Sorun couldn't help but deeply sighed as he turned away from all three echidna. The Neo-Walkers looked towards his back, while Tikal stared towards him in concern. Sorun, meanwhile, couldn't help but to run his hand over his forehead as he took a shuddering breath. The uncertainty of it all, it killed him. Dying knowing he saved everyone was one thing. Dying knowing he failed everyone was another. But dying and not knowing? It at least had a chance of everything working out, but that hope, that poisonous hope that filled him with nothing but worry and doubt... somehow it gave even more anxiety than knowing he failed. Because he didn't want to hope it'd work out only for the world to die anyway.

But want it or not, the hope was there. Maybe the Freedom Fighters could win after all; they were certainly playing with a stacked deck since New Megaopolis was mostly destroyed. But Eggman was so dangerous, and... and he didn't know. Then again, they'd been dealing with him for a majority of their life, since they were kids. Him and a previous version. They knew how to deal with him. Maybe they could pull a win off and save the world all on their own. The chances were honestly quite high from where he was seeing them.

"... Okay, fine. Maybe I did enough to save the world. And I can tell we're never gonna agree on that curse, so let's just drop it so we don't spend forever arguing." He turned towards the Neo-Walkers and Tikal, the latter of which had calmed down some. "Fact is with the way I left things there's actually a pretty good chance the Freedom Fighters will win. Nothing to do there but hope." He slowly breathed out as his eyes narrowed at the two red echidna. "What's done is done. Just tell me if it's true."

"Is what true?" Aurora asked.

"Did you bring Knuckles back to life once after he died?"

He didn't even need an answer from them; their reactions said enough. The wide eyes, their feet shifting uncomfortably, the worried looks and slight grimaces. That was all Sorun needed to see if it was true or not.

"Ha ha..." Sorun couldn't help but laugh. A dry, humorless laugh made with a broken voice as Sorun began to approach them. "Wow. Ain't that something." He stopped right in front of Athair. "You send a guy to die and don't even offer to bring him back afterwards." His hands shot up and gripped the old echidna's shoulders, and before he could do anything he began to shake him. "Why!?" Sorun shouted out in a frantic voice. "Why would you do that to me!? WHY DID YOU MAKE ME GO THROUGH ALL THIS DRAMA IF YOU COULD HAVE JUST BROUGHT ME BACK AFTERWARDS!?"

The calm, cool façade he'd tried to use cracked apart. He couldn't keep it up at that point. He wanted to know. He needed to know why they didn't offer to bring him back, why they wouldn't offer it even now. He didn't want to be dead anymore.

His shaking was stopped when an orange-furred pair of arms grasped at Sorun's own arm. When he stopped, Sorun looked to the side at Tikal, who was giving him a pleading, sorrowful look. He sighed and relaxed at the sight of her eyes, and then relented by letting go of Athair's shoulders and stepping back. Tikal let go of him after.

"Sorun, in truth, we can't even understand how it is you're here speaking with us," Athair said, making Sorun look back up. "You have no link to the Chaos Force. You are not even from this world. We'd known right away that you wouldn't have been bound for the afterlife, let alone be here to give us an audience. We didn't know what would happen to your soul once you, well... expired."

"I went somewhere really dark, that's where I went," Sorun snapped at him. "What, I'm not from here and don't have a link, so instead of going where everyone else goes I had to go to that... that void? Is that it!?" Sorun began to grow livid again. "You thought once I died I'd never be around to bug you again so you never even bothered to offer me a chance at revival!?"

"Sorun." Tikal placed a calming hand on the teen's shoulder. He huffed out in anger, but calmed down afterwards. The orange echidna removed her hand, and then faced the other two echidna. "You truly did not know what would become of him once his life ended?" she asked.

Both red echidna shook their heads. "You have to understand that he is a true enigma," Aurora stated in an attempt to explain. "We didn't know what the consequence would be of him not being able to enter the afterlife due to his lack of a natural Chaos Force link. We still struggle to comprehend how his species can even exist. How were we to know he would end up in... what did you say it was?" She looked back to Sorun. "A void?"

"There was nothing there," Sorun said. "Nothin' but black. Don't even know how long I was there, it... I didn't have an awareness of time there. Coulda been seconds, coulda been years, I-I don't..." He got a headache just thinking about it, and then shook his head. "I won't speak of it. Don't even remember much of it," he said as he looked back up at the echidna, who had all widened their eyes at him. "I cut my way out of that place with the Yamato. Still have my powers, you see. Ended up here with..." He trailed off, and then rose his hands up to his face. "... How did I touch you?"

Athair blinked in confusion. "Pardon?"

"The last time I was here, when I tried touching you, I just kept going through you," Sorun mumbled out. "But just now, I touched you. Shook you."

"You were a mental projection back then," Aurora helpfully supplied. "But now, somewhat like us, you're an intangible being. Though while we're beings ascended due to our closeness with the Chaos Force, you... seem to have so much energy yourself that your non-corporeal form seems to exist in a somewhat similar state as we do."

"So what you're saying is... I can touch you..."

"Yes, it seems so. I would actually be fascinated to learn just how you are still connected with the Chaos Emer-"

"So what you're saying is... I can use violence..."

The world around them seemed to go quiet. Sorun continued to blankly stare at his hands. Tikal stumbled back a bit, a shocked expression growing on her face as she looked towards Sorun. The Neo-Walkers began to grow extremely uncomfortable, and began to nervously glance at one another.

"Sorun?" Tikal meekly called out. "W-what do you mean by that? You aren't... please do not say such things..."

The white-haired Earthling was still looking at his hands, silently contemplating his options. The facts of everything that had happened, what he could and couldn't do, what was most likely to work and what wasn't. All these thoughts passed him in a flash, aided by the focus gained by his broiling anger. And eventually, he came to a conclusion.

Instantly, an unsheathed Yamato appeared in his right hand, and after quickly cutting a cross in the air, a portal was made. Next his left Bringer Claw formed, shot out, and grabbed Tikal by the waist. She'd cried out in surprise as she was lifted up.

"Sorun! Please don't do this!" When he looked up at the echidna girl, to his surprise, he saw her giving him a pleading look. Not a look that was scared by being held up like that, but a pleading one. She was even crying. "I-I know you are deeply upset, but violence-!"

"Tikal... you're probably the kindest person I've ever met." Sorun's soft voice cut her off and made her elicit a surprised gasp. "You went up to bat for a guy you just met. You sacrificed your life just to watch over Chaos and those Chao. You're... truly, you're a saint. And I thank you for everything you've done for me. You deserve nothing but the best. But this is my life. And I'll do whatever is necessary to reclaim it." He looked to the side at the portal. "You don't need to see me do that. So I'm sending you back. Tell Chaos I said goodbye."

Ignoring her pleading cries, Sorun threw Tikal through the portal. He then swiped his sword over it to close it immediately after, and then he dispelled the sword completely. Before either Aurora or Athair could get a word in edgewise, he Tricked right behind them, and slowly and gently wrapped his arms over their shoulders as he leaned forwards between them.

"Buddy...! P al ..." Both echidna stiffened up at the sound of his voice so close to them. Unusually happy, which fit the small, genuine grin on his face, but there was an undertone of something sinister to his voice. He looked at Aurora in particular. "Listen, I won't lie. I came in here ready to plead for my life. I would have thrown myself to your feet, crying and begging for you to bring me back. I would have reduced myself to a pathetic mess if it meant even a chance at going back. But if I can just punch you in the face...? Well, that changes the whole game, don't it?"

He let go of them both before they could say anything and began walking forwards. "Here's the deal," he said with his back to them. "I did what you asked to the best of my ability, died, and cut my way outta hell just to get here." He stopped and turned back towards them. The smile was gone. "So you owe me. I want my revive."

"You're demanding we help restore your life?" Athair incredulously stated. A deep frown settled over his face. "And you're threatening to attack us if we don't cooperate?"

"Nah, you both are getting your asses kicked regardless," Sorun corrected him. "What I'm saying is either I smack you two around a bit and you bring me back to life afterwards, or you refuse. In which case, ooh..." He slowly exhaled and shook his head. "It's a fair trade, all things considered. You don't even lose anything from it. Just bring me back."

"It is not that simple," Aurora stated with a shake of her head, causing Sorun to look towards her.

"Enlighten me, then," he responded in an impatient tone. "If Knuckles could do it, then why can't I?"

"There were special circumstances regarding him," she explained. "His unique lineage, the tampering of his body to be more in-tune with the Chaos Force, all of these factors culminated into him becoming the equivalent of a living Chaos Emerald. He'd ascended to our level, was slated to enwrap himself with the Chaos Force to become one with the cosmos... until he gave it up just to return to Mobius," she added in a slightly bitter tone.

"Yeah, well, you see Knuckles possesses something I'm pretty sure a majority of echidna don't possess: common fucking sense," Sorun said in an equally bitter tone, making the two echidna bristle a bit. "And he became a living Chaos Emerald? Good for him. I have seven of them in me. If it's an issue of power I don't see how I don't got it."

Athair shook his head. "It's not just about the power. A Mobian who wishes for a second chance at life must be worthy of it."

"What the- wor- what the fuck kind of bullshit, arbitrary criteria are you pulling this from!?" Sorun shouted at him. "'Gotta be worthy', alright, okay, the hell does that mean? The power, 'cause I got that! What, what did me sacrificing my life not constitute as being 'worthy' enough to be brought back? I'm failing to see what the fuck Knuckles did that was so special that he was deemed worthy that I didn't do!"

"It's a process that's never been tested on one who is not a Mobian!" Athair argued. "Or even one such as you that lacks a link to the Chaos Force for that matter!"

"So what!? I have got literally nothing to lose and everything to gain on this!" Sorun argued back. "And, and what, it's a definite rule it don't work on non-Mobians? You tested it?"

Both the Neo-Walkers gave each other unsure looks. It made Sorun groan out loudly at the sight, causing him to shake his head.

"Okay, so no, then." He inhaled deeply, clapped his hands together, and pointed the tips of his fingers at the pair. "I'm losin' my patience. You two owe me for all the grief you've put me through. Just bring me back and you'll never hear from me again. I'll drop everything I have against you two if you just bring me back."

"Perhaps... perhaps he is right." Aurora looked to Athair in surprise when he said that. Sorun himself stopped speaking to silently observe the pair. "He's a young lad who had no business in getting caught up in all this to begin with. And what he speaks is true... he would indeed be deemed worthy for the second life."

While Athair looked to be considering the argument, Aurora looked the exact opposite. Disagreeing and seemingly completely against the idea. "I don't want him existing on Mobius or anywhere else in the universe with that sword," she said. "You know as well as I do the destructive potential the thing holds just by looking at it! Somebody like him can't be trusted with an object such as that! It's pure evil!" She cast a narrowed, heated look towards Sorun. "And I have to question just how worthy he can really be, seeing as it was his heart that spawned that abomination."

Sorun offered her a flat look. "Lady, it's a sword I copied from a video game."

"Would that even be an issue?" Athair questioned, drawing back the attention of the other two. "The process involves sacrificing one's Chaos-derived abilities in order to return. That is the cost of the worthy attaining their second life. He would lose all of his powers just as Knuckles did, the sword included."

"Well, that's even better!" Sorun exclaimed. "I get rid of the powers that are killing me, you don't have to worry about the Yamato anymore, not that you needed to, but whatever, it's a win-win! There's no reason not to do it if that's the case!"

He hadn't even known losing all his powers would be a part of the deal of this "second life" business. He probably should have figured there'd be some price to pay to have a second chance at life, and as far as they went, it made enough sense. Admittedly he'd been wondering in the back of his mind what he was gonna do to circumvent the powers that were actively killing his real body, but if he'd just completely lose them upon coming back, then it worked out perfectly.

"Kinda figures that the only thing that can remove the Chaos Emeralds is me dying and coming back to life... sheesh..."

"Knuckles regained his base abilities," Aurora hissed at Athair. "There's no guarantee Sorun will not do the same."

"Ah, yeah, 'cause I'd be so heartbroken about losing the powers taking years off my life that I'd scramble at the first opportunity to get them back," Sorun sarcastically remarked. "Aurora, come on," he continued in a serious tone, "I hate these powers. They're cool, sure, but I don't want them if they're costing me my life! Why would I be fighting so hard to go back to being alive just to kill myself with the powers again!?" He shook his head at her. "It doesn't make sense! I don't want powers! I just want to live!"

It was such a good argument that Sorun would have thought it was infallible. They wouldn't lose anything, and he wouldn't be a danger without his abilities. Nobody stood to lose anything while he stood to gain everything. It was beyond reasonable from his perspective.

But then Aurora went and shook her head, and Sorun went completely still as a result.

"I'm sorry, but I can't agree to it," she said. "It poses too great a risk. That sword... that rancid, dark energy it uses... I don't want something like that on Mobius. I'll say it as many times as needed, but you and I both know the destructive potential it holds, and I do not trust him to use it responsibly or to never regain-!"

Sorun Tricked right between them. His right fist swung backwards, and he backhanded Aurora right in the muzzle. Her head was whipped backwards from the contact with the fist, followed by her entire body being launched backwards. She flew back a whole ten meters, and then rolled across the golden, cloud-like floor for another five meters before stopping.

Athair stared over at Aurora's body in shock, and upon hearing the sounds of rapid footsteps, turned his head. He'd done so just in time to see Sorun run up right to him, jump in the air while turning his body, and then kick the bottom of both of his feet right into Athair's face. The dropkick sent him sprawling back in the opposite direction

Aurora had flown in, while Sorun had fallen onto his back from the resulting dropkick only to then slowly pick himself up.

"It's the smackdown of the century." Sorun slowly began to walk towards Aurora while the female echidna picked herself up, straightening out his white sleeves all the while. "You either bring me back or I spend an eternity beating your asses in. I'm content either way."

"Who do you think you are?" Shakily, Aurora looked up to Sorun with defiant eyes. "We-!"

"Don't give a fuck." Sorun Tricked in front of her, rose his foot up, and stomped it down on the back of her head so her face slammed into the cloud-like ground, making Aurora cry out in pain as a response. "I really... really don't care."

He removed his foot, and then crouched down next to Aurora's lying form. He reached forwards to grab a handful of her fleshy dreadlocks, and then pulled her face up so that their eyes were level.

"I get from your perspective I'm just some punk kid that means nothing to you all. I'm probably the most inconsequential thing in the goddamn universe compared to you immortal whatevers who are so close with the universe and the Chaos Force and all that shit. I bet I don't mean a thing to you," Sorun muttered out. "Well, it's not so different from my perspective. All your existence has done is cause me misery. I hear some people down on Mobius talk about you, but you don't do anything but send cursed kids to go do your dirty work while watching from up on high doing fuck all. You realize a good nine-tenths of your whole species is dead down there on Mobius? How the fuck can people see you as gods when you can't even protect your own echidna kind?"

He slammed Auroa's face down on his own knee, making her cry out in pain again. He rose it up so they could look at each other again, and though there was a line of blood trailing out from her nose, Aurora still had that defiant look.

"You're nothin'. Some random bitch and an old dude who fell into some power and don't know what to do with it. That's all we are in the end. Random fucks with more power than we know what to do with. We ain't special. We aren't better than anybody else. Which is why it really pisses me off when people like you adopt this high and mighty attitude, thinking you're better than everyone else."

"We are echidna chosen to uphold the mantle entrusted to us by the Ancient Walkers...!" Green energy began to surround Aurora's hand as her defiant look turned into an angry snarl. "We possess knowledge you could never even hope to fathom or comprehend! What could you possibly know about us!?"

She reached forwards and slammed her hand into Sorun's chest. It was done with enough force that he was forced to release his hold on her, and was sent sliding back across the ground. He stopped after a few meters, and with an annoyed expression looked sown at his chest, seeing a mixture of green and purple bolts of electricity arcing out of the spot on his chest Aurora had touched.

The next second found Yamato forming in his hand, followed by Sorun stabbing it right into his own neck. Aurora flinched back in shock at the sight, while Sorun grimaced a bit in pain from the implement sticking through him. Blue energy flickered along the sword's edge, and the small, sparking spot on his chest proceeded to float off, and then dissipate entirely once it was removed from him.

After that was done, Sorun tore the sword right through his neck. Despite the fact such a wound should have left his neck completely in half, it was completely intact. The wound had began healing once the blade started to move away from the wound. By the time the sword was almost out from his neck the wound was nearly healed. When it did exit, there hadn't been a single sign of his neck having been wounded. There was barely even blood it'd healed so fast.

"Your curse shit's getting real annoying," Sorun stated to Aurora. He'd taken one single step towards her, and then felt something slam into his back. Sorun stumbled forwards a bit as a result, and then turned around.

Athair was there, heavily panting with his hand extended towards Sorun, with some vestiges of green electricity arcing around his fingers. The sparking began to increase in intensity as he seemed to be preparing another attack, but before he could let it loose, a blue, spectral leg flew in and kicked him in the face. The older-looking echidna was sent tumbling backwards, while a spectral ghost of Sorun looked towards him.

"I'll beat you both at the same time if I really have to," Sorun said, blue electric sparks periodically arcing around his body. "So," he continued as he turned around and kicked Aurora right in the face, sending her flying back, "you feel like bringing me back to life yet?"

The female echidna kept rolling along the ground until she finally came to a stop. A loud groan left her as she managed to rise up to all fours, though she froze when she caught sight of a blue glow just outside of her peripheral vision. She looked up towards it, only to then freeze in confusion.

A ladder. There was a ladder made completely out of Summoned Swords sitting right in front of her. She remained confused until she looked upwards, where she saw Sorun standing right on top of the ladder. And then he leapt off, his body positioned to the side with his right elbow aimed right at Aurora's head.

There was no moving out of the way before Sorun elbow dropped Aurora right on the back of the head after jumping off the ladder made of swords. She made a pained grunt as her face slammed back into the golden floor, and received no respite after Sorun kicked her in the stomach. She was sent flying away once again, though her flight was cut short after she collided with Athair, who had been thrown in the same direction by the Doppelganger.

Both echidna collapsed onto the ground. Athair moaned out in pain and remained immobile, while Aurora attempted to stand up to her feet. She only got up partway before two spectral hands clamped onto her head and forced her down to the ground. The echidna struggled in the grasp of the Doppelganger, attempting to free herself, but her struggles proved to be in vain as it wouldn't release her. She'd only been at it for a few seconds before she heard rapid footfalls, and looked ahead just in time to see Sorun sprinting in front of her. Using the momentum of his sprint, Sorun had reared his foot back, and just as he passed Aurora he delivered a full-force kick right to her mouth while she was still behind held down by the Doppelganger.

Blood, spit, and a handful of teeth flew out from Aurora's mouth as her head was whipped back from the force of the kick. The Doppelganger disappeared at the same time, though in that same moment a clawed, spectral hand reached out and grabbed at the pained echidna's face as she was gasping for breath. Her eyes had widened, and she'd made a muffled scream into the palm of the hand as she was risen up from the ground by her head. Her feet continually kicked at the air as she clawed at the Bringer Claw holding her up, but no matter how hard she tried it gave no give to its grip. Right besides her was Athair, who was struggling equally as hard at the Bringer Claw holding him up by the face.

The two Bringer Claws moved back a bit, and then raced forwards while still holding the echidna. They slammed their bodies together forcefully enough a small shockwave had been made in addition to the sound of multiple, visceral cracks and pops. Athair's limp form was tossed to the side, while Aurora was roughly thrown onto the ground. Mere moments after she hit the ground the Bringer Claw grabbed her again, this time by the back of her head, rose her up, and then slammed her face into the solid, cloud-like floor. She screamed out in pain and reached back to try and grab at the claw, but all this did was make it lift her back up only to slam her face down again. Before she even moved, it rose her up and slammed her face back down once again. And then again. And then again. Enough times that, eventually, Aurora had gone completely limp in its grasp with her arms hanging downwards as it lifted her up. It still kept slamming her face into the ground until Sorun decided to will the Bringer Claw to just throw her away.

Watching Aurora's body tumble to a stop a fair distance away from him, Sorun let out a short breath and dispelled the Bringer Claws. He looked to the side just in time to see Athair shakily getting up to his feet. He began stomping towards him, a large blue flash going off in his hands as an object appeared: Summoned Swords position in a way that mimicked a folded-up folding chair. Once he got close enough to Athair, he swung the sword-chair right at his face. The object shattered over him, causing the dazed echidna to drop back to the ground. Sorun stared coldly down at him for some seconds, and then looked over at Aurora and began to walk towards her.

In a nutshell, she was a mess. Even after he stopped a few meters away from her, he could clearly see the damage. Her once illustrious light blue dress was torn and tattered. She was covered in bruises and bent in odd angles all over her body, though as Sorun watched he saw the bruises begin to recede and her bones shift back into place. Even as she looked back at him, her body raised up by her arms pushing against the ground, he saw the damage on her face disappearing and the teeth he'd kicked out slowly regrow.

"So you can regenerate, huh?" Sorun observed. "Well, now I'm really not gonna stop 'til you send me back."

"Why do you even want to go back!?" Aurora screamed at him. It was done in such a raised, shrill voice, and with such anger behind it that not only that voice, but the question itself, gave Sorun pause. "What difference does it make?" Aurora asked him between heavy breaths. "What does it even matter!?"

"What... does it matter?" Sorun softly echoed, so bewildered by the question that he couldn't immediately form a response. "What kind of question is that? It's my life! It matters to me!"

"You'll just die again," Aurora panted out. "You. Your friends. Your family. Every single person and life you've ever touched, and every life they've touched. That's the curse of mortality, Sorun." With a grunt, she placed a foot on the ground. "Mortals are doomed to die. That is life, pure and simple. What difference does it make whether you die now or die decades from now if we did bring you back?" she asked as she stood up to her full height. "The end result... is the same. There's no point-"

A Bringer Claw shot forwards and punched Aurora right in the center of her face, sending her flying right onto her back.

"You think life is meaningless... just because it's limited...?" Sorun muttered out, eyes coldly locked onto Aurora's form as the Bringer Claw hanging from his shoulder disappeared. "Life has meaning because it's limited, you goddamn bastard," he angrily stated as he began stomping forwards. "Of course it ends at some point. Everything does. That's the pain of living life. How are you supposed to appreciate all the joys in life without all the pain, too? That isn't living. That's just existing. A meaningless existence." He stopped right in front of Aurora, who had looked up at him with her eyes. Even now, even after all the beating and the words he'd said, she still looked like she completely disagreed with Sorun. "Has being some immortal god living up in the clouds really made you forgotten all that?" Sorun asked her.

"There's no meaning to anything you speak of," Aurora denied. "I forsook all that when I ascended to this plane of existence. I cast it all aside to gain intrinsic knowledge of the cosmos. Of everything ! How could living a life so short it couldn't even be measured be worth more than what I and Athair have become!?"

"And where's all that knowledge gotten you?" Sorun questioned. "Getting kicked around by me?" He gave her a flat look as he glanced around. "Through your own means you got to this grand status. Got titled Neo-Walkers by the Ancient Walkers, whoever the fuck those guys were. But I guess even gods can die if they're not around anymore." He shook his head. "Gettin' off topic. My point is... what's the actual point of being what you are? You know every single secret in the cosmos. Good for you. Evidently you don't know every single little thing since you can't seem to figure out anything around me, but that doesn't matter. You ascended up to this immortal plane and get to look over everybody else like gods. Sure. But what the hell's the point of that?"

Sorun grabbed Aurora by the shoulders, and then smashed his fist into her face. She didn't even make a sound and continued to glare at him. "The Ancient Walkers did jack shit when the first Robotnik laid waste to Mobian civilization and roboticized all those people. They just sat on their asses and watched as a group of kids had to sacrifice their childhoods to go and save everyone." He roughly threw her body away. "They died and left you to take the reigns, and they were probably happy to leave your dumb asses filling the seats. And what did you all do? Keep watching? Sent me when things got bad 'cause your future vision got fucked with my mere presence? You call yourselves gods that people pray to?"

"You know nothing..." Aurora spat out as she sat up to look at Sorun as he approached her. "Nothing of what we do, what we know, what we exist to do..."

"Yeah, you're right, I don't. Because I've yet to see the results of what you Neo-Walkers existing even accomplishes," Sorun said. "And you know what? At the end of the day I don't care, because evidently it doesn't fucking matter since it doesn't affect anybody on Mobius. Or maybe it does and I just don't know it because my puny mortal brain can't comprehend it. Whatever. It still doesn't matter." He backhanded Aurora and sent her sprawling to the ground. "You really piss me off talkin' like life doesn't matter, Aurora. You don't know what the value of a life is."

Aurora coughed, and then rolled onto her back. "And you do? You know what the value of a life is?"

"It's priceless. Irreplaceable. You can't put a value on a life," Sorun said as he looked down at her. "I never wanted to kill Eggman. I would have done it because he's somebody who doesn't value life at all and snuffs it out or enslaves it just for the fun of it, and because I genuinely believe he'd never change and is too dangerous to be kept imprisoned, but I didn't want to. Killing him would have been just as wrong as killing anyone else. But I would have done it anyway, if only because I didn't want my friends to suffer anymore. I wanted to do it so nobody else had to. Or would, even." A short sigh left him. "As bad as you are, I'm not gonna kill you or Athair. You're just not worth it, and I really don't know if killing you would invite a whole bunch of catastrophic consequences or not, because I don't know how important you Neo-Walkers actually are. I'm serious about beating you two up until you agree to bring me back, though."

"You'd truly spend an eternity doing this to us? Out of what? Spite?"

Sorun gave the echidna a look that almost seemed disappointed. "Bitch, I literally have nothing better to do." He stomped down on Aurora again, causing her to yell out in pain. "Not gonna lie, though. I stopped getting any satisfaction out of it pretty damn fast."

And so he kept beating her and Athair. Again and again, over and over. He ran out of the mental energy needed to be creative with it pretty quickly. It'd devolved to just punching and kicking the both of them, repetitively to a nauseating degree. He stopped bothering to use his powers at some point. He just kept assaulting and beating them, relentlessly, without end.

It became tiring to him so quickly. There'd been so much satisfaction from it at first. The release of all his stress, the vindication for having been dragged through all this grief for nothing, his frustrations released every time he punched one of them in the face. It felt great at the beginning when he was beating them senseless without end. His attacks fueled by the memories of that first meeting, what they'd said and done to him, what they refused to do now. But it faded over time, quickly. Soon enough there wasn't any joy in it. No pleasure. No satisfaction or vindication. All he was doing was beating on these two helpless echidna. Some woman and an old man.

But the knowledge he could go back spurned him on. Knowing he could return to his life, that he could have it all back, that the only reason he couldn't go back was because they were being so damn stubborn . Every time a fist or a foot landed on one of them he'd plead in the back of his mind that they would just give up and bring him back already. He'd gone from being glad he was beating on them to just being apathetic and sad over it, but over time that apathy just began to fester into anger the longer this went on. The longer they held on for no other reason than they wouldn't bring him back.

"Just... give up already...!" His movements began becoming more frantic, more savage as Sorun grew more angry and desperate. Limbs were being clawed at and snapped at opposite angles. Bones were broken and shattered. They'd heal their wounds only for Sorun to inflict them all over again. But no matter how far he went they just wouldn't give in. "Do you really hate me so much that you're trying to see if your spite can outlast mine? Or are you so worried about the power behind Yamato you'd endure this just to protect the planet from it? I don't want to hurt anyone with it. I don't even want the Yamato itself. I just want to live..."

He never understood why people were so scared of the Yamato whenever they felt it. Sonic and Knuckles had been off-put by it when they felt it. Shadow had been cautious of it. Enerjak feared it, Finitevus seemed enthralled by it, and the Neo-Walkers seemed to fear it just as much as Enerjak did. Sorun didn't understand why. Just because it felt evil? Just because it had a massive amount of power behind that feeling? Was that truly it? It was just a powerful sword that felt evil? It was just a sword. A sword from a video game. What could they possibly know about it? He knew more about it than anybody else on Mobius!

Maybe that was why, he'd realized as he tossed Aurora's body away for what felt like the millionth time. They just didn't understand the Yamato, why behind all that power it felt so evil. They feared what they didn't understand, so they'd rather quarantine Sorun here as a ghost with them if it meant it wasn't on Mobius. Even if it meant Sorun torturing them like this for the rest of eternity.

He didn't want to regain the Yamato if he lost it. He didn't want to keep beating them like this anymore. He just wanted to go back to being alive.

"Aurora... listen..." Sorun tried, sounding tired himself. "I... I seriously just want to go back to being alive. I don't want the sword. I don't have any desire to reclaim it once I've lost it. It's not worth losing over a decade of my life."

"I can't trust that..." After coughing a few times, Aurora picked herself up into a sitting position and looked towards Sorun. "I won't allow... that thing to exist on Mobius..."

"Why are you so frightened of it? It's just a sword!" Sorun shouted. "What do you think I'm gonna do with it, huh!? What do you people keep seeing in it that makes it so bad!?"

"I don't know what it is!" Aurora screamed at him. "Only that it's wrong and it shouldn't have that much power! That sword is something that has enough power to potentially bring ruin to the world! That much power, with how wrong it feels, held in the hands of somebody like you-!"

"It won't even exist anymore if you bring me back!" Sorun argued back. "Why don't you believe me when I say I'll never try and get the Yamato back!?"

"Why would I trust you to be truthful?" Aurora asked him. She was still grimacing in pain despite her healing body, but she'd managed to get up as far as her knees as she continued looking towards Sorun. "An impulsive... young and foolish human like you... that can't even comprehend the magnitude of power he carries in that sword, who is outright defiant towards anybody he doesn't like and craves power. Do you think I was not watching you during the duration of your life on Mobius after out meeting?" She shook her head, and then proceeded to glower up at Sorun. "You're an impertinent, shameless individual who cares not for how his actions affects others. If there is one person who should never hold that kind of power... it's you, Sorun."

Anger flared in Sorun at Aurora's remark. His fists clenched, and he began stomping forwards. "You don't know a thing about me, about the Yamato, about anything !"

"I know there's a chance you would consider regaining your powers if it was a matter of your friends' safety." Aurora's words made Sorun pause in his steps. "Perhaps somebody would be in danger. Maybe you would seek to regain some of your abilities, including that sword. Maybe you wouldn't. Maybe somebody hoping to exploit your abilities would force them back onto you. Maybe you would accidentally stumble back onto them! Even if you're truthful and truly don't wish to regain your powers if you regained your second life, Sorun, I just can't trust that you would remain true to your word, willingly or not, because there are simply too many variables to account for. I can't trust you with that power. And I can't trust you to never regain it. That is why I will not bring you back."

She was dead serious. Sorun saw it in her eyes. Past all the physical pain, she was willing to let this continue probably forever if it meant there was no possibility of Yamato going back to Mobius. She'd damn herself to an eternity of this hell just because she was that afraid of the Yamato, and saw Sorun in such a low light. Had such a low opinion of him.

He would have said he didn't blame her if he didn't know she and everyone else that saw Yamato were blowing its abilities out of proportion. He knew it better than anyone. He knew it wasn't capable of the things they were claiming it could do. The potential to bring ruin to the world? It couldn't do that. It was just a sword with powers. That was it. He was right. They were wrong. All of them were wrong. And it made him so furious that he was being refused a second life just because everybody but him was wrong.

Sorun started walking back forwards. He didn't care how long it took, how much he had to brutalize her and Athair until he got his way. He was going back. He-

A pair of arms wrapped tightly around his midsection from behind and stopped him in his tracks. Sorun growled out loud as he looked down, expecting it was Athair who had grabbed him from behind, looked down expecting to see his red-furred arms. But when he saw orange arms instead of red, he stopped completely with a gasp as his eyes opened wide. Not Athair's arms. And if they were orange...

"Sorun... Sorun, please stop..."

It certainly wasn't Athair's voice that sounded like its owner was crying. He didn't sound that young. Or female, for that matter. And he was able to put the pieces together quickly enough to figure out who it was.

"How... I left that first portal open," Sorun realized as he craned his head behind him. It was Tikal, with tears streaming down her face. She looked up at Sorun, sorrow and anguish filling her features with her arms still holding onto him, and all Sorun could do was stutter out her name. "T-Tikal..."

"T-this isn't right, Sorun," she wept at him. "I know how upset you are, I know how unfair this is to you, bu-but please, please just stop... this isn't the right thing to do..."

"Don't listen to her."

Sorun gasped out again, and looked to his left. He saw a mirror version of himself, standing right there besides him and looking him in the eyes. And evidently he was the only one that saw him, as no one else paid him any mind. The other Sorun, meanwhile, just continued to stare into Sorun's eyes.

"She forced that curse on us, treated us like an item, like our life didn't have any value, and now she won't bring us back just because she doesn't like us and the sword?" the other Sorun asked. "What right does she have to make that kind of choice? To keep our life away from us?"

Sorun didn't have an answer to his mirror image. All he could do was hold a hand to the orange ones pressing against him as he looked down.

"I..." Sorun attempted to say, but words failed to come out of him. He didn't know what to say.

"It's not too late, Sorun, you haven't done any permanent harm." Tikal had pressed her tear-ridden face into his back while also squeezing him harder. "Just please stop, I beg you. We'll find a way to bring you back, I promise. Just please... please stop hurting them..."

"We deserve our life back," the other Sorun said. "I don't care who we have to hurt to get it back. And them? They deserve it more than anyone." He leaned closer to Sorun's ear as he continued to look down. "It's all Aurora's fault. Brutalize her. Eviscerate her. Gouge out her eyes. Tear out her organs. I. Don't. Care. And if you end up killing her? Well, we still have Athair over there..."

"Please, Sorun..."

"Take back our life."

"I..." Sorun began shaking in Tikal's grasp. "I don't know what I'm supposed to do..."

"I'll give you your second life."

Sorun felt his own head snap upwards when he heard that voice. Tikal had gasped out behind him, and the other Sorun had vanished right at that instant. Aurora was gaping towards something at his right side, causing Sorun to turn in the same direction.

It was Athair. He looked worse for wear - probably because Sorun suplexed him - and was limping towards the group with his back hunched, though his physical wounds were slowly healing before Sorun's eyes. He stopped right in front of Sorun, looking up at Sorun with an expression he couldn't quite read. He looked... thoughtful, Sorun supposed. That was all he could think of to describe that look. Thoughtful and a bit ashamed. Whether it was at himself, or Sorun, or both, he wasn't quite sure of.

"Athair!" Aurora cried out as she stood to her full height. "You cannot mean to say-!"

"Regardless of what umbrage we hold him in, the boy is right," Athair interrupted while giving Aurora a stern look, freezing her in place. "We used him when we had no right to, and he's done enough to earn his second life. For us Neo-Walkers to deny him that after all this would be... hypocritical of us, would it not?" He grimaced a bit as he turned to the side. "Besides. I'm an old man, immortal or not," he grumbled as he rubbed at his neck. "My neck can't handle being slammed like that."

"Yeah, sorry about hitting you with the Canadian Destroyer..." Sorun quietly apologized. "I'm, uh... I'm real desperate here, y'know?"

No further words were said between the four of them. Tikal had unwrapped her arms from Sorun and stepped to his side while nervously glancing back and forth between the three of them. Athair continued holding his expression, Aurora looked upset, and Sorun was just straight confused at what was happening at the moment.

"You're taking his side in this?" Aurora asked in a low tone as she turned to Athair. "You did the exact same thing when we had this incident with Knuckles. You always-!"

"You did this with Knuckles, too?" Sorun asked in disbelief. "Oh my god, I can't- you're just awful," he mumbled as he began rubbing at his temples. "I'm not even the first person you've done this to. What is wrong with you?"

"I told you that his circumstances were completely different from your own." She turned back to Athair. "You cannot seriously be considering-"

"Aurora, my mind is made up. The decision is final," Athair stated. "You cannot impede me, and we've too many responsibilities to be beaten senseless for the rest of time. Besides that, we've a title to uphold." His eyes glanced to the side at Sorun. "I title I fear we haven't done much justice in the eyes of some." He turned completely to Sorun. "I can't say I approve of the way you think of us and criticize us, and I agree with Aurora when she says you know too little of us to judge, but... many of your arguments are valid as well."

Aurora shook her head and took a step forwards. "The power in his sword-"

"It is a risk we are simply going to have to take," Athair said, interrupting her again. "Maybe you've lose faith in people," he continued as he gave her a stern look from the side of his eyes, "but I've still come to hold onto the belief that you can place faith in others, Aurora." He made a small "hmph" noise, and then turned back to Sorun. "We were watching when you confronted our friend Merlin, Sorun. In truth, if it hadn't been for the fact you spared him... I wouldn't be offering you this."

"... That so?" Sorun responded, voice a bit unsure.

"It is," he confirmed with a nod. "I can't rightly say whether I know what your alignment is, young man. Whether I can call you good or not."

"I can't just be Sorun?"

Athair made another "hmph" sound. "You strike me as someone who marches to the beat of their own drum," he said. "I struggle to see if it's just teenage rebellion or if you live just to spite others at heart, but regardless of all that, your words on life ring true to me. That along with your actions with Merlin say enough that, while Aurora may not place enough trust to give you the benefit of the doubt, I do. You've earned that much at least."

"Earned. Right." Lightly breathing out, Sorun glanced around at the three echidna and made a sigh. "So, what now?"

The portal Sorun had opened previously pulsed gently in front of them. Sorun casually blinked at the sight of it, and then turned to the side to glance at Tikal. She wasn't even paying the portal much mind, with her focus mainly situated on Sorun. She'd stopped crying, thankfully enough. She even looked a bit happy now if the small smile she had on said anything. He was glad that he got to leave her with a smile on her face.

"So you're going back to be with Chaos and the Chao?" Sorun asked her.

She nodded at him. "Yes. I belong with them."

"... Forever, though?" Sorun mumbled out as he looked to the side. "There's nothing I...?"

Tikal made a small laugh. "You're sweet to offer, but you needn't worry. I said I was content, did I not?"

"Yeah. You did." As long as she and the rest there were happy, he supposed he didn't need to worry too much about them. They seemed fine with their lot in life. It was enough for him to accept. "Thanks for, uh... you know... helping me and stopping me..." Sorun trailed off and rubbed at the back of his neck. "I kinda flew off the handle, admittedly. Just a little."

Maybe more than a little. Maybe forcing Aurora to bite down on a Summoned Sword so he could stomp on her head and break all her teeth had been a bit much. In his defense he'd been justifiably upset at the time and they could rapidly heal the injuries.

The smile on Tikal dropped off a little. "I've always abhorred violence in all its forms, Sorun. I realize not all situations can be resolved peacefully, but I still believe a peaceful solution should be sought out above all others." She glanced behind them, with Sorun following her eyes. The Neo-Walkers were standing a short distance behind them. "I can't say I approve of what you did to them. Nothing they did called for that amount of abuse, Sorun."

The white-haired teen found himself wincing at her soft, scolding tone. "They wouldn't bring me back to life," he weakly said in an attempt to defend himself.

Tikal made a small sigh. "Yes, I know. They shouldn't have done that, either. Or used you. It seems everyone is a bit at fault." They looked back into each other's eyes. "But it's nothing that cannot be fixed, correct?"

"... If they really do bring me back, sure," Sorun reluctantly agreed. "They said it's never been done on a non-Mobian. We don't even know if it'll work."

"I'm sure it will work out fine," Tikal assured him. "Just... promise me one thing, Sorun? Please try and remember what I said about violence. I want you to enjoy your next life, with others. With friends. And I don't want something like... like what you did with them to come between all that." Her eyes briefly flicked to the other two echidna before going back to a wide-eyed Sorun. "So just please try and remember not to turn to violence so easily? For me?"

"... Haah..." A sound between a sigh and a breath left Sorun as he turned away from Tikal while rubbing at the back of his neck. "Even after all this, you just want to make sure I end up happy, huh...?" He glanced back at Tikal. "You're too good for this world, Tikal. We would have been great friends if you were still alive."

"Are we not friends now?"

The question caught Sorun a bit off guard. Tikal had giggled at the expression Sorun made as a result, which made him laugh in turn at both her and the question. He made one last laugh, and then let his hand drop down to his side.

"You got me there," he admitted. "I'll try. Try to... just enjoy my new life. I never really even liked fighting if I'm being honest with you." He paused, took one last look at Tikal's face, and then looked back at the portal. "Bye, Tikal. Thanks for everything. Give the others my regards, would you?"

"I will." She gave him a final nod. "Goodbye, Sorun. I hope you find happiness in your new life."

She left through the portal right after that. Sorun closed the portal right behind her, and as Yamato disappeared from his hands he turned back to the Neo-Walkers. Aurora was still scowling at him, arms crossed, blue dress already repaired. Athair wasn't as expressive as her, more neutral than anything else, but underneath that was still that unreadable expression. Sorun couldn't figure him out. Didn't care to, either, seeing as he'd never see them again after this. At least he hoped so.

He began approaching them while trying to keep a straight face. He stopped right in front of them, and then turned to Aurora. The deep scowl wouldn't leave her face, but after everything, Sorun couldn't find it in himself to be mad at her for making that face. A bit exhausted towards her, maybe. But that was it.

"I'm being completely honest with you when I say I don't want to try and get the powers back," he told her for the last time. "You don't have to worry about the Yamato."

"So you say," she dismissively stated, turning away from Sorun. "... That sword. It's from a game from your world, yes?" she asked, still facing away from Sorun. "Is the reason the sword feels so evil hidden in those games? Why it's like that?"

"..." Sorun lifted up his left hand and let the katana spawn in his grasp. After all this, he supposed they deserved some answer. "The Yamato was a sword forged when a legendary demon of unparalleled power sheared off a third of his own soul to create it. He made a second sword that was the Yamato's complete opposite using the second third of his soul, a claymore named the Rebellion, and one day gifted them both to his twin sons, while the final third was kept to himself in the form of a sword named after himself." The sword disappeared, and when he looked back up, Aurora had turned her head back around to look at him. "That's how it goes in the games, at least," Sorun finished. "The one I have is just a replica. A perfect replica, maybe. But still a replica."

"A sword forged from the soul of a demon..." Aurora mumbled to herself. "Fitting. For how it feels." She paused. "Is that why it feels that way? That... dark aura? Is that sword alive?"

"Hard to say," Sorun honestly answered. "This specific one was made from a Chaos Emerald, not a soul. But it's also an exact recreation, or at least as close as my heart could make, so... I don't know. In the games making weapons from demons' souls was a common thing. But Yamato was only made with a third of a soul. And even then it was the strongest Devil Arm in that entire universe despite only being made from a third of a soul."

"The demon it came from was truly that strong?" Aurora asked. "Why?"

Sorun shrugged. "Who's to say why Sparda was so strong? The story didn't go into much detail," he said. "It's said he found love in the human race and awoke to justice in the wake of the enslavement of humanity perpetrated by all demon kind. He was the only demon to ever do such a thing, and that love awakened a power that made him stronger than the strongest of devils and mad demon kings who gorged themselves on fruit made from human blood all for the sake of power. Strong enough to beat all of hell, the entirety of the demon world, singlehandedly. Or maybe he was just born that tough. Or both. If you want my interpretation, it was both." He rose his hands up and interlocked them behind his head. "But he did find love, and later, long after liberating the human race and separating the human and demon worlds with the Yamato, found an even deeper love in a human and married her. After that they had the twins I mentioned. One that dressed in blue, and one that dressed in red. Twin half-devils that were fiercely competitive, to the point that, if the swords gifted by their father were alive, were only ever truly alive when they clashed."

A deep hum rumbled from Athair's throat. "Swords coming to life just to fight one another, eh...?"

"It was a deep rivalry," Sorun explained. "Between both the twins and their swords. That was just the way it was. The one who wields Yamato, and the one who wields Rebellion, are destined to fight. There's no getting around it."

"... And you said the twins dressed in blue and red."

"Yes, that's right."

"What color did the twin who used the sword opposite of yours wear?"

"The one who used Rebellion?" Sorun asked. "Red. The Yamato wielder wore blue."

For some reason, his answer caused unsettlement between the two echidna. They both glanced at each other with worried looks, making Sorun look at them oddly as his hands dropped back down to his sides. Eventually, they both focused back on him.

"Something the matter?" Sorun questioned.

Athair shook his head. "It's nothing you should concern yourself with."

"Okay...?" Weird, but he didn't want to stick around much longer to puzzle the two out. "Can I please go back now?"

"Yes, of course." Athair rose his hand up to Sorun's chest, and pressed his palm against the teen's body. It began to grow a soft green. "With Knuckles, he was able to do this under his own power. I suppose we'll have to help you as your own powers are so... rigid, so to speak." He looked up to Sorun's eyes. "Remember that the second life only works once. If you die again, then that's it. There are no third chances."

"Bit contrived, but alright." Sorun glanced down at the hand on his chest. "So this is it, huh?"

"You don't seem too excited," Athair noted, with just the barest hint of amusement to his voice.

"I'm leaving all the excitement for if this works and I do come back to life."

"Having doubts?"

"Some," Sorun admitted. "You said this has never been tried with someone like me before." He saw that his body was beginning to disappear from his limbs up. Their colors would shift to a green color, and then begin to vanish entirely. "If I'm to be truthful, I really don't know if, when I open my eyes, it'll be on that metal bed in the morgue. I hope it is, but... this just seems too easy. To just get a second chance like this." He looked up at the two echidna. "Guess this is goodbye. No hard feelings?"

The unamused looks they gave him said enough. Considering all he'd put them through, he couldn't blame them. He'd be incredibly salty, too, if somebody whooped his ass as bad as he'd done them. He didn't find himself caring at all.

"Yeah, I don't like you either," he said. His torso and head was beginning to vanish. He turned to Aurora. "I don't really have any final words for you. Just... I don't know, try never doing what you did to me to anyone else ever again?"

She wouldn't even look him in the eyes. Understandable given it all. Sorun didn't think they'd ever get along. Aurora just seem so detached from mortals that he didn't even know if she realized it. To that end, he almost felt sorry for her. Sorry, but held no pity. This was a life she'd chosen, after all. If she was fine with it, then more power to her. He couldn't care less and it didn't matter to him. As long as he never got to see Aurora again he could live with it.

"... A demon using his evil power to protect others." Aurora talked while still facing away from Sorun, though her words drew an eye-raise from him. "I'll admit it's an intriguing concept. I do hope you keep your word and never seek out the Yamato again, Sorun. And if, for some reason, you do, I hope you can follow that demon's example. For all our sakes."

"... Try my best, I guess," Sorun said. "You just gonna leave it at that? No sorry for cursing me, no apology for trying to keep me here? No nothing?"

"Will you apologize for kicking my teeth out?"

"Nope."

"Then you have my answer."

With a sigh and shake of his head, Sorun turned away from Aurora and to Athair. "Thanks for this. You may not believe me when I say this, but... I'm grateful to you for bringing me back."

Athair hummed, but said nothing else. Sorun never could figure him out. He seemed more levelheaded than Aurora. Maybe it was the visible age that just made him wiser. Or the fact he hadn't been a Neo-Walker as long as Aurora. He was able to put together from everything he heard from Tails and Knuckles that they knew him back when he was alive, so there was no way he'd been in this god gig as long as Aurora had. Maybe that was the sole difference between them. He still knew the value of mortal life, while its meaning had faded from her. Or maybe he just was wiser. Sorun didn't know, but whatever the case, in the end he'd been the one to bring him back. And unlike Aurora he seemed to truly regret what was done to Sorun. So he could afford some small amount of begrudging respect for him.

"What do you plan on doing when you wake up?" Athair had asked, rousing Sorun from his thoughts.

"If this actually does work? Dunno." Sorun's torso had vanished. His head from the neck up began to disappear as well. "I think maybe I'll take Tikal's advice and try to enjoy it..."

And with that, the rest of him disappeared.

A/N- So the whole "second life" thing is actually a thing that happens in the comics, for those of you that never got into those. I think it was #125 or somewhere around there, but the basic gist of it was, in a nutshell, "if you're cool enough you get a second shot at life". And that's all I can say about it because it was only ever brought up in that one comic and they were super vague about the whole process. The exact workings of it were never clear other than you get to sacrifice your powers in exchange for a second life.

Is it a bit of a deus ex machina? Most definitely, yeah, but it's canon to the comics, so as far as I'm concerned it's free game to use. Besides, people die and come back to life left and right in that comic. It's a comic. It's just a thing that happens. I mean it's not Dragonball levels of death just not mattering, I don't think anything will ever surpass that, but you get what I mean.

But the plan was always to bring Sorun back. Him dying wasn't the end of the story, and we got a long way to go from here 'cause the story as a whole ain't even close to being done. But the whole gag curse/Emeralds killing Sorun slowly and all the drama involved with it is done. It's done, gone, played its part. And I know there were a lot of people super frustrated at Sorun and how the story was going regarding his death, but it was all to lead to this point. And... yeah, I probably did drag it out longer than I ought to have, never imagined it'd take this long to get here, but we got here.

Imagine if I really did kill Sorun here and had, like, his friend David or some new human OC take over for the rest of the story. Or another idea I had was him leaving the Yamato behind for Sonic or Shadow to keep for the rest of the story, maybe even have a whole thing where everyone starts fighting over it because it's the last memento of Sorun but also an object of great power. Deep in the initial planning phases of the story I almost did some of these things, but decided to go with the revive route. Even played around with maybe turning him into a Mobian, but that was scrapped way early on, too. Just, uh... yeah I'll be completely honest, I didn't feel comfortable with the idea, and I think it would have taken away more than it would have offered. Then it was the matter of playing around with how to bring him back, I saw one review mentioning Sorun using Yamato to separate himself from death which I'll admit was one thing I was considering, but... come on. That'd basically make him unkillable. Can't have that. I still put the small bit of him trying in to establish it doesn't work while also highlighting just how loose Sorun's Yamato's interpretation of separation really is, though, so there's that.

I did plan on dragging out the period Sorun was dead for a while, too, get scenes in with every character he interacted with, even get a few chapters in without him, but it just seemed like it'd be too much since I was just bringing him back to life later anyways, so a lot of that was reduced. Even the chapter where Sorun went around saying goodbye to everyone before the "final mission" was reduced since I was just gonna revive him, so I didn't wanna spend too much time on it.

But anyways, yeah, he's back. More on that next chapter.

Chapter 56

Recursion Error

Episode 56- Respawn

And just like that, Sorun woke up. There wasn't any bright lights, no fanfare, no rush of energy and vitality as he regained his life. He'd simply woken up, right there on the corpse cabinet table. Staring up at the morgue's ceiling.

"... Wait, seriously? That's it?" Blinking his eyes, Sorun sat up on the table. "I just snap back to life just like that? I don't even get, like, a little energy confetti explosion or-" The green Chaos Emerald whizzed by Sorun's head. "Damn!" he screamed out as he ducked down.

He dove right down onto the table and looked out to the morgue. Much to his shock, he saw all seven of the Chaos Emeralds bouncing off the walls, floor, and ceiling of the room. A chaotic rainbow of bouncing objects that, on any other day, Sorun would have found pretty. But then he remembered if one of those just happened to slam into him he'd absorb it by accident and be left with powers killing him again.

And so, he did the first thing that came to mind. He gripped the opening of the corpse cabinet, pulling the table along with himself inside the actual cabinet, and then closed the door behind him, sealing him into darkness. He heard the plinking and thudding sounds of the Emeralds bouncing around from even inside there in that small cramped space. He even heard the occasional metallic ting! of one of the Emeralds hitting the small, square door sealing him in the cabinet. Sorun, meanwhile, had breathed out a small sigh of relief at having successfully secured himself safely away from the flying Emeralds. He decided he would just wait there until the sounds disappeared.

It took some waiting on his part. It felt like whole minutes had passed of the Emeralds bouncing around everywhere in that room, with Sorun just lying on the table and waiting. For a bit he was almost worried the sound wouldn't go away and they would keep bouncing around, but eventually he noticed that the volume and frequency of the thudding sounds were decreasing. Slowly, but it was happening. More and more they were decreasing, until, suddenly, they stopped altogether. He heard the sound of multiple objects rolling along the floor after, and then, nothing. Absolute silence.

Another minute passed of Sorun remaining in that corpse cabinet just to make sure things outside were clear. Afterwards, the door to the cabinet was cracked open, and Sorun peered out. From his vantage point he caught sight of a couple of the glowing Emeralds lying harmlessly on the ground, immobile. He breathed out a sigh of relief, and then opened the door entirely to look out into the entire room. All seven colored Emeralds were sitting motionlessly on the floor.

"Ah, man, that was a close one," Sorun muttered as he pulled the table back out from the corpse cabinet. "I guess they tried to fly out and scatter across the world again like when I first got here. Sonic said that's what happened. Nicole must make these nanite walls sturdy if they ended up trapped in here..." The table was pulled out all the way, after which Sorun swung his body around so he was sitting at its edge, with his feet hanging off. "Well, I... guess I managed to do it..."

There he was. Alive. He did it. He revived. Got his second life. Athair pulled through for him. His premature death at the hands of powers, the sickness associated with it all, the lying, the stress of it all, it... it was all gone. Over.

He couldn't describe how it felt. There was such a mix of emotions going through him that he couldn't put it into words. Ineffable amounts of relief, happiness, shock and disbelief, uncertainty of what he was supposed to do now. He could have cried, laughed, and fallen unconscious from it all right there with how he was feeling. That's what all his emotions amounted to- a jumbled together mess of confusion. He could still even hardly believe he was sitting here, alive and witnessing this all.

Just to be sure, he held up his arm and felt it with his other hand. He felt a pulse, rushing blood, warm flesh. Felt the air going through his mouth and nose and into his lungs. He felt... alive. Better than he had in months, really. Better, but... also slow, in a way. Sluggish. He realized why when he brushed some hair out from his eyes, and saw it had returned to its natural black color. Devil's Body and all the physical enhancements it gave him was gone.

"What a weird feeling..." His eyes widened. "Wait, hold on." He looked downwards at his own torso, and then reached down to lift his shirt up.

... His abs were gone.

"Dammit, my gains." Feeling disappointed, he lowered the shirt back over his flat stomach, and then tried holding his hand out. He reached for the same feeling he always felt for whenever he wanted to manifest Yamato, but nothing appeared. Not the katana. Not the Summoned Swords or Bringer Claws or his Doppelganger. He couldn't teleport or stop time. Nothing.

All of his powers were truly gone.

"It really did work," he whispered to himself. An uncontrollable smile broke out over his face, and he'd even laughed a bit. "They're... they're really gone. I'm cured. I'm back... I'm alive..."

He spent some time just sitting there, quietly laughing as he held his head in one hand. Drinking it all in, enjoying it all. He was there, alive and well. He didn't have to feel sad about dying anymore, or be sad about everyone being sad that he was dead. It was over. He did it. He was alive again.

The laughter eventually died out into a happy sigh, followed by Sorun looking back down at the seven Emeralds. He gave them a curious look, and then slid off the table. His black boots hit the ground, and he walked over to the one closest to him. The green one.

"It looks like they all just fell out of me like Athair said they would," he said to himself as he crouched down in front of the Emerald. "Seven gems of unlimited power just... sitting here. I'd be worried if they were anywhere else but New Mobotropolis, but this might as well be the most secure city in the whole world right now." He began to reach for the Emerald. "Guess I should gather them u- ooh!"

He'd come within centimeters of touching the Emerald before he remembered touching them was a bad thing to do, after which he reoiled his hand back to himself. He clicked his tongue, and then glanced around the room hoping to find something to help him gather the gems up without needing to touch them. His answer came when he saw a broom leaning against a nearby countertop, and a burlap sack right on top of said countertop.

"Yeah, that'll work."

A couple of minutes later, Sorun had carefully used the broom to sweep all seven of the Chaos Emeralds into the burlap sack, and then tied the top of it closed. He then set it down on the ground in front of the corpse cabinet table, and then hopped back up on the end of it. He placed his hands in his lap, legs freely swinging as he looked down at the sack of Emeralds in front of him with a contemplative look.

"Well now what am I supposed to do?" Sorun asked himself. "I, uh... guess I should go and... tell everyone I'm alive. How the hell am I supposed to go and do that?" Sorun asked himself. "They're probably gonna freak out, and that's just- ugh, it's gonna be so awkward and I don't know what I'm gonna do. And the Emeralds are all just... kind of here now... huh..."

He found himself focusing back on the bag. The bag that contained the Chaos Emerald. All seven of them.

"... Should... should I just go back home...?"

The sound of a far away door opening and shutting distracted Sorun and made him turn towards the door to the morgue. It was still closed, though he heard a pair of voices nearby, likely in the hallway connecting the morgue to the hospital's basement entrance. This caused Sorun to freeze a bit in panic and, not at all prepared to reveal to anyone he was back to being alive, he did the first thing that felt natural to him: lie back down on the table like he had been while dead to appear he was still dead.

Cowardly, maybe, but he needed all the time he could get to figure out what he was gonna do and to steel his nerves.

"Man, I hope they don't notice my hair turned back to black... or that I'm breathing. Who is it, anyways?" He strained his ears to better listen to the pair of voices that were steadily coming closer. "Male and female... accents... Southern and... French- oh, it's them."

He heard the door leading into the morgue open, but couldn't see anything due to having closed his eyes while trying to remain as still as possible. He didn't hear anything, either. Neither voices nor footsteps. It seemed they'd just opened the door to the morgue and just stopped there. And then he heard a deep sigh.

"Ah'll... leave ya with him." That was definitely Bunnie's voice that Sorun had heard. She said that sentence, and then he heard a single, heavy, metal set of footsteps exit the morgue and close the door. From there he assumed Antoine was standing over at the other end of the room, likely staring at what he thought to be Sorun's corpse. He was silent enough that Sorun almost thought he'd been mistaken before he heard the Mobian take a deep breath and slowly walk in Sorun's direction.

"I guess Antoine's here to say his final goodbyes to me or something... HOLY SHIT I GOTTA PRANK HIM." When was he ever gonna get another chance like this? It was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. He'd be a fool not to take it.

"Err, uh... uh... hello zere, Sorun." Antoine's voice was close enough that he sounded like he was standing right next to the table Sorun way lying on, almost right over him, even. He sounded unsure and also sad at the same time. "I, um, apologize for having taken so long to do zis. Eet 'as been, how you say, a... I do not know what you would say in ze face of zis," he sadly admitted. "Eet iz unfortunate you are being dead. Y-you left before you evair had ze chance to taste my fine cuisine. H-heh... heh..."

He sounded like he tried laughing. It came out sounding more unenthusiastic and sad than anything even resembling happiness. It was almost enough to make Sorun reconsider pulling a fast one on his grieving friend. Almost.

"Zey are saying ze Chaos Emeralds made you sick and end up like zis. I am not knowing what to zink of zis," Antoine quietly said. "I am not wrong in saying we would nevair 'ave let you go around touching zem eef we knew, but I am supposing eet iz too late to be saying such zings." He paused, and then made a deep breath as he laid a hand on Sorun's shoulder. "You were very special to me, Sorun. Ze others, zey are family to me, always will be. It would being impossible to not see zem as so after so long, but... you were special, and I had held you in ze same place as zem. Zey are always being ze big teases about moi accent, Soneek especially, but you nevair did. And nobody else evair practiced ze swordsmanship with moi." A short, empty laugh left him. "Not once did you evair beat me, and yet I had more fun practicing with you zan evair weeth myself." The hand on Sorun's shoulder began gripping him harder. "You... you were truly ze bestest of friends..."

It was when the tears started falling down on Sorun's face did he decide that maybe playing on Antoine's grief to play a prank on him wouldn't have been the nicest of things to do, as appealing as the opportunity was. But he was smart enough to understand some things just weren't worth it. Even if they were really tempting.

"He just had to break out the tears, didn't he?" Sorun thought with an internal sigh. "So much for pulling a Joseph Joestar on him. Ah, well..."

And so, with his decision finalized, Sorun made a groan and lifted his hand up to his face to wipe the tears off of him. Antoine had completely froze as a result.

"Ugh, man, you're really- I was gonna pull this whole zombie bit on you, but if you're just gonna go and cry on me-"

"L'ES UNDEAD!"

Apparently Sorun hadn't even needed to do the bit the begin with; just talking and moving like that had been enough to frighten the poor coyote. He shrieked like a girl and fell completely backwards onto his back he'd been so scared of Sorun's sudden resurrection. Sorun, meanwhile, was laughing. He'd sat upwards and was laughing hard enough that he had to hold a hand to his head just to steady himself. It continued for minutes, Sorun just sitting there on the table laughing while Antoine sat on the ground staring up at Sorun in absolute disbelief, completely stupefied by the mere sight of his living form.

The laughter faded away eventually, thankfully enough. Sorun sighed out the last laugh, and then looked down at Antoine. He was practically frozen there, staring up at him with those wide eyes. It brought enough amusement to Sorun that he was smiling at the sight, though he seemed to lose all energy despite the smile when he realized he'd have to explain himself.

"Guess the cat's out of the bag, now," he mumbled, and then waved down at the Mobian. "Hey, Antoine."

"Sorun...? Antoine sounded one-part in wonder and one-part completely baffled as he stared up at the human, with a myriad of wild, unreadable emotions flashing over his face. "I- I don't- zis is... y-you're... ze opposite of dead...?"

"Apparently I had an extra life," Sorun replied in a low drawl. He made a short sigh and slid off the table. "Lemme tell ya all about it..."

And so, Sorun told him. Everything from his point of death to how he managed to come back. Some parts were appropriately abbreviated for Antoine's sake. When it came to the Neo-Walkers Sorun said he'd just "smacked 'em around a bit 'til they saw some sense" and left it at that, and Antoine took his word for it. The concept of that void he'd ended up in was left out entirely. Otherwise he'd laid it all out for the coyote. The events for the most part, his feelings on it all, everything.

That lead them here. Both of them sitting side-by-side on the ground and leaning their backs against a nearby table. Sorun was just getting to the end of speaking while Antoine just watched him.

"And... and I don't know, Antoine, I..." Sorun exhaled through his nose, lifted his hand up, and let it drop back on his leg. "Say something."

"What am I to say?"

"Something, anything, man I don't know!" Sorun turned his head to Antoine. "You're just sitting there looking at me, I don't know what to do with that, I..." His fingers started to run through his hair as he looked down. "Just say something."

"... So... your kind really do turn into ze ghostie types when you die...?"

Sorun scoffed out a short laugh. "I missed you, Antoine. I really did," he said. "Nah, that was... Chaos energy shenanigans or something, I dunno." He shook his head. "I'm less worried about the why of things and more about what's gonna happen next. Ugh, man... what am I supposed to say to them all, Antoine? I'm at a loss at what I'm supposed to do."

"I am not understanding..."

Sorun breathed out and shook his head again. "'Hey, guys, I found a way to come back to life.' Am I seriously just supposed to lead with that?"

"What else are you to do?"

"Got me there." Wasn't really any other way to go about it, really. He was more nervous about the reactions more than anything else. He almost told Antoine as much, but when he turned around to do so he saw Antoine giving him that unreadable look again. His ears were down a bit, too. If Sorun didn't know any better he'd say he looked sad. Or maybe Sorun didn't know any better and he actually was sad. He decided to ask. "What's with the face?"

Antoine seemed to flinch back a bit, almost like he'd been caught doing something he shouldn't have. He shrunk back a bit away from Sorun, and then looked down a bit. "So... you were died..."

"Dying. And yes, I was." Sorun relaxed against the table he was leaning against as he gave Antoine an apathetic look. "I know it looks bad. You guys pull some random guy away from his home to help with your problems and he ends up slowly dying as a result." Antoine flinched again, and his ears lowered a bit more as he began to look guilty. Worried, even. "Look, I'll be real, I wasn't exactly thrilled about the whole thing, but it's not like I blame you guys or anything like that. Was my choice to go around collecting the Emeralds. If I really wanted to I could have just abandoned you guys altogether and not have bothered."

Antoine's ears rose up a bit. The worried look and uneasiness began to fade, though he still looked a bit uncomfortable. "I... I am not knowing what to say," he admitted. "Why didn't you?"

"Come on, man, do I really look that shallow to you?" He made a small laugh and looked ahead, though he still noted that Antoine was looking at him from the corner of his eyes. At that, he felt the small smile he had on drop. "Because I wanted to, alright? Because I didn't want to see Eggman win."

"Because of zat prophecy, non?"

"A prophecy that's becoming less credible by the second," Sorun demurred. "I talked to the Neo-Walkers while I was dead. They don't got a clue on what's gonna happen since me walking around doing stuff messed up their foresight so bad it just doesn't work anymore. So I dunno what's going on. But they did straight-up tell me it would have went bad if I did nothing, so..." He trailed off, and when he saw Antoine still looking at him, he shook his head and looked away. "I like you all too much to see that happen. What do you want me to say? It doesn't go any deeper than that."

"... Nothing, I am supposing."

"Suppose," Sorun quietly corrected.

"Oui, merci." A few silent moments passed before Antoine spoke up again. "You... truly did zis wanting to sacrifice your life for ours..."

"Hey, let's not get ahead of ourselves," Sorun said, shaking his head in denial as he looked back at Antoine. "I... I didn't... there wasn't a better opt- stop looking at me like that!" When he saw the grin slowly growing on Antoine's face, he faced forwards and crossed his arms in a huff. "Ugh, so what if I did?"

Sorun's answer came when Antoine reached to the side and wrapped Sorun's head in a one-armed headlock. The black-haired human quickly found himself missing his enhanced strength, as, despite his frantic flailing, he was unable to free himself from the Mobian's grip. Antoine, meanwhile, was laughing lightly while using his other hand to gently ruffle the top of his head.

"Ahh, look at you, Sorun, being ze modest type you are-"

"Get off, get off!"

"- I 'ave always been knowing you to be ze shy type, but I did not zink you would be zis scare-ed of showing a heroic side-"

"I regret it all!" Even after Antoine finally released him, still laughing all the while, Sorun maintained his flustered look as he averted his face from Antoine. "Shoulda left you all out to dry, can't believe I gave my life just for this..." The look fell off his face as his shoulders went slack, and when he looked to Antoine again, he saw him still smiling at him. "... I ain't a hero, Antoine. I just didn't want anyone to die. That's all. Fact I died in the process was just a... I dunno, a side effect or somethin'. Stop looking so far into it."

He didn't know why something like the title of "hero" just made Sorun so grossly uncomfortable he wanted to avoid anybody calling him one in any way possible. It just was. He felt like he didn't deserve it, and the word alone made his skin crawl for some reason. He didn't like the attention or implications behind it, none of it.

"Non, Sorun, I am afraid zat nobody will see it ze way you do," Antoine said, making Sorun loudly sigh and hang his head. "Mon ami, you will be having to hang away zat shy side of yours. I am not zinking it would do well to look so fluster-ed in front of ze others."

Sorun ran a hand over his ragged face. "Woulda stayed dead if I knew I was just gonna come back to this," he jokingly stated, though he saw Antoine shift nervously next to him.

"Eh, Sorun, do not... do not say such things, s'il vous plait. I am glad you are back." Antoine's face made an uncomfortable twitch. "I am... not so glad you had to suffer through months of dying..."

"... Eh, it's fine." Wasn't really, but Sorun was desperate to put Antoine at ease. "Who hasn't suffered continually for months on end? It's over now, though. Feel better than I have in a long time."

"Oui, I... would know some about zat."

"The, uh... the half a year thing you mentioned once? During the whole train thing?"

Antoine nodded. "Did anyone evair tell you of Moebius?"

"The weird evil mirror version of this world, yeah," Sorun answered with a nod. "What about it?"

"I had been... abducted iz ze word, oui?" In addition to widening his eyes, Sorun nodded at him. "Ze other Antoine had abducted moi and 'ad swapp-ed our places. I was forced to pretend to be him for six months while he replaced me here. Eet had nearly destroyed my life and relationships weeth ze others, but, eventually, all was set right. Not without... some costs, we shall say, but otherwise all had ended well zat... ended well, I do not know ze expression," he said with a shake of his head. "I am not claiming to know exactly what you had been going through zese last few months, but, well... I suppose -" When Sorun nodded at the correct pronunciation, Antoine smiled a bit, "- I may know a detail or two. Eef you need one to talk weeth."

He hadn't known how severe that whole "half a year" thing had been for Antoine, never having known the details. He knew he felt angry at hearing it, and he would have been enraged knowing some evil doppelganger tried stealing Antoine's life if the man himself wasn't alright and here telling Sorun about it. Past all that he felt... some good feeling. Thankfulness, perhaps, that he was willing to just be there and listen to him. It made him calm down, and a bit happy, even. But on the other hand he didn't want to bother Antoine with the extra baggage, so he shook his head.

"N-nah, man, but... thanks. Y'know, for the... the offer an' all that, you know, j... just thanks- hey, I should get going," he suddenly said in a raised voice, causing Antoine to jump back a bit at his sudden rise in volume. "As much as I'd like to stay in this morgue forever to avoid seeing the others and the awkward mess that's gonna follow, I, uh... prolly shouldn't do that."

After a few seconds of looking at Sorun with a strange look, Antoine got Sorun's meaning and nodded his head. "Ahh, oui, right..." he said as he calmed down some. "What were you zinking on doing?"

"I don't know, man." Sorun looked off to the side and gestured towards the nearby, filled sack. "All the Chaos Emeralds fell out of me because of the whole revive thing, so I gathered them all up in that sack over there."

"Do you plan on doing zomething with zem?" Antoine asked.

"... Not sure yet. Still thinking." Sorun stood up to his feet, groaning a bit from the sensation of his legs having fallen asleep from sitting so long. "For now, I'm going to the park."

"Ze park?" Antoine repeated in a questioning tone. His head followed Sorun as the human went to the burlap sack and picked it up. "Why ze park?"

Slinging the bag over his shoulder, Sorun turned back to the coyote. "Need some fresh air, gotta clear my head. Maybe wait until somebody I know wanders by and just sees me sitting there, because I got no clue how else I'm supposed to reveal myself. Too nervous to just do something like go to Sonic's house and knock on his door. Or the castle. Or the... server rooms in the science center..."

He just realized he was gonna have to deal with Nicole. And he also realized he didn't have the slightest idea how to go about doing that. In fact, he was scared of just seeing her again.

"Eh, I'll think of something.

"...

"... Fuck, who am I kidding?" Shaking his head, Sorun waved at Antoine with his free hand and began moving away. "Do me a favor and keep my resurrection on the down-low for a bit. Still trying to wrap my head around all this."

"I am not zo sure zis iz ze best way of going about zis, but alright," Antoine agreed. "What am I to tell my wife who iz waiting for me?"

Sorun sighed and flipped his hand up. "I mean, I'm not asking you to lie for me, so go ahead and tell Bunnie, I guess." He began walking towards the door to the morgue. "Eh, to be honest with you there's no way people in the hospital aren't gonna see me, so I doubt I'll even make it to the park. But it's all I got." He stopped at the door, and right before he opened it he turned his head back to Antoine. "Thanks, Antoine. F-for being here."

"I am happy to be zere for you, Sorun." Antoine offered him one last smile. "Welcome back."

"... Yeah. Good to be back."

Shockingly enough he actually had made it to the park without being accosted by anyone. He'd gotten some stares from random Mobian citizens, who all probably thought he was dead only to see him walking around. He new Dr. Quack had seem him when he passed through the lobby and distinctly heard a clipboard being dropped on the floor. Hell, even Bunnie had seen him.

The first thing Sorun had done when he walked through the hospital doors was take his first breath of fresh air since coming back to life. He exhaled, and then looked to his left. He made absolutely no reaction when he saw Bunnie leaning against the hospital wall next to the door. Staring at him like he was a ghost with her jaw dropped open.

"... 'Sup." That's all Sorun gave her before turning back forwards and walking to the park. She hadn't called or even chased after him; probably too shocked to do anything except stare after him. He'd trust Antoine to fill her in on the details. He just didn't want to deal with it.

For sure the rumors - the very, very true rumors - that he was alive and just walking around would circulate like wildfire. Wasn't even a question that somebody would find and confront him within the hour, which would lead to him explaining everything to everyone down the line. Probably Nicole, seeing as all she had to do was glance at the security system, see Sorun, and teleport to his location. Oddly that hadn't happened yet. So either she hadn't gotten wind of him yet, which wasn't likely, or, like Bunnie, she was so shocked she didn't know what to do, which was... marginally more likely.

He didn't care either way since he managed to make it to a bench in the park. So he set the bag full of Emeralds down, sat his ass down on that bench, and decided to just take it all in. Clear midday skies, the pleasant, rustling sound of leaves and the quiet sound of the city behind him, the clean smell, wind on his face, the sun warming him. The fact he was alive and moving around again. The dread at having to talk to everyone over it.

But then his attention kept getting drawn down to the bag at his feet. The burlap sack with all seven Emeralds. The things that'd kill him if he touched them all. And also the things that were responsible for the portal that brought him here to begin with. And, with all seven of them gathered like this... potentially his ticket back home to Earth.

"I can go home with these," Sorun thought. "But if I do... it's one-way. The Emeralds scatter after use, and there's no way we could set up any form of communications over that distance. If they make a portal back home and I go through, that's that. They'd never have a reason to hunt around for all the Emeralds again and open the portal back up, and even if for some reason they did I'd have no way of knowing about it so I could be there when they did. So there'd be no going back.

"But... I'd get to see mom again. And Dave, and the rest of my friends. Hell, I could get my life back. I was really only gone for... what'd it be, almost five months now? I'm not dying anymore, so that's almost nothing. I can get it all back. My life, friends and family. And having my games back would be nice, too.

"What about the ones here, though? Some of the people here are practically family to me, too."

"You're seriously gonna choose them over our real family? Don't tell me you actually wanna stay here."

"No, it's not that, it's..."

"They don't need us anymore. Eggman's at the end of his rope and we're powerless now. They can handle everything on their own. They're good. I know it's gonna be hard to leave them forever and everything, but we got a life to get back to. You're not gonna stop being friends just 'cause we leave and never see them again. There's a slew of movies and games and anime I can pull from our memories with the same message of them 'remaining in our heart' and all that tripe."

"..."

"It's Nicole, isn't it?"

"She-"

"You are not fucking stranding us in this world over a girl."

Sorun sighed, and then looked to his side, where he saw himself sitting next to him. "Yeah, I know," Sorun thought at Sorun. "I'm just... I'm really gonna miss her. I've never liked anybody like I like her."

"Heartbreaking, I know," the other Sorun said, "but dude, come on. If there was ever a reason to stay here... this ain't it. There's nothing for us here. Some friends, that's about it. We don't belong here, don't have a place here. Back home on Earth we do. Our own place in life, our own people, friends, family. In a world that doesn't constantly try to mindfuck us every single second with its twenty-four seven spew of insanity. We can't just abandon all that. Abandon them ."

"I know. You're right." As much as he'd like to stay, which, in all honesty, he didn't... he couldn't stay. He'd left too much behind when he was dragged through that portal. More than that, he just wanted to go home. It was his goal since the second he came onto Mobius. A goal once seemingly unattainable now sitting right there at his feet.

His mind was made up.

He was going home.

"Ugh... Not saying you gotta go immediately or anything," Sorun said to Sorun. "Take your time, say your goodbyes or whatever. But we really should be getting back to Earth right after."

"Sounds good." Sorun blinked, and he was left alone sitting on the bench. "Eh, it's not like Nicole likes me in that way anyway. It'd probably be really stupid to stay here for a girl not even interested in me." He sighed, leaned back on the bench, and kicked his feet out as he looked up at the sky. "It really is a nice day out."

He could spend all day here just sitting at this bench and looking out at the park and sky. He'd give one thing to Mobius, if nothing else. It really was a beautiful place. Too crazy for him to keep living here, but beautiful all the same.

"S-Sorun...?"

Ah, there it was.

There was absolutely no bracing for what was about to happen, so after quietly sucking in some air through his teeth Sorun just decided to turn his upper body around to address the person he heard speak from behind the bench. He'd already known who it was from the voice alone. Seeing Nicole with his own eyes was a different matter entirely. She had that same look Bunnie had when she saw him walk right out the hospital completely fine: that stunned, bewildered beyond words look. There was something else though that he couldn't quite pin down in that expression, something he couldn't describe. It made something in his chest wrench, though, seeing her face look like that.

As for Sorun himself, he just sat there looking at her with a completely straight face. He didn't have a plan on what to say to her, not even the faintest idea, like almost always. He decided to just try and act normally.

"So the secret I wouldn't tell you about was that I was dying." He rose both his hands up, palms facing forwards, and gently shook them. "Surprise...~"

He didn't know if normal, human reflexes would have been sufficient in catching Nicole when she jumped right at him. It was just too fast for his eyes to keep up with. He was able to perceive her leaping forwards, phasing through the bench and tackling him to the ground, but he hadn't had enough time to even think about moving. By the time Sorun's thoughts did catch up with him he was already on his back, with his arms pinned to the sides of his body due to the fact Nicole was lying right on top of him with her arms wrapped around his torso.

"..." Sorun tried moving around a bit. Nicole's grasp was too tight for him to budge. He sighed and let his head fall back against the grass. "Can't help but notice I never got that statue," he said. "I know I said it was optional, but c'mon, I died."

He didn't get a response.

"Nicole?" Sorun picked his head up. "I'm just kidding around, I don't actually care about a..."

Sorun trailed off when he saw what she was actually doing. She was crying. She was burying her face into his chest and softly crying, while at the same time he felt her whole body shuddering on top of his. Any words he planned on saying died off right there. He just plainly couldn't speak while he saw her in that state.

So, instead of saying anything he just silently laid his head back on the grass with the intent of waiting her out. He had all the time in the world now, after all. He could spend a few minutes waiting for her to calm down. And despite the circumstances, he liked the way she was holding him too much to complain.

There wasn't a point where Sorun counted the time Nicole had pinned him to the ground. Minutes, he'd estimated, a lot of minutes. She'd finally calmed down enough to speak after she found it in herself to lift her face up off his chest.

Then she started grabbing at his face...

"N-Nicole-"

"It's really you?" There'd been absolutely no willpower on Sorun's part when Nicole, still lying on top of him, grabbed both sides of his face and began moving it left and right as she examined it. "You... y-you're... I don't understand, this shouldn't be..." She looked down at Sorun's body, and then looked back at Sorun's face. "You're truly back? Sorun?"

"Of course it's me," he said, not bothering to ask her to let go of his face. She still held on as a result. "It's me, not some clone or android double or something wacky. I came back to life. Morgue's empty if you really wanna check."

"No, I believe you. I saw you walk out of the hospital on the security cameras..."

"Had me pinged since then, huh?" Sorun thought. "So I guess you want me to explain how I'm walking and breathing, huh?"

"That would certainly be ideal, yes..."

And so he'd given her the same spiel he gave Antoine, once gain toning down what he'd done to the Neo-Walkers and omitting the void entirely. Somewhat to his disappointment she'd gotten off of him, leading to them sitting next to each other on the park bench as he explained everything.

Throughout the entire explanation Nicole had kept one of her hands on his. Not to grab it or anything. She was just letting it lay there on top of his as he talked, like she needed some physical reassurance that Sorun was there alive and talking with her. She wouldn't stop looking at him, either. Wouldn't so much as turn her head away from him. She just kept staring at him.

But he'd finished, again, from the point he'd died to now, again . And now all that he saw that was left to do was apologize.

"And so, now that you know everything... I wanted to say I was sorry."

"You're... sorry?" Nicole repeated. "Sorun, I don't understand. What could you possibly be sorry over?"

Sorun made a small hum, and then turned away from Nicole. He couldn't help still being aware of the hand overtop his. "Told you while I was dead I was kinda just... floating around as a ghost for a bit. During that time I decided to go see how people were doing, so... after I visited my body in the morgue, I went to the science center to see if you were there." He saw Nicole go a bit still from the corner of his eyes, and her fingers lightly gripped around his own. "Saw you in a bad way, talking with Sally, holding that controller like it was my last surviving memento-"

"It was your last memento."

"Okay, regardless," Sorun continued with a half-bemused smile, "I never wanted you to end up like that. I shouldn't have... the whole reason I tried avoiding you that one time was because I wanted to avoid that happening."

He stopped talking and then looked back at Nicole. She was giving him... well, frankly, a lot of looks. Lots of confusion mixed in with the earlier bewilderment, and some relief was showing as well. Relief he was alive, he supposed. But it was buried under all the confusion.

"It was this whole big plan I had," Sorun said as he looked back forwards, going as far as to sweep his hand out in front of him. "If I just pretended to be some unlikeable, unapproachable jerk nobody likes, then no one will care when I finally die so I don't leave people hurt."

"Sorun..."

"But you all just had to be too likeable for me to pull it off. I really tried, but I just couldn't go through with it." He glanced at Nicole. "You especially. I... could never even merely act that way around you, so I tried to just avoid you, but not even that worked. I never thought I'd grow to like you all so much, but I did. I never expected to grow so close to you specifically, but I did. So this ended up happening." He looked back ahead and briefly tossed an arm up. "I died, evidently for nothing, and left all this heartache behind. Heartache that could have all been avoided if I didn't cave into my desires and just toughed it out to the end, but I couldn't even do that. Couldn't go on without your support. Everybody would have been fine if I managed it: you never would have cried, and I wouldn't have turned into the most deplorable human in existence just because I was some weak-willed-"

A brown and black-furred pair of arms found themselves going back around Sorun's torso. He found himself being pulled into another hug by Nicole, close enough that their heads were forced to rest on each others' shoulders. It was a move that deeply startled Sorun, who himself couldn't find the words to say as a result of the hug.

"Stop it. Don't say such things about yourself," Nicole whispered out. "You shouldn't have to apologize for being friendly. You shouldn't have to apologize for anything . You died. You continued being a Freedom Fighter knowing you would die. You're not at fault for anything."

"I..." The words stunned Sorun. Enough that he'd went limp in Nicole's grasp while staring blankly ahead over her shoulder. "I still... you're not mad at me...?"

"Of course I'm not mad." Nicole pulled away from Sorun, though she kept her hands on his shoulders as she looked him in his eyes. "I'm vexed beyond words that you were forced to endure such an ordeal, and frustrated that you were barred from the possibility of even consulting anybody on the matter. But I'd never want you to lie to yourself like you wanted to do just to try and spare everyone's feelings."

"But-"

"Sorun, no." Nicole silenced him by placing one of her hands on his cheek. He froze up at the contact, at the soft sensation of her hand on his face, and he found himself relaxing into it. "I wouldn't have traded the time we spent and all the memories we created together for anything. What I experienced when you died was... quite frankly, it was the worst sensation I'd ever experienced in my entire existence, Sorun," she admitted to him with a sad look. "I told you, back when you almost died fighting to bring everyone to this city, that I never wanted to experience something like that again, but when I thought I'd truly lost you, I... words alone cannot describe it. I lack the descriptive capacity to do so. I felt like I'd been shut down but was still active at the same time. Like a part of me was lost." She looked a bit to the side. "You really do have a habit of teaching me new aspects of life. Even the bad ones, it seems. But I digress." She looked back at him, and began smiling again. "Despite how terrible that experience felt, I truly would rather have suffered through that and have been left with those memories of us than to never have had them to begin with. I recently learned through Sally that this is a sentiment others agree with. Logically it makes no sense, I realize this. Even I struggle to properly rationalize this to myself. But after having experienced it firsthand I think I finally understand why this is so, even if I can't rightly explain it in words. Just... feelings." She repositioned both of her arms so they were both over Sorun's shoulders in another hug. He was too flustered and focused on Nicole to make a single move. "It doesn't matter, anyways. You came back. You don't have to feel any amount of guilt, Sorun, because you came back. And I don't blame you a single bit for anything that happened. If anything, I... truly believe you're one of the strongest individuals I've ever met, to have gone through what you have and ended up where you are now. I sincerely mean that, Sorun."

"C-c'mon... you're just saying that..." Sorun couldn't help the abashed smile that came to his face. One of his hands reached up to softly caress one of Nicole's wrists, but that was as far as he'd gotten in terms of actual movement. "I thought Sally was the mentally strongest person you've ever known."

"You give her competition," Nicole claimed, still smiling at Sorun. "I can't express how happy I am that you're alive."

"I'm... happy I'm back, too. And that you're okay." There she went again. In just a few short words Nicole made every single doubt and uncertainty in Sorun's mind fade away, just like that. One conversation with her and all he felt was calm and peace. Like everything would be okay. She always had that effect on him, no matter what. Suddenly having died and come back to life just seemed like a fleeting memory despite how recent it had been. She was right in that respect; it didn't matter anymore. He was back. With her. "Thank you, Nicole. For everything."

They sat there for what felt like minutes. Just the two of them. Nicole kept her arms draped over Sorun's neck, and he continued to stroke at her wrist with his fingers. He couldn't look away from her eyes which were staring into his own, and between that and the smiles they were giving each other, he felt... he didn't quite know. It was indescribable, the feeling. But it felt right. More than right. For some reason he felt like they could have remained this way for days. He wouldn't have minded one bit.

"Nicole, I... I have something I need to tell you," Sorun said in a soft voice.

Her warm smile grew even wider. "As do I," she said in an equally soft voice. "I wanted to ask you on the rooftop, if you'll remember correctly. Before that day."

"Right, I remember. Do you...?"

Nicole gently shook her head. "You can go first."

"I gotta go home."

The mood shattered like glass. Nicole had gone completely rigid, and Sorun had felt it seeing as her arms were still over his neck. She made a peculiar expression, too- her smile broke, confusion mixing in and freezing it in a strange, shocked smile. She'd blinked heavily a few times, that expression still frozen on her face.

"W-what?"

"Yeeeaah, look, here's the thing." Sorun untangled himself from Nicole's arms, blissfully unaware of the disappointment filling Nicole's eyes despite the frozen, shocked smile on her face. He didn't perceive it at all as he reached down and picked up the burlap sack near his feet. "The condition for getting my second life was that I lose my powers, so as a result all of the Chaos Emeralds were separated from me. So since I just have all of them now I can use them to go back to my zone using the portal machine Tails used to bring me here."

"Your... zone?" Nicole repeated in a quiet voice. "As in... Earth...?"

"Mh-hm, yeah," Sorun blithely confirmed with a nod. "I'm worried about my mom and friends and everything, so I kinda need to go back. I mean, I always thought I'd just be stranded here forever, but since the Emeralds are all just here now I can finally go back to my old home and life." He turned his head to Nicole and gave her a smile. "Isn't it great?"

She didn't respond at first, making Sorun's smile drop a bit. The strange, frozen smile had fallen off of her face completely, and she was left staring at Sorun and the bag he was holding with an odd look he couldn't quite place. It caused some confusion on his part, seeing that expression Nicole wore, but then she seemed to notice Sorun's staring at her and changed her face back into a smiling one. A noticeably forced smile, Sorun had seen. One that didn't hide the disappointment he saw in her eyes, and the way her shoulders had slumped.

He had no idea why she looked like that.

"Yes, of course... your family. Of course you would be concerned for the life and everybody you left behind when you were forced onto Mobius. I understand completely." Nicole stood up off the bench, still giving Sorun that same, fake look as his eyes followed her. "You'll be departing soon, then?"

"I, uh... was gonna say goodbye to everyone first, but yeah. Thinking of going tomorrow," Sorun slowly said. "You okay?"

"I'm functioning at full capacity, yes," Nicole said with a nod.

"Alright...? What, um, what-what was that thing you were gonna ask me?"

"Hm?" Nicole's ears lowered a bit, and she'd turned away too quick for Sorun to see the smile leave her face. "It was nothing. Just a silly notion of mine," she said. "Shall I go gather all the others for you?"

Slowly, Sorun nodded. "That'd be nice, yeah. Are you ok-?"

"I'll go do that, then." She turned back to Sorun and gave him a small, very small and very forced, smile. "Goodbye, Sorun. I wish you safe travels home and hope you'll be happy there."

Nicole's body vanished right after she finished speaking. Sorun was left sitting on the park bench, bag in hand and a perplexed look on his face as he stared at the spot she'd vanished from. He continued doing this for a few seconds, and then loudly exhaled as he sat back against the bench.

"What was up with that look on her face? Eh, whatever. I'm sure it's fine. Would have liked to know what she wanted to ask me, though," Sorun thought to himself. "Guess all that's left is to say my goodbyes and then head back home. 'Least I ain't gotta pack anything."

A/N- Alright, here's what you do. You picture Nicole's face during the entire exchange between her and Sorun. Sorun says he's going home, and you picture her face snapping from that to her reaction face. Then the GTA thing happens where the colors go grayscale and WASTED appears in big, bold, red lettering as the camera angle tilts and the sound effect plays while still focusing in on her reaction face.

Anyway, yeah, happy late Valentine's Day.

Chapter 57

A/N- Wow, so the reception for last chapter was downright staggering. Really had the same energy as the "I love Emilia" scene from RE: Zero. From all the reactions and reviews, it was great to read. There was also this one person that put a link in a review that I couldn't figure out to open despite my best efforts, so, uh... yeah, don't know what was behind that, but thanks to everybody all the same for the feedback. It was entertaining reading about all the guesses people have for what's gonna happen, too. Not gonna say if anyone was close or not, but you'll all get to read for yourselves what happens later.

So the roadmap for the next few chapters is just a few short ones, and then we get to the portal chapter. Specifically it'll be chapter 61 if I'm counting it right that the portal happens, which is probably the most I'm ever gonna spoil on what's gonna happen in the story in the future in an A/N, so look forward to it.

Recursion Error

Episode 57- Goodbye, Freedom Fighters

Nicole had been true to her word and had gathered everyone. So here they all were- every member of the Freedom Fighters. Gathered in some large room inside of Castle Acorn. And Elias, for some reason, probably because he lived here. Sorun was sitting backwards on a chair, his hands folded over the top of the back of the chair as he looked towards the other end of the room. A long table was what separated him from everyone else, who were all standing around in a group.

The reactions he'd seen when he'd strolled into the room and wordlessly sat down in the seat were mixed, both in everybody's reactions in relation to each other and the reactions themselves. The standard stuff: shock. Disbelief. Surprise. Joy. Worry. A hodgepodge of emotions that couldn't rightly be described from how chaotic the mood felt despite how silent it was. The rundown he'd given them all was the same one he gave to Antoine and Nicole. Now he was merely left sitting here to gauge their reactions.

If there was one whose reaction Sorun was looking for in particular, it was Tails. He was pretty sure the fox Mobian had caught Sorun looking towards him, too, from the way he'd jumped up slightly when Sorun looked at him. He looked the most worried out of everybody there, to the point he could have been sweating. For all Sorun knew he probably was sweating and the fur just covered it. Sorun's eyes remained on the young Mobian for a few moments, and then he faced back forwards at everyone else.

"Well don't all speak at once," Sorun drawled out, making everyone freeze in place. "Go on. Say somethin'."

Nervous glances were passed between everyone. Eventually, all gazes turned towards Sally. She'd of course noticed all the looks, and made a small, defeated sigh and then moved to the head of the table opposite of Sorun. She looked towards the human, looking unsure of how to proceed. He didn't think he could blame her considering it all.

"Well, Sorun, I... I think I speak for everyone here when I say we're overjoyed that you're among the living once again." Her voice was well-collected, all things considered. Even so there was no hiding that nervous waver behind it. "So, uh... I don't... I don't really know what you want me to say..."

Sorun remained silent. He kept staring at Sally, expecting her to continue. But she'd actually shrunk back from his gaze and didn't say anything else. Sorun's stony face, meanwhile, hadn't even twitched.

"Awright, enough o' this." Oddly enough it was Bunnie of all people who got fed up with the quiet looks. She'd stomped her robotic feet to the midpoint of the table and then slammed her robotic limb on the table's surface, using it to lean against the furniture as her green eyes gazed into Sorun's blue. "Now Sorun, Sugah, ah'm glad - beyond glad - yer alright and kickin' again, but ya got us all in this stuffy room an' all yer doin' is starin', so if ya got somethin' tah say then say it an' stop makin' everyone so gosh-darn nervous-like."

"... Forgive me if I seemed hostile in any way, Bunnie. I'm just nervous, too, you see," Sorun explained. "I hold absolutely no ill will towards any of you. I wish to make that clear right now." He glanced to the side. "In fact, I... probably should have done so earlier..."

His statement caused surprise to bloom on the faces of everybody in the entire room. Their stances had grown a bit easier and relaxed, and Sally chose that moment to speak again. "If that's true, then why are you sitting in that chair so threateningly?"

Sorun shrugged. "I dunno. Never had an opportunity to do this before. Wanted to try it. Now seemed like a good opportunity."

"Ugh, for the- Sorun..." Sally palmed her own face in exasperation at the answer. Some grins were cracked all around by the others, too, which Sorun supposed was a good sign. "I really don't think that's an appropriate thing to do given the situation."

"I think after everything that's happened I've earned the right to mess around with you all a little," Sorun countered. "But seriously, no hard feelings."

"That's quite a thing to say seeing as you died," Sonic commented. He was at the other end of the table along with everyone else, leaning back in a chair of his own with his feet propped on the table. "Props to you, though, man."

Sorun looked over at the blue hedgehog. "You don't seem very surprised about all this, Sonic," he noted. He was probably the most normal-looking one of the bunch given his demeanor. There were still hints of the earlier nervousness in his face, for sure, but he seemed nonchalant otherwise.

"Well, I mean... everyone thought I was dead during the whole space thing, then I came back," Sonic began, "then a long while ago Sally took this really nasty fall and we all thought she was dead, but she wasn't, so I had to use a Power Ring to fix that, Knuckles died and came back-"

"I'm glad people dying and coming back to life is so common here that you're able to just take it all in stride," Sorun said. "Can't say I share the same ability, but you know. Good on ya."

And with those words, the nervous glances everyone was sharing among one another before returned. Sally, once again, took it upon herself to speak for the rest of them, and began approaching the spot Bunnie had been standing in while the cyborg herself went to go stand back with the rest.

"I'm still not so sure what to say," Sally began. She stopped right in front of Sorun, and then locked eyes with him. Her expression was just as unsure as her words, and she'd looked down towards her blue boots before she continued speaking. "I feel somewhat at fault for what happened. Well all do, actually. You were only ever put into this position because we dragged you into our problems. We kept encouraging you to gather the Chaos Emeralds when in the end they... well, I'm sure you get it."

And that was the crux of the issue. They all felt at fault for what happened to him. Because they were the ones to vote to use the portal and drag him through. They were the ones that let him be a Freedom Fighter when he in all honesty shouldn't have become one. They were the ones that helped him gather a bunch of magic gems that killed him, and he had to suffer through his entire time here knowing all that while they spent it thinking everything was fine. He'd be shocked if they weren't nervous given all this information.

Well, Sorun wasn't having it. He already made up his mind in this matter on how he felt towards the whole situation.

"Sally, save it. Already said I don't hold anything against ya." Sorun sat up a bit straighter in his chair and leaned back a bit while keeping a grip on the back of the chair. Sally, meanwhile, had looked back up at his face as surprise crossed her features. "Ya couldn't have known. Nobody coulda. And I didn't have to go after all those Emeralds. I could have just run away and avoided it all if I wanted. I did run away," Sorun said, making Sally and a few of the others in the back flinch a bit. "But, well... figured I was never goin' home anyway, so I might as well try and save everyone since the alternative wasn't so appealing. So I came back even if it meant me dying down the line. I knew that going in and still made the choice. It's all your fault for being so likeable, every single one of you." Some smiles broke out at that. "Wasn't a picnic for me, knowing I was dying for months on, but... I dunno. You guys made it easier, somehow. So, er... yeah. Thanks. For being there for me, all of you."

"I still feel a bit responsible for it," Sally admitted, though she was smiling a bit after Sorun had said his piece. Everyone was, really, perhaps at knowing he wasn't so upset over everything that'd happened after all. In truth he wasn't, not anymore at any rate. Seeing as he was back being alive and not dying anymore. He just plainly didn't have the energy to stay upset. "You're a Freedom Fighter, and I was in charge of you. So even if your condition was kept secret from everyone, I should have noticed something and taken some measure to save you. To stop any of this from happening to begin with." Her eyes softened into an apologetic look. "I'm truly sorry for having let you endure this entire experience on your own, Sorun. For us having to rely on a comrade and friend and the expense of his life. I'm happy you forgive us, but if there's anything we can do to even remotely make it up to you, all you have to do is ask us."

These people were the only people Sorun knew that would go to such lengths to be so apologetic even after he flat-out said he forgave them for everything and tried assuring them it wasn't their fault. For the most part, at least. Part of their charm he'd fallen for, Sorun had mused. They just had to be that nice. It was endearing, in a way that warmed Sorun's heart enough that he had to fight to keep his face straight.

"Well, since you're offering..." Sorun bent down slightly and grabbed at the burlap sack that was at his feet. He lifted it up, and then plopped it right on the table in front of him. "I'll take an express ticket to Earth, one-way."

Sally blinked, and then looked to the side at the bag. Understanding crossed her features when she saw it, after which she turned back to Sorun. "Ah, I see. The Chaos Emeralds. Nicole mentioned they came out of you."

"Mhm." Sorun leaned back forwards on his chair. "Look, Sally, everyone. You're all really great, to the point I'd say you all are the only reason I was able to tolerate this whole ordeal. I mean, I gave my life for you all." He gestured to the bag. "But listen, I got my own life in my own world. People to go back to, a culture I can actually function properly in. I wanna go back to that." He looked back to Sally. "So if you really want to make it up to me, Sally, then I want you to fulfill that promise you made me. It's not broken anymore. I became a Freedom Fighter and helped you all with Eggman, helped you push him back to a destroyed city. So in return you have to send me back to Earth using the Emeralds."

"A way back home, huh?" Humming, Sally walked closer to Sorun, over to where the bag was. She reached towards it and began fiddling with the top of the bag, until eventually she managed to undo the knot holding it closed. She opened the bag up and was then forced to squint a bit when a bright array of colorful lights hit her in the face. "Well, Sorun... I'm not alone in saying that I'd grow to miss you if you left. You've really become a part of the gang over the months with everything you've done and sacrificed." She closed the bag back up and faced Sorun with a smile. "But I understand you wanting to return home, and it'd be selfish of us to ask you to stay.

So if that's what you really want, then we'd be happy to help you. You don't have to worry about a thing."

And there it was. She'd given him her word. Not that he didn't expect her too, nor did Sorun expect Sally to go back on her word. In the time he'd gotten to know her Sorun had learned that Sally had so much integrity her word was practically worth gold, formerly broken promise to him notwithstanding. Quality of her being a princess. But it was done: he was going home now.

It didn't feel quite as exciting as Sorun thought it would feel. Maybe that was just the mental exhaustion in him talking. Or the finality of it all was beginning to wear on him. He was still happy to be going back after all his time, but he just couldn't find it in himself to be overly enthusiastic at it. Quiet acceptance and a feeling of content was all he could muster.

"Well, alright." With that done, Sorun finally stood up off the chair. There was at least one single thing he wanted to get out of the way before he walked out of this room, so he'd turned to the front of the room. He began walking forwards, quickly passing Sally who turned to stare after him, along with everybody else as he approached the group of Mobians.

Soon, he reached the person he wanted to speak to. He had to get down on his knee just so he and Tails could be eye level with each other, but he'd done so nevertheless for the fox's sake. Tails himself seemed to have a hard time looking Sorun in the eye, going as far as to shy away slightly and turn his head just so they didn't have to look directly at each other. It was an action that made Sorun feel some guilt, and as a result he sighed a bit before speaking.

"So, Tails. You doing alright?"

Tails had once again jumped up a bit when he heard Sorun's voice. He finally turned his head fully to Sorun, looking like he expected to see Sorun with a scornful look, though all he saw was the human looking at him with an inquisitive look. Even so Tails still looked down at his red shoes. "I guess," Tails mumbled out. "I... I'm sorry, Sorun. For everything."

"How many times I gotta go an' say I forgive you 'fore you finally get it through that big brain of yours?" Against his better judgement, he'd risen his hand up and placed his palm on top of Tails' head just like he'd done in the past. "It's over, it's done with. I'm alright. Quit stressin' over it."

"But you wouldn't have ever had to go through all of this if I'd never made that portal!" Tails argued. His voice sounded a few octaves higher than normal, and he sounded genuinely distressed, making Sorun retract his hand a bit in surprise. "I just... I feel like it's my fault. You got poisoned by the Chaos Emeralds and died just because I'm the one that brought you here..."

"Aw, come on, Tails, that's..." He almost said that wasn't true, but he didn't want to outright lie to the kid's face. Or draw any angry glares at him from the others. "Look, it's all fine now. I undied- undeathed- undid my death- undea- I came back to life," Sorun stuttered out, though he felt a bit glad in making Tails smile a bit from his small speaking blunder. "At the end of the day all I lost was a few months away from my life." And a heap of mental trauma, but he didn't want to bring that up. "And, well... it wasn't all bad. I genuinely enjoyed spending time with you all. You know, once I warmed up to you all. First few weeks there were kinda rocky."

"Heh heh, yeah..." Tails' face brightened up a bit, though his ears had only gone halfway to being straight. "Do you really have to go, though? You can't stay?"

Sighing, Sorun rose up to his feet. "Wouldn't be fair to my mom if I stayed. From her perspective I just disappeared without a trace," Sorun said. "'Sides. I gotta go make sure my friend David didn't do something stupid. Dude's hopeless without me."

"Yeah. I understand." Tails gave Sorun a full smile, and a nod, and then turned around towards everybody else to address a specific Mobian in the crowd. "Hey, Rotor, could you help me unpack all the equipment for the portal machine? We can set it up just like last time to send Sorun back."

The purple walrus gave him a reciprocating nod. "Yeah, sure thing. If I remember right we packed all the parts away, but we should be able to get it all set up by tomorrow."

"You packed the portal machine away?" Sorun asked.

Rotor shrugged. "Well, we thought you were gonna stay here and it was taking up a lot of space in the lab, so..."

"Fair point," Sorun conceded. "We really gotta go all the way back to the HQ, though?"

"For the parts, yeah, but if you really want to we could probably just fly the parts back here to the city to rebuild it." Rotor turned to the side at an empty spot in the crowd. "Hey, Nicole? There a spot anywhere we could set it up?"

In response to Rotor's inquiry, Nicole's form appeared in the empty spot he'd been speaking into. She seemed... better, Sorun had thought. That extremely strange expression she'd wore right before disappearing on Sorun from earlier was gone and had settled into a more neutral look.

She kept glancing at Sorun, though. Minute twitches of her eyes that Sorun wouldn't have caught otherwise if he wasn't looking at her. And every time her eyes landed on him, for just that split second, her expression would change just the barest amount. What it would change into Sorun couldn't tell, because it disappeared almost faster than it took to form. And when she'd gone to address Rotor, her face had gone back to neutral and she stopped doing it entirely.

"I believe that can be arranged," she calmly answered the walrus. "There's an empty space in the science center that should be more than adequate in terms of space."

Rotor nodded. "Alright, cool. Me and Tails will fly out, pick up the parts, fly back and set everything up."

"Great," Sorun said. "So, uh... yeah, that's it," he continued while clapping his hands together. "This's my last day here. After that I'm going home."

"Ah reckon that's the right call," Bunnie said from off to the side. "We'll miss ya somethin' fierce, Sorun, but, well... family's important. And not all of us've got folk to go back to." Her organic hand slipped to the side and intertwined its fingers with Antoine's, who stood next to her. "Ya gotta do what ya gotta do. It's been real nice knowin' ya, Sorun," Bunnie finished with a smile.

Antoine mirrored the smile of his wife and and looked towards Sorun. "Oui, we will very much be missing you."

Sorun saw from the corner of his eye that Nicole had glanced towards the hand-holding couple. Her expression changed for a split second once again, and this time he was all but certain it was a sad expression. And like before she'd returned her face to looking normal. He hummed a bit at the sight, and then turned back to the rest.

"Thanks, guys. Means a lot. But I really do have to get back." He glanced over to the other side, where Elias was standing. "In a country where I'm actually considered a legal citizen."

Elias made a nervous chuckle, and then turned his head a bit. "Believe it or not I was drafting some documentation for you before... well, you know."

Sorun's eyes widened a bit in surprise. He hadn't actually known that, nor even cared enough to make a note of it. Well, it was very considerate of Elias, even if it was a bit useless now. He still gave Elias a small appreciative smile though for his efforts, the king seeing it and nodding back in turn.

"Awww, do you really have to be going away so soon?" Sorun turned towards the new voice, and saw Amy standing near him. The pink hedgehog had a small pout on her face. "We're not gonna have enough time to plan a going away party or anything for you!"

"Eh, one party was enough, I think," Sorun said, holding his hand up and giving her a bit of a shy grin. "I honestly don't think I have the energy for a party at any rate. But thanks anyway for the thought, Amy."

"Yeah, you're welcome." The pout faded away from Amy's face and was replaced by a small smile. "Bye, Sorun. It was really nice having a weapon buddy."

"Can't really call me a weapon buddy anymore," Sorun reminded her. "Don't have the sword anymore, remember?"

Amy shook her head, surprising Sorun a bit. "Nope! Weapon buddies for life, sword or no sword."

"Don't argue with her over it, Sorun. It's a losing battle," Sonic called out, the blue hedgehog still reclining in his chair. "Just accept it and move on with your life."

Sorun rose an eyebrow at the reclining Mobian. "I'm sure you'd know all about that, huh, Sonic?"

"What was that thing you said that one time? 'I have no recollection'?" Sonic tilted his head towards Sorun and flashed him a grin. "I have no-"

"That's not grammatically applicable given the current context; you saying 'I have no recollection' is you essentially saying you have no memory of Amy chasing you around, which I know is false," Sorun corrected. Sonic's grin fell away, Amy began pouting again, and everyone else began grinning towards the trio. "It'd be more appropriate if you said 'I'm sure I have no idea what you're talking about' or something along those lines. I told you that if you want to battle somebody with wits you need to learn how to speak correctly."

"..." Rolling his eyes and shaking his head, Sonic relaxed his head so that he faced the ceiling and reclined even further in his chair. "I don't even have a comeback for that one," he mumbled. "Just had to get the last word in, huh?"

"You know me."

"Yeah, now I do. I'm almost glad you're takin' your fancy speak back to Earth-"

Sonic was interrupted when the doors to leading the room everybody was in burst wide open. Everyone had jumped up a bit in shock, and Sonic had fallen out of the chair he'd been reclining in due to the loud bang! of the doors opening. Sorun had turned his head towards the now-open doors to see who it was that had just opened them, and then felt all the blood drain out from his face when he recognized the Mobian standing in the doorway.

She was standing right at the entrance to the doors, legs spread wide and arms held to the sides to hold the doors open. She was panting, heavily, like she'd sprinted all the way here, and her golden eyes were locked right onto Sorun. The human himself had gone as far as to take a step back from the sight of the manic-looking yellow cat looking straight at him, looking almost frightful.

Before Sorun could react in the slightest, Honey ran headlong into the room barreling right towards him. She hadn't even let the table stand in her way, and had jumped right on top of it just to sprint across it without losing momentum. When the cat Mobian reached the end of the table, she'd jumped yet again to dismount the table, landed on the floor still at running speeds, and then barreled straight at Sorun...

... Only to then run a short distance past him and completely stop. At the same time, Sorun found himself feeling just the slightest bit lighter right when Honey had passed him. He looked down, and realized that his white coat was missing, leaving his tattered black shirt. He blinked, and then looked behind himself to see Honey just standing there. Holding his nearly-destroyed white coat in her hands, looking at it mournfully. He could have sworn he saw tears threaten to form in her eyes.

"You didn't even have it for a week," Honey mumbled in a voice so quiet Sorun barely heard her. "I poured my heart and soul into this coat, and look at what you've done to her..."

Sorun slumped his shoulders. "It's nice to see you too, Honey. Dunno if you know this but I died. Came back, by the way. Thanks for worrying."

She waved a hand in Sorun's direction. "Ah-huh, that's nice, Sorun, but could you please explain to me-" she turned towards Sorun so fast with such a distraught look Sorun stumbled back in shock at the speed, "- why the beautiful coat I gifted you out of the kindness of my heart is nearly FALLING TO PIECES !?"

Everyone in the room had gone still, looking towards the cat like she'd lost her mind. All except Sorun, who just stared towards her with a flat look, like he wasn't at all surprised at her reaction. That seemed to make everybody watching the two grow even more confused.

"... I died," Sorun blandly stated.

"Excuses!" She threw the tattered thing at Sorun, who fumbled to catch it. "It's always excuses with you! 'Oh, I'm fighting giant killer robots who keep trying to stab me and set me on fire, ooh, I'm more busy trying to stay alive than make sure the best clothes in the world that are better than what I deserve don't get scuffed up', it's always the same thing! Do you take joy in torturing me so!? Some sick, sadistic pleasure!? Is that it!?"

"Woman, I-!"

The pair's voices became indiscernible as the both of them began drowning each other out in a shouting match. The Freedom Fighters gathered around looked at each other with confused, bewildered looks, with none of them sure how to proceed. Sorun and Honey didn't even seem to notice them all staring at the two as they continued shouting at each other.

"... I always thought Sorun was kidding around when he said the clothes lady he got his stuff from was nuts," Sonic mumbled out to Sally after finally having picked himself up off the ground. He stepped to her side and found his eyes completely transfixed at the exchange between the two.

"Yeah, I know," Sally quietly agreed, her own eyes uncontrollably affixed to the pair. "I kind of feel bad since I was the one that introduced them."

"Should we, uh... should we do somethin'?"

Sally shook her head. "I'm not sure it's a good idea to get in between that, Sonic."

"You just don't have any respect for me!" Honey screamed out. "None! None whatsoever! I slave over a sewing machine for you and for what!? For this!?"

"I got stabbed through the chest ! What more do you want from me!?" Sorun yelled.

"Oh, boo-hoo, you're fine now, aren't you!?" she snapped. "I don't even see a scar through the hole in your shirt! Yet another quality product you've ruined I might add!" Her eyes shot downwards, where she then saw the hole in Sorun's blue pants where he'd been stabbed through the thigh by a lance. "The pants, too!? What, did you get stabbed through the leg!?"

"YES!"

"IS THE CONCEPT OF DODGING TOO MUCH FOR YOU TO COMPREHEND!?"

"E-excuse me..."

Somehow, beyond all reason, that small voice had been enough to get through to the two and get them to stop shouting. Their eyes immediately traveled to the side and downwards towards the source of the voice, along with everybody else in the room who hadn't even noticed the new person enter due to being too distracted by Sorun and Honey's shouting. The newcomer everybody was looking towards was Cream, who was standing right next to the pair and looking up at them with sad eyes. Her pet Chao with the bowtie was floating on her right side, while Virgil was floating on her left.

Sorun was the first one to react. "O-oh, Cream, hi there," he softly greeted, nervously smiling at her while his eyes darted to Honey. "Hey, you know the rules. No shouting in front of kids."

"Of course, of course," Honey immediately agreed with a nod.

The rate at which the two had synced up and quickly agreed with each other right then and there after all the shouting was an act that went on to mystify every single Freedom Fighter who bore witness to this entire exchange.

Nervously smiling, and completely ignoring the wide-eyed looks everybody was giving him and Honey, Sorun turned and looked down at the small rabbit. "Was there something you needed, Cream? How come you're all the way out here at the castle?"

"W-well, it's kind of a long story..." she said in a shy tone. "My mother and I were at Ms. Honey's store because my mother wanted some new clothes for me." She looked towards Honey, who, for some reason, froze up a bit. "Ms. Honey seemed really sad, and when I asked why, she just said she missed you, Mr. Sorun! And I remembered earlier when Ms. Amy was at our house having tea with us that the nice computer lady appeared and said everybody was gathering here, and she mentioned your name, too! Ms. Amy seemed really surprised and left before she could even finish her tea, and later I told Ms. Honey what happened and she ran all the way here, so I flew after her because I was worried!"

Sorun blinked at the long-winded explanation, and then he tilted his head curiously at the little girl. "You... flew here?"

"Mhm! With my ears!"

"I'm ignoring that." Pushing Cream's statement completely out of his mind, Sorun turned towards Honey. He saw that her eyes had darted away from his, and the instant he saw this, he found a small smirk playing across his lips. "Aw, Honey... don't tell me. You were actually sad I was gone?"

"W-well... ugh, of course I was!" she replied in an indignant tone. The yellow cat crossed her arms while keeping her whole head turned away from Sorun. "You were gone! How was I supposed to feel!?"

"Mah, mah, Honey, there's no need to be upset. I get it." Chuckling, Sorun held up the tattered white coat to her even though she still refused to look his way. "It's aaaall clear now. You didn't wanna look all emotional in front of me so you pretended to be more upset at the coat to hide it. It's understandable you'd be too shy to show that side of you. Almost sounds like something I would do, actually."

It'd all been said in a teasing tone, which seemed to visually irritate Honey based on how she began to growl under he breath. Before Sorun could say anything else her hand shot out, and she snatched the coat out from Sorun's hand, and then turned her back to him fully.

"Tch. Who do you think I am? I have an image it maintain." She turned her head to Sorun, angrily glaring at him. An angry glare that by now was much more subdued. And if one looked hard enough there may have been a smile there somewhere. "And I am upset about the coat. I really did put a lot of effort into this one."

"Yeah, I know..." Sorun began rubbing the back of his head while making a slight chuckle. "Sorry about that, Honey. I tried my best not to ruin your gift to me so soon after getting it."

"... You're impossible to stay mad at, y'know?" Sighing, Honey tossed the coat over her shoulder and then turned fully to Sorun. "I suppose I could overlook it this time and file this instance under extenuating circumstances. Just this once. Given your...-" she glanced at Cream, and then looked back at Sorun, "- trip? Trip. It's a shoddy excuse, but I'll take it."

Sorun's response was to make a light chuckle at Honey, while also giving her a small smile. She'd blinked in surprise at the action, but then she gave him almost the exact same chuckle and smile at seeing Sorun's reaction. By now everybody watching had calmed down as well and began smiling again. Nicole, too, thankfully enough. It was something that caused a nice feeling to well in Sorun, though it was interrupted when he felt a soft tug on the leg of his pants. He looked down to see Cream was trying to get his attention.

"Mr. Sorun? Did you go somewhere?" she asked him. "You never came back to check on Mr. Virgil, and everybody seemed really worried and sad for you."

"Ahh, right, that." Sorun got down on one knee and addressed the Mobian child with a calm smile. "Yeah, I had to go somewhere alone for a bit. I'm back now, though."

Cream's ears straightened up in understanding. "Oh! Where did you have to go?"

"Super special Freedom Fighter mission, top secret, can't tell you a single thing. Sorry." The explanation caused a small whine to come out of Cream, as well as her large rabbit ears to lower somewhat. Sorun once again chuckled a bit at the sight, and then looked over to the side. He caught Virgil looking at him with the same scowl he usually wore. "Glad to see you're happy to see me."

"Chao."

"Don't try and say you weren't worried. I know for a fact you were sadly staring out a window, all forlorn-like. You missed me."

The accusation seemed to shake the Chao a bit. He did a double-take on Sorun, growled out a bit, showing his sharpened teeth, and then turned his head away from Sorun while grumbling out, "C-chao-chao..."

"You're allergic to feelings, I get it. Missed you, too, buddy." A sudden thought came to Sorun, which made him pause as he continued staring out at the Chao. With him returning to Earth, Virgil would essentially be losing out on an owner. He couldn't just go and take him back with him. A strange, mystical creature wouldn't last two days on Earth before something bad happened to him. At least that's what Sorun's paranoid mind told him. "Maybe I could... nah."

Internally, Sorun shook his head. He didn't want to put his Chao at risk by bringing him back, or separate him from his homeworld. He'd have to stay on Mobius. Which meant that he would need a new owner. He figured asking Cream wouldn't be too terrible of an idea considering she seemed to already have a handle on caring for Virgil. And he honestly doubted anybody else was up for it.

"That all said, Cream..." Sorun began, turning back towards the child rabbit, "I need to go on another trip. Unfortunately, this one's going to be a permanent trip."

"Permanent?" Cream repeated, growing a bit sad as a result. "You're leaving again?"

"'Fraid so. I gotta go home to my family, you see. And my home's so far away that I won't even be able to ever visit. So can you do my a favor and keep Virgil for me?"

The question seemed to surprise Cream a bit, who'd widened her eyes at Sorun at hearing the question. Virgil had reacted, too, though while he was surprised as well, he also didn't seem too happy about what Sorun just asked.

"Chao-chao!" The black and blue Chao floated right in front of Sorun, shaking his head in denial while angrily gesturing to Sorun with his arms. "Chao!"

Sorun sighed at the sight. "Virgil, there's no Chao back where I'm from," he said. "I don't know what would happen to you if you came back with me. Things, uh... things don't work back there like they do here." The explanation caused Virgil to pause a bit, and while the anger began to rapidly fade from his features, he'd still lowered his head down to the floor while the rest of him seemed to go slack, save for his V-shaped wings that kept him aloft. Breathing heavily through his nose, Sorun reached forwards and gently poked the Chao's head hard enough to pick his head back up. "I'd take you with me if I could. But I can't. Besides, it'd be a bit too cruel of me to take you away from your home." He removed his finger, and Virgil found it in himself to keep his head lifted up at Sorun. "Keep an eye on things here for me, okay? I won't be able to do it anymore."

"... Chao." Reluctantly, Virgil gave him a nod as a look of understanding crossed his eyes. Sorun nodded back at him, smiling once again, and then turned back to Cream. To his relief, she was smiling back at him.

"Don't worry, Mr. Sorun! I'll take good care of him!" she promised. "I, um... I hope your next trip goes well! I'll miss you!"

"It'll go fine, Cream, don't worry," Sorun said to her. "Now, uh... maybe you should go back to your mom? You kind of made it sound like you kinda just abandoned her at-"

"Oh dear! Mother!" She seemed to reach the same vein of thought as Sorun did from the way realization flashed over her eyes, along with her features morphing into a worried look. "She must be worried sick over me! Sorry, everybody, but I need to go back now!" Much to Sorun's confusion, Cream's ears began to... flap. They were moving up and down like a pair of wings. "Goodbye, everyone!"

After that, with Sorun staring blankly and with a straight face, Cream's body began to lift up all the ground. Her ears, acting like wings, carried her all the way out through the doors she and Honey had come in from, with her own pet Chao Cheese following after her. Virgil followed as well, but then had stopped at the open doorway to the room. He glanced back at Sorun, looking straight into his eyes, and gave him a nod. Sorun nodded back, after which the Chao turned around and followed after the other two.

"... Just to be clear we all saw that, right?" Sorun suddenly spoke up after the three finally left. He got back into a standing position, and then looked to the side at Bunnie, who was looking out towards where Cream had flown off to. "Bunnie, are rabbit Mobians supposed to do that?"

"... Ah know ah can't..." she mumbled in answer, seemingly looking just as surprised as Sorun at seeing the rabbit girl flying away with her ears. "Well... huh. Ain't that a thing?" Chuckling a bit under her breath, she shook her head and, with a small smile, looked towards Sorun. "Guess ya ain't leaving without one more surprise, huh?"

"Evidently," Sorun dryly responded with a grin of his own. "So now that the goodbyes are out of the way, what do you all want to do now?"

The next hours were spent with everyone just talking. Sitting there in that room, hanging out like any normal group of friends would. It was nice, Sorun had felt. That he was leaving things in such a state like this. Where everybody was happy and okay. And he was glad to get this much in with everyone before he'd finally be leaving. He was glad to have stayed and spent this time with everyone. Enough that he'd eventually left the room smiling.

For the first time in what felt like forever, he didn't feel too shy about other people seeing him smile.

Chapter 58

Recursion Error

Episode 58- Goodbye, Chaotix

"You know, Knuckles, it would have been really great if you, I don't know... mentioned you died at one point and the Neo-Walkers helped bring you back. Woulda been real helpful helping me cope with the whole dying thing."

Thanks to Nicole, the news that Sorun was up and about had reached Team Chaotix up on Angel Island. He'd made friends in them, too, so naturally they'd wanted to see him with their own eyes, and Sorun wanted to say goodbye to them before he left for Earth.

Unfortunately, Sorun didn't want to go outside of New Mobotropolis. Frankly speaking, he didn't want to leave the safety of the city by stepping outside of its borders, especially now that he was powerless once more. Likewise, the Chaotix weren't too keen on leaving the island, even if it was to visit a recently revived friend. The answer to this dilemma came in Sorun using a communication system that had been set up some time ago so the people down here could keep in contact with those up there on the island.

So that lead to this point, with Sorun sitting in a room in the science center staring up at a big monitor displaying Knuckles' face. The entire team up there had already been briefed by what happened with Sorun and his revival by, once again, Nicole, and Knuckles, seeing how he'd gone through the same process Sorun had for coming back to life, had understood immediately and hadn't questioned it at all. So the call was less an interrogation and more a friendly chat.

Or at least it was until Sorun brought up Knuckles never mentioning his own death and revival.

"H-hah, yeah, about that..." The echidna made a nervous cough and looked to the side of the camera that was transmitting his image. "Well, it never really came up, so..."

Sorun had risen an eyebrow at seeing the echidna's expression. Under the relieved smile there were hints of tension and nervousness. The same look the Freedom Fighters had when he confronted them all post-revival. He understood it well- Knuckles probably had some small amount of guilt in him, too, with what happened to Sorun since he and the rest of the Chaotix helped in the decision to bring him here. Perhaps he felt even more at guilt for never bringing up his revival. It was a sight that made Sorun sigh.

"Knuckles, would you relax?" Sorun requested in an annoyed tone as he waved a hand. "I'm not mad at you or anyone else. I'm not upset anymore." He blew past his lips and sat backwards in the rolling chair he was sitting in. "It's over and done with and I get to go home now. All in the past, yeah? 'Sides, not like I even blame anyone for what happened."

Knuckles had started a bit at Sorun's words, and for a brief moment the mask he wore dropped and his nervousness was very apparent. But then he'd sighed, relaxed his shoulders, and he took on a more easy expression as the red Mobian faced the camera once more.

"Yeah. Sorry about that, Sorun," he apologized. "We all felt bad hearing what was really going on with you, but I'm glad to see you're alright now. But you're really going back to your own zone?"

Sorun nodded. "Mhm. Got all the Emeralds, and Rotor and Tails already flew out to get the parts for the portal machine. They're gonna set it up here for me."

"Huh. Well, good for you. Glad you finally get to go home," Knuckles congratulated with a sincere tone. "Julie-Su wanted to come say hi, too, but she got wrapped up in an errand with Saffron and Ray. They all wanted to see you again, actually, but they're not gonna be back for a while."

"Just give them my regards, please," Sorun said. "I don't really wanna stay on too long. I'm leavin' tomorrow and I got some last things I wanted to do."

"I getcha." Knuckles nodded at him and flashed a grin. "Well, don't let me keep ya-"

The rest of Knuckles' sentence was lost when a small, black and yellow form shot in from out of the camera's view and right into the back of the echidna's head. Sorun had widened his eyes in surprise at seeing the act being displayed on the monitor, while Knuckles, interestingly enough, looked more annoyed than anything.

"Is that Sorun!? Is it!? Is it!?" The human watching the screen let out a laugh when he recognized the voice and saw who it was clinging to Knuckles' back while staring towards the camera. Knuckles wasn't nearly amused, and began waving his arms up in an attempt to try and swat the newcomer off of him.

"Charmy, get off!" Knuckles had barked out. The bee, in response, had buzzed his wings and flown off from Knuckles with a small pout on his face, while the echidna himself rubbed the back of his head while turning back to the camera. "I gotta go, Sorun. Happy to hear you're doin' well. Uh... goodbye, I guess. Hope it all goes well for you."

He gave Sorun one final smile through the camera, and then wandered off-screen. All that was left was Charmy, who was floating right in front of the camera while giving it a quizzical look. And then he seemed to recognize the figure in the screen on his end as Sorun, and he immediately flew so close to the camera that he almost rammed into it. He very well might have, seeing as the screen briefly shook as Charmy took hold of the camera.

"Sorun!" The amount of happiness exuding from Charmy's face was downright explosive from how he looked, as well as infectious due to the fact Sorun had felt himself crack a wry grin at seeing the bee's reaction. It was enough that Charmy's eyes had gone slightly glossy from seeing him. "You're not dead anymore! We heard you came back and we were all really happy 'cause you died and we found out why from Shadow and-!"

"Charmy, Charmy, give him some room!" A green, scaled arm came into the screen and pushed the bee away from the camera. A crocodile Mobian's face then appeared within view, scowling at Charmy. "Geez, he's all the way on the other side of the planet and you're somehow smothering him!" The scowl left, and in a split second the crocodile with a gold chain around his neck turned towards the camera and gave Sorun a wide, tooth-filled smile. "Sorun! Heard you were back in the land of the livin'! How's life?"

"Life's, uh... life, I guess," Sorun answered, still smiling a bit as he shrugged. "Vector. It's nice to see you."

"Same, same. Ain't just me here to see ya, though." Vector stepped to the side, letting two more Mobians into the view of the camera. A purple chameleon with a yellow horn and an armadillo with a smooth, red shell that Sorun instantly recognized.

"Mighty, Espio." Sorun's smile grew a bit wider when he saw the two walk into view. "It's great to see you both."

Both of the Mobians smiled in turn when they saw Sorun on their own screen, though theirs were much wider than his own. Mighty was the first on to speak, saying, "Sorun! It's great to see ya!"

Espio, in turn, nodded at him. "Indeed. I'm relieved to see you're no longer deceased."

"Yeah, tell me about it. So how are things..."

It was a breath of fresh air to just idly chat with friends like this. No crises, no nerve-wracking topics, nothing even remotely negative. They'd just talked. Sorun about his revival, plans for going home, and how he was generally doing really well now. The reception he'd received in turn from the others had been warm, though Charmy had been a bit disappointed Sorun was leaving so soon since it meant they couldn't celebrate Sorun's return to both life and his home.

But, otherwise, it was a relaxed conversation. They'd talked about how things up on the island were going, which was to say, pretty slow and uneventful. Knuckles was still dealing a bit with everything that had happened with the echidna people, but otherwise, things had been quiet up there. It was good for Sorun to hear. He felt like things going "slow but peaceful" is what he'd been fighting for this entire time. It helped to reassure him that he was making the right choice in going back. Things on Mobius were alright now. Nobody had to worry about anything anymore.

He was glad. It was the least these people deserved. And it meant he could go back without feeling any guilt.

"... But, yeah, that's pretty much the long and short of it." This had marked the end of a small story Mighty had just finished telling Sorun of how the Chaotix had lost track of Charmy one day and had spent an entire afternoon looking around for him. Apparently he'd just been taking a nap behind the Master Emerald's altar, which had gone on to upset Knuckles some amount. Charmy himself had on a sheepish look the entire story, while Sorun kept smiling and laughing softly through the whole thing. It was such a mundane, boring story, but it was for that reason alone Sorun found so much joy in it. In such a mundane, harmless thing. So much better than everything else he'd been dealing with all these months. "So you're goin' tomorrow?"

"Tomorrow," Sorun confirmed with a nod. "I don't imagine you all will be coming to say goodbye."

Mighty, Vector, and Charmy both glanced towards each other, while Espio looked off to the side. "The island's really far away from New Mobotropolis..." Mighty began, appearing to grow a bit uncomfortable.

"Yeah, that'd be kinda a long trip for us to take just to see you off," Vector finished off. "Sorry we won't be able to make it, Sorun. But hey, at least we got this."

Sorun waved their concerns away with a sweep of his hand. "Don't sweat it, guys. I get it," he said, making the four of them looked relieved. "I wouldn't expect you guys to drop everything just for my sake. It's fine. Saying goodbye through this is more than enough."

"Aw, well, I'm sure gonna miss you!" Charmy beamed out. "I'll go ahead and tell Saffron you said goodbye for her!"

"I'll do the same for Ray," Mighty volunteered. "Sorry they couldn't be here to say goodbye with us. They got caught up with something."

"It's fine, it's fine," Sorun assured them. "I'm just glad I got to see you all one last time."

"Same here, pal. Same here." Vector gestured a peace sign at the camera as Mighty stepped next to him while Charmy floated by his other side. "Welp, Sorun, it's been real nice knowin' ya! Don't let the portal hit ya on the way out when you finally hit the trail for home, y'hear?"

Sorun nodded. "I hear you, Vector, I hear you. Stay well, all of you."

With some final nods and smiles, the three finally left the view of the camera as they walked off to tend to their own devices. All that was left was Espio, who was still standing in view of the camera. His arms were crossed and he had his usual stoic expression and stance, though even he couldn't avoid grinning just the slightest bit given current events.

"I wanted to wish you safe travels as well, Sorun," Espio said to him. "I'm pleased to hear the way to your home has been opened to you, and that you've decided to take it. We'll make sure to look after things here on our end, so please try and not worry too much over us."

Sorun chuckled a bit, while the Mobian ninja's own grin grew just the slightest bit. "I'll try not to," he assured him. "They aren't too loud for you, are they? The others? I know you like your quiet time for you meditation and stuff."

Espio shrugged. "Even they are not loud enough to interrupt my meditation exercises. Even so, there's enough quiet spots on the island for me to hide myself away in," he added in with a slightly bigger grin. "I understand that you lost your abilities?"

"Yeah. Same thing happened with Knuckles if I heard it right," Sorun said. "I'm not too broken up about it. Not having years taken off my life is nice, and I get to go back home now. So it all worked out."

"That it has," Espio agreed with a nod. "I can't say I'll be missing that katana of yours."

Sorun rolled his eyes in an amused manner. Espio still had a dislike for katanas, the same as always. "You never change, Espio," he said. "Vector still tease you about not liking katanas?"

"He usually doesn't, but there were many times when you and that sword came up in conversation that he'd mention it and everybody would jump on the same bandwagon," Espio grumbled out. "It's my fault for starting it in the first place. He didn't even know what a katana was until I told him when he asked about ninja tools and weapons this one time."

The sentence caused Sorun's eyes to widen and, following him snapping his fingers, he pointed towards the screen. "Ha, so you admit it! Ninjas do use katanas!"

Caught by his own words, Espio became startled enough that his arms uncrossed and surprise flashed over his features. He composed himself a second later, and then a mixture of amusement and annoyance crossed his face as his grin returned. "I'll admit that they may not be entirely exclusive to samurai. But you'll never find this ninja using one."

"What about me?" Sorun asked. "Am I samurai material?"

At that, Espio made a single, low, controlled laugh. "Not in the slightest. You're way too undisciplined," he said, making Sorun slump back in defeat. "You're quite good with a sword, though. And your stealth skills are... passable, to an extent. If somewhat unorthodox."

The human perked up a bit in pride at hearing the compliments. "You're really not letting that box go, huh?" Sorun blinked, and then tilted his head as a thought suddenly came to him. "Hey, how do you know what a katana is?"

The grin fell off from Espio's face. He stilled a bit, and then asked, "What do you mean?"

"Well... it just came to me. None of the Freedom Fighters here knew what a katana was when they first saw the Yamato. Not even Shadow. And according to you Vector and the rest just knew because you told them," Sorun explained. "I kind of just assumed katanas were something only found in the eastern continent, so that's why nobody here knows about them, but... I thought you were raised in the chameleon community up on Angel Island." He made a shrug. "It's just a bit weird."

"Some of the founders of that community hailed from Yurashia," Espio smoothly answered, making a shrug of his own. "They brought some of the culture from there and passed it down over the generations. It's where my ninja techniques and weapons originated from."

"Ah, alright. That makes sense." Sorun blinked again. "Didn't Angel Island originate from Downunda, though? How'd chameleons from Yurashia wind up there to begin with?"

Espio shook his head. "I'm unsure, Sorun. This was all well, well before my time, and I never delved too deep into our history before I began tagging along with Knuckles and the rest."

With that, Sorun shrugged in acceptance. Weirder things had happened on Mobius. Much weirder things. He didn't see the point in looking any further into it. He didn't even want to, really, since he had way more important things to focus on. Like home. And, well... generally speaking, everything else. Upon thinking about it further, Sorun realized he didn't actually care all that much about this entire topic.

Espio didn't like katanas. That's as far as he needed to think about it.

"Well, Espio, I don't wanna take up anymore of your time," Sorun said. "This is goodbye. Keep Charmy out of trouble for me, would you?"

"I'll endeavor to do my best." Espio gave Sorun one final smile, and then, in an act that made Sorun smirk in amusement, flattened his arms to his side and bowed at the camera. "Farewell, Sorun. I greatly enjoyed our time together. Thank you for everything you've done for us."

"It's been an experience, Espio. Peace."

And with that, Sorun hit a button on the side of the console he was sitting in front of, right below the monitor he was staring at. The screen went black upon the communications being cut, followed by Sorun getting out of the chair and stretching his arms and legs a bit after having sat down so long.

That had been nice. The Chaotix were doing well like everybody else was. Sorun was glad for it, and was happy that he got to say goodbye to most of them. He found that he'd be missing them just as much as everyone else.

"Ah, well. They'll all be fine." Sorun turned around away from the monitor. "I have faith things here will work out. All's left is for me to hit the road."

He began making his way towards the exit of the room. A camera that was right above the doorway swiveled towards Sorun's way, and at the same time there was a small swirl of green pixels besides the doorway as Nicole's form materialized in front of Sorun. He greeted the lynx with a wave, who looked towards him with a neutral face and with her arms held behind her back.

"Hey, Nicole," Sorun greeted, "I just finished talking with the Chaotix. They're all doing well. Thanks for letting me use the-"

Without a word, Nicole disappeared before Sorun could even finished speaking. He blinked in surprise as a result, and then looked where she'd disappeared from as he scratched the side of his head in confusion.

"Okay...? What's up with her?" He didn't know her to just disappear like that while somebody was talking. She was way more considerate than that. "Eh, whatever. Maybe she's just caught up with something," Sorun reasoned to himself with a shrug.

He left the room right after, wondering to himself, "So what was I gonna do next...?"

Chapter 59

Recursion Error

Episode 59- Goodbye, Team Dark

"... Man, this is awkward."

The biggest surprise of all that day was when Sorun learned that Shadow was coming here to see him. Somehow, someway, he'd found out about Sorun. And Sorun only knew he found out when he was informed he was coming all the way out to New Mobotropolis just to see him. The initial surprise had been enough to stun Sorun for a few seconds, and after he got over it he decided that the most sensible thing to do was to go to the airfield and wait for Shadow to arrive.

So that's what Sorun did. Went to the airfield to wait for Shadow, inside of the hangar. Tens of minutes later a dark green shuttle had flown into view, had stopped over the runway, and softly touched down before powering down. Only one figure had exited from it: a figure Sorun had instantly recognized as Shadow. He remembered the red-striped hedgehog entering the hangar, and his eyes immediately being drawn to Sorun, who was sitting on top of a small stack of crates. It'd been strange to see how such a flurry of emotions had twitched across Shadow's face, as he'd seemed to try his hardest to stifle them all and maintain his neutral scowl that he ordinarily wore. Even he couldn't contain all that surprise, though. Sorun could have sworn he'd even seen hints of relief and joy that had flashed over the hedgehog's face for what was probably milliseconds. Then again, it could have just been the lighting. Or his imagination. Some combination of the two, perhaps.

Shadow, for his part, hadn't said a word. What he did do was wordlessly step over to where Sorun was, sit on a metal crate right next to him, and... simply continue to sit there. They probably spent minutes sitting next to each other in silence, with the mood becoming increasingly more uncomfortable by the second, at least for Sorun. The human had committed to glancing over at Shadow occasionally, though all he would find was his crimson eyes looking right at Sorun, his face set almost in slight wonder.

But even Sorun had a limit to his patience.

"You know, usually people use words for these sorts of things," Sorun said. Merely speaking had made Shadow look almost startled, though even so his eyes wouldn't leave Sorun's own. "You're free to speak, you know."

"... You're alive." It was a statement of fact, though Shadow's voice was unusually quiet compared to how he normally sounded. A bit less reserved, slightly softer. Sorun picked up on it, but didn't comment on it nor did he think much of it.

"Not for a lack of trying," Sorun replied. "I had to fight tooth and nail to get those Neo-Walkers to bring me back. Can you believe they had me go through this whole spectacle while keeping the fact I could come back in their back pocket?" He scoffed, faced forwards, and crossed his arms. "I really did have to fight them, too," he added. "I kind of downplayed it when I told everyone else, but... eh, I'm not gonna lie to you, Shadow, I kinda went a bit far with them."

"How far?" Shadow asked, tone simple and curious.

Sorun scoffed. "I reenacted the 'American History X' curb stomp on Aurora's face, so I don't- ah, wait, you wouldn't know what that is. It's this one movie where, uh... eh, you wouldn't be interested," Sorun said with a dismissive wave. "They regenerated, so it's not like I did any lasting damage. And honestly I couldn't care less seeing everything they... well, I don't know. Still my choice in the end to go after the Emeralds."

To his surprise, Shadow shook his head. "They shouldn't have kept you from speaking out. There's still fault that lies with them. I'm... relieved you were able to sort your differences with them and come back. You shouldn't have had to die just for the sake of a planet that isn't even yours." Shadow's eyes became half-lidded in regret, and he'd turned forwards and away from Sorun as his hands were folded into his lap. "I wanted to apologize to you."

Sorun cocked his head to the side as he looked back to Shadow. "Apologize? For what?"

"Back then, with that red Chaos Emerald," Shadow clarified. "I always knew you were hiding something, that your excuses for not wanting to touch that Emerald were nothing but just that: empty excuses. But I could never figure out what the issue was, and you dropped the matter after coming back, so I ceased thinking on it." His head dipped a bit lower. "I blame myself in part for you having to go so far. I should have noticed something. I should have picked apart the meaning behind your words, why you didn't want to be a Freedom Fighter. I don't blame you for having those feelings, knowing it would result in your death, but-"

"Shadow, it's not your fault." The black and red hedgehog looked back to Sorun in surprise as Sorun shook his head. "Even if I wasn't an idiot that never realized I coulda just used Yamato to separate that curse, I wouldn'ta done it. If I knew before I decided to go ahead with it all, well... that'd be a different story. Seeing as this one had a happy ending, I don't really want to focus on the what-if of it all," he said. "I don't hold any blame in you, and neither should you."

His words seemed to make Shadow relax a bit, which Sorun was thankful for. Nevertheless he still had a small, upset look to his otherwise calm eyes. "What made you decide to give your life up?" Shadow asked.

Softly exhaling, Sorun flattened his palms against the top of the crate and leaned back a bit as he looked up at the hangar ceiling. "Same reason as you, I guess," he said. "I like this planet too much to see it die."

"... I see." Shadow shifted his gaze back forwards. "You like it so much, and yet you're intent on leaving it."

"Aw, don't tell me you're gonna miss me."

With a roll of his eyes, Shadow scoffed. "Don't flatter yourself. It's unbecoming."

"Strong words for a guy that raced all the way out here when he heard I was back to being alive," Sorun pointed out. When he leaned back forwards in a normal sitting position and turned his eyes back at Shadow, he saw that the hedgehog had stiffened up and widened his eyes slightly, as if he'd just been caught doing something. "I didn't make you use a vacation day or something from work, did I?"

"No, you're fine." When he glanced to the side and saw Sorun's blue eyes curiously looking into Shadow's red, he sighed and turned away from Sorun once more. "You're on good terms with the others?"

"Mhm, yeah."

"You're healthy again? No lasting effects, no-?"

"Yes, Shadow, yes, sheesh." Sorun made a breathy chuckle as he shook his head. "No scars, nothing's missing, I'm all good. Quit worryin' so much over me."

"I-!" Shadow turned to Sorun to say something, but while he opened his mouth, nothing came out. Sorun glanced at Shadow as a result, though all the hedgehog did was close his mouth and looked down a bit. "I... I think you going home is the right decision," he said. Sorun didn't bother calling out the sudden shift in topic. "You told me you felt like you didn't belong here, not even with the Station Square humans. You should go back to those you can identify with." His eyes glanced to the side. "Back to a world you're less likely to be hurt in just because you don't have powers."

Sorun blinked a few times, and then quietly snorted in amusement. "The fact I'm so weak now compared to everybody else has been a bit... frustrating to live with again, I won't lie. But I'm used to it," he informed Shadow. "But you're probably right. It's not fun living in a place where children are stronger than me." He gave Shadow an inquisitive look. "Gonna miss me?"

"... Perhaps a bit," was all Shadow offered as he looked back up at Sorun. "I haven't encountered anybody who's as easy to talk with as you. Not since..."

Shadow cut himself off right there. He'd clamped his mouth shut, and after silently looking at Sorun for a few moments, turned back forwards to look ahead. Once more Sorun blinked, and then did the same thing. What felt like another minute of silence passed before Sorun spoke again, with the both of them still sitting forwards.

"Back then, you said, 'I don't want to lose you, too.'" From the corner of his eye he noticed Shadow flinch. "Who else were you referring to?"

"I don't wish to speak of it," was Shadow's immediate, clipped response.

"Fair enough." Far be it for Sorun to pry. He was curious, very much so admittedly, but he liked Shadow too much to try and breach his privacy. If it was something like he suspected it was, Sorun couldn't rightly blame him for wanting to keep it to himself. Not in the slightest. "Well, at the end of the day, nobody's letting me apologize for worrying them all so much, so you don't get to apologize for anything, either. It worked out."

Shadow relaxed some, and if the look on his face said anything, he was thankful for Sorun having shifted the conversation topic. "That it appears to have," Shadow agreed. "I'd say it all wrapped up rather nicely, but..." He stopped briefly to take a deep breath, looking like he was readying himself for something, and then continued. "There's something you should know. The reason Rouge didn't join us in that final battle is because she was attacked on the way to our position."

"Attacked?" Sorun repeated, growing a bit concerned. "By what? Is she okay?"

Shadow nodded. "Recovering back at G.U.N., yes. Others... weren't so fortunate. Whoever attacked them only spared Rouge and killed the G.U.N. personnel traveling with her." Sorun's face had grown even more concerned, while Shadow's expression had turned grim. "She spoke with the assailant briefly, though she said he wasn't giving up much. Not even a name. She couldn't even tell what kind of Mobian he was, either, since he was covered head to toe in clothing with not a single part of him exposed. But according to Rouge, he displayed physical prowess far above the norms of a Mobian, and even showed off a regenerative ability."

"So a Chaos energy user, then?" Sorun guessed.

Shadow nodded. "We're assuming so, but it doesn't leave us any suspects." He made a quiet exhale. "There's one other thing. He knew you were dying."

The room had chilled right there after that sentence was uttered, and Sorun couldn't tell if it was his mind playing tricks on him or if the temperature really did drop. He replayed the words in his head over and over in his head in what was less than a second, but no matter how many times he did it, it just didn't make any sense to Sorun. He would have said Shadow was messing around with him, but he didn't know Shadow to do something like that. He'd never joke about something this serious. He wouldn't joke about soldiers dying and Rouge being hurt. About any of this.

It was the truth. And it confused Sorun to no end.

"Shadow." Sorun's voice came out low, his eyes locked right onto the dark hedgehog's with a serious slant to them. "That's literally impossible. There's no way."

"Are you absolutely sure?" Shadow pressed. "You never told anybody about-?"

"I couldn't have if I wanted to!" Sorun shouted out, startling Shadow a bit. "Y-you're telling me- no, you're wrong. I knew, and the Neo-Walkers knew. That's it. You're telling me some random powered-up guy, a guy who I do not recall ever meeting since I'm pretty sure I'd remember someone like that, knew the Chaos Emeralds were killing me when I never told a soul?"

"Rouge said he said it right to her face," Shadow said. "The reason that outpost we went to was cleared of robots was because of this man. He confessed to Rouge he was the one that cleared that place just so you could acquire the final Emerald. He even gave a correct estimate as to how long it would take for you to die. He said around twenty minutes."

That was accurate. Off a bit, maybe, but in the general ball park. Sorun hadn't been keeping track of time when he'd been cutting through hundreds of Badniks so quickly in his mad dash through that ship. He'd been too focused on his goal to keep track of something as meaningless as time. Around twenty minutes sounded right, though.

But it didn't make sense. Nobody could have known. Especially... whoever it was Shadow was talking about. Somebody with powers who covered their entire body with clothes. That could have meant anything, anyone. But that shouldn't have mattered because there was no way they could have known ! Sorun himself didn't even know how long it would have taken him to die after getting the seventh Emerald until it happened!

"Sorun... the Commander wanted me to escort you back to the command center. For questioning," Shadow said, making the human snap his eyes right to him. "They... they just want a statement from you so they can gather as much information as-"

"I refuse."

Shadow winced a bit. "Sorun, please-"

"I'm not going!" Sorun had raised his voice a bit, startling Shadow again, and after which he slid off the crate he'd been sitting on and began pacing back and forth. "Jesus Christ, Shadow, I'm-I'm leaving ! I'm leaving literally tomorrow and you decide to drop this bomb on me!? And, and you want me to, to what, delay that just so I can go all the way to G.U.N. HQ and tell them I know nothing!?"

No. No, he wouldn't do it. He wasn't going to get wrapped up in another adventure, and he wasn't leaving the safety of the city just to go and do something as useless as that. He was leaving. He was done with it all. He wasn't going to be staying on this planet for a second longer than he needed to, and he surely wasn't going to get mixed into whatever this new mess was.

He couldn't do anything even if he wanted to. He was powerless. And he refused to gain that power yet again and lose his way home. He wasn't letting the world get an excuse to hold onto him any longer.

Shadow, for his part, didn't even so much as speak back to Sorun. He looked uncomfortable, if anything, even a bit guilty at seeing Sorun's outburst. "At least tell me if you know-"

"I don't!" Sorun interrupted, making Shadow flinch back. "I don't know who the guy is, okay? I don't know who he is, I don't know how in the world he knew that much about me, I don't know why he let us get that last Emerald, I-I don't know, Shadow." He sighed out, and let his arms go limp at his sides. "I don't know who he is. I just don't know, Shadow." He walked back to the crates, though instead of sitting back on top of them, he sat down onto the ground and pressed his back against the crates as Shadow watched. "I might have an idea, though."

"You do?" Shadow's eyes widened in surprise. "What do you mean?"

The back of Sorun's head thunked onto the surface of the crate he sat against. "It was when I first met the Neo-Walkers. They, uh... they said..." His head tilted up to the ceiling as he tried to remember what they said. "They said something, some entity, just... showed up out of nowhere. They said they couldn't use their god vision or whatever to see it, that it was blocked from their sight, and that... it's basically what threw everything off-kilter. Whatever that means." He threw his arms up in defeat. "I don't know. If I had to guess I'd say they were talking about your man, but that's all I got for you. For all I know it might not even be that."

Shadow had silently listened to Sorun throughout the entire explanation. He didn't appear to be very satisfied with the answer once Sorun had finished, and he continued staring down at Sorun even after he ceased speaking. "You're sure that's all they said?" he asked.

"That's all I have, Shadow," Sorun tiredly muttered out. "Did you really come here to see me because you wanted to, or were you ordered to?"

"I..." Shadow's face fell, partly in guilt, and partly in regret. "Both," he admitted to Sorun, making him scoff. "Sorun, I primarily came because I'm worried for you."

Sorun made a "tch" sound. "Sure you are."

"Sorun, I care about you. I truly mean that."

The sincerity behind Shadow's voice, along with how soft it had gone, caught Sorun off guard. He looked to his left and saw Shadow had slid down his own crate just to sit next to Sorun again, with concern written plainly on his face. And no matter how hard Sorun tried, he couldn't find any deceit in Shadow's face. He truly meant what he said. Sorun had relaxed immediately right after, feeling the barest twinge of guilt at having been so dismissive of Shadow's concern for that brief moment.

"... Forgive me for my outburst, Shadow," Sorun apologized. "It's... this is a lot."

"Already forgotten," Shadow said back. "Sorun, I came because I care, and I worry. It scares me knowing some unknown person powerful enough to do what he did to Rouge and kill a small squad of soldiers so effortlessly knows so much about you when it shouldn't be possible. It concerns me we know so little and he seems to know so much. It..." He looked down, his teeth grinding a bit. "It frustrates me greatly there's nothing I can do about this. Nothing but be here to make sure you're alright."

"Well... thank you for that," Sorun mumbled. "Listen, Shadow, I get it, but... I don't mean for this to sound callous, but it is what it is. I'm not going to be on Mobius after tomorrow. It's not my problem. I don't want it to be my problem." He shook his head in Shadow's direction. "I... I just can't, Shadow. I can't do this kind of thing anymore. I just can't. I'll fall apart if I try."

A look of understanding formed on Shadow's face. He reached out to place a hand on Sorun's shoulder. The exhausted, pitiable look on Sorun's face was enough to make Shadow's own expression turn gloomy. Out of worry for him, Sorun had assumed. Or maybe everything in general. He couldn't decide which was worse.

"... It's technically within my authority to detain you and bring you back to G.U.N. by force if I deem it necessary." Sorun stiffened up greatly, but relaxed at the calming look Shadow gave him. "I'm not going to," he assured Sorun. "What you said is more than enough. Beyond that, I... I want you to leave as soon as possible. Before something happens. In case he wants to try something. Just get away from all this. Please."

He almost sounded the same as he did when Sorun revealed he was dying, which only brought the human's mood down even more. He reached up to place his own hand over Shadow's, going as far as to give it a reassuring squeeze as he gently removed it. "I will. Don't worry," Sorun said. "I'm going home tomorrow."

"Good. That's... that's good." With a final nod, Shadow stood back up to his feet. "I'll be returning now," he said to Sorun. "For what it's worth, I..." Shadow trailed off, face scrunching in confusion as he became unsure as to what exactly to say. "I... just, be well, Sorun. Goodbye and farewell."

Looking at Sorun one last time, Shadow turned around and began to walk away towards the exit of the hangar. He'd only made it halfway before he stopped, and then turned around to look at Sorun once more. The human was still sitting with his back against that crate, his eyes having gone down to the ground. Shadow sighed a bit at the sight, offering Sorun one last, hopeful look, and then turned around and exited the hangar.

The sound of Shadow departing barely even reached Sorun's ears. He hadn't even registered the sound of the shuttle he came in taking off, or even the silence that surrounded him once he was gone. He was too wrapped up in his own thoughts to consider anything outside of himself at the moment.

"There's no possible way some kind of stranger could have not only known I was dying from the Emeralds, but could have known an accurate time estimate for when they'd kill me," Sorun thought. "It's impossible. I told no one. And how could he have known details I myself didn't even know? It makes no sense..."

It was like when he tried to figure out what the deal with that tablet was all over again. That wooden tablet that was responsible for bringing him here. A tablet with a set of numbers that lead to a world so far removed from the rest of the multiverse its own existence was called absurd by some here on Mobius. It made no sense how that tablet could have had those numbers when it was given to the ruler of the now-former kingdom so long ago. Why it pointed to that specific place on Earth, at that time, why Sorun had to be there right when it opened, none of it made sense. It made as little sense as how somebody Sorun had never even met knew all of that information.

"Maybe I shouldn't even worry about it. It's like I told Shadow: it's not my problem anymore. I'm leaving. I'm not in a position to worry about it." He shook his head and, slowly, started to get up to his feet. "I don't even want to think about it. It's gonna be one weird loose end I'll never solve once I get back, sure, but by this point it's out of my hands. It's probably nothing, anyw-... well, alright, it's something , but I don't see whatever it is being as bad as Eggman. Not my problem anymore. I'm going home."

Strange, to be sure. Everything about it was. But Sorun was less focused on thinking about it and more focused on just trying to forget about it entirely. Part of him was almost upset at Shadow for informing Sorun of all this in the first place, but he couldn't find it in his heart to blame him for what he did. He was just worried and trying to look out for Sorun. He could understand that. And he truly was grateful to Shadow for not forcing him to go with him all the way to the other side of the world for some ridiculous statement. He was a good person. Another person Sorun would miss.

"Ugh... this is all such a headache." Having finally stood up, Sorun had made a small sigh while clutching at his forehead with his hand. There was a painful throb in his head just from thinking about all of this. "I... I need some pancakes."

Chapter 60

Recursion Error

Episode 60- Goodbye, Sonic

Sometimes in life all a man needed was some pancakes to help the world slow down.

In Sorun's opinion they were the penultimate food, seconded only by french fries. Or at least the ones made by Sonic's mother had that effect on him. He wasn't so sure why. They just had this strange calming effect that helped Sorun to think. Whenever he bit into one of those golden, fluffy discs all his worries seemed to just disappear in that moment. They calmed him down enough so he didn't feel like he was gonna die of a panic attack every second.

He decided to just ignore everything Shadow had told him, a decision reached halfway through the pancakes graciously provided to him by Bernadette. It was weird, definitely so, but he wouldn't be around long enough to worry about it. No reason to look behind him at strange loose ends like that. He'd leave that weird, strange matter in much more capable hands than his.

Wasn't his problem.

He was going home.

"I'm really gonna miss her pancakes." It was with a forlorn expression that Sorun stared down at the empty plate right in front of him. As far as his second last meal went, it was miles better than a damn hotdog. All good things had to come to an end, though, and unfortunately pancakes weren't infinite, despite how much he wished for the opposite. So with a resigned sigh, he took the plate and utensils and walked them over to the sink.

He'd probably only made it through twenty seconds of washing them before a gloved hand shot in from outside of Sorun's view to softly grab onto his wrist. He jumped a bit due to being startled from the sudden contact.

"Oh, Sorun! I thought I told you that you didn't need to worry about the dishes!" The feminine voice reaching Sorun's ears caused him to turn towards its source. He saw that it was Bernadette herself standing next to Sorun and grabbing at his arm. Same warm eyes and same kind smile as always. "You've been through enough without having to worry about that. Go on, just leave it. I'll get to it later."

"A-ah, right. Sorry, Mrs. Hedgehog," Sorun quickly apologized. He'd reached his hand out from the sink, prompting the blue hedgehog to let go of him, though her smile became a bit strained. "I just didn't want to be a burden-"

"Oh, shush now, Sorun, shush. You're anything but a burden," Bernadette chided him with a shake of her head. "Just go on and relax, dear. I'll take care of it."

Even after all this time Sorun couldn't help but be flustered around the woman. Perhaps it was because she reminded him a bit of his own mother. It was because of that he couldn't help but feel inherently bad by the way she wouldn't so much as let him lift a finger to help with anything, and how he'd felt a bit guilty asking her for pancakes at eight at night only for her to agree without any hesitation whatsoever. It was a combination of her just being that genuinely good a person and in part, Sorun suspected, due to some amount of gratitude she held for Sorun for saving her, her family, and everybody else during the destruction of Knothole, as well as helping out with the Freedom Fighters.

It was a sentiment the other members of Sonic's family shared, as well. His robotic father had been acting friendly around him, smiling and patting Sorun on the back while giving him well wishes on his return home. Chuck, who had been visiting his family at the time, had largely been the same. All smiles and happiness, not a hint of animosity between them directed at Sorun. He was grateful for the family's hospitality, though he also felt a bit undeserving of it. Of just how nice they were to him.

Almost five months on this planet and he never got used to how nice people here could be.

"I never got to thank you and your husband for giving me a place to live in all this time I've been here," Sorun said as he sat back down at the dining room table. "I-"

"There's no need for that, Sorun. It was nothing," Bernadette assured him, still wearing that kind smile on her face. "If anything, I'm almost sorry you're leaving. It was nice having such a polite, young man like you spend some time with my son. I was so hoping some of your manners would rub off on Sonic, but, ah, alas... he still won't pick up his socks."

"Yes, he's still the same as always," Sorun finished with a nod. "It's unfortunate you were given such an ungrateful son who can't see the lengths his mother will go for him," he'd jokingly stated, though on the inside he was completely sincere with his statement.

Bernadette made a bit of a giggle at the statement. "He's still my son, and I love him dearly. And I can't exactly fault him considering how many times he's saved, well... the whole planet." She took one glance at the sink, and then looked back at Sorun. "I'll get to those tomorrow. You're free to spend the night here before you go back home tomorrow, dear. I, um... suppose this would be goodbye."

"That it would be," Sorun confirmed. "Thank you very much for taking care of me, Mrs. Hedgehog. Words alone cannot express how grateful I am to you for taking me in."

Her smile had wavered a bit, and past the tan fur on her mouth Sorun could have sworn he perceived a blush on the woman's face.

"It's no trouble, dear," she assured him. "Take as much time as you need to settle in. Thank you for everything you've done."

After that, and with one final nod to Sorun, Bernadette left to some other part of the house. Sorun himself breathed out lightly and leaned back in the chair, leaving one arm laying across the dining room table as he glanced around. As far as aesthetics went, Nicole had done a more than decent job recreating the Hedgehogs' new home here in New Mobotropolis. Wasn't the exact same, of course, and from what Sorun understood they had to retake a lot of pictures since the old ones were lost in the bombing, but otherwise it was still a very homely-feeling place.

Sorun had only been able to admire the décor of the kitchen for a few minutes before a blue speed blur passed in front of his vision, followed by the sensation of somebody sitting next to him. Sighing out, Sorun turned to the side to see Sonic sitting in a chair right next to him, forearms softly tapping on the table's surface as he grinned at the human.

"Hey-hey, my man, Sorun," Sonic greeted. "How're you feeling about tomorrow?"

"As well as I can be," Sorun answered. "All things considered I'm pretty excited to leave."

"Oof. Don't gotta act that happy to be leaving us," Sonic said, feigning a hurt expression.

Sorun made a wry grin. "I would stay, Sonic, but... I'm not gonna lie. I don't want to. This world's too crazy for me," he said. "Speaking of which, I'm afraid I'm going to have to ask if I can spend one last night in your room. I don't have anywhere else to go, you see."

"Yeah, sure, no problem," Sonic agreed with a nod. "Just, uh... it's kinda messy in there, eh-heh, so if you wouldn't mind-"

Sonic was cut off when, after his face flashed into an expression of annoyance, Sorun reached out and pinched Sonic's nose between his thumb and index finger. The hedgehog made a strangled sound and tried swatting at Sorun's arm to get him to release him, while Sorun stared at Sonic with narrowed eyes.

"I consider it a great shame that such a wonderful woman like your mother has to have such boorish son such as you that can't even pick up after himself," Sorun grumbled out, still keeping a hold on Sonic's nose. "She gives you life and you don't even have the decency to pay her back by keeping your room clean? Have you no shame?"

"Le' 'o of meh!" Rolling his eyes, Sorun finally released his hold on the hedgehog's nose. He breathed in deeply as a result, and then made a groaning sound as he darted his eyes away from Sorun's piercing glare. "Gimme a break, Sorun. You're tearing me apart over one bad habit?"

"You should be thankful that's the only trait of yours I picked out," Sorun said.

"Sheeeesh..." Sighing, Sonic leaned back in his chair enough that his face was facing the ceiling. "Hey, I wanted to ask. You're kind of in a hurry to race back home to Earth, aren't you?"

Though he couldn't see it, Sorun gave Sonic a flat look. "Yes, how could I ever be rushing to make it back to my loved ones I haven't seen in months?" Sorun dryly remarked.

Blowing past his lips, Sonic ceased leaning in the chair. He oriented it back so that all four legs were on the floor, after which Sonic turned to Sorun while locking eyes with him. "You could just stay for a little bit longer, y'know? Few more days ain't gonna do any more harm," he suggested. "Or we could, well... I dunno, just send a letter or something through the portal to explain what happened to you so they don't worry?"

Sorun's mood began to dim a bit, and it began to show on his face. "Sonic..."

"I know, I know. Family's important. You shouldn't stay." Sonic rose his palms up to Sorun as a sign of peace, and then groaned out a bit as he leaned against the table, propping one of his elbows up on it. "I'm... I'm just really gonna miss you. I actually really liked having you as a roommate."

"Learn to fold, Sonic."

"Not just 'cause you picked my socks up," Sonic laughed out, though it was a humorless laugh for the most part. "Hey, listen, I know in the beginning there we weren't really tight an' all, but, well... everything I said back then still holds up, holds up a hundred times over. You're one of the coolest people I've ever met," Sonic confessed, making Sorun's expression shift to surprise. "The way you did everything you did while you were going through all that awful stuff, the way you fought, the way you put others before yourself, it's... you're just really cool, Sorun. Way past it." He began to sheepishly grin as he turned his eyes away from Sorun. "I know asking you to stay would be too selfish of me, but you've been a really great friend. I just wanted to get that out before you left."

"... I feel as if I don't deserve your praise," Sorun admitted. It was Sonic's turn to look surprised as he looked back to Sorun, who had slumped a bit in his seat. "I thank you for your kinds words, Sonic, but... in truth, I simply don't feel somebody like me warrants them."

Sonic's shoulders fell a bit. "Aw, man, this must be serious. You always talk fancy whenever you get serious."

A single, half-amused chuckle left Sorun. "You seem to be the only one who's ever noticed that," he admitted. "Maybe Nicole, too, but she never made mention of it."

"Well, uh... I think it's neat," Sonic said. "It's kinda cute when you do it."

"Never call me or any trait of mine 'cute' in any capacity ever again," Sorun groaned out while shaking his head. The reaction had made Sonic grin a bit, causing even more ire on Sorun's part.

"Just teasin' ya," the Mobian sniggered out, though it died out when he saw the down look on Sorun's face. "What's eatin' at you?" Sonic asked, worry plain in his tone.

What, indeed? Most of Sorun wanted to keep quiet for the rest of his time here just so he didn't have to bother Sonic with some of his problems. But a small part of him managed to reach out and say that they were friends, genuine friends now and not... whatever their relationship had been prior to this. Back when Sorun held all that animosity towards everything and everyone. He didn't have a reason to bottle it all in anymore. It was okay if he talked to Sonic, that part reassured himself.

So, while drumming his fingers along the table, Sorun sighed and began to speak. "I... It's just been a lot," Sorun quietly admitted. "Everything. All of it. Hiding all of that for so long, dying, the... the daily struggle of not just breaking down." Sonic's features grew increasingly strained with worry as Sorun continued to speak. "I really thought that was it when I died. The end of my life, alone in some random, giant metal room. I felt like the worst person in the world. Such a failure, such a bad person, and more than that, I was... I was dying. Was about to die." His eyes shifted down towards the table. "Never been more scared in my entire life. Then I died."

He felt uncomfortable just talking about it, reliving that experience. Sonic didn't look much better, looking both worried and sad as he looked towards Sorun. Even pained, in some capacity, as if seeing Sorun in such a state was hurting Sonic, too. For some reason it made Sorun feel... relieved, of all things. He couldn't tell why. Just that he liked it. The attention he was being given.

"What was it like when you died?" Sonic asked.

"I don't wish to speak of it," Sorun mumbled out. "I went somewhere dark for a bit, then I had to do a bunch of nonsense to pull myself back to life." He paused to briefly reach up and run a hand over his face. "It's not really that that's bothering me," he confessed after lowering his hand and looking back at Sonic. "I feel bad because... well, you never really got to know me. The real me."

"Huh?" Confusion mixed in with the myriad of emotions of Sonic's face as he blinked in confusion, his ears going up straight. "I, uh... I don't get it. Sure I know ya."

Shaking his head, Sorun said, "I don't know if that's true. When I first got here I was just full of so much... confusion, and anxiety, and anger at everything and everyone around me. And then the Emerald happened, I was told I had to kill myself-" Sonic flinched, "- for the sake of the same people that tore me away from my life, and all those feelings were just magnified," Sorun explained. "So much... fear, dread, anger at everything, at the whole world, there were too many emotions for me to list off. Like a cloud smothering me every single day. And I kept it hidden from all of you through that whole time. Every single facet of myself that was eating me alive. And I just felt so... fake the whole time. Hiding the fact I was so depressed for months straight from you all. Like I was wearing a mask all the time just so none of you would worry." He paused. "A really heavy mask. And it just kept getting heavier each day."

"W-well... it's not like it was all fake, was it?" Sonic asked. "I-I mean... I get it was a struggle holding that all in, and I'm glad you're getting it all out now and don't have to do that anymore, but it's not like you were faking your whole personality or anything."

"..." Sorun thinned his lips, looked to the side, and then back at Sonic. "Maybe not," he agreed in a hesitant tone. "Some times were easier than others. Fighting, as much as I disliked it... helped take my mind off it for a time. You and all the others being kind around me helped take that edge off. Nicole was... well, Nicole." The corners of Sorun's mouth lifted up the faintest bit at mention of her name. "Some days were just easier to manage than others, while the others were... a struggle, we'll say. That party, the one I helped Charmy set up, it was... well, that one night was the only night I can think of where I didn't have to wear that mask in front of everybody. It was the one night I could relax and be me."

That and every single time he'd ever been with Nicole, a voice in the back of his mind told him. He didn't want to entertain that thought too much, since those happy memories hurt to look back on now that he was leaving. And furthermore he didn't want to give Sonic more ammo to tease him with.

"See? There ya go." Sonic reached over and softly punched Sorun in the shoulder. "It's not like you not having to hide your feelings anymore makes you a whole other person suddenly. A bit different, sure, maybe, but I like this Sorun way better than the old one. If you feel that bad about it though, then... let's just start over!"

"... Eh?" It was such an unexpected suggestion that it completely blindsided Sorun, enough that he felt like he'd been metaphorically slapped. Sonic, on the other hand, had fully turned towards Sorun, smiling widely while holding his arms out to his sides. It did nothing to assuage the utter bafflement Sorun felt at the claim, causing him to shake his head before speaking. "Start... over...?" Sorun slowly repeated.

Sonic vigorously shook his head up and down. "Mhm! Fresh start! No more bad feelings or secrets or anything getting in the way. Just you and me getting to know each other. Not that all the other times we hung out it wasn't real, but if you really feel like they weren't, then now it can finally be real."

"Pffft... hah hah..." He couldn't resist laughing at the suggestion. At how pure and innocent and sincere it was, and how Sorun hadn't seen it coming at all. He barely even knew what to think of it, at how overly simple it was and just how Sonic the suggestion felt. Like it was something only he would ever suggest, and somehow, Sorun could see it. "It's a little late to be doing something like that, isn't it?"

Sorun asked. "I'm leaving in twelve hours. And eight of those hours will be spent sleeping."

Sonic shook his head side to side, not surprising Sorun in the least. "Nah, no way. It's never too late to make a friend," he said, and then extended his open hand out to Sorun. "Come on, just go with it. It'll be good for you."

Looking down at the hand in bemusement, Sorun couldn't help but scoff at the gloved hand being offered to him. It was such a ridiculous notion, restarting when they had so much history between them already, but then again... there was some odd appeal to it Sorun himself couldn't rightly describe. And it wasn't like doing such a thing would erase the memories they'd already made together. This was simply... well, Sorun didn't know what it was. Therapy, maybe. Sonic just trying to help him.

Well, he doubted this would help, but he wouldn't deny Sonic this moment. Not when he was just trying his hardest to help Sorun at the very last minute. He was too grateful and respected him too much to do something like that. So after taking a deep breath, Sorun played along, reach forwards, and grabbed at Sonic's hand with his own.

"Fine, have it your way," Sorun said as his hand and Sonic's gripped each other. "Hello. My name is Sorun... Sorenson..." The last name was mumbled out so quietly that Sorun himself had barely heard it. He'd been too nervous saying his last name to say it at a higher volume. He saw Sonic's small, triangular ears flick, though, indicating he had heard the name. And to Sorun's horror, he began to smirk.

"S-Sorenson?" Trying his best to stifle his growing laughter, Sonic began smiling widely. "Your full name is Sorun Sorenson?"

"Shut up ..." Sorun bit out, growing angered at the hedgehog's amusement. It was embarrassing enough knowing he had to live with the name, but at least here he could get away with it by never telling anybody what his last name was. Now that he'd told Sonic it in a moment of weakness he was regretting it immediately and wishing he'd have just lied and made up a cooler last name. Or even better just stolen a cool last name from his mental library of fiction.

"Srnk- okay, alright, I'll take it seriously." Managing to fully subdue his laughter, Sonic took in a deep breath to begin his own "greeting". "Heya, Sorun! I'm..." He paused, and for whatever reason he grew a bit nervous before saying his name. The hesitation was noticed by Sorun, who tilted his head a bit in confusion, though this just caused Sonic to breath out and shake his head. "Ugh, fine, here we go. My name's Ogilvie Maurice Hedgehog, but you can just call me Sonic. In fact please just call me Sonic."

There was a moment where, after Sonic finished, the pair just continued to stare at each other in complete silence. Sonic stared at Sorun in slight apprehension after having just revealed his name, while Sorun looked at Sonic in one part incredulity and one part disbelief. The human's expression soon turned to realization that Sonic was telling the truth based on the look the hedgehog was giving him, and then surprise when he realized just what that name really was. More seconds of silence passed as they continued to look at one another.

And then Sorun burst out into an uncontrollable fit of laughter.

"Ugh...!" The groan Sonic made almost made it sound as if he was in grief in response to Sorun's laughter. The blue Mobian seemingly deflated, his whole upper half flopping onto the table top as he rubbed both sides of his head with his fingers. "Sorun, man, come on..."

"Ogilvie! Ogilvie of all things!" He couldn't help banging his fist on the table. Sorun's laughter was so intense he nearly fell out of the chair he was sitting on, which would have left him laughing so hard on the floor he wouldn't have been able to get up. He managed to avoid that fate, though, by some means. It didn't detract from the fact Sorun found Sonic's name to be the most hilarious thing in the world at the moment. "ha-ha-ha-ha! I-I've never- that's just too funny!"

Sonic didn't find it nearly as amusing. With his chin pressing against the table he stared up at Sorun, a deep frown on his face as well as just the slightest bit of red peaking out from his tan mouth fur from embarrassment. Fortunately for both Sonic's sake and Sorun's lungs, the laughter began to subside.

"Ha... ah, man." Wiping away a tear with his finger, a large smile still on his face, Sorun looked at Sonic with his own teasing grin on his face. "I've never even heard of that name before. That's a new one for me. I don't even know if I can think of a name that tops that one."

"Oh, like yours is so much better!" Sonic slammed his palms on the table to lift himself back up to a upright sitting position. "What kind of parent gives their kid a name that sounds like the family name!?"

"Same kind that names their kid Ogilvie?" Sorun jokingly remarked, causing Sonic to roll his eyes away from Sorun. "She thought it'd be funny, I guess," Sorun said in a slightly more serious tone. "My mother was caught up on the whole Latin thing and, I dunno, guess she picked out the name 'cause she thought it fit, or... yeah, I don't really know. I'll ask her when I get back."

"Yeah, some sense of humor your mom's got." Sonic's eyes drifted back to Sorun's face. "Your dad went along with that name, too?"

"..." The sudden shift in Sorun's mood was enough that Sonic was almost startled by it. His question made the smile that was on Sorun's face drop off instantly, and a slightly cloudy expression overtook Sorun's previous one. "Don't wanna talk about him."

"Huh? Sorun-?"

"Sonic, seriously. Drop it."

There wasn't any anger or malice behind Sorun's request. Not even sadness, which just went on to make Sonic look confused. He couldn't tell what Sorun was feeling just from listening to his words alone, and looking at his face didn't bring Sonic any answer, either. He couldn't tell what was going through Sorun's mind, seeing that vacant, downcast look he had. But then the human teen shook his head, returned his expression back to normal, and then locked eyes with Sonic. There wasn't any evidence on his face Sonic could see of the sudden mood change that had happened seconds prior.

"Sorry. That's a bad subject for me," Sorun quietly apologized. He made a small sigh and sat back further in his seat. "Sorry again if I brought the mood down."

"Nah, it's... it's fine." Sonic turned to the side briefly to let out an awkward cough. "So... names..." He said in an attempt to alleviate the growing tension.

"Yeah. Names." Still leaning back in his chair, Sorun reached forwards and began to idly tap his fingers against the table. "Our parents are evidently pretty terrible at picking out names."

"Ah, I wouldn't go that far..." Sonic denied with a slight chuckle. "Tell ya what. I'll never use your last name or tell anybody it if you never say my real name in front of anybody."

"I'll agree to that." The mood was already beginning to turn lighter as, thankfully, what happened just a minute earlier began to be forgotten by the two. That's what Sorun perceived when he saw the smile beginning to return to Sonic's face. The less said about that, the better as far as he was concerned.

And then the mood shifted entirely when Sonic sat straight up in his seat as his eyes opened widely. Sorun reacted by jumping slightly in his seat.

"Oh, shoot! I just realized!" Sonic exclaimed. "I never taught you the handshake!"

"The... handshake?" Sorun echoed. "What handshake?"

"The Freedom Fighter handshake!" Sonic said, as if that alone explained everything. "It's a handshake we, uh... okay we made it when we were all kids and starting out the whole thing, but it stuck with us all the way from then to present. I figured, well, you're a Freedom Fighter, so you should get to know it, too."

"It's a bit last-minute to be teaching me the super secret handshake, ain't it?" Sorun pointed out with a tilt of his head, though a small, amused grin appeared on his face. "I don't think-"

Sorun was interrupted when Sonic reached towards him and grabbed at one of Sorun's wrists. He felt some of his joints lock up instantly from the unexpected contact, but otherwise he did nothing but silently watch as Sonic brought their hands together.

"Nah-nah-nah, it's okay," Sonic assured him. "Think of it as something to remember us by. Now here's how it goes, so pay close attention, okay?"

Sorun did so, expecting to see some convoluted, over the top handshake that he'd have a hard time copying as he watched Sonic move his hand while Sorun himself mimicked the movements with his own hand. He was severely disappointed to find that the coveted Freedom Fighter handshake was, by all means, a fairly bog-standard handshake. Enough to the point that Sorun had to wonder if Sonic was messing with him.

"Alright, so we fist bump up like this, then down, then we center it, then you take your finger and-"

"Sonic, this is just an ordinary set of fist bumps with a finger twirl mixed in," Sorun deadpanned as he copied the hedgehog's hand motions. "This is the most lackluster secret handshake I've ever seen."

"Oh, come on! We didn't even get to the part where we lock pinkies and then do the thumbs-up at the end! You have to see it first!" Sonic complained, right as they reached the aforementioned steps of the handshake.

Looking completely unimpressed, Sorun shook his head and rolled his eyes to the ceiling. "I can tell you made this when you were kids," he commented. "I know a whole bunch of complicated handshakes on Earth that would put this one to shame."

"Oh, and you're suddenly such an expert?"

"I'd like to consider myself a sommelier of overly complex handshakes. Me and my group of pals back home used to make up a bunch for funsies."

"Somme-what now?" Sonic's eyes narrowed a bit. "... That's not a real word. You made that word up just to confuse me."

Sorun snorted in amusement. "I really didn't. You know, you should be thankful I'm teaching you all these new words, Sonic. I heard girls like guys who have a vocabulary that contains more than just three-syllable words."

"Man, whatever. I try to do something nice for a guy..." Sonic mumbled out, sighing a bit and shaking his head. "Alright, alright. If the handshake doesn't interest ya, Mr. Wordsmith, then I'll leave you with something else."

Once again Sorun found his wrist being grabbed by Sonic's hand. He didn't act surprised like the first time, and made no outward reaction as Sonic jumped off his chair and pulled Sorun all the way into the house's living room. The room itself was vacant, save for Sonic's pet dog, which was sleeping in a small bed in the corner of the room. He was practically forced to sit on the couch by Sonic, though right after he'd released Sorun's wrist and then disappeared somewhere in a blue speed blur. Sorun stared off in the direction

Sonic had run towards, blinking in confusion, but then merely shrugged as he sat back against the couch.

Not even two seconds later Sonic had returned, this time clutching something in his hands. A guitar, Sorun had recognized with a disbelieving scoff. A plain-looking one, but a guitar nonetheless. Sonic sat down in the spot right next to Sorun, fiddling with some of the tuning knobs meanwhile and strumming a few of the strings to make sure it was tuned.

"You play guitar?" Sorun asked, half skeptical and half impressed by the mere sight of the instrument.

"Ah-huh," Sonic confirmed with a nod. "You ever try an instrument?"

"No, never," Sorun answered with a shake of his head. "Thought of picking up violin, but, eh... I wasn't really serious about it. Would have cut into my video game time anyways."

"Ahhh. 'Course." Giving Sorun a knowing smirk, Sonic strummed his fingers along the guitar's strings. A small, melodic tune flowed out as a result. "I'm a bit out of practice, actually, but I wanted to play all the same." His fingers began to continually strum along the instrument's strings. "I dunno. I just wanted to relax and do one last thing with you before you left. You don't mind, do you?"

"Not a bit." Kicking one leg over the other, Sorun's back sunk further into the couch while at the same time he interlaced his fingers behind his head. "Play away, Sonic."

And so he did. Sorun was the furthest thing from a music connoisseur, but at the same time internet back on Earth, as well as various forms of media, made Sorun's ears very traveled when it came to music. Sonic playing a simple guitar didn't much compare to the hundreds of songs, music tracks, and game OSTs he'd heard in his life on Earth. Even so, Sonic wasn't half bad. Pretty good, actually. The simple notes being played out by the guitar certainly had a charm to them. It was nice. Calming.

As far as his final night on Mobius went, this wasn't a bad way at all to be spending it. Sorun found himself actually enjoying Sonic's playing after a short time, and eventually Sonic even began humming a song under his breath. It made Sorun happy, oddly enough. Sitting there, relaxing next to a friend as he played his music. He could have fallen asleep right there he felt so peaceful.

It was a nice way to end things.

"Well... looks like this is it. Goodbye, Mobius."

Chapter 61

Recursion Error

Episode 61- Goodbye, Earth

The room was separated in half by a wall that had a giant window that spanned the entire length of the wall, save for the door that was on the very end of said wall that lead to the other side of the room. On one side was a long array of consoles and buttons pressed up against the wall, with multiple cords and cables at the bottom going through small ports at the bottom of the wall and snaking through the floor on the other side of the room in order to connect something at the very far end of that room. It was what the cables were connecting to in the other room that was Sorun's sole focus at the moment.

He hadn't really known what to expect when it came to how the portal machine would look like. A large, circular metal thing that would make a portal perhaps, like something out of 'Stargate'. Or a large platform with a bunch of pillar things around it. Something along those lines. He'd seen too many examples of portal machines in various forms of fiction back on Earth to make a singular guess for what it would be.

In the end, he... wasn't too far off the mark, Sorun had supposed. It was indeed a circular 'gate' of sorts in that the main component he was staring at past the window was a large, metal ring set up on a small, metal platform. On either side of the portal were two tall, metal poles topped with, oddly enough, red spheres decorated with yellow stars. And those poles were each attached to small consoles on their sides by power cables, from which Sorun could see from here had the Chaos Emeralds slotted into them. Three of them inserted into the left console and four on the right.

"The weird star post things are a bit off-putting, but, uh... whatever works, I guess." At the end of the day Sorun didn't really much care about how the thing looked as long as it worked, and he knew from experience it worked.

It was finally time to go back home. The anticipation alone was killing Sorun. Leaving it all, going back home, the mess he was going to have to deal with seeing as he'd technically been missing for almost five months over there, seeing everyone again and leaving everyone here. To put it mildly he was feeling jittery. Excited, too, enough that he could barely stand still seeing the portal machine. It was almost intimidating to look at.

There were a couple of other people in the room besides him. Tails was over by all the consoles, making various adjustments and such to get the machine ready. A scientific process that was way over Sorun's own head for him to even begin to understand what he was doing. Sally was there, too, mostly just to oversee that everything went as planned and supervise Sorun's departure. She'd approached Sorun's side as the human teen was staring out at the portal machine on the other side of the window, looking down at his torso with curious eyes.

"Hey, Sorun." Her voice drew Sorun attention towards her, where he saw her examining his torso. "Where'd you get that?"

"Hm?" He looked down at what she was looking at. "Ah, this..."

Earlier

"A last-second gift? For me? You shouldn't have."

Looking up from the item he held in his hands, Sorun saw the yellow cat standing in front of him blink her golden eyes, and then turn her head away in slight indignation. She'd crossed her arms over her chest as well, while her tail began to swish back and forth in an irritated manner.

"Well, if you're going to be like that then just give it back," Honey said, not sounding nearly as irate as she looked. "I'm sure I could find an owner actually appreciative of it."

"I didn't mean to detract from your kindness, Honey. It was just a bit of sarcasm." Sorun looked back down at what he was holding. "I actually quite like it."

Simply put, it was a leather vest. A navy blue vest, almost black it was such a dark blue. A vest that would have been normal otherwise were it not for the texture it had. The interior was lined with a soft, silky-smooth material, but its exterior, the dark blue leather surface, was a different matter. It wasn't the soft, smooth texture normally found on leather. As he ran his thumb over the vest, it... almost felt like he was touching the scales on a lizard, strangely enough. Or at least something that tried to mimic that sensation, as it still felt like leather.

A strange vest, to be sure. And for some reason Sorun couldn't help but be drawn to it.

"What gave you the idea to make something like this?" Sorun asked, his eyes still transfixed on the vest.

"Remember that one time I asked if I could see that sword you used to have for inspirational purposes?"

"Vaguely," Sorun answered, looking back up at Honey.

"Well, I noticed back then the, er, handle part was made of this weird blue, scaly stuff," Honey explained, her own head having already turned towards Sorun. "I wanted to make you something to take with you back home as, well, a souvenir, and I thought if I made something like that it'd make it personal for you." When he continued to silently look at her, the cat Mobian began shuffling her feet while growing a bit sheepish under the look. "I-it came to me in a dream, so the next morning I got some faux leather and silk out from my storage and threw that together."

"Oh, she uses fake leather? Eh, one mystery solved." Humming, Sorun looked towards his own chest. Honey'd been nice enough to give him a new black t-shirt to replace the one that had the hole through its chest. Without another word he slipped his arms through the arm holes in the vest, and then reached for its center in order to zip it closed.

He couldn't be too surprised at the way it fit so snugly against his torso, and yet at the same time wasn't uncomfortable in the least. All in all the vest was perfect.

"I'd say you outdid yourself, but considering that's pretty much a gold standard for you I'm not sure the phrase does you enough justice," Sorun said. The nervousness disappeared from Honey altogether at Sorun's comment, prompting her to stand up straight with a proud, smug smile on her face. Her tail began swishing around even faster. "I love the vest. Thank you, Honey."

"Wellll...~ I suppose there's a lot of truth to that," Honey said, her nose pointed high in the air and her expression growing more smug by the second. "As expected of somebody who knows they stand so close to greatness. Really, you're the luckiest guy in the world to have somebody as amazing as me as a friend who showers you with gifts like this, Sorun."

Sorun's own smile began to become strained, and one of his eyes twitched. "Yes, I'll... miss this humbling attitude of yours so very much..."

"As you should." She looked back down to lock eyes with Sorun, after which Honey's smile softened. "But really, I can't thank you enough for everything you did to help my business out. I really am gonna miss you." She began to idly twirl around one of her black pigtail-tied bundle of hairs with her finger. "I have way more than enough people that do business with me, but not a lot of people actually talk with me normally like you do. I'm not so sure why."

Sorun's face twitched violently.

"Ah, well. I'll be fine." Her finger lowered away from her head. "Anyways, take care of yourself, y'hear?" Honey finished out. "And don't you dare ruin that vest. You don't have to fight killer robots anymore, so you don't have any excuses."

"I'll do my best," Sorun assured her with a smile. "Bye, Honey. I doubt I'll ever meet another person like you ever again. I still don't know whether that's a good thing or a bad thing."

"Alright, alright. Don't push it." With a teasing look on both of their faces, Honey reached over and pushed Sorun on his shoulder. "Go on already. You have a home to get back to."

"... It was a parting gift from a friend," Sorun answered in response to Sally's inquiry. The fact he could comfortably say that he considered the cat as a friend was still something that mystified Sorun, but despite all her faults, of which there were numerous in Sorun's opinion... well, she was still a good person who gave him nice clothes. It was hard for him to not like her.

"Gift, huh?" Sally gave the vest he wore an appreciative nod. "It looks good on you. Honey?"

Sorun nodded. "Yeah."

"Hm... maybe I should go to her one of these days." She looked down a bit and tugged at her own open vest. "Not that I don't like this one, but..." She looked back at Sorun's vest. "Yours has so much detail. She must have put a lot of work into it."

"She did." Sorun gave Sally a half-amused smile. "I guess blue vests are just in. Congratulations on being a trend setter."

"Har, har." Mirroring Sorun's amusement, Sally shook her head, and then rolled her eyes towards the window dividing the room in half. "So... this is it."

"That it is," Sorun confirmed. "Thanks for keeping your promise, Sally."

Chuckling a bit, Sally turned back to Sorun. "I'd be a terrible princess if I didn't keep my word," she said, and then extended her hand out to Sorun. "It's on behalf of all the republic's people that I thank you for your service with the Freedom Fighters, Sorun. I realize everything that's happened to you hasn't been the least bit ideal, and I'm sorry the most we can do to repay you is undo what we did by sending you back to your zone, but you still have everyone's thanks, as well as my own personal thanks." Her smile became wider, more genuine and happy. "Thank you, Sorun. For sticking with us and being such a great friend."

Sorun stared down at the hand. If this was right after he learned he was dying, he probably would have smacked the hand away from him. If his current personality had any semblance to what he was like back then he wouldn't have bothered saying goodbye to anybody and would have just waited for the portal to finish so he could storm through it and back to his own world. But that was then, and this was now. And he valued Sally too much to ever consider doing something like that anymore.

"It's been an experience I'll never forget, Sally." Sorun reached his own hand forwards and grasped at Sally's brown-furred hand. "Good luck with things over here. And with, you know... the whole royalty thing."

"I'm still questioning just how much my title of princess is worth with the way the government is now, but I'll try my best." They shook hands, and then retracted their hands back to their sides. "As for things here, don't worry. Eggman's still out there, but we'll all still do our best to keep the world safe."

"You better. If I died to keep this world in one piece only for you guys to screw it up I'll find a way to come back here just to slap you all."

The lighthearted jest caused Sally to laugh a bit. "We'll do our best to avoid that," she assured him. "Bye, Sorun."

"Bye." He spent the next few second taking in Sally's face one last time, which was still smiling at him. Afterwards, he bid the chipmunk a farewell with a nod, and then walked away towards the panels lined up against the room's window. He stopped right besides Tails, who was still working on the various controls on the machines. "Hey, Tails."

"Hi, Sorun," the fox greeted, turning away from his work briefly to give Sorun a smile. "I'm just working on some calibrations before I get the portal up and running. Already have the coordinates punched in and everything, so I should only be a few more minutes here."

"Sounds good, m'man." Sorun looked to the side and out the window, towards the other end of the room where the portal machine was. "So how does this whole thing work, anyways? Does it just open a hole between two points in space like my Yamato did?"

Tails shook his head. "Not exactly. It's a bit more complicated than that." He turned his gaze back to the machines he was fiddling with. "I don't think you realize just how far your zone is compared to all the other zones. Usually if you want to go to another zone it's as easy as using Chaos energy to open a way to the Cosmic Interstate Highway-"

"The what?"

"- and after that you can just take a road to a new zone," Tails continued, making Sorun sigh and flip his hand up at the ceiling at being ignored. "But your zone isn't even connected to that. It's really weird, 'cause, well... every single zone in the entire multiverse is supposed to be connected to the Highway. But yours is just so removed from every other zone that I'm honestly shocked anything could be that far out. The entire reason we need the Chaos Emeralds is because that kind of sheer distance creates a power requirement no other possible energy source could provide."

"... The word 'Highway' is just being used metaphorically, right? Like, there's not just a literal highway-"

"Even then," Tails continued, making Sorun groan loudly, "there's only so much we can do. Having an unlimited energy supply doesn't do us much good when the actual hardware is still limited in how far it can be pushed. We had to cobble this thing together from spare parts we took from Badniks, after all."

Pursing his lips, Sorun leaned forwards and leaned his forearm against the window. "How does it work, then?"

As he turned a nearby knob, Tails stuck his tongue out as he thought of an answer. "It's like, uh... well, take your Yamato answer from earlier," he began. "Normally, yeah, that's how a portal would be made, but the longer the distance between the two points you're trying to bridge, the more power you need and the harder the hardware has to work. Jumping from one zone to another is one thing, all you have to do is go far enough to hit the Highway, but as I said, yours isn't connected to the Highway for some reason, and it's so far away..."

"The machine itself gets stressed?" Sorun mumbled out in a questioning tone.

"Tearing open a portal to link a distance that vast would melt the entire thing," Tails confirmed, nodding at Sorun's understanding. "I kinda had to get creative with the workaround. It's less about tearing a hole open to bridge the two points in space and more like tunneling a path from here to there while punching holes in space to make the entranceway. There's no technical 'space' in this tunnel, so the distance is zero, but it's less effort to use brute force and tunnel to your zone than fold that much space to connect the two points. Metaphorically speaking. It uses a process that..."

The technobabble Tails began spewing out proved to be too much for Sorun's understanding, so he tuned the young Mobian's words out as he continued staring out at the portal machine. He didn't have any idea what the "Cosmic Interstate Highway", as Tails called it, was, but it had to be some kind of placeholder name for something weird. Sorun didn't really care too much for whatever this vaunted Highway was or how the machine really worked. It worked. That's all he needed to know.

"Sorun? May I speak with you for a moment?"

"Huh?" Sorun turned around away from the window, while Tails had gone back to focusing on the electronics, having finished his longwinded explanation that Sorun had ignored. Nicole had materialized behind him. Hands clasped behind her back and her face set in a mostly blank expression, save for her eyes. They looked almost downcast, her green irises switching between looking at Sorun and the portal on the other end of the room, separated by the window. If nothing else, Sorun found her look peculiar.

He still pushed himself away from the wall, and traveled towards the center of the room where she was waiting for him. He actually had wanted to talk to her regardless; he was aware he never got to give her a proper goodbye outside of when she confronted him in the park that day when he revived, and he wanted to rectify that with the precious few minutes he had left in this world. She deserved that much, and he truly did want a proper goodbye with her.

"Nicole. Hey," Sorun greeted after stopping in front of the lynx. "You're here, too?"

"I'm overseeing some of the preparations along with Tails," she answered. "I wanted to speak with you one last time."

"Oh. Yeah, alright." Sorun unconsciously rose a hand up and began scratching at the back of his head. "You've been kind of acting weird ever since I told you I was going back home," he noted. "Did I do something?"

A look of confliction briefly flashed over her features. So brief, in fact, that it had been too fast for Sorun to possibly perceive it, and thus he hadn't noticed. She settled for frowning a bit, softly biting her lower lip before relaxing again and transitioning into a neutral expression. "I was... I was just surprised," Nicole confessed to him. "Admittedly I was somewhat upset to learn that you are leaving. Forever, that is." She paused, the frown somewhat returning to her face. "I'm sad to see you go."

Sorun made no outward reaction, though he did look a bit to the side while exhaling through his nose. He had some slight suspicion that was what this was about, but he didn't know how to address it other than remind her of the cold, hard truth: he was leaving, and that was that. He didn't know how to make it sound any better than that. "I'll miss you, too," he tried as he looked back at Nicole. "But I have to go. Besides, you have all the others. You won't be alone."

"I realize this," she replied, voice a bit quiet and toneless. "But none of them could ever replace you."

Making a small sigh, Sorun had to resist saying the first things that came to his mind. Asking her what she wanted, or what she wanted him to say. He wanted this goodbye to remain as friendly as possible. He didn't want to accidentally escalate it. "I know," Sorun said. "I mean, who else is gonna play games with you and actually be able to keep up?"

The corners of Nicole mouth upturned the smallest bit. It was more a sad smile than anything else, but the smile itself looked genuine enough to Sorun's eyes. "Perhaps nobody," she admitted to him. "I've had some time to process it all, and I've come to the conclusion... well, I..." Hey eyes dipped down to the floor for a second, and then she looked back up at Sorun. "Your family takes precedence over everything else. I realize this. So you returning to your zone is the logical decision to make."

"Um..." Blinking in confusion, Sorun tilted his head to the side and gave the AI an odd look. "Where are you going with all this?"

"Nowhere," Nicole answered with a shake of her head. "Just promise me you'll be safe and happy back home."

"Of course, Nicole. I'll do my best." Clicking his tongue, Sorun began to roll back and forth on his feet. Both he and Nicole kept looking at each other, neither finding any words to say to the other for some time. "Bye, Nicole. I hope things go well for you here."

She nodded at him, the sad smile growing. "As do I," she said. "Goodbye, Sorun. I truly enjoyed our time together."

"Hey, Sorun? We're all set to go."

His eyebrows rising, Sorun turned back towards Tails. He was looking back towards the human, while right next to him the myriad of lights and diodes on the consoles in front of him were all brightly glowing with green and white lights. Realizing that it was time, Sorun nodded at the fox, sending him, Nicole, and Sally all one final look.

"Well, uh... guess this is it." He rose his hand into the air, gave them all a two-fingered salute, and then turned towards the door to the wall separating the room in two. "Take care, guys."

Sorun approached the door in the wall, opened it, and then stepped through. The door sealed shut behind him, leaving him alone in the half of the room containing the portal machine. He walked forwards, and then stopped in the center of the room, right in front of the inactive machine. Looking back over his shoulder introduced Sorun to the sight of Tails at the controls behind the window, along with Nicole and Sally standing right besides him. All three of them were giving Sorun reassuring smiles, helping ease some of the tension Sorun felt, while Tails had even given him a thumbs-up before looking down at the console in front of him. Switches were flipped, buttons were pressed, and knobs were turned, resulting in Sorun hearing the sound.

It was a sound that was reminiscent of crackling lightning, making Sorun turn back towards the portal machine in front of him. The Chaos Emeralds slotted into the metal boxes powering the machine began alternating between dimming and glowing brightly, and at the same time he saw green energy began sparking out from the cables connecting them to the star-tipped poles and the hollow gateway. More green sparks began flying out from the balls on top of the poles, and seconds later a beam fired out from each of the spheres. The two beams converged right in the center of the inactive, metal gateway, after which there was a bright flash of light that forced Sorun to close his eyes.

The flash had only lasted for a second, and when Sorun opened his eyes back up, there it was. The exact same green portal he'd seen at the beginning of all of this. A green, swirling portal fitted perfectly inside of the metal gateway in front of him. All he had to do was walk right on through and he'd be home free.

"Huh. Just that easy, huh?" Sorun thought. "After all this time, I can finally go back. All I gotta to is walk on through."

Sorun lifted up his foot, and then planted it forwards. He did the same with the other foot, and then kept going. Each and every tentative step towards the green portal filled him with more and more equal parts anxiety and excitement. The anticipation alone was making it feel like his heart could explode at any second, and it was certainly beating fast enough that such a thing was plausible.

"Ah, man, mom's gonna be so upset at me for being away so long. Dunno what lie I'm supposed to spin to explain it all away." He was almost there now. Just a few more steps away from the portal. "Wonder if any good games came out while I was gone? Wanna try and catch up on some of my shows too, and- oh, egh, wonder how school's gonna work? Is there any catch-up work I can do or am I just gonna have to repeat the year? Eh, I'll figure it out."

He stopped directly in front of the portal, close enough that the tip of his nose was practically touching its surface. His entire vision was overtaken with the green color of the portal, and the quiet thrumming of the machine filled his ears. Sorun took a deep breath, and then held it in for a few seconds before exhaling.

"Well... here goes nothing. Let's go home."

With that final thought, he stepped into the portal.

"There he goes." This was said by Tails, right as he and the other two by his sides watched the human step into the green portal. "He said that the portal appeared in a grocery store at his end, right?" Tails asked as he turned towards Sally.

The red-haired chipmunk nodded. "Yeah." A small smirk grew on her lips. "Every time he brought it up he kept complaining they were out of orange juice. Maybe they finally restocked some."

"Well, I mean, they have to have by now, right? It's been months," Tails reasoned. "Though, eh-heh, I think he's gonna have bigger concerns than some orange-"

Sorun fell back through the portal.

It was an event so sudden and unexpected it caused all three observers to jump in surprise and snap their gazes back towards the room. The portal was still open, though the nearby machines were beginning to spark more and more violently as the window it could remain open closed further and further. But, for some reason, Sorun was back. He'd stepped through the portal only for a few seconds before he'd tumbled back out to their end.

"U-uh... what... what's Sorun doing?" Tails mumbled out, his eyes glued to the human's body. "What's going on?"

"Huh...?" Sally seemed just as confused as Tails was, and only grew more confused as she stared out at Sorun. The way he'd fallen back out of the portal on their end made it so he was sitting on the ground with his feet and hands against the floor, though from this position they couldn't see his face. Just the back of his head as he stared up at the portal. "Sorun...?"

Sudden movement on Sally's right side caused her to turn her head. She'd ended up looking towards Nicole, who'd straightened her body in response to something. Her ears had folded back a bit, and the previous confusion on her face was replaced by something that made Sally begin to worry. She looked extremely concerned.

"Nicole?" Sally voiced. "What's going on?"

"The nanites in the room, they're... I'm..." The lynx's face began to transition from concern to being suddenly alarmed. "I'm reading a high amount of radiation flooding into that room..."

Sally had taken some steps back, while Tails had jumped right out of his seat. Both looked confused and horrified at Nicole's claim, while Nicole herself had already vanished, and then reappeared on the other side of the room. She'd materialized right next to Sorun, and then proceeded to crouch down right next to Sorun.

"Sorun!?" Nicole reached a hand out and grabbed at one of Sorun's shoulders. Even after calling out his name and shaking him, he wouldn't look her way. "Sorun, please say something!"

He wouldn't respond to her no matter what she did. His eyes were locked onto the portal, widened to their limit with the irises alternating between dilating and constricting in a rapid fashion. He was panting heavily, far too heavily for Nicole's comfort, and a cold, panicked sweat was beading down his face. Throughout the entire ordeal he continued staring at the portal, his face terror-stricken and his entire body refusing to budge or move despite how much Nicole shook him.

Her own eyes wide and mouth agape in worry, Nicole swiftly stood up and, quickly, looked towards the green portal. For a single second the teeth of her holographic body grit together as she processed her thoughts. She came to a decision in mere milliseconds, and then moved towards the opening of the portal.

After she arrived at the portal's entrance, she stuck her head through. Not her entire body; just the head of her body, enough to see out to the other side. Nicole had only maintained this position for a single second before she pulled her head back out from the portal. When she had, the alarmed look on her face had shifted to a horrified look. So horrified, in fact, she'd stumbled a few steps away from the portal.

"T-Tails... you need to close the portal..."

"What!?" The twin-tailed fox had already made his way back to the portal's controls, though his face was marred in worry and panic as his hands clumsily made their way to the buttons and knobs. "Nicole, what-!?"

"TAILS, CLOSE IT!"

The panicked scream from Nicole shocked Tails enough that he flinched, but, understanding the severity behind her voice, he managed to pull himself together quickly. In just a few seconds he'd located a large, red button on the dashboard of controls he was standing in front of, and then banged his fist down on it.

A loud clunk! sound echoed throughout the room the instant Tails hit the large, red button. Alongside the sound the beams firing out from the two posts disappeared, and in that same moment the green portal disappeared, leaving the hollow gateway. Right after the Emeralds slotted into the machines besides the portal started shaking violently enough that they began to come loose from the slots housing them.

Nicole, quick to act, had waved her hand up at the ceiling. The nanites that comprised the entire structure obeyed her silent command, after which the ceiling dissolved and opened up due to the nanites receding, revealing the open sky. Not a moment too soon, as the seven Chaos Emeralds shot out from their slots in the machines that they had been plugged into. They'd bounced around the walls of the room for a bit, with Nicole going as far as to cover Sorun's body with her own in an effort to shield him, but fortunately they soon enough found the opening in the ceiling. The seven colored gems shot up into the sky, each one then shooting off in a different direction towards the horizon after rising far above the city. Nicole had paid exactly zero attention to the display, instead choosing to wave her hand again to prompt the ceiling to close back up. She hadn't even waited for it to finish reforming before she'd picked Sorun's body up and ran towards the door.

Without her even touching it the door had opened right as Nicole, still carrying Sorun, approached it. She bolted right through, and the door had closed again once she'd ran past it. It was only after she was out of the room did the lynx stop, and then carefully began setting Sorun down on the ground. Tails and Sally meanwhile, both tense and concerned, slowly approached the two.

"Nicole," Sally began after they both stopped next to them, "what's going-?"

"Don't go in that room," Nicole hastily stated as she finished gently laying Sorun on the ground. "It's saturated in radiation."

"Radiation?" Sally's eyes darted towards the windowed wall separating the room, and then, with her eyes widened, she looked back at Nicole. "If that room's contaminated-"

"I'll deal with it later!" Sally had looked taken back at the AI's outburst, though Nicole hadn't seen it. She hadn't even looked towards either her or Tails, her focus solely being on the human lying down in front of her. "Sorun! Sorun, please...!"

She'd began cradling his head with one hand while using the other to brush the teen's black hair that matched her own out from his face. She grew more and more visibly worried when she saw his face was a paler color than normal. His eyes were half-open and unfocused, while the rest of him looked drowsy and weak. He wasn't responding to any of Nicole's pleas, even after she began to rub at his face with her hand to try and get him to focus on her.

"Nicole!" A strong hand clamping down on her shoulder finally got Nicole to look away from Sorun. She saw Sally crouching right next to her, a gravely serious look on her face underneath the concern. Tails, standing behind her, wore a pained expression as he looked down at Sorun, who was beginning to move less and less. "If that room is contaminated with radiation, then Sorun got exposed. The hospital can treat him, so you need to teleport us there right now before his condition gets worse."

"R-right." Shakily, Nicole gave her a nod. The panic on her face had subsided by a fraction, though she still looked nearly as terrified as Sorun had seconds prior as she looked back down at the teen. "Sally, his home..."

Sally roughly shook her shoulder. "Tell us later, Nicole! Sorun needs a hospital right now!"

What was he expecting when he walked through that portal?

A store, simply put. The same beyond-average grocery store Sorun remembered going into before getting dragged to Mobius. The same aisles, the same refrigerated racks full of drinks, maybe even the same employee sweeping the floor. The sensation of his feet touching down on tiled ground, that same scent of frozen produce, the same moderate lighting.

He remembered his foot touching down on the tiles, and there'd been so much pure joy Sorun had felt. That one step confirmed it all for him, that he was finally back and it was all over with. Mobius was a thing of the past. It was gone, over with. He was home. He could see everybody again, go back to his life, go back to his mother and friends. He planned on going home first thing just to see his mother again, once he'd managed to assemble some sort of excuse, of course.

Two steps out of the portal and that joy, that happiness, magnified tenfold. He was back, finally back, finally in the world he belonged in. In a world filled with his people and his culture; a world he was comfortable in. No more fighting for his life, no more of the insanity that was the entire universe Mobius resided in, none of it. He'd felt so light, so happy, and so free that he could finally put that awful chapter of his life behind him and move on with his life.

Sorun's entire body passed through the portal. He was still trying to figure out how he'd return to his life. Reuniting with his mother would be a challenge all on its own. His education would be another thing. He planned on visiting David as soon as possible right after he settled all of that, and he was certain his friend would round up the boys and they'd all plan some big party for him. Maybe he'd end up telling Dave the truth; Sorun felt he'd actually believe him for some reason. And after Sorun figured out how to get his life back on track he could go back to doing things he loved. Go back to games and pirating shows off the internet. Maybe he'd take up literature again. Hell, maybe he'd write something himself. Make an adventure novel about his time on Mobius. He'd have to change some things of course, couldn't rightly write a story using Vergil's powers without suffering some form of copywrite infringement, but he'd find a workaround.

It was going to be alright. He was home. It was all fine now.

But then he'd taken a look around right after he'd exited the portal, and something was wrong. Very, very wrong . It was the grocery store alright- he recognized the layout. Although some aisles were knocked down for some reason, he recognized it as the same store. But there weren't any lights. In fact, there wasn't even a ceiling.

And then Sorun made the mistake of looking up.

It was either dawn or dusk from how the sky looked. That deep red color. Through the completely vacant ceiling Sorun saw the state of the city he'd been in his whole life. Once pristine buildings that he managed to see through the open ceiling were now cracked apart. Almost all of their windows shattered, and some were dangerously leaning over or were even toppled over completely. They looked less like buildings and more like ruins.

There was a burning sensation, too. It was slight, almost unnoticeable to Sorun, but it was there. And he knew it was there. And that, along with the state of the store, along with the states of the buildings, that hellish image he'd stepped out of the portal to see, all said enough for him to understand.

He'd stumbled back, dazed at it all. He tumbled right back through the portal, back to Mobius and onto the floor of the room where the portal machine was. He didn't even notice it. All he could do was stare at the portal he'd just fallen out of, so much in shock that he couldn't even move. His thoughts weren't in any better shape.

"I... what, I... that... I don't... why... I- that isn't- when- I-I-I..."

His eyes saw Nicole next to him, doing something. His mind couldn't register her presence, though. All he heard were muffled sounds when she tried speaking to him. He didn't feel his heart hammering in his chest or his breathing that was so rapid and heavy that, were he conscious of it, Sorun would find painful. He wasn't aware of when he was physically picked up and carried away. He was so much in shock that nothing was registering with him. What he was aware of, if just barely, was the fact he was rapidly growing more tired and weak by the second. His breathing began to grow more shallow as his movements slowed, and alongside that his jumbled thoughts began to become more and more disjointed.

"Why...?"

There was no describing how sharp of a change Sorun had felt when he saw his city once so pristine and shining now destroyed. To have gone from being so hopeful and happy to what he was now. Horrified and confused and anguished and a hundred other emotions bundled together in such a way that he didn't know what he felt. His mind couldn't make sense of any of it. It was all just nothing but noise that made him feel awful, that was scrambling his thoughts so much he couldn't think coherently. And as Nicole laid him down on the floor, everything was becoming quieter. His own body as it slowed down, his breathing, his thoughts, his emotions. Everything continued to rapidly slow down as Sorun's eyelids became heavier and heavier.

He saw forms in his blurring vision. A brown and purple form with splashes of black and a hint of green. A lighter brown with blues and reds. Yellow and white. He knew who they were, could put names to the forms, but he couldn't think to say anything. What little focus he had between him shutting down and the maelstrom of emotions swirling through him was all focused on a single thought, the one, single thought Sorun successfully managed to form as his eyes closed further and further.

"Why is my home dead...?"

The last thing he saw before everything went black was the brown and purple form frantically shaking him.

A/N- You know in hindsight I don't think all these fakeout goodbye chapters are gonna hold much weight to people in the future just getting to this part when there's gonna be however many chapters after this one. A fact I realized way early on, because I originally planned a short goodbye chapter for every single character before realizing I didn't wanna put that much time and effort in for just that: a fakeout. At the same time I didn't wanna skimp, either, and I still had to throw a few things in there like Shadow informing Sorun about Rubrum's existence, however vague it was, so we got what we got.

But hey, good news for people who wanted Sorun to stay on Mobius: he's staying on Mobius. It's not at all good news to Sorun, but the truth of the matter is we still got a whole lot of story to go through here.

Chapter 62

Recursion Error

Episode 62- Home was never in the cards

"Nicole, please calm down."

The situation was awful enough. Between Sorun and everything happening with him, Sally was already reaching her limit, and a headache continually threatened to form. Sitting in the hospital's lobby and watching Nicole pace around back and forth, wringing her hands together like a nervous wreck, though, was proving too much even for her.

On the other hand, she wasn't doing all that better herself. It was probably experience alone that was keeping her from going into a similar state out of worry for both of her friends: Sorun, and Nicole, who looked more scared than Sally had ever seen in her life. Seconded only when she saw Nicole's reaction to Sorun's mutilated body back when Knothole had been lost.

"I am calm," was Nicole's quickly-delivered response to Sally. Seeing as she was still pacing, she didn't believe it for a second.

Blowing past her lips, Sally slumped forwards while cradling her head in one of her hands. "Nicole, Dr. Quack's treated people with radiation poisoning before, remember? We had that whole incident with that group of Overlanders way back when, the group Hope was with, and they turned out fine after he treated them."

"I'm not worried about the radiation poisoning!" Nicole snapped, though unlike before Sally didn't react in the slightest to the small outburst. "He's catatonic! He's not responding to the doctors or anybody else! He... he just keeps staring at the wall!"

"He's in shock, Nicole. He just found out his home suffered a nuclear apocalypse." Making a small sigh, Sally turned her eyes up at Nicole. She'd hoped a logical explanation would go far in calming the AI down, but all that did was make her begin to pace around even faster. She sighed again. "Are we sure that's what happened?"

Nicole stopped pacing, though she still had her hands clasped together in front of her. She made an anguished face, like looking back at the mere memory was painful for her. Sally couldn't find herself blaming her. She'd seen that look Sorun had on his face. That shocked stupor mixed with terror, the way his skin had gone so pale. It hurt her just remembering that look he had before he passed out from sheer shock alone.

"There's really only one conclusion we can come to, Sally," Nicole quietly stated, eyes downcast towards the ground. "His zone was full of buildings in ruins. That in conjunction with the lethal levels of radiation that leaked through the portal leaves very few conclusions. And I would think Sorun's reaction alone says more than enough."

"... I guess so." Sighing for a third time in the last few minutes, and for probably the hundredth time in the last hour, Sally turned her gaze back to the ground. Nuclear annihilation. She knew firsthand how dangerous weapons of the sort could be, even the science behind them. She didn't know the circumstances behind their presence on Sorun's world, though. He never talked about that aspect of him home. Until he told them those specifics, all they could do was speculate.

And right now he couldn't even speak, let alone give them an in-depth history lesson of how extensive his world's use of nuclear technology was.

Admittedly she really was as worried as Nicole was over Sorun, more for his mental state than anything else. Going back home was all he would talk about when he'd been brought back to life. Even during his time as a Freedom Fighter at least a half of Sally's memories of the human was him talking about something or someone from back home. Usually his friends. Or his mother. Who were all more than likely gone now. A fact she was sure Sorun was acutely aware of. With all of this she didn't know how he would cope with it, or if there was even some conceivable way of coping with it.

Losing a home and fighting to reclaim it and its people once again like she and everyone else did was one thing. She didn't know how to deal with permanently losing a home like that...

A high-pitched zooming sound caught Sally's attention, making her look up. Her vision was immediately filled with blue when she saw Sonic standing right in front of her. He looked alarmed and confused, and kept looking back and forth between Sally and Nicole, like he was looking for answers simply from their expressions. His own face began to turn grim when he saw the sad looks they both were giving him.

"H-hey, guys, I... Tails told me..." The hedgehog shook his head and looked to Sally for answers. "What's goin' on with Sorun?"

"... His home's gone, Sonic," Sally said in an empty tone, not at all sure how she could possibly gently break the news to him. Sonic's face fell as a result. "From what we can tell a nuclear weapon was used on the city he lived in. We don't really know what the implications of this means, and Sorun isn't..." She stopped herself and shook her head, not wanting to worry Sonic even further. "He's not really in a condition to be speaking right now."

"Oh... oh, no..." His ears completely flattening against his head, Sonic held his hand to his forehead while looking down at his shoes. "I... that's terrible. What's gonna happen with Sorun?" He looked back up at Sally. "C-couldn't we just send him somewhere-?"

"That would require us to gather the seven Chaos Emeralds once again," Nicole interrupted, voice quiet and full of worry. "Even if we did, we have no way of deciphering the universal coordinates. Editing even a single digit could prove disastrous. It could send Sorun to the center of his world, or somewhere in space, or a different zone entirely, and even if it did just send him somewhere else on his planet we don't know what the state of the rest of his world is." She shook her head as she looked to Sonic. "It's... simply not feasible to send him back..."

"He's... going to have to stay here with us," Sally added in tone equally as sad as Nicole's. "Permanently. It's too risky to try and send him back, Sonic. Dr. Quack is treating him right now for radiation poisoning."

Sonic's face fell even further as grief overtook him. His arms seemed to go slack by his sides, and some small sound came out of his mouth as he tried to speak. "What happened with all his folks?" he finally got out.

Sally and Nicole glanced at each other. Nicole then shook her head, making Sally breath out slowly as she turned back to Sonic. "They're probably gone, Sonic," she said. She stood up out of her seat after seeing the sad, horrified look overtake Sonic's features, and then walked close enough so she could place a hand on his shoulder. "It's terrible, I know," she said, "but there's not really all that much we can do right now for him."

"Yeah... I know," Sonic replied. "Should I go see him?"

Sally quickly shook her head, surprising Sonic somewhat. "Sonic, I really don't think that would be a good idea. It's too soon," she stated. "Later, for sure. Definitely. But not right now. If, um... if you could check on Tails for us that'd be great, though. He was kind of shaken by what happened."

"Alright. I can do that." Nodding in understanding, Sonic took a few steps back while Sally had removed her hand from his shoulder. "Sorun's gonna be okay, right?" he asked her.

"I really hope so, Sonic." The unsure tone in Sally's voice did nothing to assuage the visible worry on both Sonic's and Nicole's faces. "But honestly? I'm not too sure. And it's scaring me..."

So apparently he'd gotten radiation poisoning.

Made sense in hindsight. What else was one to expect when they walked into a radiation zone? Oh, but apparently Mobian technology was perfect for curing that. Sorun didn't know what that stuff Dr. Quack injected with him was. Wasn't iodide or anything like that. Some substance made from the wacky scientific rules this world operated under that cleared Sorun's body right up from any harmful radiation. According to the duck doctor he'd be completely fine.

How fucking fortunate.

"..." He was sitting in a chair outside the examination room, inside a waiting room that was adjacent to it. The empty chairs around him and the small collection of toys in the corner meant to entertain waiting children may as well have not existed for him with how he was right now. Leaning forwards with his hands clasped together in front of him, head bowed down so low that his hair was obscuring his eyes.

He could barely think. Every time he tried thinking forwards, making new thoughts so he could try and sort through it all he just kept going back. Back to the moment he stepped through that portal and saw the apocalyptic state his city was in. That and all the implications behind it. It kept running in a loop inside of his mind and he couldn't stop thinking about it no matter how hard he tried. It was fading, slowly, agonizingly so, but he was getting back hold of his mind one piece at a time.

So, in the face of his fractured mind that he was slowly managing to piece back together, he tried working in those memories. Trying to piece together what he saw, what it meant, how he could begin to understand it. He didn't like any of the conclusions he came to. Conclusions he was able to come to after only having seen that landscape for just a few seconds. But they'd been enough. He only needed once glance at those buildings and a dose of harmful radiation to understand the how of what happened, and just what exactly that meant.

He just couldn't understand the why of it.

Eventually Sorun had gained enough of his semblance back that he finally noticed somebody was standing near him. He managed to muster enough focus together to peer past the locks of hair covering his eyes and saw that it was Sally standing right there. He didn't know when she showed up, or how long she'd been standing there looking at him. Just that he finally managed to notice her. Her and that incredibly sorrowful, worried look.

"... It doesn't make sense."

Sorun's voice had come out as quiet and slightly cracked. It was still enough to startle Sally, who'd been standing there and staring at Sorun for some indeterminate time Sorun couldn't figure out. She regained her composure in the same breath Sorun's words had surprised her, after which the chipmunk cleared her throat and spoke out to Sorun.

"What doesn't make sense, Sorun?"

"What I saw. That. It doesn't make sense."

Sally's shoulders slackened. "I know it doesn't, but-"

"No. You really don't." Sorun shook his head a slight amount. "I can't believe somebody would actually use a nuclear weapon on a city. I just can't. There's no way."

"I... Sorun, you know I'm not familiar with how your world worked," Sally said. "Why is it so unbelievable?"

"It's not like every single person and their mother had a nuclear missile sitting in their basement," Sorun muttered out. "Officially there were only five countries with the things, and between all of them they had enough weapons to erase all life on the planet. Multiple times over."

The room went completely silent following the explanation. Sally had completely stilled, looking down at Sorun with wide, slightly-shaking eyes. He'd heard a small gasp to the side, and when he glanced in the direction of the sound, past the black hair covering his eyes, he saw Nicole off to the side looking at Sorun. Eyes equally as wide and horrified as Sally's with her hand covering her mouth. He didn't know if she just showed up or if she'd been there the entire time without him noticing until now.

Finally finding the will to speak, Sally asked, "Why would... Sorun, why would your people... just why ?"

He wasn't surprised the concept would shock and confuse Sally so much. It'd probably have that effect on any Mobian. This kind of concept was a thing he doubted anyone in this entire republic would ever conceive. "It was for the sake of mutually-assured destruction. The idea was if one country used their nuclear weapons against another, it was a free pass for the country being attacked to use their nukes against the one firing on them. Since countries with nukes had so many, it'd basically mean the end of those countries. But with that many nukes in play, that many nuclear detonations of that size would create a nuclear winter that would end the entire world." He finally looked up at Sally, his black hair falling away from his eyes as he gazed at the chipmunk's face. "Do you get what I'm saying? Using a nuke was tantamount to suicide. That's why I can't believe anybody would use one against my home. Because my home country had the second-largest stockpile of nuclear weapons in the whole world."

"B-but... that doesn't..." She'd had to hold a hand to her head and shake it just to get the thoughts through. She almost looked like she was in denial with what Sorun was saying. "Sorun, that sounds like insanity," Sally said to him. The outright disturbed look she had on her face said enough about her disapproval with the idea. "How could anybody think making enough weapons to end all life on the planet is a good thing?"

"I'd say it worked pretty well seeing as it stopped the world wars that kept happening." She didn't calm down in the slightest by Sorun's statement. If anything, Sally looked even more disturbed by what he said. But she remained silent when Sorun continued. "But I'm telling you, Sally. Nobody could actually be stupid enough to use nuclear weapons. Not the Americans, Not the Russians, not the Chinese, not France or the United Kingdom, nobody . There's no way another world war broke out while I was gone. Not in just a few months. Not even half a year. Relations between all those countries were better than they'd ever been Sally, they... I just don't see it happening."

It made no logical sense. No moral sense. It didn't make any kind of sense. The whole idea of mutually-assured destruction was that nobody would use nukes since it would lead to the end of the world. There was absolutely no reason to make such a decision, regardless of country, regardless of beliefs, regardless of anything . No government would possibly be so spiteful towards another, not in his day and age, that they'd resort to the very last resort never even meant to be used. None of them. Not under the threat of everyone dying.

He had too much faith in humanity to believe anybody would be stupid enough to end the entire world for any reason. Because as far as he was concerned one country using a nuke against another meant all the nukes being used. So if somebody had nuked Detroit, then that was that. Game over for the world. And it had to have been a nuke; reactors melting down by accident couldn't cause the destruction Sorun had seen in those few seconds. With the radiation, it had to have been a nuclear weapon. Had to be. But it couldn't have been a weapon, because nobody would ever dare use one against another. But there was not other explanation he could see.

None of it made sense to him.

"Sorun... I understand what you're saying, but you have to look at the reality of what happened," Sally softly said to him. "Your home is gone because of a nuclear weapon. If what you're saying is true-"

"Maybe it was an accident." Sorun had leaned forwards, staring at the ground in no particular directions. His hands were still clasped in front of him. "There were tons of stories of nukes almost being used because of stupid accidents. Maybe that's what happened. Maybe it was a nuclear meteor that hit the planet or something. I don't know..."

Sighing deeply, Sorun's hands finally unclasped and limply hung by his side. He leaned back in his seat, his unfocused eyes traveling up towards the ceiling. He just couldn't make sense of any of it. There weren't any signs of war by the time he'd left Earth. Even if there were, nothing could escalate that drastically. But an accident seemed unlikely, with how much security they had around those weapons following previous near accidental launches in the past. A random nuclear meteor hitting the planet in the short window he was gone seemed even more unlikely. No matter how much Sorun thought he couldn't figure out what could have possibly happened.

Why did his home have to be dead? Why couldn't he figure out what had happened? What could have possibly even happened? He didn't know a single answer to any of these questions. Not a single thing made sense.

"... There's no way to send me back to any other part of my world, is there, Sally?" He could have been staring up at that whole ceiling for minutes before speaking out again and Sorun wouldn't have known it. He couldn't find it in himself to keep track of the time. "No way I can go back and... maybe figure out what happened?"

Much to his expectation, Sally said, "We'd have to gather all the Emeralds again. Even if we did, we can't send you anywhere else in the world but your home, which... which is contaminated with enough radiation to kill you, Sorun. Even if we could send you somewhere, if what you said is true then the rest of your world..." She trailed off, letting Sorun finished the thought.

"... Gone. I know." So no. He couldn't go back. Go back and try to piece together what happened to the world. If everybody on Earth really was dead, which, from just that single glimpse Sorun had caught, made it seem likely. He couldn't do any of that. Not if they were only able to send him to that one specific spot in the destroyed grocery store in the middle of a poisoned city. "There's no going home..."

Somehow that news hurt almost as much as seeing his destroyed home. The knowledge he couldn't even go back to figure out what happened. That he really was stuck here on Mobius forever. Again.

Again, again, again...

"Over and over, like I've done this millions of times..." His breathing began to become shallow and quiet. His head had dropped so it was centered towards Sally, though his eyes weren't focused on her nor Nicole. Nor anything else in particular.

"I had so much hope, you know?" Sorun began, his voice no more than a mumble. "When I first got here, all those months ago, the only thing keeping me going was the hope I'd be able to go back home one day. After I came into contact with the first Emerald, I began losing it. I was chasing after a vague hope that maybe I could find a way to remove it so I could use it to go back and not die, or find some alternate way back home, but deep inside I knew there was no way. But I kept hoping and searching for one, because I didn't want to give up on it. I didn't want to die.

"Eventually, though, I realized it was a foolish, idiotic thing I was doing. So I gave up, right after I ran. I wasn't going home. I was going to die. I ran out of hope and had to live with that every single day, over and over, that I was going to die. Over and over and over. Every time I woke up. Every day I lived through. Every time I went on a mission to go kill robots for you."

Both Sally and Nicole glanced towards one another, each holding worried looks of their own over the human sitting in the chair, vacantly staring off in a random direction.

"And then I died, and I came back, and I really thought this time I could go home for real now. All that hope was back, so much bigger and brighter than before, because everything was going so great and it seemed like such a sure thing. But then it happened again. Something happened, and now I can't go home again. My hope keeps getting torn away from me."

He began to lean forwards in his chair, looking down at his hands. Pale hands that just hung there, limply, like they weren't even alive. As far as Sorun was concerned he himself didn't feel like he was alive.

"I don't know what to do," Sorun said. "Getting home. That's all I wanted. But I can't get that anymore. And even then, back home, I had no aspirations. No goals. No direction I wanted my life to go in." Sorun lifted his hands up to grab at his head, letting his dark hair spill through between his fingers. "I don't have my powers anymore. I can't fight. I don't want to fight. I don't want to be a Freedom Fighter. It's too much. I can't, I... I don't... what am I supposed to do...?"

Neither Sally nor Nicole had an answer for him. All they could do was watch Sorun sit there completely silently, that pitiful and blank look on his face. Eventually Nicole was able to make a move, and materialized right besides Sorun. She knelt down right besides him and laid a hand on his shoulder, though Sorun didn't even react to the touch. This just saddened Nicole more, who then looked up at Sally.

"I... I'll take him," she told Sally. "I think maybe you should go home and get some sleep, Sally. It's been a strenuous enough day for all of us."

Wordlessly, Sally nodded at Nicole in agreement, eyes still locked on Sorun. Despite this, she wouldn't budge from her spot. She could only keep looking at Sorun with an anguished expression.

"Come on, Sorun. Come on." Nicole had grabbed hold of Sorun's wrist with one hand and his shoulder with the other, and then helped the teen up to his feet. He was putting so little energy into standing up that she practically had to hold him up for him. "I'm going to take you somewhere, okay?"

Slowly, Sorun blinked and looked to the side just far enough to see Nicole. "Where are we going?" he mumbled to her in question.

"Just please come with me." Nicole briefly took her hands off from Sorun just to ensure he'd continue standing on his own. When he proved to be able to do so, she softly wrapped her arms around one of his own and began to walk away towards the waiting room's exit, using Sorun's own arm to guide him besides her. "I promise it isn't too far, Sorun. Just to the residential district."

Sorun, his arm being held by Nicole, agreed and followed her. His movements were more akin to a zombie's than an actual human's, but Nicole had noticed this and walked at an incredibly slow pace for Sorun's sake. They'd reached the exit to the room and left outside of it, leaving Sally alone in the room staring off after them. She'd spent whole minutes staring off at the door before sighing for a final time, and then ran a hand over her face as she herself made her way to the doorway.

When they left the hospital, it was nighttime. It was slowly coming back to him, but between now and after the portal this afternoon Sorun's concept of time was entirely shot. So without asking he had no indication for how long he'd been in that hospital. Just that it'd apparently been quite a few hours if the sun was already gone.

Nicole was leading him somewhere. He didn't know where. She probably would tell him if he asked, but he just didn't feel like pressing her on the location they were going to. He was pretty sure the only reason he was walking was because Nicole was leading him by the arm. Sorun knew he should have been thankful for that, for her being there for him, for doing whatever this was for him, and he wanted to be thankful and express that to her, but he just couldn't feel it.

He couldn't feel anything. His mind still felt stuck on the prior events. His own thoughts were still sluggish in that regard, as everything he'd said to Nicole and Sally in the hospital was already blurring in Sorun's memory.

The homes scattered around the residential district were recognized in Sorun's vision, but he couldn't tell where in the district they were. Just that Nicole had lead him somewhere in there. He couldn't even recognize whose homes they were. To him, they were just blurry shapes.

"Sorun? We're here."

Nicole's voice was the only sound that could reach Sorun's ears that didn't sound muffled. Everything else, even his own voice, was hard for him to hear. Not her, for some reason. It was why he was able to understand her words and look up at what she'd lead them to.

It was a house. A small, one-floor house that looked like a cross between a house and a hut. Same off-white walls the rest of the houses had, same brown roof. Nearly identical to the rest of the homes around, really. But he couldn't understand why Nicole was paying so much attention to this house.

"Wha...?" Sorun's vocal confusion caused Nicole to look back at him. She was still holding his arm. "I-I don't understand..."

"It's yours," Nicole explained in a simple, quiet tone. "This house belongs to you."

He didn't have the energy to look surprised. Just confused. "... You made me a house?"

The lynx nodded. "I wanted to give you a home of your own. It was meant to be a surprise I'd wished to give you after that mission where you..." She trailed off, stopping herself and looking like she didn't want to finish the sentence. "I just wanted to give you something," she tried again, tone slightly quicker. "It's yours. You can live in it."

"Oh." He looked back at the house, expression blank aside from tiredness. "Is this what you wanted to talk to me about on the roof? And at the park?"

Nicole didn't answer him immediately. He felt her two-armed grip around his own arm tighten slightly, and that conflicted look returned to her face. But then she shook her head and turned away from Sorun towards the house. "That isn't important right now." She began walking again, leading Sorun behind her. "Come on. I'll show you what it looks like inside."

So they'd approached the home. There was a small cobblestone path leading from the sidewalk across an incredibly small lawn, all artificial and composed of nanites, to the front door of the house. Nicole had turned the door's knob and lead Sorun inside, who didn't even bother closing it behind them. She lead them right to the living room of the house, which was just outside of the house's main entrance.

The house was... relatively spartan, Sorun had observed. A living room, a kitchen, a hallway that lead off to other rooms. There were basics amenities: a fridge and an oven in the kitchen, a table and some chairs, some cabinets. The living room had a TV and a couch. Even a game console and some controllers plugged into the TV, the set from the HQ, Sorun had recognized. But that was it. The house was empty of everything else otherwise. No other furniture, no decorations on the wall. Just that same off-white color everywhere.

"It's empty," Sorun quietly noted.

Nicole faltered a bit, and then looked towards Sorun. "I-I didn't know your preferences or what types of furnishings you'd want," she quickly explained, voice uncomfortable, like she was fearful of Sorun's disapproval. "If you would only tell me what you desire for your home I can easily-"

"It's fine."

Sorun's barely-audible voice cut the AI off, causing her expression to shift. Her ears slowly began to fold against her head, and she'd tightened her grip on Sorun's arm in an effort of bringing him closer to her.

"It's not okay, Sorun. It's too empty," she mumbled to him. "I'll make anything for you. Anything. Please just tell me what you want."

She kept holding Sorun's body close to her, and her voice almost sounding pleading to Sorun's ears. He couldn't understand why. Why she was talking like that, or why she had that look on her face. So sad and worried, and for some reason him being upset at that look she had was the one emotion that was breaking through what felt like a blanket of heavy fog smothering the rest of his emotions. He couldn't figure out why. Or what he could do to make her feel better. He couldn't even find it in himself to try. It just went to make him feel more upset.

"... The house is fine the way it is," Sorun said to her at last. "Thank you anyways, Nicole. For offering. And for the house." His eyes took a quick half-glance around. "It's a nice house."

She didn't look satisfied with his answer, not nearly so from the way her large, triangular ears remained folded against her head, but Nicole at least seemed accepting of it from the nod she gave Sorun. "You are going to be okay here, correct?"

"..." Sorun's head turned around to look back into the empty house. "Everyone I knew back on Earth are gone, aren't they, Nicole?" He turned back to her. "What do I do with that?"

She didn't have an answer for him.

For Nicole, emotions, at least ever since she gained the ability to formulate her own feelings, were simple and at the same time incredibly complex. It was a paradox that realistically shouldn't have existed, but when it came to emotions, it just did. And everybody acted like that paradox was normal. Like it was a standard part of living. It was just something to expect.

So she'd went along with it in the beginning, asking some questions here and there but otherwise going out to discover things for herself. It was easier back then, during those experimental trials. Things that made her happy made her happy. Seeing her friends happy made her happy, helping others and doing things that pleased her friends made her happy, doing things Nicole herself enjoyed made her happy. Then there were the bad emotions. Her friends putting themselves in danger for the sake of being Freedom Fighters made her mildly concerned, though the confidence she inherently had that assured her they'd be fine like always worked to mitigate this particular emotion. Frustration from the days she'd been confined to that handheld body, or when she'd been making preparations and creating lines of code for the nanite city, only for things to not run right in simulations she'd create because of a single pesky line of code being improperly written ruining the entire system.

Coding the nanites were finicky like that. She'd refined it to a fine art in record time, to a point her mastery over them was practically reflexive for the AI, but even she'd admit she'd had a time of getting to that point. She imagined if she actually had an organic body it would have caused her the headaches she often heard others complaining about. If it was anything like what she felt when that drone she sent to Angel Island was destroyed, the one during that Enerjak incident, she didn't envy them constantly experiencing those.

There were other feelings, of course. Good and bad. Anger at seeing a friend hurt, joy whenever someone would talk to her just to have a pleasant conversation, excitement at unveiling a surprise. Like the city she'd made, for example. Or... the house she'd made for Sorun...

The house that'd been part of a surprise she'd painstakingly been preparing for Sorun. A surprise she was preparing because she'd wanted to see what look his face would make at such a surprise. She couldn't blame him for how things turned out, of course, but she wouldn't deny some part of her felt disappointed in how it had gone. That along with everything else.

That was part of the issue, really. Feelings used to be just that for Nicole. Good and bad. Binary descriptors used to identify feelings appropriately felt at different circumstances. That was easily understandable. She'd picked up on the concept almost immediately when she'd developed her own emotions with little difficulty. Her incredibly high intelligence only made it easier. She had no trouble understanding them.

But Sorun made things difficult for Nicole in terms of understanding emotions.

In many ways he made her more happy than anything else. Playing games with her, doing things with her, merely speaking with her, everything he did with her made her happier than anything else she could think of. She couldn't figure out herself why it was like this, just that it was, but it was something she enjoyed so much that she was tempted to just not delve into the reason behind it. But for her, something like that was next to impossible, so she looked deeper into the relationship they shared all the time. Sometimes things would become clearer for Nicole, other times more murky, but not matter what she never got a definitive answer on what she was feeling towards him.

Because sometimes things like this would happen. Something would happen to Sorun, and she'd feel more dreadful on the inside than she thought possible. Not just for Sorun, but for herself . When he'd died, she'd felt like she had lost some piece of herself Nicole could never reclaim. She remembered being inconsolable for those days he was gone, and when he came back, just like that, she'd been so elated . Sorun was back, the bad feelings associated with him and herself were gone, and she was glad because she didn't want to feel bad whenever she thought about Sorun. He was back, and things could go back to normal. She could surprise him with the house, maybe even finally get around to asking that question.

That question. The one she kept going back to over and over. She suspected she knew what these peculiar feelings she felt towards Sorun were. It was an odd sensation. Both exciting and... terrifying, somewhat. Having those special feelings, wondering if he felt the same. She kept wanting to ask him about them, and if, in fact, he did feel the same, if they could... do something with that. She desired so much to say it right there when she found him in the park, especially after the opportunity escaped her on that roof. Like she needed to ask him as soon as possible before something else happened.

Except, something did happen. Sorun had told her he wanted to go home, back to his own zone, and once again she found herself feeling negative whenever she thought of Sorun once again. Not like when she'd been so dreadful when he'd died. Not when she was left questioning herself that one time why he kept avoiding Nicole during that one period, wondering what happened between them and if she'd done something or if it was because of what she was only to later learn it was Sorun's attempt at trying to spare her feelings. Learning he wanted to go home made her feel, strangely enough, bitter. She understood why he wanted to go, even completely agreed with him, but Nicole still couldn't help but feel bitter about the whole affair. He was leaving, again . And she had to watch him go, again . And deal with him begin gone, again .

She'd tried to accept it. Be happy for him going home, tell herself that it was for the best, that he didn't belong here and he needed to be back with those closest to him. But at the same time Nicole didn't want him to go. There'd been a period of time where she'd debated with herself if she should try asking Sorun to stay, but she'd given this idea up. She knew he would say no, and she didn't want to ruin their friendship by making him feel so awkward and sad for the last time they'd ever see each other. So she'd forced a smile on her face, for Sorun's sake, and bid him farewell in the friendliest manner possible. And it was strange, interacting with him before he went through that portal. Because Nicole felt happy and sad at the same time, all for a person she was supposed to feel exclusive happiness over, and it mystified her to no end.

And then the portal happened. Sorun came back, Nicole went to see why, and understood immediately when she saw those ruins. His home was gone and he had to remain here on Mobius. And once again, she felt conflicting emotions. She wasn't strictly happy over the fact he was remaining with them, given what it took for this to happen, but she couldn't deny she was somewhat relieved of this fact. That he was back with them all, for good this time. It made her feel awful about herself, that she could feel such a thing, but she reasoned that the events that lead to this point were outside of both Nicole's and Sorun's hands, that maybe it was natural to feel this way. Either way it was still massively overshadowed by how awful she felt for Sorun's sake.

Here it was again. Something else happening to Sorun that made Nicole feel bad, because somebody she adored so much just suffered an unimaginable tragedy and he was not dealing with it well. He was speaking and cognizant now, at least, which was good, but... there was still something wrong with Sorun and Nicole didn't know what. How little energy he had, his movements, how quiet his voice was and how little he was speaking. It was all wrong. She knew why, he'd all but said why he was like this in front of her and Sally, and Nicole could well understand how everything that had happened could rattle Sorun so much, but it didn't change the fact that it hurt her seeing him like this and she wanted to fix him so that he would stop suffering.

But she didn't know how to fix this. She was still learning about her own emotions, let alone trying to fix someone else's emotions. Nobody else she knew of experienced tragedy on Sorun's level. People who had lost people, of course, but not on the sheer scale Sorun had. Not an entire world full of family and friends and his own people. Not gone as in out of reach, but gone , as in they'd all perished. Nobody, not a single person in the city she'd created, not anybody they knew, had ever had to deal with something like this. The closest Nicole could think of was Knuckles, but even then he still had his family, his team, and his species wasn't entirely extinct like Sorun's now was. She didn't have a benchmark to compare it to. She didn't have solutions.

She... didn't know how to help him, despite how much she so desperately wanted to.

So when Sorun asked her how he was supposed to deal with the fact his world and every single person there, and his history, his culture, every single facet of his life previous to Mobius, was now all completely gone and dead, she didn't have an answer for him. She just didn't know, nor could the AI even begin to speculate on an answer. It was uncharted territory.

"Sorun, I..." Nicole's words fell short. She had a perfect memory as an AI. Could think thousands of times faster than any organic being could ever hope to, could make advanced calculations in seconds with her own mind when it would take experienced mathematicians hours using a cumbersome amount of assistive tools. None of it was helping her with answering Sorun. Not her thinking abilities, not her database of information her mind was frantically searching through to find an answer that didn't exist, nothing. She didn't know. It frustrated her even more than being stuck in that handheld. "We... we're all here for you, if you need us."

It was such a predictable answer that Nicole had to hold back from visibly cringing, and afterwards had to wonder if she'd really said that in front of him. It had to count for something, though, right? She knew people in grief often clung to others as emotional aids to help them through times such as this. Familial units and friends and such. He didn't have the former, but he certainly had the latter. Especially her. And it was here she realized some part of Nicole wanted for Sorun to latch onto her for support, and the very idea of holding such an emotion repulsed her. She didn't want to exploit his pain just to be closer with him. That was wrong. She just wanted to help him be better so he'd stop being like this. She cared about him too much to see Sorun in this miserable state.

He didn't react in the slightest to what Nicole had said to him. He just continued staring at her with that empty expression he'd worn ever since the doctor at the hospital finished examining him. That hollow look. The neutral position his mouth was in. His vacant, sunken-in eyes. He wouldn't stop making that face. Nicole didn't even know if he was aware of the expression he was wearing.

"I know." That was all he offered her. He still kept giving her that hollow look, like all the emotion had been drained out from him. "..." He wouldn't speak further. He just kept staring at Nicole, like he wasn't sure of what to say. He wouldn't even move in the slightest. He only kept standing there staring at Nicole.

Even when she'd leapt forwards, wrapping her arms around his torso in a bear hug, holding their bodies so close together she had to rest her head on his shoulder, he didn't react.

"I can't imagine how painful it must be for you." She'd gone as far as to stroke his back with one hand and the back of his head with her other, in some desperate attempt at giving him some comfort, but all he would do was continue remaining limp in her hug. "I realize this home will never compare to the one you lost, but... this is still your home, Sorun. Your new home. We're all still here with you. I'm still here. And all we want to do is help you, okay? You just need to ask. We'll do whatever we can to help."

"..." Sorun still wouldn't speak to her. Nicole broke the hug and pulled away, both hands resting on his shoulders as she looked to his face. He'd gone back to staring aimlessly in a random direction, and it was here Nicole realized just how dreadfully tired Sorun looked. Tired in a way she couldn't describe.

"I... I'll come back tomorrow. I'll check on you every day." She still had a city to steward over, after all, as much as her responsibilities to the citizens were vexing her at the moment. But she'd find time for Sorun. She'd make time if she had to. "Please just go to sleep for now. You need your rest. Do you think you can find the bedroom on your own?"

Thankfully, Sorun nodded in Nicole's direction. She would have preferred a verbal confirmation, but just the fact he was still responsive and hadn't gone back to being catatonic was enough to put her at ease for now. She released Sorun's shoulders, and slowly her body began disappearing as she began transferring herself back into the city's systems.

"Goodnight, Sorun. We'll talk more tomorrow."

The fact that he didn't say anything as she faded away only made Nicole more worried for the person she adored so much.

It was probably a single second after Nicole disappeared that Sorun's body tilted backwards until his back fell against the floor. He noted the back of his head hitting the ground, but the pain was dulled. Distant. Not all there. He didn't care.

He was grateful to Nicole for everything. For the house, wanting to be there to help Sorun, just existing and being around him, everything. He felt bad not being able to vocalize these thoughts, but he didn't have it in him. He couldn't even stand right now, let alone pour out all his feelings for her. He just couldn't.

"Mom's dead. Dave's dead. All my friends are dead. Every single person on Earth is dead. It's all dead. Gone. I'll never see them again."

And here he was. The last, sole surviving member of the human species, surviving only because of freak coincidence it seemed. Stuck in a world of animal people and robots and, as far as he was concerned, off-brand humans that didn't truly count as humans. Here he was. All alone in a world that couldn't even comprehend his culture, while he, in turn, couldn't comprehend the world around him.

The others were there, at least. There was that. Some small comfort Sorun could just barely feel in his heart. If nothing else, there was that. He didn't know if he could keep on living if it weren't for the sole fact that there were people here in this world that cared about him. He wouldn't bother anymore otherwise.

"..." His head tilted to the side a bit. He saw himself, sitting on the ground and leaning his back against the wall, right next to Sorun. He looked as empty as Sorun was. "You realize they saved our lives by kidnapping us," he said to him.

"Don't wanna hear it." Sorun turned his head away from Sorun. "That doesn't fucking absolve them."

"Kind of does if you really think about it, intentions aside. You can't seriously still hate them."

"I don't feel anything right now. And neither do you," Sorun said.

"..." Sorun looked back up at the ceiling. "What are we supposed to do now?" he asked, his voice unsure. What was he supposed to do, really? He didn't have any plans. He didn't even know what he was supposed to do when he woke up tomorrow. Sorun had no idea what to do going forward. None whatsoever.

What was he supposed to do now that his world was dead?

Sorun, looking down at Sorun lying on the ground, sighed and stood up. "I don't care anymore," he said, voice scathing and sad at the same time, "about anything. Do whatever you want. None of it matters anymore. I'm going to sleep."

He walked off out of Sorun's view. Sorun sighed at him leaving, his eyes still up at the ceiling. It was only after Sorun left that Sorun realized just how tired he really was, and rapidly his eyelids began to become heavier and heavier.

Sorun decided it wasn't worth getting up to find the bedroom and decided to just sleep right there on the floor.

Chapter 63

Recursion Error

Episode 63- The hustle

He was back in that ship once again. Cutting through so many robots in his attempt at trying to get at Eggman. Sprinting through the dark corridors, cutting down everything in front of him. Wielding a sword with supernatural reflexes and skill no normal human could ever possess. It'd felt so natural, swinging that sword through everything the way he had. The style, the technique, it'd come to Sorun so easily, so instinctually, like he was meant to hold that sword for the sole purpose of slicing through everything in his path. An effect of the Emerald and Devil's Body, maybe, or his knowledge on the proper way of using that sword, a combination of the two, perhaps, he hadn't known and hadn't asked questions. He didn't care. He just wanted to keep going.

There'd been hundreds of Badniks he'd sliced apart on that ship. Always moving forwards, never stopping or resting. They had no resistances to the katana capable of cutting through space, no defense whatsoever, and they weren't nearly fast enough to avoid Sorun. All they had was offense, but with his own powers and regenerative abilities, not even that could stop him.

They'd shot him, stabbed him, smashed him with hammers, tried blowing him up, but no matter what they tried he never stopped moving, never stopped going forwards to cut them all down. Any damage inflicted on him healed in the blink of an eye. He'd be riddled with so many scars he wouldn't look human otherwise.

Hundreds. Hundreds and hundreds. Dozens in seconds. His clothes were stained in oil, his blade practically black as it dripped with the fluid as he stood above a lone Egg Pawn, cowering on the ground and holding its hands out to Sorun, like it was begging for its life. And Sorun, coldly looking down at it, black oil splattered all over his face, didn't bat an eye as he swiped his sword in front of him to cut the robot in two and kill it. And then he'd move on to the rest.

But it always ended the same, no matter how fast he went, no matter how efficient he was in dispatching everything in his way. He'd die before he'd get a chance at killing Eggman. He'd only get far enough to see him before he'd feel his heart stop, and then his body would refuse to move, and then Sorun would die right there. Sometimes Eggman would leave immediately, too terrified of Sorun to stick around even though he was dying. Other times he'd have the cheek to stay and gloat over Sorun, and the last thing his ears would hear is his mocking voice ridiculing Sorun before he'd die.

And when he'd die, he'd never go back to that void again. It was always his home city he'd wake up in. Sometimes in his home, or at his high school, even just somewhere in the street sometimes. But it always ended the same regardless of where he woke up. There'd be a white flash, and oddly enough, the sound of a shotgun going off as opposed to a booming, distant explosion. The clear, blue skies would turn red, and in the distance Sorun would see a mushroom cloud rise up as a fiery shockwave engulfed the city.

Windows would explode as buildings would buckle, with some falling down. Streets would crack and blow apart, cars would overturn, and the screaming, always so much screaming. Sometimes he'd see people he knew, his friends, his mother, and he couldn't do anything but watch as their bodies were completely obliterated by the shockwave from the nuclear blast, and then he'd have to feel his own skin get torn away, his organs rupture and his bones shatter as he was completely scorched by nuclear fire-

---

The sunlight hitting his face woke Sorun up. His eyes cracked open to the window next to his bed, with the morning sunlight shining through it. He made a short sigh, and then turned onto his back.

The bedsheets that had been covering him were lazily thrown off his body. The teen sat up in his bed, groggily blinking his eyes as he looked around. Still his same room that contained nothing but a bed and a closet. The same room he'd been waking up in for a week now ever since he'd moved into his new home.

"That same dream again..." He reached his hand up to run a hand over his face, choosing to brush away some of his disheveled hair. The nightmares were a frequent thing. Happened every night at this point. He didn't bother telling anybody about them, and he didn't care enough to do anything about them. So he simply endured and ignored them, and then moved on with his day.

Swinging his feet off the edge of the bed, Sorun slid off it and let his feet touch down with the floor. He turned towards the closet, moving towards it with languid motions and then reached out to open it as he gazed at the articles of clothing inside of it. A pair of black boots, some socks. Blue pants and a black shirt. The dark blue vest Honey had made for him. His only clothes.

He quickly threw them on and left the bedroom. The same blank, off-white walls that decorated his entire house greeted Sorun as he walked his way towards the kitchen, form slumped forwards and arms hanging limp, a blank look on his tired face. In the exact same ritual he'd been performing every single morning since he began living here he made it to the fridge and then opened it to see what food was inside so he could calm down the dull ache in his stomach.

"... Running out of food," he realized when he looked into the sparsely-populated fridge. He was mildly surprised he was already running low considering he only ate once a day, sometimes twice if the hunger was especially bad. But at the moment just seeing the contents of his fridge, or lack thereof, sapped away any motivation Sorun had of eating, so he closed the fridge and went to sit down in one of the chairs next to the kitchen table. "What a pain..."

Sitting down in the chair, Sorun briefly went over his options. Running out of food was a problem. He could only go so long without eating before Nicole noticed something, and if she figured out he didn't have any food and wasn't doing anything about it, Sorun didn't imagine it would end well. And she would eventually figure it out. She made it a point to visit him every single day here. The other Freedom Fighters made visits to him, too, brief ones to ensure Sorun was doing well, but from what he heard things with Eggman were picking up again, so they were back to doing that. Nicole was the only one that found the time to see him every single day, sometimes multiple visits in the same day. But either way it was a constant.

Normally for Sorun her visiting him was the brightest part of his day, since the rest of it usually composed of him sitting on the couch in the living room and staring up at the ceiling all day before he got tired and walked to the bedroom so he could go to sleep. It was the only thing he had to look forwards to. The only spot of color in his day. But now he had to worry about her fretting over him because of the food situation. He didn't want to burden her with that and make life that much harder for her.

It was something he'd have to rectify before she noticed.

"Maybe I can just steal food from the food storage site," Sorun internally mused. "No, wouldn't work. Nicole would catch me on the security systems. Steal from the market at night? Same problem: Nicole. It's pretty much impossible to do any kind of crime in this city without her catching you. Illegal actions aren't viable. So... the only course of action I have is legal action. So how do I legally obtain food?"

Growing his own food was an option, but that presented multiple problems. He'd need pots and soil for that, since fruits and vegetables couldn't grow in the faux-nanite soil this entire city rested on. He didn't know how to acquire those. Even if he did, Sorun didn't know the first thing about gardening. Even worse was that it was too slow to solve his very immediate problems. Above all that, though, he just didn't want to.

Beg for food? Eh, an option. Not a very appealing one, but certainly doable. Last resort. Except... that'd probably be very noticeable. No, on second thought, not an option, either.

Buy it? Probably the most pragmatic solution Sorun could find. He had some money, given to him by Sally to help with his "adjustment period" - he could have scoffed right in her face when she said that - to settling in to New Mobotropolis and his new home. She hadn't given him much, though. Just enough to get by for a little bit. He wouldn't be able to rely on that money for long, a few more days at best if he rationed the food. Long-term he'd have to find a way of generating his own income.

So... he needed a job, then.

"... Not like I'm doing anything better with my day." Maybe getting a job would be a good thing. Give him something to do and stop Nicole from worrying about him all the time. Every time she'd visit him there'd be this undertone to her entire demeanor. She kept trying to hide it, probably for Sorun's sake, but he could practically feel her concern for him. The way she kept asking if he was alright, the way she'd look at him like she was examining him, the frequent visits.

He was grateful for them, greatly so, but they kept making him feel bad for himself. Like he was some burden making her life and everybody else who was worried for him inconvenient just by existing. Maybe doing something productive would help fix it. Show he was doing something to move on and get some structure in his life, if such a thing was even possible for what happened to him. Either way he needed a way of getting money so he didn't starve.

"Guess I'll go get a job." Sorun lifted himself off the chair and made his way towards the front door of the house. Opening it caused Sorun to be assaulted by pure, unfiltered morning sunshine, causing him to squint and shield his face with his hand. He hadn't stepped foot outside this house ever since Nicole first showed it to him. He forgotten how bright daylight was.

Lowering his hand, Sorun looked out to the residential district. The sun was shining, the sky was clear, and overall things looked peaceful. His house was still surrounded by all the other houses in the neighborhood, though he had no idea who lived in those houses. He did see some Mobians walking up and down the sidewalks though, happily going along with their day while waving and smiling at each other. Sorun even got a few waves himself, and Sorun, not knowing at all how to respond, had merely just awkwardly waved back while keeping a nervous look on his face.

It was when he was waving his hand, and it'd moved near his face, that Sorun had accidentally smelled himself. He'd blinked in surprise, and then slowly lowered his arm while giving it, and his entire body, a contemplative look.

"... Shower first, then job," he decided, and then walked back into his house while closing the door behind him.

One shower later and Sorun was in the one place in the city he figured he was most likely to find a job: the marketplace.

Sorun didn't really know what the job market in New Mobotropolis was like. He knew there couldn't be any positions in infrastructure or construction since, well, Nicole and the nanites took care of pretty much all the city's needs. Most likely ditto for any electrical, plumbing, or any position falling under maintenance when it came to the city itself. Nicole was in charge of all that, as well as running the city's inner systems. So what was left after that?

Well, plenty, probably. There were all the guards and soldiers in the royal - or would it be republic now? - army, as small as it was, but with his distaste of fighting, or really just a lack of general ability, Sorun didn't see that going well for him. There were other specialized positions: educators and doctors and the such, but he didn't have the education for something like that. So he was unqualified for any of those.

He knew a sizeable part of the population worked in producing food for both trading and for maintaining the city's food reserves, which were all stored in a food storage site. Those were usually the people found in the marketplace, as well as other craftspeople that sold various things they crafted. Other than that there were people like Honey that ran their own independent businesses for a living. Even in a city that ran itself people found ways to make a living.

There had to be something out there for him.

"Alright, job hunt time. Never, uh... never really done anything like this, but it's gotta get done." Admittedly a great part of Sorun was nervous about undergoing this endeavor as he walked through the marketplace. What did this process even entail? Did he just go up to random people asking for a job? How was he supposed to act? Was there some kind of procedure or etiquette he had to follow? Were there weird rules that applied here but not on Earth that were in effect he wasn't aware of? "Speculatin' ain't gonna get me anywhere. Might was well just go for it and hope for the best."

He made a resolute nod to himself. No lack of ever working a single day in his life, work as a Freedom Fighter aside, was gonna stop him from at least trying this.

"Ya... want a job?"

Sorun quietly clicked his tongue, made a sharp inhale, and nodded his head while keeping his hands respectfully clasped behind his back. The pig Mobian in front of him was giving Sorun the once-over, looking him up and down with peculiar, questioning eyes.

The job hunt lead Sorun to a stall in the marketplace, which was connected to a small, house-sized structure. What drew him in was the "help wanted" sign out in the front window, and entering the small building lead Sorun to meeting the aforementioned pig Mobian he was asking a job from. Apparently he was a local distributor of produce that traded food to some of the other market vendors who then sold the food to the citizens paying for it. Hell if Sorun knew how that system worked, but it did, and the guy needed help while Sorun needed a job. Seemed like a good place to start to him.

"Yes, sir, that's correct," Sorun stiffly replied with a nod, having put on his most respectful face. "I, er, noticed the sign, so-"

"Ah, wait, I know you!" the pink-skinned pig Mobian suddenly exclaimed, causing Sorun to jump a bit in surprise. "Yer that one human Freedom Fighter, right? The one with the weird blue arms an' swords an' all that."

"I'm... still the only human living in New Mobotropolis, yes," Sorun confirmed, forcing himself not to twitch in any way. "And indeed was... that guy you saw fighting Eggman and the mech suit while you and everyone else were trapped in the Egg Grapes. I was there for the whole Enerjak thing, too."

How the fuck was he not more recognizable when he was the only human that lived in the city? Not even that he was with the Freedom Fighters, but lived in the city exclusively full of Mobians otherwise. And an AI. Sure, he'd... he'd never really gone out of his way to interact with many of the citizens, really, but goddamn. He stuck out like a sore thumb compared to everybody else. Even Nicole had a Mobian form for her body. He was the only one on the whole damn continent not rocking fur, for crying out loud.

... Well, him, Eggman, and Snively, with the latter two somewhere in the ruins of New Megaopolis, but the point still stood.

"Ah, yeah, yeah-yeah-yeah, I know you." Maybe he was being a bit too hasty with his judgement. It wasn't like this random Mobian didn't know him at all or forgot him, clearly. Sorun just... didn't really get around that much. That had to be it. "Aren't you doin' work with the Freedom Fighters? Why d'ya want a job from me?"

"I'm retired," Sorun explained. "Indefinitely. Permanently. Forever. I don't fight anymore."

The pig blinked. "Oh. Why not?"

"Come on, man, I came for a job, not to give my autobiography." What was he supposed to say? That he was too scared and traumatized to fight anymore? He wouldn't even bother his friends with his emotional baggage, let alone some complete stranger he was begging a job from. He decided to just go with the other ugly truth: he was too weak to be a Freedom Fighter. Or fighter of any kind, really. "I don't have my powers anymore, so I can't really fight. Hence my retirement and me seeking alternative employment, sir."

The change in the Mobian's demeanor was instantaneous, and not the good kind of change, which made Sorun grow concerned. He looked a lot more hesitant all of a sudden, blinking in surprise and growing a bit uncomfortable-looking. He winced and glanced behind him, at an open doorway. Sorun peered through that doorway and saw an empty room full of crates of food stacked up on one another. The pig Mobian made a small hiss, and then turned back to Sorun.

"Oh, uh... lost the powers, huh?" he asked. "So no, uh... no super strong arms or, uh, the-the weird clone thing?"

"No...?" Now Sorun was progressing from concern to full-blown worry. "Is that a problem?"

"Well, er, yeah, actually. It is," the Mobian admitted. "Look, Solder-"

"Sorun."

"Sorun, I got a lotta product I gotta be movin' on the daily. I'm a supplier of a lot of the vendors here and even some of those fancy-schmancy restaurants further inta town," the pig explained. "Thing is, uh... the boxes're heavy, see, an' humans like you ain't really, well... you're not known for bein', you know, very strong." He looked down to avoid Sorun's face while reaching a hand up to scratch the back of his head. "Thing is I already got a buncha other applicants, too, an' one of 'em was a tiger. So unless you can hold four pallets of food over your head with one hand like that guy can there's nothing I can do for you." He looked back up at Sorun. "Can ya?"

"... I could probably pick, like, one up. With both hands," Sorun answered in a quiet voice.

"..."

"..."

"..."

"... I don't have the job, do I?"

"N-no, no, you don't. Sorry."

Sighing in defeat, Sorun slumped his shoulders. Probably should have seen that one coming, he realized. What was he compared to a Mobian with borderline super strength? He could probably cross off any type of physical labor job if that was the case. Narrowed his search down, at least, but also closed off way more doors than he was comfortable with. This job hunt was looking less and less viable by the second.

The pig Mobian, seeing Sorun's distress, grimaced a bit and held his hand out to Sorun as he turned to leave. "Aw, geez, wait up a sec." The human did so, freezing mid-step and turning back to the pig. "Listen, I ain't got work for ya, but one of the restaurants I do supply for I mentioned earlier might have a position open. Waiter or somethin' like that. You could try there."

"Waiter? Huh, that's... actually a pretty decent idea, yeah. I mean, shit, waiter was a common job for high schoolers back in my world. I was friends with a guy that waited tables. Yeah, sure." After taking a few moments to think, Sorun nodded in thanks at the pig. "Alright. I'll go do that. Thanks."

"Yeah, no problem. Hey, good luck, kid." The pig waved to Sorun on his way out, with Sorun doing the same as he left. The door closed behind the teen, with the Mobian nodding to himself in satisfaction as he turned around to conduct the rest of his business for the day.

And then he was forced to turn back around when he heard the door open, only to then see Sorun poking his head back in.

"H-hey, uh, could, could you give me some directions to that restaurant, please?"

The restaurant Sorun had been pointed to was a place that went by the name of Crème De La Crème. Real fancy name for a real fancy eatery, the kind of place Sorun never dreamed of ever being able to afford going to. Fortunately he wasn't there looking to spend money. He was there looking to get paid.

Unfortunately it didn't seem like that was going to work out.

"So you're not hiring?"

"Afraid not, sir." Sorun never even made it to the manager of the restaurant. Or inside the place for that matter. He only made it as far as the damn greeter. An old orange fox Mobian, much to Sorun's consternation. "All of our waiting positions were recently filled. The proprietor of this establishment isn't seeking any additional help."

His shoulders slumping in defeat once again, Sorun looked off to the side. There were a few outside tables under an awning connected to the restaurant seated with guests. From what Sorun saw they were all being waited by a rooster Mobian. And on the actual inside of the restaurant were even more waiters tending to the guests.

Place was fully staffed, then.

"... You sure you don't need a dishwasher or something like that? Or a janitor?" Sorun tried. All he received from the fox was a raise of an eye ridge. "I'm... look, man, I'm really desperate here."

"No, sir , I assure you we do not." There was an edge to that aged, sophisticated tone the Mobian greeter was speaking in. A very annoyed one, directed right at Sorun. The piercing gaze he was giving the human wasn't helping his nerves at all. "Now if you don't have a reservation, I'm going to have to ask you to move along."

Sorun could take a hint. This one, at least. He wasn't wanted here, and frankly, he didn't want to be here right now. "Fine. I'm gone."

"Have a good day, sir," the greeter called out as Sorun turned away.

"Don't tell me what to do." He hadn't turned around to see the Mobian's reaction as Sorun left, but he didn't think he needed to seeing as he could practically feel him glaring a hole into the back of his head. He didn't care. He just wanted to put as much distance between him and that restaurant as soon as possible so he could put the place out of his mind.

"Fuckin' foxes. It's not just the Prower family. They're all out to get me." The teen shook his head as he rounded a corner, stopping to relax and lean his body up against a nearby wall as he looked up at the sky. "Well, that's that place out of the question. It's not really looking too good so far, but the day's still young. There's gotta be someone out there willing to hire me for everything."

The further this went on, the more Sorun was convinced there wasn't a single job available for him in the whole city.

He'd just now walked out of a bakery, back hunched forwards, his head bowed down, and his hands tucked into his pockets. This was the tenth place that had either turned him down or just didn't have any openings. Including that fancy restaurant he tried he'd been to three whole restaurants, and they all turned him down. The other seven places always had the same story: nobody wanted to hire him either because they were fully staffed, or because they didn't want him due to his status as a "weak, jelly-armed human that couldn't do a quarter of the work a Mobian could." He'd actually had that said right to his face by one person.

It was a cutthroat job market in New Mobotropolis apparently.

"Ugh... this is getting me nowhere." How was he supposed to support himself going at this rate? At the speed he was going he'd starve to death before he'd ever find anybody willing to hire him, if such an opportunity even existed here. And he was starting to see that as a preferred alternative to getting turned down over and over like the way he was. He felt emotionally beaten. Like every single turndown he got was a kick to his soul. That one incredibly rude Mobian that called him a weak, jelly-armed human especially.

Wasn't even that anybody forgot who he was, either. Not like anybody could seeing as he'd had his arm torn off in front of the entire city when he was busy saving all of their lives. Some Mobians profusely apologized to him that they couldn't hire him despite his service as a Freedom Fighter and all he did for them. Others weren't nearly as nice and didn't even acknowledge all he'd done, and instead just pointed right at the door after outright refusing to hire him right to his face. For the most part, though, people kept acting like they barely even knew who he was. Which was true, Sorun supposed, and he wasn't the kind of person to try and use everything he'd done as leverage to try and garner himself a job, left a bad taste in his mouth, but even if he did he wasn't even confident it would work.

Nobody wanted him, plain and simple. Nothing he could do to change that.

He'd briefly entertained the idea of going to one of his friends for advice, but Sorun decided against it after some debate. He didn't want to bug them with this. Didn't want to drag them down with his problems or make them worry further. Besides, they were all busy with the whole Freedom Fighter thing. They didn't have time to worry about someone like him. He had to figure this out himself.

Right. As if that was going well.

"Well, with how things are going, it seems like there's only one thing left to do."

"So how are you doing today, Sorun?"

"Ah, you know," Sorun calmly answered, not even looking at the lynx sitting besides him, his eyes staring right at the TV. "Fine."

He'd decided to give up looking for a job altogether and opted to just go home and wait for Nicole to visit so he could play video games with her. He didn't want to deal with the emotional duress that was getting turned down left and right. Didn't want to be reminded of his own inherent ineptitude due to being a human in a city full of Mobians.

At the very least, Nicole was there with him on another visit. He didn't know how he was going to resolve the food situation, but there was that. Her visiting let him ignore all of his problems for just a little bit, which was something he desperately craved at this point.

"That's good to hear." Thing was Nicole wasn't even looking at the TV. She was looking at Sorun. Her whole focus was solely on him. And he could tell, too, because she wasn't playing nearly as well as he knew she could since she was barely even paying attention to the game.

Somehow she was still better than everyone else, barring Sorun, at games even without focusing on it. At least enough to make him put effort in.

"I saw you leave the house today," Nicole continued. "What were you doing?"

Sorun won the round right as Nicole finished the question. A bit too easy for his taste, but he was too scared of upsetting Nicole to comment on it. He had enough sense to not complain to her for paying too much attention on him instead of a video game. "You were watching me on the security cameras again?" he questioned her.

"I simply just noticed you walking around through them," she said.

"Ah." He wasn't sure he believed her. He didn't care either way. "I... decided I should probably try and find something productive to do with my day. So I went looking for a job. You know, just something I can do to keep me busy."

"Oh! I see." There was a small chirp to Nicole's voice, and her ears straightened up as a smile broke out on her face. A real smile, and not that fake one she'd been wearing to mask all the worry she'd had over Sorun this past week every time she came to see him. Like him getting up to go do stuff was a sign he was getting better, which in turn made her happy. "And how has that been going?"

It was here that Sorun had to consciously refrain from sighing and sitting back in the couch. To give any sign that he was under duress. She didn't seem to know why it was he was walking around all day, just that he was, so that was good. He didn't want to tell her he was an utter failure at finding a job here. He liked seeing her legitimately happy instead of trying to fake it for his sake, and he didn't want her to start worrying again. But he also didn't want to lie to her on the moderate chance she figured out he couldn't find a job.

Eh, he'd just be evasive about it.

"Still exploring my options. Went to a bunch of different places, haven't made up my mind on what to do yet, it's still an ongoing process," Sorun vaguely answered her. When she kept staring at him expectantly, Sorun endeavored to change the topic. "How's everybody else doing?"

"As well as could be. Operations against Dr. Robotnik have been going without issue thus far," Nicole said to him. "There has been one development. Due to the events of your last mission as well as Enerjak's attack on his city, and due to us all having dismantled his production facilities beforehand, his autonomous forces are practically nonexistent. To compensate he's enlisted the help of the militant echidna organization Knuckles and his team often fought against on Angel Island."

"The Dark Something Or Other?" Sorun asked, prompting Nicole to nod. "I thought Enerjak eye-zapped all their cybernetics away? What're they doing working with Robotnik? And also why?"

"Evidently he restored their cybernetics on the condition they align themselves with him. We're not sure of the specifics." The lynx turned her face away from Sorun at the same time to corners of her mouth began to lower. "I find myself questioning what possessed those echidna to act in such a way. Why their attachment to technology is so strong they'd go to such lengths just to replace parts of themselves with mechanical enhancements." She rose her hand up to her face and flexed it closed, and then opened it again. "It's... confusing to me. How they could be so enamored with cybernetics when they have their own bodies."

Sorun silently stared at her hand, and then looked up into her eyes. "Because they're doing the exact opposite of what you wanted for yourself?" he asked.

"Perhaps," she confessed to him. "Some of them go as far as replacing their limbs with artificial replacements for no other reason than they're marginally more efficient than organic Mobian limbs. Limbs, eyes, internal implants and artificial organs and the such. Unfeeling metal replacements. Prosthetics for lost limbs is one thing, but they're voluntarily doing this to themselves. It just doesn't seem worth it to me to give things like touch up in exchange for a moderate boost in strength now that I've experienced touch for myself."

"I don't really get it, either," Sorun admitted. That delved into a territory Sorun didn't like going into- echidna history, and all the fuckery behind that. There were probably solid reasons why the Dark Legion were like this, but that would require asking Knuckles to go further into the history of things. Which Sorun absolutely refused to do due to his genuine dislike of their entire species with the exception of a few members. And he had better things to do than try to understand why a bunch of cybernetic fanatics were the way they were. Like stare at the ceiling.

But he could understand why Nicole would be so confused over them. For the longest time she wanted a body for herself, and this holographic form of hers was as close to a real body as an actual, physical body could get. A physical body that could move around and feel sensations like an organic body could, however... however that worked, Sorun wasn't sure of the science. He had to wonder if she was thinking those echidna were taking for granted what they had and were willingly giving up just for cybernetics. Maybe she was even insulted by the very notion of replacing organic parts with mechanical, which he wouldn't be surprised over.

"I wouldn't stress so much about it, Nicole. Those echidna are crazy," Sorun told her. "They gotta be screwed up in the head if they're working with Robotnik for no other reason than they want a shiny arm. The guy that wants to rule over the entire world and enslave everybody. The turbo dictator. Who cares what those nutjobs think at that point?"

Nicole smiled a tiny bit, and her shoulders briefly shook in subdued laughter. "You're right. Their reasons are their own, even if I think them wrong. Even if... everybody else thinks they're wrong in what they're doing. Robotnik has his own reasons for what he does, and he's clearly in the wrong." She placed her hands on the couch and stood up off of it. "I apologize if this wasn't a pleasant subject of conversation, Sorun. I know I shouldn't be concerning myself with their actions. I just can't help in trying to understand."

Sorun shook his hand and waved in her direction. "Nah, it's fine. I like talking with you." He paused and turned his head away from her. "Um, thanks for this. For... coming back to check on me all the time. I know I'm not really making things easy for you-"

"Nonsense. It hasn't been any trouble for me at all." He felt a hand lay down on his shoulder, causing Sorun to look up and see Nicole smiling down at him. "You're a very dear friend of mine. I'm just happy to see you're doing better." Her smile faltered a bit as she looked more directly into Sorun's eyes. "You are doing better, correct?"

"... As well as I can, I guess," he honestly answered. He didn't want to tell her about the nightmares. As far as he was concerned that was a secret he had to keep from everybody. That and, no, he wasn't really doing better and his thoughts kept going back to his home. She didn't deserve to be weighed down by concern over him. "It's... you know."

Nicole blinked. Her had slid off from his shoulder, and at the same time her ears lowered a bit as the smile left completely. "It'll be better, Sorun," she promised him. "I wish the others could visit as frequently as I do, but with how things are it isn't feasible at the moment. But I'll keep visiting," she assured him. "I really do think you're getting better, though. You're speaking much more than you have in the previous days!"

"As opposed to not at all?" Sorun numbly thought. "You don't have to keep doing this every day, you know," he reminded her, despite how much he wished she'd keep doing this.

"But I will. Because I want to," she said, brightening Sorun's mood a bit. "That said, I do need to leave now. But I'll see you again tomorrow, okay?"

"Alright." As he watched Nicole's body begin to disappear, Sorun managed to find the will to bid her a goodbye. "Er, bye."

"Goodbye for now, Sorun." She'd managed to give him one last smile and a wave before disappearing. And then she'd vanished, leaving Sorun alone on his couch in his living room.

And just like that, with Nicole's absence, it all began to slowly set back into Sorun. The emptiness of the house, the quietness, nothing but his own thoughts to occupy him. Thoughts of his home and everything that was gone now, which made him slump back in the couch and drop the controller on the floor. He tried thinking of something else to take his mind off of it. Usually that just entailed Nicole in some shape or form. But in this particular moment he couldn't help but focus on what she said about Eggman. Him and the echidna.

Those stupid, stupid echidna.

"Why do they always have to cause so much trouble? Garbage fucking species," he mumbled under his breath as he examined his right hand, feeling twinges of anger under his skin. "'Dark Legion', pfft. Probably did something lame and put 'Egg' somewhere in it now that they're with him. 'Dark Egg Legion'. Dumbass name." The hand dropped to his side. "I guess it's probably a good thing I lost my powers and dropped out of the Freedom Fighters when I did. I don't imagine the others would have reacted well if I started cutting through cyborg echidna. I know Knuckles wouldn't have liked me killing so many. There's not too much of his species left, thankfully."

Killing robots with mass produced basic AI was a whole different world than killing real people. Sorun would call himself a fool if he didn't realize this. And on the inside, he recognized it was more of his anger towards the entire echidna species in general talking. The more he thought about it, though, the more he had to wonder.

"... Would I even go as far as to kill them?" he asked himself. "If I still had all my powers incapacitating them would be easy. And everyone else, well... they don't even see it as an option. They'd probably never speak to me again it's such a taboo to them." Sorun sighed and turned his head up to the ceiling. "Alright, maybe on second thought I wouldn't have killed any of them. Eggman and Snively, sure, but... egh. I don't know." He rose his hand back up to rub at his head. "Could I even?"

He'd never taken a life, after all. When it came to Eggman and Snively it wasn't a question of if he could and live with it, because with them, Sorun could. Almost had some occasions. The anger made swinging the sword easy enough when he'd tried, and after all they'd done, he knew he wouldn't be losing sleep over their deaths if he ever succeeded. Random echidna grunts he didn't even know were another matter. He didn't know if he'd be able to do it or if he'd just freeze up trying. Or what would happen afterwards. Maybe incapacitating them would have been easier just so he didn't have to deal with these kinds of moral quandaries. Everybody else seemed to handle it well enough, anyway.

It wasn't like he ever wanted to actually kill anybody. And the more Sorun thought on it, the more he realized the prospect of killing people who weren't genocidal maniacs kept leading him to more and more uncomfortable thoughts, echidna or not. Killing Eggman was easy for him to justify. He couldn't put the same labels he had on those echidna. They weren't universally hated like that man was.

"... Egh, why am I even thinking about this? I'm never fighting again. I'm done with it," Sorun murmured to himself. "I kept my hands clean the whole time I was here and I don't see myself ever getting the opportunity to kill anyone ever again. Doesn't matter."

His out-loud musing were interrupted when Sorun heard a knock at his door. He sat up straight in his couch, and then turned his eyes over to the closed doorway. He once again heard knocks, making him tilt his head questioningly at it.

"A visitor?" He stood up off the couch. "Who?"

A short trip to the door later and Sorun found himself opening it. There were two figures of greatly varying size on the other side, though Sorun found himself focusing on the significantly smaller one that was floating right in front of him. A small floating creature with silver, cylindrical horns adorning his head.

"... Virgil?" Sorun blinked in surprise at the Chao. Virgil, in response, gave Sorun little more than a nod, though the human couldn't help but note the strange way his eyes looked. They were a bit wider than normal, more alert. Searching, particularly towards Sorun. He almost looked worried. Worried over Sorun, maybe.

Behind the Chao was a significantly tall Mobian. Taller than Sorun, at least, which made the human sigh out a bit at the sight. A light-furred rabbit with orange highlights here and there. "That's Cream's mother, isn't it? What was her name? V-something, something... Va, Varnish-? No, Vanilla. Yeah."

"Um... hello," Sorun greeted in his best polite tone. "Did you come to the wrong house?"

"No, I'm quite sure this is the right one," the tall rabbit said. "I came here for you specifically."

"... Vanilla, right?" When she nodded at his question, Sorun looked down at the Chao floating in front of him. "Don't tell me you made her take you all the way here just to see me."

"... Chao."

That small, affirmative noise was enough to confirm Sorun's suspicions. They were only confirmed further when Vanilla stepped a bit closer to gain Sorun's attention.

"Little Virgil has been upset since news of... well, what happened to you reached us," the woman gently explained to Sorun. "He's been restless, so my daughter assumed he wanted to see you. I had to ask around a bit to find where you live and wanted to bring him to see you. And also to check up on you."

"I barely know you," Sorun said in a blank tone. "This is the second conversation we've ever had. Why do you care?"

She straightened up a bit, a bit stricken. Like she'd been slapped right across the face. She gave Sorun an astonished look as a result. "I don't see how that would affect me caring about your wellbeing," Vanilla said to him. "More than that, my daughter is quite fond of you."

"I've also only talked with her twice."

"She took a liking to you since you used to take care of Virgil. There are not many that can care for a Chao like my daughter can, you see," Vanilla explained. "Beyond that she heard stories. Of you, I mean." She began twisting at her long skirt with her hands. "Of how you're this brave Freedom Fighter who goes out of his way to save everybody-"

"Overblown, really," Sorun interrupted, making the rabbit freeze. "Mobians..." his thoughts continued as a tired look overtook his features. Barely even knew these folks and even they were fretting over him, even if he'd just been using them as a convenient excuse to dump his Chao on them. They were a nice enough family. He just could barely understand why they'd care about him so much. "Please tell me you didn't tell your daughter what happened with me," Sorun asked Vanilla.

Much to his relief, she shook her head. "I just told her that you couldn't go on the trip you told her about after all," she informed him. "Why do you ask?"

"I don't think telling a little girl seven billion people died would be a good idea. So thanks for not doing that."

He started to regret saying that when Vanilla's entire demeanor changed completely. She looked positively horrified, having widened her eyes at Sorun while holding a hand to her mouth. Virgil's reaction was much more subdued, but even so Sorun could still see the worry in the Chao's face. The worry and sadness and the way his head was bowed a bit.

"Oh, my... Sorun, I had no idea..." The hand slowly lowered from the rabbit's mouth, though that sorrowful, pitying look was still present in her eyes. Sorun felt himself bristle from that look. "I-I knew they said your home was lost, but I hadn't realized that many..." She stopped herself, and then allowed her eyes to travel down lower to Sorun's body. He couldn't understand why, but for some reason her examining his body caused her to grow concern on top of everything else. "Pardon for me asking, Sorun, but I'm not very knowledgeable of your kind. Are... are you supposed to be this thin?"

"..." Sorun looked down at himself. He had grown a bit thinner as of late. Probably because of how little he'd been eating. It suddenly dawned on him why Nicole always kept looking at his body with worry every so often whenever she visited. He hadn't realized it'd grown so visible. "It's fine," he lied as he looked back up at Vanilla.

She didn't look convinced in the slightest. "Dear, have you been eating?"

"Damn mother's intuition," Sorun thought. "Some. Once, twice a day. Quit asking."

Her eyes widened. "S-Sorun-!"

"You wanted to check on me, and I'm fine. Nice seeing you two again, now leave me alone."

That should have been the end of it right there. He'd turned around back into his house and made to close the door behind him. But he'd only managed to close it halfway before a hand reached out and stopped Sorun before he'd managed to close it fully. He sighed, and then looked back. Of course Vanilla was there holding the door open with her hand, and she'd even gone as far as to push her foot in the doorway. She wasn't alone, either: Virgil was hovering in the doorway like he intended to use his entire body to block the door from being closed.

And neither one looked like they were willing to let the matter go.

"What are you-?"

"You are coming to my home for dinner right this instant."

And now Sorun's eyes were widened, only slightly so, as he shot the woman a bewildered look. But Vanilla, for her part, didn't at all look phased by the look. In fact, she looked... awfully serious at the moment, bewildering Sorun even further. And so did Virgil.

"Excuse me...?" He shook his head and refocused on Vanilla's face. "You want me to-"

"Yes. Right now," she demanded. Demanded , with that authoritative tone only a mother could have that made Sorun freeze and stiffen his back up. "I won't be taking no for an answer."

"Why?" Sorun bit out. He wanted to refuse. Desperately. But that tone she was using with him kept stopping his attempts. That motherly, authoritative tone. It gave him painful reminders of his own mother. He'd even heard Bernadette use it on her own son whenever she scolded Sonic.

It had to be some strange ability exclusively hidden among mothers. Sorun couldn't think of any other explanation otherwise. And her voice, that way she was looking at him, those eyes, everything about her kept him locked in place. And he felt so nervous he couldn't look away from her.

How the hell did they do that?

"I simply want to treat you to dinner is all. You're a friend of mine and Cream's, as well as Virgil's original owner," Vanilla calmly exclaimed in a firm voice that made Sorun's spine more rigid. "And afterwards we can have a talk. Just you and I."

"Say no," Sorun tried thinking to himself. "Refuse, close the door, she can't make you do anything you don't want, just say no and-"

Later

"How the fuck did it come to this?"

Well, here he was. At another home's dinner table, with food laid out before him. Food that he was awkwardly staring down at in an effort to avoid the eyes of everybody else sitting at the table. The rabbit child sitting on the left side of the table from Sorun's point of view, and her mother who was sitting on the other end opposite to him. Both of which were looking at him.

It was all her fault. Vanilla's. Her fault Sorun was sitting in her home practically being forced to have dinner with her family. It'd been in her eyes. That knowing look, the questions about his deteriorating weight. The fact he went and confirmed to her he'd been undereating in that moment of weakness. It wasn't even just that tone of hers that she'd used on Sorun that had frozen him to the spot. It was that hidden threat she'd had behind her eyes, her body language, the implications behind all of it.

Sorun was intensely worried she would go and tell the others what was going on with him. So of course he'd given in and followed her back home. Admittedly he was still worried she'd go and say something to them. He hoped to try and clear it up seeing as she wanted to have a talk with him after dinner. Whatever that entailed.

He didn't know what the hell he was supposed to clear up seeing as she was spot-on with whatever concerns she had over him, though.

How he was supposed to survive the dinner alone was another mystery Sorun couldn't unravel. It seemed like even the food was taunting him. The food he was staring down at to avoid everybody's eyes. A plate of steamed vegetables. Mainly carrots.

"I don't even like carrots."

"Thank you for-"

"Dammit, they're saying words."

"- coming to dinner with us, Mr. Sorun!" Inhaling deeply, Sorun looked up from his food and to the left side of the table. Cream was beaming up at him happily, face full of youthful and blissful innocence that Sorun desired to possess at the moment. Vanilla, over at the end of the table, at least seemed to be in a calm, easy mood. She still kept maintaining a level look with Sorun regardless. He couldn't tell if that warm look she had was just a front she was putting up for her daughter or if she was just that confident in cornering Sorun like this.

"Why do all mothers have to be like this?" Sorun blinked over at Vanilla once and then shifted his gaze to Cream. "Technically I should be the one thanking you," Sorun said to the young rabbit. He'd idly picked up a fork and began mindlessly stabbing at one of the steamed carrots, though he never endeavored to actually eat anything. "It, uh... it was very kind of your mother to invite me. I didn't expect it." He glanced at Vanilla. "Really, really didn't expect it..."

The warm look and level gaze wouldn't disappear off her face. She was doing this on purpose. Had to be.

"Mhm! Mother can be very kind like that!" Sorun found some small amusement in how Cream kept carrying on like she couldn't sense the tension between himself and her mother. Probably couldn't for how young she was. He wished he was as clueless so he didn't have to feel so awkward. "What happened with that trip you said you were going on, Mr. Sorun? I thought you said you weren't coming back once you left?"

"My trip. Right." How the hell was he supposed to go about this? He didn't want to tell her what happened with Earth. He wasn't even sure she knew he was from a whole other zone, if anybody ever told her. "It got cut short, unfortunately," he said. "I wasn't able to go on it after all, so I'm staying here in the city."

"Oh... that's too bad." Cream visibly deflated in her seat. "I hope your family is doing alright."

Sorun darted his eyes away from Cream's. "Yeah, we keep in touch. It's fine."

Vanilla cleared her throat. An attempt at trying to change the subject, Sorun had assumed. He sent her a thankful nod, causing Vanilla to nod back before speaking. "You know, Sorun, you're allowed to eat the food I made for you," the older rabbit pointed out.

He was suddenly a lot less thankful. "I realize this." He glanced down at the carrot he'd been stabbing with the fork, and then stuck it fully to bring it up to his mouth. "Alright, maybe if I try really hard I won't gag and- wow, what the hell, this is actually good."

Never did like vegetables. They were too bitter for Sorun, too tasteless. Fruits, sure. Vegetables? He steered clear away from them all the time his whole life. It was the reason he expected to be completely disgusted by a plate full of vegetables, but for some reason these ones actually had flavor. And decent flavor at that.

... He was also apparently hungrier than he thought he was, because after taking that first bite Sorun suddenly felt ten times hungrier.

When he started eating with a newfound fervor, a kind of eagerness that would have resulted in him practically attacking the plate if he didn't exercise an excruciating amount of self control to just appear to be eating quickly, Sorun noticed Vanilla's expression change just the slightest amount when she and her daughter began eating as well. She had just the slightest hint of smug on her face, the self-satisfied kind of smug. And beneath that her eyes relaxed a bit as the hidden worry that Sorun just now noticed in her eyes. A worry he only now noticed was there due to the fact it was absent now.

"This woman really scares me. She's also a great cook," Sorun thought to himself. "Now I just kinda feel like a jerk for trying to blow her off back at my house. She's just worried about me like everyone else."

Didn't surprise him that she'd be so caring despite the fact they barely knew each other. Mobians were just like that. A belief Sorun didn't believe in quite as much with today's events, but with all he'd seen that supported this point of view, it couldn't be denied. He was still concerned about her informing the others, which would lead to all sorts of awkward questions he didn't want to answer, but at this point there wasn't anything he could do but hope he could smooth it out with her.

"I, uh... wanted to thank you. Again. I mean I know I already did, but, uh... thanks, Vanilla. Y-you know, for the dinner," Sorun stammered out. "I don't really have a lot of food back at my home."

Vanilla's face shifted again. He knew the worry was back, but she was hiding it well, to the point Sorun didn't notice it. But he had noticed the change in her expression. And she was looking right at his eyes with a leveled gaze again. "And why is that, Sorun?" she asked.

Sorun placed his fork down on the plate. He made a sigh, and then leaned back in his chair. "I'm pretty financially challenged," he admitted to her. "I tried going out to look for a job, but it didn't go really well."

The worry was growing more apparent on Vanilla's face. By now Cream had stopped eating and was looking at him, too. "What went wrong?" Vanilla pressed.

"Well, the problem is that there isn't really a lot of positions open for me. I never even technically finished my high school education, so there aren't many options I have. And this is a pretty small self-sustaining city with a population that doesn't even break a thousand. There just aren't that many jobs period." He glanced away from the two rabbits in embarrassment. "Doesn't help I'm physically the weakest and slowest person in the whole city."

"So what is it you plan on doing?"

Sorun shrugged. "I dunno. Starve to death, I guess." When he looked back at the mother and daughter, Sorun felt himself internally wince when he saw them both giving him alarmed looks. "Why did I say that out loud?"

"Ahem!" Vanilla had quickly and loudly cleared her throat, and then rose up out of her seat. "Cream, dear," she began as she looked at her daughter, "I think it's time you went to bed, don't you?"

"Huh?" Cream looked down at her half-finished plate. "But mother-"

"I'll take care of it, dear, don't worry about it. Come along, now." Without further protest, Cream hopped off of her chair and walked towards her mother, who had already left the table. They grasped hands and began to move away towards another end of the house. Right before they left, though, Vanilla had turned hear head around so that her eyes met with Sorun's for a single second before both rabbits disappeared around a corner.

She didn't look too pleased with him.

After they left his sight, Sorun sighed loudly and sat back in his seat. He didn't have the willpower to eat anymore, with that look Vanilla gave him having wiped out his entire appetite. "One of the most wholesome people you've ever met that invited you to her own home for dinner because she was worried over you... and you manage to piss her off. Nice job, Sorun."

Some time passed after Vanilla left to go put Cream in bed. During that time Sorun had continually been alternating between states of self-pity and mortification, and it'd taken him whole minutes to finally find it in himself to get up off of the table. Half of him just wanted to leave right there and just go home so he could go to sleep and forget all this. The other half didn't really want to leave things as they were, and he still needed to have that talk with Vanilla.

Because of these conflicting desires, he'd only made it as far as leaning against the end of the wall separating the house's living room from the hallway that lead to, Sorun assumed, Cream's bedroom. He wasn't nearly brave enough to go as far as to approach the bedroom just to run into Vanilla faster. And from here he could see the front door, almost taunting him to just go and leave. He was tempted to bolt right out. In fact he almost did before he heard a soft pair of footsteps begin to approach him from down the hallway he was next to.

He might have accidentally startled Vanilla a bit when she finally reached the hallway corner he was leaning. She'd flinched and stepped back once in surprise when she noticed him leaning there, and then blinked a few times before she began to visible calm down. And then the worry began to show on her face. That and stern. A large amount of stern.

"I had to assure my daughter her friend wasn't going to starve to death," she told him in a dry tone. "She's very worried about you. I'm worried about you."

Sorun sighed and looked down away from her eyes. "Sorry," he mumbled.

"I didn't very much appreciate you lying to my daughter, either."

"What was I supposed to say, Vanilla? You actually want me to go and tell your daughter that a whole world of people died because... agh, I don't even know why."

Looking a bit hesitant at her answer, Vanilla shook her head. "No, but... you could have at least just tried to avoid it altogether. What do you think she'll say if she learns what really happened?"

"I'm not good with kids, alright?" Sorun pushed off the wall and turned around, towards a nearby couch. He walked towards it, with Vanilla following him and watching as he turned back around only to then lean on the arm of the couch with his arms crossed. "How's she doing otherwise?"

"She's doing well," Vanilla answered.

"Adjusting to the city alright? Gotten used to things, both of you?"

"Yes, yes." She folded her hands in front of her, and then looked off to the side, towards the hallway that lead to Cream's room. "She told me she wants to be a Freedom Fighter."

Sorun scoffed when he heard that. A quiet, sad-sounding scoff that caused Vanilla to look back at him. "I was a Freedom Fighter once. I wouldn't recommend it as a career choice. Pay's terrible," he said. When he saw her giving Sorun a disapproving look, the teen shook his head and tried again. "Why does she want to be a Freedom Fighter?" he asked.

Vanilla had to take a second to think of an answer. "Cream has always been a kind soul that thinks of others before herself. It's why Chao are so drawn to her, I suppose. She sees all these other heroes in the city, like the world-famous Sonic, and Amy who keeps visiting since she's good friends with my daughter, and you, and... well, she admires you all very much. Enough that she wants to help people like you all do."

A child wanting to emulate her heroes and be a hero herself. Common enough, Sorun guessed. Fit in with how caring Mobians could be, but the amount of care Cream had was a category all on its own from what he'd seen. Couldn't rightly blame her if that was the case.

"Do you think she should be one?" Vanilla continued in an apprehensive tone.

"Tch. No way," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "Look, Cream, she's... I mean she's young. Like, young young, not... teenage like me. Developed. Mature," he said. "Still innocent. Too weak," another voice in his head hissed out in warning. "Besides," he added, "this whole Freedom Fighter thing is almost done with anyways. Robotnik's still hanging on for dear life, but that problem's almost taken care of and once it is they won't have a reason to keep being Freedom Fighters anymore. It's too late."

Vanilla had a mixed reaction. She looked mostly relieved, but a bit saddened at the same time. Glad her daughter didn't have to go risk her life but sad she couldn't get her dream fulfilled was Sorun's best guess. Probably a natural reaction for a mother, but he wouldn't know. "Well, that's... a logical way of looking at it. Admittedly I never did approve of the idea of my daughter throwing herself in the face of danger."

"You'd probably be a terrible mother if you did," Sorun said. "And no offense to your daughter, but, well... I know she's got a flight ability, but that's about it. That just doesn't cut it when it comes to those robots Robotnik keeps throwing at people. And nowadays I hear it's actual people instead of robots, and that's a whole host of other issues I don't wanna get into." He looked to the side, away from Vanilla. "It ain't a good idea. 'S all I'm saying."

Still worried him even speaking about it, the fact the Freedom Fighters were fighting actual people now instead of just robots. Those cyborg echidna. Real people had cunning the half-baked AI in those robots didn't. Planning. Cruelty. Considering the lengths they would go on their own bodies he didn't want to imagine how far that kind of cruelty stretched, and his imagination went quite a bit far from all the media he'd consumed on Earth. The only saving grace was that a large majority of Freedom Fighters had powers, and all of them had experience and the others backing them. Sorun had to believe that was enough to keep them safe. They made it this far, after all.

"Is that why you left?" Vanilla asked, drawing Sorun's attention back to her. "I understand you lost the abilities you used to have." She glanced at his right arm. "Though I'm glad you recovered from your injuries so you don't have to use them to compensate for, well... lost parts."

"..." Sorun rose his right hand up to his face. "Partly," he admitted. "Mobian children are stronger than me, after all." He re-crossed his arms. "That," he continued, "and because it was stressing me out too much. I don't know, Vanilla. I don't know how the others do it. Risking life and limb day in and day out, all the close calls, the brushes with death, it-it just washes off all the others. I don't know if it's because they're just used to it because they've been doing it since they were five or because a Mobian's mental constitution is just way higher than a human's or if I'm just that weak-willed, but I'm-I'm not like them, you know? It just keeps sticking with me. All of it. But them, they, they just... they're able to stay normal. Like they can keep doing this forever." He sighed and shook his head. "Well, I can't. Five months of Freedom Fighting was way too much for me. My limit was, like, two days. Christ, Vanilla, I'm only sixteen but I feel like I'm fifty."

He didn't even know if the concepts he was talking about was something all his friends in the Freedom Fighters could even understand . How could they when none of them ever acted like him? When they all acted like all these things that kept giving him nightmares was just an ordinary Tuesday for them. He was envious of them for that. That they all had such strong wills that all this stress Sorun had accumulated was probably incomprehensible to them since they always acted like they could never fall as low as Sorun had. He didn't think they could if they tried. For him it was the exact opposite.

Always had to be different from them in everything. His will, his species, his strength, all of it. Everything in this world was backwards to Sorun.

"And how are you feeling now, Sorun?" Vanilla's voice brought Sorun's attention back to the outside world, making him focus back on the rabbit's concerned face. "Now that you're not fighting anymore?"

"... Dealing with it," he answered.

"And... your home?"

"Dealing with it less successfully." He sighed and uncomfortably shuffled a bit under Vanilla's gaze. "Where's the kid's dad?" he suddenly asked in an attempt to change the subject.

It seemed to work, as Vanilla's demeanor shifted entirely. She looked surprised that he'd ask such a thing, though her face fell into another expression that caused some surprise on Sorun's part. It almost looked like contempt. "I try not to speak of him too much, for Cream's sake. She doesn't even know he exists, and I try to keep it that way just so she won't miss something that will never return."

The air between the two began to grow uncomfortable, causing Sorun to nervously tap his foot on the ground a few times. "So he's dead?" Sorun hedged out. He was surprised to see Vanilla shake her head.

"No. Maybe. Perhaps. I don't know," she said. "To put it simply, he... wanted me, but didn't want a child. So when I told him we were having one, and he protested, I gave him a choice. Either stay with his family or don't." Her hands, still folded in front of her, began grabbing at her long skirt, hard enough that Sorun could hear Vanilla twisting the fabric. Her shoulders were even shaking slightly. Whether in anger or sadness he didn't know. Maybe both. "I don't know what became of him. Perhaps he found a life somewhere else, or maybe he was captured by Dr. Robotnik's machines and was roboticized. Maybe he turned back along with everyone else, or maybe he perished in some mine somewhere. I don't know. And as harsh as this sounds, I don't find myself particularly caring seeing as he abandoned me and his daughter."

So that's what it was. Sorun understood immediately. "A father who didn't want their own child, huh?" Sorun looked to the side at a nearby window to look out into the dark night outside. "I know a lot about what that feels like."

He felt Vanilla's mood shift again, and from the corner of his vision he saw her looking at him with sympathy. "Ah. So, your father... left as well?"

"... In a manner of speaking." He looked back at Vanilla. "It's not a thing for Mobian ears to hear, so I won't speak of it."

"I'm afraid I don't understand what you mean, Sorun."

"Better you don't." It was the same reason he kept censoring himself in front of everybody he even remotely cared about. He'd seen enough to learn that Mobians in general were innocent in a lot of areas. He didn't want to tarnish that innocence in any way, even inadvertently.

Then again, what his father did wasn't nearly as terrible as his whole world dying. He'd keep quiet on it regardless.

"Listen, Vanilla... you're not going to tell the others, are you?" Sorun asked her. "That I'm... probably not doing as well as I say I am?"

The one topic he'd been dreading and stalling for as long as he could. He felt terrified just waiting for Vanilla's response to the question, and it didn't help his stress at all when she kept looking at him. A deep-in-thought look, like she was trying to make her mind up on something. He was so afraid she would go and tell them everything, and he didn't know how to deal with that. He didn't have any plans for that kind of contingency. He didn't know what to do at all.

Finally, Vanilla sighed out and began walking away. "Wait here," she'd all but demanded. Sorun did so, too scared to even budge from his spot for fear of whatever was about to happen. He didn't know what Vanilla was doing other than the fact he heard some rustling in the nearby kitchen. A few minutes later Vanilla had returned carrying something in her hands.

It was a basket full of food.

Sorun knew immediately what she was trying to do, and nearly recoiled away from the basket she was holding as a result. He didn't want it. He didn't want people pitying him, or people making sacrifices to give him handouts. He hated the very sight of that basket. He wasn't taking it.

"I won't accept that," Sorun grumbled out as he turned his head away from Vanilla.

"You will ," Vanilla said with emphasis by forcing the basket into Sorun's hands, "or I'm marching right over to the nearest Freedom Fighter I know to tell them you're starving yourself."

Sorun blinked, and then looked down at the basket in his hands. He glared at it in confusion, and then looked up at Vanilla with even greater confusion. "This is the most backwards blackmail I've ever been subjected too," he informed her. "Why are you doing this?"

Vanilla's shoulders relaxed with a sigh as her eyes grew a bit more calm. "Sorun, I know a thing or two about loss and how painful it can be. But I can also understand wanting to hide it from those you care for. More than you probably think," she explained to him. "With how things are going for you right now, I really don't think you can keep carrying on like this. But I want to give you this so you have a chance of finding some way. And I think we both know that if you don't find one by the time you run out of food the others will find out. They care about you too much not to, and you know it."

That he did. And he was surprised Vanilla was reading him so easily like an open book. Maybe she really did understand a bit of what he was feeling if this was her reasoning. "You're trying to buy me time to find a way to get myself together so I won't worry the others?" he asked as he looked down at the basket. "Why?"

"It's less buying time and more helping you on your way. Whether you manage to do so or you finally swallow your pride and accept help from your friends, or they find out on their own and help you regardless of what you do, you'll be fine in the end, which is what matters the most. But I can sympathize with what you're trying to do. So I just want to help a bit. That's all." She looked over her shoulder. "But, just in case, I think you should take him back."

When Sorun looked back up at Vanilla, wondering what she was talking about, he felt his eyes widen a bit when he saw a small, blue and black creature with silver, metallic horns peaking over the tall rabbit's shoulder. Virgil floated up and away from Vanilla, only to then float towards a dumbstruck Sorun and land on his shoulder in a sitting position.

"Chao," came Virgil's unenthused greeting mixed with a bored expression on the Chao's face.

"..." Sorun looked from the Chao back to Vanilla. "Won't Cream be upset?" he asked.

Vanilla shook her head. "She actually wanted to give him back to you," she said, surprising Sorun further. "She knew how close you were and said she didn't want to keep you two apart anymore. And I'm confident little Virgil here will be keeping an eye on you to make sure matters regarding your health don't become too far out of hand. Isn't that right, Virgil?"

"Chao." Virgil made a nod.

Ah, so that was the play. She was counting on Virgil snitching to the Freedom Fighters if Sorun somehow managed to keep his deteriorating state from them. Which he doubted he could in the first place. But if Virgil was going to be staying with him now it'd be nigh impossible. Which meant he really did have to solve this food problem before the others found out. It was certain now. Except he had no confidence he'd be able to find some way of supporting himself before that inevitability arose.

Well, time to wait and do nothing and hope the best would happen, Sorun supposed. At least he got his pet back. He'd missed Virgil.

"You're a caring woman in a devious sort of way," Sorun told the Mobian woman. "Thanks, I guess. For giving me a shot." He looked back down at the basket. "Even though it ain't gonna be enough."

Vanilla made an accepting sigh. "Sorun, you know it would be easier for everybody if you just asked for help right now instead of making the others worry even more once they find out you're starving."

"Maybe. Don't wanna burden them," Sorun murmured. "I already feel like a leech taking just this from you."

"That isn't how they would see it. But I understand your thinking. I wouldn't be doing this otherwise." The rabbit stepped forwards a bit and placed a comforting hand on Sorun's shoulder. "Whatever happens, it'll work out for you in the end. I'm sure of it. Call it a mother's intuition."

Sorun released a dry chuckle. "We're onto that now?"

"Apparently so." Vanilla offered him a small half-smile. "I wish you luck and hope things get better for you sooner rather than later, Sorun. I really do. Now, I'm off to bed for the night. I highly suggest you and Virgil head home so you can do the same."

Giving him a final nod, Vanilla separated her hand from his shoulder and slowly took off back in the hallway she'd come out of previously. Sorun watched her leave, and then lifted up the basket to his eyes to scrutinize it. Enough to maybe last him another week in addition to the food he already had at home. He doubted it'd be enough to tide him over until he found a solution. There was no solution other than asking for help. Maybe this was Vanilla's way of secretly telling him that.

Well, he wasn't biting. He was eking this out for as long as possible if it meant even the slimmest chance of not alerting the others to how bad he was doing. Even if it was in vain.

... Who was he kidding? It was most definitely in vain. He didn't have a chance of hiding it from his friends. Nicole especially. Wouldn't stop him from trying.

"Tch." He looked to the side at his shoulder, where he saw Virgil looking at him from the side of his eyes. "Alright, warden, come on. Let's go home."

A/N- Everybody deadass just left Sorun to live alone thinking he'd be fine. It's extra screwed up when you realize Sorun's never lived alone before and doesn't know how to independently function in a society. Which is even worse because this particular society isn't built to accommodate him.

On another note, I have no idea what the in-universe economy is like in canon. The comics never really touch on it other then that there's an official currency, which is mobiums, and my best guess is that those equate to around the same value as US dollars since it's an American-published comic. Or at the very least because the kingdom/republic is located in the post-apocalyptic remnants of where America used to be. But again, they never really go into detail on it, so I'm flying blind in that regard and making it up as I go. The economy system, that is. Not the story itself. That's all planned out.

Chapter 64

A/N- I feel I should clarify that Sorun isn't outright racist against the echidna. At the same time he really, really doesn't like them. From his perspective some of the worst things that have happened to him were in the form of omnipotent sky echidna messing with his life, and a malicious god-echidna, and the crazy cyborg echidna he has to worry about now, as well as him just hearing how bad off their species is. It's to a point where Sorun just thinking the word "echidna" automatically makes him mentally associate their species with bad emotions because of his limited experience with them. It's less racism and more like a really strong, negative unconscious bias towards them.

So I guess in a way it kinda is racism. He'll make exceptions for ones he actually likes like Knuckles and Tikal, and it's not as bad to the point that he'd go out of his way to attack or even antagonize random echidna if he saw any, but otherwise he'd rather just not think about and avoid echidna.

Another thing I wanna talk about, which I was asked on by a few people, is time dilation between zones. So we all know Sonic got blasted hundreds of billions of lightyears away or whatever the insane distance was that one time, and time on Mobius passed by a year while it took him a few weeks to get back because of the wonky relationship light and time has with each other. That's due to distance in the same zone. At the same time there's multiple points in the comic where characters go to whole other zones, and the time that goes for them is completely linear with how long they're gone from their home zone. So, say, going from Mobius to Moebius didn't mean a few seconds on Moebius was a few minutes on Mobius or what have you. It's a second-to-second ratio. It was a linear progression of time. So we can extrapolate from this that the same amount of time Sorun spent on Mobius passed on Earth regardless of distances between zones.

Recursion Error

Episode 64- Sorun steals Tails' plane

Virgil wasn't a normal Chao. Indeed, he was fairly certain there wasn't a single Chao in all of Mobius quite like him. No, he knew for certain he was alone in what he was. He was... different. Unique. And he liked that aspect about himself. With that uniqueness came strength, the kind of strength he'd never imagined himself having when he was in his previous state. That state that failed to set him apart from every other unevolved Chao in the world. That weak state.

All because of his owner that was different from every other thing in this world. Much like him.

Inherently Chao were able to form bonds and connections with those that took them in due to their links with the Chaos Force. It was these links that allowed them to form bonds with others, should a Chao decide to follow them and that person chooses to care for them. It was the strength of that bond and the relationship between the Chao and their owners, as well as the owner's personality, their inclination towards positive or negative emotions, that dictated a Chao's evolution if the Chao was capable and the bond was strong enough.

Sorun was curious in Virgil's eyes because he didn't have a Chaos Force link, which shouldn't have been possible. Everything in the world did. But he didn't. And yet he'd also had Chaos Force powers, which, he'd later heard from listening to others, was a result of him absorbing Chaos Emeralds. A trait of his species, apparently, which was unique in that they were void of a link. Well, Sorun had saved his life and fed him apples, and at the time his Chao Garden and colony was entirely gone. So of course he'd latched onto the human and allowed him to be his owner. He'd even given him a name. From "someone cool" he'd been told.

That kind of relationship necessitated a bond, which had been difficult, because Sorun didn't have a link. He did have a soul, though, curiously enough. A strange, tiny, weak little thing that was little more than a spark of life piloting an organic body as opposed to the spirits every other living being on Mobius possessed. So small it was practically nonexistent. But it was there. And it was good enough for Virgil.

Time passed, and their bond grew, and through that bond Virgil was able to get a better reading of Sorun through that thing he called a soul. He'd learned about Sorun's inclination towards positivity or negativity: it was a confusing mess. He'd gravitate back and forth between being extremely aligned with dark emotions and being extremely aligned with light emotions. Rapidly. Every second of the day. He'd oscillate all over the spectrum, sometimes leaning to one side or the other in an extreme, other times being various mixes of the two. It was wholly different from how natives of Mobius acted. Alignments were never supposed to move all that much except for special circumstances. The Mobians Sorun was always around, for example, were all extremely aligned towards lighthearted emotions and feelings. Virgil felt it just by being near them. That funny little Overlander man Sorun liked punching was aligned with dark desires and emotions as another example. But Sorun was different in that he kept flowing back and forth, over and over, like his very being couldn't make up its mind on what it wanted to be. Or, perhaps more accurately, it desired to be both. Another complexity to his owner. Nothing on Mobius was supposed to do that.

When their bond was at its strongest, and thus prompted Virgil to undergo his evolution into what he was now, he'd been able to peer into Sorun's soul, or at least as much as it allowed him. Normally not something possible, but due to having to have bonded with a soul instead of a Chaos Force link, such things had become an unintended side effect. Much of a Chao's evolution depended on the preferences and alignment of who they were bonded with, but since Sorun's alignment was all over the place in its constant flux, he'd decided to peer at the surface of Sorun's soul and, as Sorun would put it, "wing it".

He was compelled in knowing more about who he was named after. The person Sorun looked up to that Virgil was named after. Vergil. The cool guy.

To that end, Virgil learned much through his bond with Sorun's soul. He'd seen the man and felt that Sorun held a great, great amount of respect and admiration for him, his ability, his power. And also that... he was a fictional character, apparently, but it was a moot point for Virgil as far as he was concerned. He'd seen a man different than Sorun, with white, slicked-back hair and a blue coat, carrying the same sword Sorun had used to carry. And then there would be flashes of blue lightning and a wave of blue energy particles, and when the light died down, it would be something completely different standing there. Where there had been a human was a different creature entirely. Coat tails had turned to folded wings, pale skin to blue and black scales, hardened hide and carapace, finger nails to sharpened claws, and the sword itself had fused completely with the creature's left arm.

But the most striking thing to Virgil had been the horns atop its head. Those shining, silver, cylindrical horns. Almost regal-looking in their design.

This was who Sorun had named him after. This being that radiated so much power just from memories inside of his owner's soul. So that was what he'd evolved into. Or some approximation of it, at the very least.

Sorun had approved when he saw his transformation, and Virgil himself had approved when he felt the power his evolution had granted him. That and the flood of memory and knowledge Virgil had gained when his connection to Sorun facilitated his evolution.

Another side effect of the soul-bond. His personality had completely shifted that day. For the better, as far as Virgil was concerned. He was more alert like this. More attentive. More... relaxed. Powerful. But relaxed. Calm. He could actually think clearly with his newfound intelligence.

And power. So much power he could hardly believe it. Enough that Sorun no longer had to call him too weak to fight and could bring him along on the fights he went on. He even did, once, when Virgil had prodded enough. It'd been a good day.

And with that evolution came a strengthened bond, and Virgil realized just how much his owner was suffering. He'd often be in a haze of negative emotions. Some days had been easier than others, some worse, to the point Virgil had always intensely worried for him, for Sorun, for the person that saved his life and gifted him this form. But Sorun would always act fine around him and the other Mobians, which greatly confused Virgil. He couldn't understand why Sorun would hide how he felt until he'd told him directly he simply didn't want to concern them.

Personally Virgil hadn't agreed with the logic, but Sorun was his owner, so he hadn't complained and just went along with it, acting like all was normal alongside Sorun.

He'd felt he'd made a mistake when he felt the bond between him and Sorun sever when the human died. It'd been a shock to the Chao, feeling that bond intertwined with his own soul suddenly vanish like that. Virgil had known the implications immediately and had mourned in his own silent way. Some part of him knew that Sorun knew he was dying, which was probably why he'd left him to the rabbit Mobian and her Chao.

She was alright. Nice. Bit too nice for Virgil's taste, too caring and touchy-feely, but there were worse owners.

Cheese was a punk.

Sorun had come back, though, which Virgil had felt when the bond suddenly reappeared. And for the first time since Virgil met Sorun he felt... happy. Normal. How he should feel, and his alignment was more steady and slowly but surely drifting towards the light. He was sad to hear his owner, his true owner that saw Virgil as an equal and not a pet, was leaving once more, but as long as it meant Sorun's soul continued to remain at the peace it was in now, he'd understand. At least it meant he got to stay with the nice rabbit girl and continue to prove his superiority to that unevolved Chao weakling with the stupid bowtie.

He hated that bowtie. Virgil didn't know why. He suspected it was that color. Red. He didn't like red.

But then Sorun's home turned out to be lost, and his alignment was once more in flux, now more wild than ever. Beyond that he was feelings emotional depths Virgil himself didn't even know was possible. Levels of despair and hopelessness that, frankly, made the Chao uncomfortable. But he'd endure it, for his owner's sake. Because he knew he was only feeling a fraction of what Sorun was feeling, and he had to wonder how he could keep living feeling like that all the time.

This was probably why the matriarch of the rabbit child had talked with Virgil and pleaded with him to keep an eye on Sorun, as apparently his owner was starving himself and was unmotivated to support himself. His friends would find out eventually, and failing that, Virgil himself would just tell them. Or failing that bring them back to the house to show them his sorry state. But they'd wanted to give Sorun a chance in the hope that he'd be able to pull himself together to avoid worrying his friends, for Sorun's sake. Virgil felt it was the least Sorun was owed. A chance to pick himself up.

Well, he didn't. Days after that dinner and Virgil's relocation to his true owner lead to this. Sorun passed out on the couch. Empty bottles of that Chao-Cola soda he had a pension for strewn about on the floor, as he'd given up on acquiring food and spent the little money he had left on the sodas. He was completely out of food. And the nice disappearing lady Sorun really liked was nowhere in sight.

Floating right next to the sleeping human, Virgil sighed. Well, he'd given him a chance. It was time to fetch the others so they could get Sorun to his senses. Just because his owner was fine with starving didn't mean he was, and he wanted his apples.

Virgil liked the things Sorun likes and disliked things Sorun dislikes. A consequence of the bond they shared and Virgil being able to sense Sorun's emotions along with him having similar tastes to Sorun.

The disappearing computer lady, for example. Sometimes to Virgil it felt like Sorun was a completely different person when he was near her. The negative emotions would fade, and positives would swell, and his alignment would temporarily stabilize and hover towards the lighter side. And he felt... strange, too. Strange in a good way Virgil couldn't describe, or even understand. But it was a nice feeling that only ever came with the nice disappearing lady. And Sorun liked her very, very deeply. So Virgil liked her. Enough that she was the only one aside from Sorun allowed to pick him up and handle him.

The blue hedgehog, whose home Virgil was floating to now. He didn't like him. Sorun didn't, either. Interactions with him had often left Sorun with feelings of envy. Jealously. Loathing. Scorn. And alongside that was a driving need Sorun had that screamed at him, demanded him, to be better than the very fast hedgehog. Feelings he could never satiate because he'd never accomplished such a thing. These feelings had faded over time, of course, muted nowadays as Sorun was more friendly with the hedgehog and liked him. But those feelings remained under the surface.

Virgil... tolerated him, since Sorun liked him now.

"Alright, guys, I'm off- AH!" The door to the house opened just as Sonic opened it. He'd only taken a step out before he saw Virgil and then leapt back in fright, his arms held defensively in front of him. "Oh, uh... Virgy. Hey there."

"Chao..." The hedgehog was fortunate Virgil wasn't strong enough to wound him.

"I heard you were livin' back with Sorun? Good for him, he, uh... kinda needs the company right now, I think," Sonic said. "Hoo, man, I'm still really worried about him. Glad you're here, though. Sheesh, if I'da known a pet was all it'd take to mellow him out I would have got him a Chao his first week here. You really did help calming him down those days, y'know?"

Virgil was aware. He wasn't here to reminisce. He needed Sonic's help. "Chao. Chao-chao."

"Huh? Hey, no." He had the audacity to try and swat Virgil away when he floated near. "I ain't got time to play, Virgil."

"Chao- chao ." As loath as he was to admit it, Virgil needed the hedgehog. Unfortunately he didn't seem to understand the severity of the situation.

Curse his inability to form the words they used to communicate.

"Virgil, seriously, let go!" Sonic cried out as Virgil began pulling on his ears. He tried reaching up to grab at the Chao, to no avail. "I'm warnin' ya!"

"Chao!"

"Alright, you asked for it!"

The hedgehog was fast. Too fast for Virgil to hold onto. And after he'd transitioned to a speed that forced Virgil to let go, he disappeared from his sight.

Well, good riddance. He had other friends of Sorun's he could try. Friends Virgil could certainly tolerate much better than the hedgehog. Like the chipmunk. Or that coyote with the stupid hair that talked funny. And as it happened Virgil encountered that coyote while wandering around looking for Sorun's friends.

"Non, non, release me at once, you fiend!"

He wasn't very cooperative, though. Not for a lack of Virgil trying. Words didn't work because he didn't possess words. Gestures didn't work because the coyote, and Sonic apparently, confused it for him vying for attention, as if he needed such a thing. So action was the only solution Virgil sought.

Except pulling on the coyote's hair wasn't working, either.

"Alright, now. Calm down little feller." Cold, metal fingers grasped around Virgil's torso and lifted him off the Mobian's head. He turned his head to see a metal arm attached to the rabbit - the one that spoke weird - extending her arm out towards him. "Yer gonna pull his hair out if ya keep doin' that, Virgil."

Good. He should be thankful to Virgil for removing it. That thing was atrocious. It had to be if Sorun didn't like it.

"Now, if ah let ya go, ya promise not to attack mah husband again?"

She'd retracted her mechanical arm back to its normal length midway through her sentence. Virgil, of course, nodded at her. She sent him a cautious look as a result, but still believed him and opened her hand to free the Chao.

And then he flew up and began tugging at her ears.

"Gosh darnit, Virgil!"

"Chao! Chao!"

He'd been pulled away by her hand again. Roughly. Green eyes bore into his own blue, and the rabbit didn't look too pleased with the Chao's actions. He didn't care. He did care that she didn't seem too cooperative despite his best efforts. He couldn't understand why they didn't see how urgent he was.

"Jus'... go home, wouldja?" The rabbit asked as she released Virgil, though she seemed much more guarded now in case Virgil tried attacking her again. "We got important things tah be doin' today. We ain't got time fer your tomfoolery."

"Oui, and tell Sorun to be keeping a better eye on you," the coyote added, still rubbing at the top of his head Virgil had been pulling at.

"Chao!" Sorun was the whole reason he was here in the first place!

"Do not be taking zat tone with moi! Eet was my zinking zat Sorun taught you bettair manners zan zis."

Virgil rushed the coyote and began pulling his hair again.

"Bunnie, help! Help!"

"That tears it!" Once again Virgil felt metal fingers grasp around him. The rabbit looked much more upset now. "One more little outburst like that and we're headin' straight to Sorun. Now leave us alone."

Maybe he should keep attacking them. Them going to Sorun was what he wanted. He didn't care what happened afterwards, and Sorun would understand. Probably.

Well, he wouldn't, but it was still for his own good.

Except Virgil never got that chance. Because the rabbit had extended her arm far away from the couple's home, a whole ten meters, and deposited Virgil right in the air. Any thoughts of returning to gain their ire and lure them to Sorun's home was stunted when he caught the glare the half-robot rabbit was sending him.

Perhaps he'd have an easier time trying somewhere else. Sorun had other friends. Friends that weren't as fast and couldn't handle Virgil with a robot arm. He would have sliced that arm to pieces if he didn't know that Sorun wouldn't have been so forgiving to that kind of retaliation. But there were other friends he had a better chance with.

Where was the annoying pink one?

Pink one hadn't worked. All Virgil got for his efforts, in which he'd been slicing cuts into her dress, was the pink hedgehog screeching and swinging her hammer at him. He'd gotten her attention, yes. But she wouldn't follow him. She'd just kept trying to hit him with the hammer whenever he got close. A no-go.

The chipmunk Sorun liked wasn't an option. Virgil didn't want to gain her ire, both out of respect for her and fear. She was... built different from the others, he felt. More commanding, authoritative. And the wisdom gained from the bond Virgil had with Sorun told him not to mess with that. Besides. She was kind and nice, and Sorun had a lot of respect for her. Virgil let her touch him on occasion as a result. Not hold. But touch was okay.

He was aware that the fat, purple walrus had a back injury. Virgil didn't find use in attacking a defenseless, weakened Mobian. And Sorun wouldn't think attacking the crippled was cool.

The yellow fox? Certainly an option. Sorun's feelings with the two-tailed Mobian were mixed. Sorun had dark feelings around him the same he had with Sonic, though the feelings he had towards the fox were more malicious. Subdued and dulled these days, hidden by happy emotions associated with the friendship the fox shared with Sorun. The same case with the negative emotions he felt towards Sonic, and like those emotions, that animosity Sorun had for the fox remained in Virgil's owner. Muted, but still there. So he didn't like him very much. So he seemed perfect to annoy and lure to Sorun's home so he could finally find some help for his owner.

Too bad he couldn't find him.

The rabbits that had cared for him? He didn't want the mother to know Virgil was failing in his task of looking after Sorun. In front of their Chao. That unevolved one, Cheese. That was a weakness he refused to show in front of him. He had to remain superior to his fellow Chao at all times he felt. To prove he was better. And he and his owner, the rabbit girl, were inseparable. Any news he gave the mother would certainly reach the child, and thus, the Chao.

No. He couldn't go to them.

What to do? Nobody would follow him back to Sorun. The computer lady, Nicole, would eventually learn of Sorun's state when she visited again, so Virgil wasn't wholly worried. It was a matter that would resolve itself if he didn't. At the same time he wanted this solved sooner rather than later, for worry of Sorun. Who was probably still passed out on that couch.

If only that black and red hedgehog was still around. Shadow. They were similar in a lot of ways, him and Sorun. Virgil felt it, saw it. He would have understood Sorun's plight, and probably would have followed Virgil without him even having to lift a hand to gain his attention. But he'd left for somewhere. The only other person Virgil was aware of who had a ever-shifting alignment. Not nearly as wild, varied, or extreme as Sorun's. But still shifting nonetheless. The two understood each other, even if they didn't know it. They were both oddities.

During Virgil's silent contemplations, where he'd been aimlessly floating down the street, he'd seen a pair of people walking down the street. A yellow-furred pair of Mobians, a male and a female. He didn't know the male, but the female one with the purple hair spilling over her shoulders was recognized by him. She was... that one singer Sorun and Nicole took Virgil out to see that one time. They'd never got to hear her sing, though, because of the incident caused by that fat Overlander Virgil felt that Sorun hated . Virgil had been disappointed the concert had been cancelled, and Virgil felt that Sorun had been disappointed as well that they'd missed out on her music. And then Virgil had felt Sorun became doubly disappointed when he realized Nicole hadn't been able to hear her sing, either. Triply so, even.

Well... Sorun was on friendly terms with the singer. They weren't friends by any margin, at least from Sorun's perspective, but they were still friendly. Virgil knew that much. On the other hand, she was hardly somebody Virgil thought appropriate to show Sorun to. And yet... his options were limited. There was nobody better the Chao could think of.

Far from perfect, but it would have to do.

"How long are you going to fiddle around with that thing, Ash?" he heard the female yellow Mobian ask as Virgil floated towards them. The male yellow one had and object in his hands. A cube made of smaller, colored cubes, Virgil observed. One constructed in a way that sides of the cube could be turned and shifted around. The male seem intensely focused on it.

"I'm gonna figure it out," the male mumbled, "just gimme a sec."

The female shook her head. "I don't understand why you bought that. You've been at it for hours- oh!"

Both she and the male had stopped when they saw Virgil floating directly in their path. He regarded the surprised Mobians with a neutral face, his mind wondering what he was to do to gain their attention. Hair pulling and cutting hadn't been working out so well so far, and he couldn't afford to mess this one up like the others. He needed to bring them back to Sorun.

"Um... what's that?" the yellow male asked.

"That's... oh, I know you!" the purple-haired Mobian exclaimed. "That's Sorun's pet Chao! I forget his name, though," she said. "I think it started with a V, but... hm, I'm not too sure..."

While they were conversing among themselves, Virgil looked down at the odd cube in the male's hands. He seemed attached to it, somewhat at least.

... An idea formed.

"- Orun? Err... Sorun? Sorun...?"

With a groggy groan, Sorun opened his eyes. He'd been having a relatively peaceful sleep for once until he heard someone call his voice out while also poking him awake. No dreams, but no nightmares, either. Which as far as he was concerned was the best sleep he got in a long while until somebody chose to wake him up.

His ceiling greeted him. His living room ceiling, and not his bedroom ceiling. Why was- right, the couch. He'd fallen asleep on it while lamenting he'd drank the last of his soda and ran out of food finally, and that he had no way of fixing it. He assumed it was Nicole waking him up, finally realizing something was wrong, and Sorun was left wondering how he was gonna survive facing the music.

... Sorun didn't recall Nicole having yellow fur and purple hair.

"What the- wha- Mina?" He just barely managed to recognize her, but he remembered her as being a Mobian he was vaguely acquainted with. The singer. He remembered her having been rather pleasant, sent him a card once if he recalled, but they never spoke that much outside of that and the whole concert fiasco. He didn't know why she was standing next to his couch right now. Or even how she knew he lived here. Or why she was intruding in his home for that matter and waking him up. "What are you- huh?"

As he sat up in a sitting position on the couch, he recognized another Mobian standing to the side of the couch and looking at Sorun. Another yellow mongoose like Mina, but male and black-haired. What drew Sorun's attention though was that this Mobian was dressed . Jacket, jeans and all. The most dressed Sorun had even seen a Mobian. He even had a pair of dopey, red hippie shades.

"Wow, that's... you have pants," Sorun commented, making both mongooses give him odd looks. "You're the only Mobian I've ever seen wear jeans. I didn't even know jeans existed here. Who are you?"

"Um, this is Ash. He's my manager. And boyfriend," Mina introduced, her voice going a bit shy at the last part. Ash, in response, waved at Sorun in uncertainty.

"... Hey." Sorun nodded at Ash and turned back to Mina. "What are you two doing in my house?"

He felt he should have been slightly more alarmed at the two intruders inside his home, but at the moment Sorun couldn't really find it in himself to care all that much. Besides, he knew Mina... meh, reasonably well. And the boyfriend guy seemed alright. Had to be if he had pants on. He'd still like to know why a person he barely ever interacted with and her boyfriend broke into his home, though.

"Really should start locking that door..."

"Well, it's your pet Chao," Mina informed him, making Sorun tilt his head questioningly at her. "He stole something of Ash's and flew all the way here. We chased him here, and after we saw you sleeping here we got worried." She looked up a bit, over Sorun's shoulder. He followed her gaze and saw Virgil floating right behind him with an object clutched in his arms. "I'm surprised he was even able to outrun me."

"Eh, Virgil's special," Sorun said, though he kept his eyes on the Chao with a small frown on his face. Virgil met his glare with a scowl, causing both of them to scoff. "Bastard finally tried ratting me out," he thought as he looked at the object in- wait. "Is... is that a Rubik's Cube?" he asked, seeing the colorful, mismatched puzzle cube held in the Chao's hands. "You guys have Rubik's Cubes here?" Sorun asked as he turned back to Mina.

"Um... it's just a puzzle cube Ash bought from the market," Mina explained as Sorun took the cube from his pet Chao.

"Yeah," Ash continued, "you're supposed to turn all the sides 'til the colors on the sides are all the same. Pretty sure it's impossible. I bought it with all the colors mixed up and I haven't been able to figure it out."

"Mmh." Sorun's fingers began to rapidly spin the sides of the cube around. While he did this, he looked back up at Mina. "I'm sorry about Virgil's behavior, Mina. He's usually more well-behaved than that."

"It's fine, Sorun. No harm done." The female mongoose began to glance around the house they were in as Sorun continued turning the cube's sides. A concerned expression began to slowly etch over her features. "So... this is your house, Sorun?" She looked back at him. "It's... a bit dreary..."

"Haven't bothered decorating."

"I see..." She glanced towards the kitchen. Empty glass soda bottles and other pieces of trash littered the floor. "Um, Sorun?" Mina asked. "Are you doing okay?"

"Yeah, fine. Solved it." Sorun announced, reaching over to place the puzzle cube in Ash's hands. All the sides were solved, the sight stunning both Mina and Ash, with the latter proceeding to turn the cube's sides and mix the colors up again.

Mina got over her own surprise at seeing the puzzle solved as quickly as Ash had, and then focused back on Sorun. "Are you sure you're alright?" she asked the human. "I heard through Sonic what happened with your home zone. It sounds awful, what happened..."

"Yeah. Hey, can you do that again?" Ash asked, offering Sorun back the puzzle cube with the sides all mixed up again.

"Ash!" Mina shouted, admonishing the other mongoose's behavior and causing him to flinch back as Sorun took the cube.

"Ash is fine," Sorun assured Mina as he began turning the cube's sides again, causing her to calm down. "I wouldn't say I'm... I... I don't really know, Mina," he admitted to her. "It just really blindsided me. How was I supposed to know I was coming back to that ? There weren't any warning signs of something like that happening before I left. None. And I don't- oh, here." With the cube once again solved, Sorun deposited it back into Ash's hands. The male mongoose's shock only lasted a few seconds before he furiously began mixing the colors up again.

"I just... I kind of want to go back," Sorun continued after handing the cube off. "I really find it hard to believe somebody finally went far enough to fire off the nuclear missiles. In fact, I don't believe it. I want to go back and figure out what really happened. Try and piece together if it was some giant accident or mistake, or if it really was a meteor or something, anything . Anything other than that." Sorun sighed. "But the only way for me to go back is using all the Emeralds, and I can only go to that one specific spot. And the others would never let me go back since the radiation levels there are deadly and they wouldn't have a reliable way of organizing me a way back here. They won't even collect the Emeralds for me again."

Skeptical. He was so skeptical humanity on Earth killed itself with nuclear war, because Sorun just couldn't believe anything would cause things to come to that. It wasn't impossible; he wasn't that naïve. He did recognize it was a possibility. At the same time he had a hard time believing it would happen with things having been so well at the time he left. And it was bugging him to no end that he knew so little of what happened. If only there was some way he could pop over there for a bit and then come back...

Sorun was dragged from his thoughts when the Rubik's Cube was practically shoved into his face again by Ash, once again scrambled. He didn't know why he kept making him solve it, but he still shrugged and began rotating the sides as he watched Mina open her mouth to speak again.

"It just must be so awful for you. Is there anything we can do to help?"

"Hmm." Sorun hummed out in thought as he continued rotating the cube's sides. "I don't really wanna impose, but if you happen to have any spare sodas lying around I'll take those."

"... Sodas?" Mina repeated, sounding more confused than anything at the request.

"I like them. They remind me of home. Here, Ash." Sorun tossed the solved cube back to Ash. He caught in out of the air, looking one part disbelieving and one part frustrated.

"How do you keep doing that!?" Ash angrily hissed as he glared at the puzzle cube. "I was trying to solve this thing for hours and you're doing it in seconds!"

Sorun shrugged. "We had them back in my zone. I looked up the formula on how to solve one, and then I did it 'cause I was bored one day."

"There's a formula for solving this thing?" Ash asked as he looked back at Sorun. "That's the trick?"

"Yeah, it's, like... super long and complicated, but once I did it I was able to memorize it."

"Huh? Really? You a brainiac or something?"

Sorun shook his head. "Nah, I... I've always just perfectly remembered how to do things with my hands." He rose his two hands up in front of his face. "Like, if I do things with my hands it... I dunno how to describe it, it's just easy to remember the movements and patterns and stuff. How do you think I'm able to pull off consistent frame-perfects in games?"

Ash gave him an odd look. "I didn't understand a single word in that question you asked me."

The look Sorun gave back to the mongoose was one full of disappointment and disgust. "... Why am I even talking to you, then?"

While the two conversed, Mina had tiltered her head down as she thought on Sorun's request. And then, in a outburst so sudden she's startled Sorun, Ash, and Virgil, she'd shouted, "Oh, wait!"

Mina's head had lifted up as if she just realized something. She turned around and bolted out of the house right after, at a speed that was too fast for Sorun to keep up with. He blinked in surprise as the mongoose departed, and then looked to the side at the other mongoose, who was staring at Sorun awkwardly with the cube still held in his hands.

"..."

"..."

"... So what's it like dating an idol?" Sorun asked in an effort to relieve the settling tension.

"It's, uh... great, I guess." Ash began to nervously turn the cube around in his hands as the two continued to uncomfortably look at each other. "She's nice, you know?"

"Mm." Didn't really tell Sorun much since most Mobians were generally nice, but alright. "Out of curiosity how'd you two start dating?"

Ash grew a bit more uncomfortable. "Whhhhy are you asking?"

"Come on, man, I helped solve your cube. You can't humor a guy after he does a solid for you?" Ash seemed to accept the logic with a reluctant nod, prompting Sorun to continue. "I'm just a bit curious is all. Like, did you just ask? Is that how it works?"

The Mobian honestly looked like he didn't want to answer, and Sorun saw he kept glancing at the empty doorway Mina had sprinted out of, looking like he was cursing her for leaving him alone with Sorun in this situation. Sorun couldn't tell was was making the poor mongoose more uncomfortable: being left with a complete stranger and a cube thief or the dating question. "I don't know, man, we worked together for a long time and got along great so I just worked up the nerves one day-"

"So it was you?" Sorun pressed. "You initiated it? It's totally okay if the guy asks? That's how dating works?"

"I don't- it worked for- we just met, why are you asking-!?"

"I'm back!" At hearing Mina's voice accompanying the rapid sound of footfalls suddenly ceasing, Sorun turned back forwards. She was indeed there again, and holding something out to Sorun. He blinked at it in confusion, and then gently took it from her so he could examine it.

... It was a small, cardboard case that had three glass bottles of grape soda in it. And a spot for a fourth bottle was missing.

"It was a gift I got from a fan during a world tour me and the band were doing," Mina elaborated when Sorun looked up at her with a questioning look. "I just realized I never really got to thank you for the whole concert thing anyways, so since you like these kinds of things I figured you could have it! You know, as a get-well present."

"Uh... thanks...?" Seemed like the most random thing to Sorun. When he glanced to the side at Ash, though, he didn't even look the least bit surprised at the sudden, spontaneous gift. He looked tired, actually. Must have been a weird quirk of hers or something. "Grape soda?" Sorun asked when he looked back at the bottles.

Mina nodded. "Mhm. I tried one and didn't really like it. And that tour was... gosh, almost a year ago now, I think. It's just kinda been sitting in a cabinet back at our studio."

"Ah. Year-old grape soda," Sorun deadpanned. "Thanks, Mina. It's just what I needed to overcome starvation." He'd still drink it, of course. If only because he didn't want to waste soda. Was probably gonna be the flattest soda in existence, too, but he'd still go for it.

"... Starvation?" Sorun felt his stomach drop when he heard Mina repeat that word, after which he mentally cursed himself for the verbal slip. "I, um... was actually looking in your kitchen and noticed it looked a bit... well, sparse."

"How the hell could she- oh, goddammit, I left the fridge open."

"Sorun?" Mina looked back at him, looking significantly more concerned than previously. "Why don't you have any food?"

"Ah, yeah. That." He cleared his throat to try and put her at ease. It didn't work. "I can't get a job. So I'm broke and starving."

Concern was mounting at an alarming rate. "And... what's your plan for that...?"

"I mean, nothing, really. I kinda just gave up."

Probably wasn't the best idea to be flat-out telling Mina all this, but from how Sorun was seeing it, she pretty much had him cornered thanks to Virgil bringing her here. She saw all the lack of food in the kitchen. And if she noticed, then it was basically a guarantee Nicole was gonna notice when she came to visit him again.

He was hosed. Utterly and completely. He might as well give it one last hail mary, though, just in case.

"Hey, Mina? I'm grateful for the soda and all, but can you do me a favor and not tell anybody I'm kind of starving?"

"N-no! Of course not!" she exclaimed, making Sorun sigh loudly. "Sorun, you can't just sit here wasting away like this! Why can't you get a job?"

"I'm a flimsy human in a city full of people so superior to me in physical ability that the children can bench press me. And also there aren't that many jobs. And I'm uneducated," Sorun said. "My opportunities ain't even slim. They're nonexistent."

Both Mina and Ash cringed a bit in understanding. "Couldn't you ask somebody for help?" Mina asked in a softer tone. "You're friends with Sally, and she's connected with everybody in the city. I'm sure she could find you something. I mean, her brother's the king!"

"Yeah, Mina, I could, but then it's not just my problem anymore. It's other people's problems, and I don't wanna drag people into my problems," Sorun told her. "All my friends are busy balancing their lives and the whole Freedom Fighter thing. I don't wanna bother 'em because Sorun, that one inconvenience in their lives they have to deal with, has another problem they gotta bail him out of."

"I think you're selling yourself too short, dude," Ash commented from the side. "Just talk to them about this. Sometimes in life asking for help is more humble than trying to do things on your own."

"Man, what do you know? You can't even solve a Rubik's Cube," Sorun scoffed. "No. I ain't doin' it. I'd rather starve than bug someone with this. Which is exactly what I'm doing."

Mina made an uncomfortable sound and kicked at her feet. She didn't look agreeing with Sorun at all. More worryingly, she looked like she wanted to help with that sympathetic look she had on. "What if we just told someone for you?"

"I'd rather you didn't."

"But it solves everything, doesn't it?" Mina asked him. And to Sorun's horror, a smile began to break out on her face. "If I go tell Sally she can find a way to help you and then you don't have to worry about stressing her out since I'm the one that told her!"

Ah, his one fear of something happening. Exactly this. "That's the most backwards logic- Mina, wait-"

But it was too late. She looked like her mind was made up. "Don't worry, Sorun. I'll go talk to her and we'll get this all sorted out." She started to make towards the exit of the house, her torso still turned to Sorun as she waved at him. "I'll go find her right now, even! You don't have to worry about a thing!"

It was with a blank, deadpan stare that Sorun watched Mina leave. Ash was right behind her, casting Sorun one last glance as he nervously turned one of the sides of the cube back and forth. "Yeah, that's Mina for you," he mumbled. "Uh, look, sorry about the soda thing, Sorun, she's... kinda random like that sometimes."

"Hah, I'm not really complaining," Sorun said as he lifted the case. "Don't suppose I can convince you to convince Mina to keep my poverty a secret?"

He wasn't surprised when Ash shook his head. "Yeah, I don't really wanna do that. Mina'd be mad at me. Plus you really look like you need help, man."

Sorun gave Ash a firm nod. "You're a good man, Ash. Now get out of my house."

He did so, snorting lightly in the process. It was when the door closed behind him that Sorun slumped in the couch as Virgil floated closer to him, with one hand rubbing across his face as the other continued to hold the grape sodas.

In a turn of events that didn't even go to surprise Sorun, he'd been made. And now his friends were gonna know what was going on with him. He predicted he wouldn't even make it to the morning before he started getting concerned knocks at his door. And now he had to live with inconveniencing everybody once again. And he'd knew they'd try and help him, too. They were too nice not to.

"I hope you're happy with yourself," Sorun snapped as he turned to Virgil. "Now everybody's gonna know I'm a loser than can't take care of himself."

Virgil made an uncaring shrug. "Chao."

"You're just happy 'cause now you don't have to starve along with me!" Sorun exclaimed.

The blank look Virgil sent him said it all.

"Ugh." Sighing, Sorun pulled out one of the bottles from the cardboard case. "Guess there's nothing left to do but wait for the end credits on this horrible chapter of my life. One among many." He pulled the cap off the top of the bottle, and then leaned back a bit in surprise when he heard a small hiss! escape the bottle. He brought it to his nose and sniffed it, acknowledging that, yes, it was grape. Grape and a hint of something else he couldn't make out. Blinking down at it, Sorun made a shrug and decided to go for it.

It was actually surprisingly good.

"Wow, that tastes purple," Sorun commented as he pulled the bottle away from his lips. "Mina's crazy. This stuff is great." He smacked his lips. "It's got a really weird aftertaste, though. Eh."

A small hiccup escaped from Sorun. He ignored it and went on to continue drinking from the bottle as Virgil watched on.

Virgil was fairly certain this wasn't normal behavior.

It started happening after Sorun finished drinking a single bottle of that purple stuff Mina had gifted him. Or maybe even a bit before that. He'd gone... weird, simply put. Virgil could feel through their mind Sorun's mind go fuzzy and blurred, like he was... well, Virgil wasn't rightly sure how to describe it. He just felt wrong.

And then he stumbled out of the house, and Virgil was forced to follow him. Night had just fallen over the city a few minutes prior, so nobody was out to see Sorun walk all funny-like through the streets, much to the Chao's chagrin. Something had to be wrong with him; he'd seen Sorun walk, and he most certainly didn't walk around like that. Like he was fit to fall over on the ground at any second.

"It'sh all... it'sh alwaysh the same thing," Sorun slurred out, the case with two remaining bottles still clutched in his left hand as he continued walking along the streets. "Erryone's gotta be so amazin' an' great at everythin', an' I get left in the dusht like... like the loser I am. Can't do anything on my own 'thout needin' help from someone, like a parasite." He wobbled on his feet a bit. "Man choose, obey slave, golf... where- House, where are ya, I got the club an' I need the xp!"

He was fairly certain Sorun didn't talk like that, either.

On the one hand, Virgil was extremely concerned about this strange state Sorun was in and wanted to go find someone to help. On the other hand, it was freshly nighttime, nobody was around, and Virgil really didn't want to leave Sorun unattended while he was like this. So he was stuck with following him, hoping nothing bad would happen.

Like Sorun wandering towards the airfield.

That probably constituted as something bad happening.

On its own, probably not a good sign. But then he started to move towards the hangar, and Virgil was aware that the hangar was where the flying machines were kept. Like that blue biplane the flying fox used. And the really big ship the others would pile in sometimes. And Sorun was stumbling right inside there. Maybe he was just wandering around aimlessly, maybe he just happened to walk in here by mere chance, he didn't feel like he had all his faculties in check so perhaps-

Oh, he was beginning to climb up on the biplane.

"Chao-chao." Making very annoyed and worried sounds, Virgil flew up behind Sorun and tried tugging him back by pulling on the collar of his shirt. But, alas, while he was quicker than most, or more likely all Chao, and the blades on his arms were sharp enough to cut through the toughest of metal... Virgil's strength didn't seem to be enough to pull the human off from the plane. In fact, he'd ignored Virgil entirely and sat right down in the pilot's seat.

"Call me a bad pilot..." Sorun set down the case of bottles at his side and began reaching for the controls. "Gonna show you all I ain't worthless..."

It appeared Sorun was trying to start the plane. And succeeding, it seemed, because he was pressing buttons and dials and switches and lights were beginning to turn on. And to Virgil's mounting worry the plane was shaking to life.

"'Member how to do this," Sorun mumbled as he gripped the throttle. "Pitch and... pitch'n law, yeah."

"C-chao-chao..." When the plane began moving forwards on its wheels after the propeller began spinning, Virgil meekly sat down in the seat right next to Sorun. It didn't look like there was getting out of it now. Sorun was steering the plane and Virgil didn't know how to stop it outside of cutting the plane itself apart. He even considered it, but refrained from doing so in fear of that propeller and how fast it was spinning.

The plane made it out onto the runway. When it began to drive down that runway, Virgil began to fidget in his seat right next to Sorun while trying to avoid panicking. And Sorun, meanwhile, didn't even look like he was focusing on anything as he continued steering the plane. He looked half-asleep if anything.

And then they took off to the sky, resulting in Virgil deeply regretting not having cut the plane apart before Sorun even stepped foot in it.

There were only two notable things Sorun could pay attention to upon waking up. One was the splitting headache he felt. His eyes weren't even open and he could feel he was sprawled out on something... something soft and course at the same time, but he didn't need to see to feel that sensation in his head. Like somebody was trying to drive an icepick through his forehead. He didn't know why he felt like this, because when he reached up and felt at his forehead it felt fine, but the throbbing pain in his head was almost unbearable. Ebbing away slowly, thankfully, but still too intense for his comfort.

The second thing he noticed was the gentle sound of softly-crashing waves.

By now, he'd chosen to open his eyes. He outwardly groaned and covered his face from the harsh sunlight beaming down on him, which only intensified his headache, and had to stay there for whole minutes before he could finally sit up. Sorun then heavily began blinking his eyes a few times to try and clear the blurriness from his vision, and after a bit he began to get his perception back and see what was in front of him.

Ah, that's why he heard the sound of waves. He was on a beach.

"..." Sorun looked down. He was indeed sitting on sand. When he looked up, ocean. Nothing but endless blue ocean in front of him. He blinked a couple more times, and then looked behind him. Just behind where he was sitting was some foliage and a few palm trees, but past all that he saw another beach and the continuation of the ocean behind him.

So not a beach, then. An island. A really small island. An island in the middle of the ocean he appeared to be stranded on.

Something off to the side drew Sorun's attention. A few meters away from him was the wreckage of what was once a blue biplane. Tails' plane, which he only recognized due to the tail of the plane sticking up from the wreckage with one of the fins snapped off, with Tails' logo just barely visible on the side. There were some bits and pieces in the pile of rubble that once upon a time could have been a plane, but now it was less a vehicle and more a pile of scrap. Virgil was sitting on top of the pile, arms crossed as he glared at Sorun with narrowed eyes.

Sorun, ever unflappable in the face of such adversity, looked back forwards at the ocean.

"Huh."

Chapter 65

Recursion Error

Episode 65- That's not how it works

"You know, maybe this is just the fresh start we need. Island life! Some time to ourselves to sort through our head." Sorun, who stood at the edge of the island's beach, bent down to pick up an imaginary stone and made a show of skipping it across the water in front of him. "In the grand scheme of things this most recent fuckup of yours may not be the worst fuckup yet."

Besides Sorun sat Sorun, who was sitting down on the sand and watching the waves crash against the beach. Over and over, receding and rushing forwards over the sand. Again and again.

"That being said we should probably be thinking of a way to get out of here," the standing Sorun continued as he threw another imaginary rock. "'Cause we're gonna die of thirst in a couple days if we don't. I predict we have roughly fifty hours before sea madness takes over and you attempt to drink the ocean, after which we die." He glanced down at the sitting Sorun. "You'd probably like that, wouldn't you? Us dying so we don't have to deal with this bullshit anymore. The bullshit that is life on Mobius!" A third invisible stone skip.

The sitting Sorun ignored that remark, and then spoke out while continuing to stare at the water. "How'd we even end up here?" he hollowly mumbled.

"Hell if I know. One second we're drinking that purple soda Mina gave us, and the next second we wake up on a deserted island in the middle of the Pacific Ocean. Atlantic Ocean?" The standing

Sorun took a quick glance around. "Damn, are those names even applicable in this world? Is it just 'the ocean' here?"

He couldn't make sense of how he wound up on this island with Virgil. In Tails' destroyed plane. Did... did he drive it here? Why? Why here of all places? Why was he even in the plane to begin with? Why didn't he remember?

None of it made sense. At least the headache finally faded away.

Sighing, Sorun stood up. "You think the transponder in the plane still works?" he asked Sorun.

"In that slag heap?" Glancing back at the destroyed remains of the plane, Sorun shook his head and faced back to Sorun. "Super doubtful. That thing looks like it took a nosedive right into the island going max speed. I'm still trying to figure out how we didn't end up getting mangled if we're really the ones that drove it here."

"Well, then I don't see what we can do," Sorun said in a plain tone. "We don't have a way to call for help and no way off the island."

Sorun made a sigh. "Can you knock it off for five minutes?" he tiredly asked him. "You're seriously gonna give it up at minute one? Really ? You could at least pretend to put effort in!"

"Maybe I don't want to," Sorun snapped back at Sorun. "Maybe I'd rather bury my head in the sand and not bother."

"Well, hey, there's the sand right there." Sorun pointed at the beach. "Get to buryin'."

He couldn't really tell why Sorun was acting like this. Ever since he'd woken up Virgil had just been sitting on the remains of the flying machine, watching him. He'd had a vacant, uncaring look the entire time, just slightly confused, and after looking around a bunch he'd just faced forwards at the ocean for twenty minutes mumbling to himself.

And now he was pacing back and forth, seemingly arguing with himself.

"Why do you have to be like this? It's always poor me, woe is me, but you'd rather just sit there and mope than do anything about it! I did do something about it, what, you weren't there when I was walking around from place to place trying to get a job somewhere!? You gave up on the first day! We got turned down ten times!" He was pacing back and forth in the sand, hands in his hair with his eyes facing down at his feet. "It's your fault we're in this mess in the first place! Oh, oh, it's my fault!? Suddenly everything's all my fault!? It's always your fault! You and the stupid decisions you're always making!"

Humans were pretty weird, he decided.

"Why do you even care!?" Sorun shouted at Sorun. "You said you didn't care anymore! Now suddenly you're over here criticizing me for every mistake I've made-"

"I'm criticizing you because you spent the first week of our new life here staring up at a ceiling, and then you tried to do something about it, and when that didn't work you went back to being an apathetic good-for-nothing wasting away and waiting for somebody to notice so once again somebody can come help us out. You've been like this-"

"What, since we found out everybody, every thing , I ever knew died on Earth?!" Sorun shouted at him. "How am I supposed to feel about that!? What, am I supposed to be glad we get to stay here with them!?"

"It's a helluva lot better than anywhere else in this world!" Sorun shouted back. "At least it's in a place where people actually care enough about us not to let us starve! Oh, but what did you do when that stunning revelation was about to be revealed by Mina? You ran! You ran again!"

"I didn't r-" Not even being able to finish the sentence, Sorun turned away from the other Sorun in anger, gasped out a breath, and then rounded back at him while pointing a finger at him. "What is with you!? You really flipped from hating everybody to yelling at me for not accepting them!?"

"I'm yelling at you because we got a second life, a hard-fought life we kicked teeth out for, and you're using it being a depressed vegetable! It sucks! Yeah, I get it, it sucks Earth's gone, but there's nothing we can do about it now! I'm not saying we get over it, hell I don't think we can ever get over it, this shit's with us for life probably, but we still have a chance at making something of our life and you're over here starving yourself and hiding behind flimsy excuses! For god's sake actually do something because what you're doing right now is straight misery!"

"Maybe I don't wanna do anything." Sorun turned his back to Sorun and began walking down the beach. "What are we supposed to do? Go back and live a life? Doing what? Get real. We had a life. It died with Earth. This isn't living a life anymore. It's just living."

"..." He heard a loud scoff from behind him. "Oh, is that how it is? Figures you'd wanna give it up. It's what you're best at doing."

Nothing was said between them as Sorun walked away. From the plane and Virgil and everything else. He just kept walking down the beach, eyes fixed downwards at his feet as he kept walking. His feet softly touching down on the sand and the sound of the waves was the only thing he heard.

"What's even the point? I... what's there to live for here?" Sorun wondered to himself. "I don't have anything going for me. Everybody has their own lives, even past the Freedom Fighter thing, but what do I have? Antoine's got a wife, Sonic's got his whole hero thing, Sally's royalty, Tails has the whole kid genius inventor angle, everybody has their own families, and what do I have? No family, no skills, nothing that gives me meaning, no... no anything. Everything I used to have is in an irradiated city of the dead in an equally dead world now. All I have is an empty house and a group of friends too busy saving the world to give me the time of day. I'm nothing past that. I can't do anything, there's nothing I want to do, so why-?"

His foot caught on something, making Sorun trip forwards and hit the sand.

The only upside to Sorun falling right on his face was that the sand provided some cushioning to his fall. He still laid there in the sand for a good ten seconds before sighing, placing his palms and the sand, and lifting himself up. He shook his head to loose the particles of sand from his hair, and then sat up on his knees to look forwards. This followed him twisting his face in confusion when he saw bootprints ahead of him.

"How out of it was I that I didn't even notice I made a full circle around the island? And what'd I even trip on?" Sorun wondered as he turned back around. There was a small bump in the sand, likely what he tripped on, though what that bump actually was he couldn't figure out due to the sand covering it. He tilted his head as a result, humming and moving backwards in order to examine it further.

"What is this? A coconut or something?" Sorun silently asked himself as his hands begin digging through the sand. His fingers finally grabbed at the object, something that felt extremely smooth, and lifted it up out of the sand to- "Fuck, not again!"

It was a Chaos Emerald he'd tripped over. The blue one. He'd noticed the glow before anything else once his hands lifted it out of the sand. And then he saw the color, the shape, and put two and two together, and then he immediately realized what it was and then threw it away. He'd even shouted out of fright, fell on his back, and then crawled away out of fear of the thing as he watched it land in the sand in front of him.

And then, he froze.

"... Wait, what?" The Emerald was still there in the sand where he tossed it. When he lifted his hands up in front of his face, they were empty. "Huh?" He looked back at the Emerald. It was still there. "What? Isn't... why didn't it stick to me?"

He had enough experience with the things to know that, once he touched one, that was it. He was absorbing it. But that hadn't happened here. He'd managed to pick it up and then throw it away. It hadn't affixed itself to his hand like all the other ones always had.

"That shouldn't be... maybe it's 'cause I don't have any in me," Sorun thought to himself as he stood up. "That first one took a while for me to absorb compared to all the other ones I think. Maybe I didn't hold onto long enough? No, that... that doesn't sound right." He took a few steps forwards, ending with him standing above the blue Emerald. "What's going on here?"

Against his better judgement, he bent down to pick up the Emerald, and then straightened himself up as he turned it around in his hands. It wasn't sticking to him no matter how long he held onto it. He gripped it with both hands, squeezed on it, even tried grabbing it in different areas, but nothing was happening.

There was still something there, though. A strange, tugging sensation he felt in the points his hand made contact with the Emerald. Like a gentle pulse going from the Emerald to his hands. There was a feeling inside of Sorun, too, something trying to reach out for the Emerald, but he squashed that feeling down as he continued examining the glowing gem.

"Maybe it ain't a real one?" Sorun reasoned with himself. "Like a fake or... or something." He began to idly toss the gem back and forth in his hands. "I mean, come on, what are the odds I'd crash-land on an island that just happens to have a Chaos Emerald? But this feeling though... no, there's no way, it's gotta be-"

In a flash of blue light and ethereal, blue particles, the blue Chaos Emerald turned into the Yamato. Once again Sorun yelped out in surprise and dropped the sword.

The sheathed katana fell onto the ground, partially burying itself in sand. In another flash of light and particles, it turned back into the blue Chaos Emerald.

"Okay, what the hell...?" He bent down and picked the Chaos Emerald back up. Once again, it turned into the Yamato. "It's real?" Experimentally, he tried willing the sword to turn back into an Emerald. His confusion only grew when the Yamato turned back into the blue Chaos Emerald in his hands. "What the... that... that's not how... what the fuck, that's not how it works!"

He actually made a frustrated yell and threw the Emerald down in the sand again. Huffing out in anger, he bent down once again and picked the Emerald back up. Once again, it turned into the Yamato.

"That's not how it works!" his mind screamed. "I touch the Emerald, it gets stuck in me forever in exchange for a power, and I lose twelve years! That's what's supposed to happen! I'm not supposed to just be able to touch it and... what is this!?"

He could control it, he realized as he examined the Emerald further. He could freely switch back and forth between the sword and the Emerald. And when he let go of it entirely, it turned back into a Chaos Emerald upon losing contact with Sorun. And he didn't feel any of the pains he associated with absorbing the Emeralds. Nothing but that urge of the Emerald trying to tug into his body he kept resisting, that urge that only appeared when he touched it.

"That isn't... why...?" Sorun made a frustrated growl and gripped the sword hard enough that it began shaking. "Arrgh, this doesn't make any sense!"

"What doesn't make any sense?"

With the sword in his hand, the first reaction Sorun had to hearing the unfamiliar voice besides him was to go rigid, tightly grip the handle of the sword, and then sharply pull it out from the sheath and hold its edge up near to where he heard the voice. His eyes had widened a bit in panic, and even Sorun's breathing had gone a bit heavier just from being startled by the voice. And so, with the edge of the blade still held up to the unknown speaker, Sorun slowly rotated his head just the barest amount to get his eyes on the newcomer.

"A... shark...?" It must have been what it was. He didn't know anything else that possessed that kind of dark, bluish-gray skin. Or the dorsal fins on the head that had iron rings going through them. Or the incredibly sharp teeth it had. It was still a Mobian, though. Still bipedal, and still roughly as tall as Sorun. He couldn't help but be slightly disconcerted looking at its face, though, and the human-like features on the shark's face that looked so out of place with those teeth. The widened, yellow eyes that were looking down at the sword up against their owner's throat and the hands raised up besides its head. Hands with more fins on the forearms.

"H-hey, man, take it easy," the shark stuttered out. Definitely male from the voice and body shape from what Sorun observed. "I was just comin' to say hi."

Sorun blinked, and then looked further down at the shark's waist. He was wearing a piece of green rope around his waist like a belt, with a small pouch tied to it. Worryingly there was also a small knife attached to his hip. Also something that looked handmade like the belt, but it was still secured in its scabbard. He was bare of any other clothes aside from a necklace decorated with random gold bits. Even the gloves and shoes he normally saw on other Mobians were vacant on this one.

"Didn't know aquatic Mobians were a thing," Sorun thought to himself. Despite the knife and the teeth that looked like they could bite Sorun in half, the shark seemed genuine. Had to be if he kept the knife in its scabbard even after sneaking up on Sorun like that, which alone had probably been unintentional from the way the shark was reacting to him. "Tch... he seems alright."

"Sorry. You spooked me," Sorun quietly mumbled as he removed the sword's edge from the shark's throat. The Mobian sighed in relief and lowered his hands back down, while at the same time Sorun slowly slid Yamato back into the scabbard. "Why'd you sneak up on me like that?"

"I... I called out to you, but you didn't hear me, so I got closer," the shark innocently explained as he blinked his yellow eyes at Sorun.

Making a displeased sigh, aimed mainly at himself, Sorun rose his hand up and rubbed at his forehead. "I must have been too distracted to notice you," he said. "I'm a bit out of it right now. Things aren't really going that well for me." He glanced down at Yamato, held in his left hand. "Again, sorry for that."

He couldn't say he was too surprised when the shark offered him a tooth-filled smile in forgiveness. "Eh, it's all cool. Anyways, I'm Razor!"

"Sorun."

"Sorun?" Razor had repeated his name with a hint of confusion in his voice. "Never heard of that name before. In fact, I don't think I've ever heard of a Mobian that looks like you, like, ever."

It was Sorun's turn to look confused. "I-I'm not a... look, don't worry about it," he said. "How'd you get to this middle-of-nowhere island, anyway?"

"... I swam?"

"Right." Sighing and reaching up to pinch the bridge of his nose, Sorun shook his head and looked off to the side. "Is there civilization nearby? Somewhere I can go to so I can hitch a ride back to the mainland?"

Razor shook his head. "Not really. This place is pretty removed even from where I live. In fact, nothing really ever comes around here."

"Fantastic," Sorun sighed out. This place really had to be remote if the shark Mobian that probably lived in the ocean barely even knew this place.

Noticing the disparaged look on Sorun's face, Razor asked, "Can I ask how you got here?" The question made Sorun face the shark again. "I just, uh... I'm not really seeing any gills or fins on you or anything, and I'm pretty sure if a Mobian like you lives in the sea I'd know, so can I ask how you wound up here? I don't even see a ship or nothin' parked anywhere."

"I crashed," Sorun deadpanned. "You might have seen the metal heap piled up on the other side of the island?"

Razor's face lit up in realization. "Ohhh! You came in that! Yeah, I saw that, but I didn't know what it was." He looked over his shoulder and began rubbing at his neck. "I saw a weird-looking Chao there and left my own with it and decided to follow the footprints I saw in the sand to you. Was that Chao yours, too?"

Sorun's head perked up. "Oh, you have a pet Chao, too? Yeah, he was mine." A beat. "Oh, you left him with Virgil?"

For some reason, the simple confirmation that Virgil was Sorun's Chao made Razor visibly relax. "Crusher? Yeah." He looked back at Sorun. "Why? Is that a problem?"

"Virgil, uh... he doesn't really play well with other Chao," Sorun said, much to the shark's confusion. "I mean he's only ever interacted with the one I know of post-evolution but he really didn't get along with him. It's this weird superiority complex thing he has, I dunno."

Nodding in sympathy, Razor said, "Yeah, Crusher's kinda like that, too. Always was kinda more violent than a normal Chao since he evolved with me." They both locked onto each others' eyes, both growing concerned. "You, um, you think everything's okay over there?" he hesitantly asked.

He was an odd Chao that came with the weird fish Mobian thing that had suddenly appeared out of the water. This weird black and green Chao. Smiled too much for Virgil's liking, but he had sharp teeth like him, too, which he found a bit interesting. But then there had been that smile- that cocky, overconfident smile, like he was challenging Virgil. And he only started doing it once that Mobian walked out of sight following Sorun's footprints.

So of course Virgil decided to fight him. He seemed interesting. Much more so than the rabbit child's Chao, that pathetic thing that needed to be coddled. This one actually evolved like he had. And that smile... it irked Virgil.

The fight itself hadn't nearly been as interesting as the Chao itself. It liked punching- inelegant compared to the black blades attached to Virgil's arms as far as he was concerned. Inelegant and much, much too slow. It hadn't lasted more than ten seconds, ending with Virgil sitting atop the now-struggling Chao as it tried in vain to free itself from the fate of being Virgil's chair. The smile was all gone now, replaced with angered snarls as it tried and failed to remove itself from Virgil.

As far as Virgil was concerned the fact he wiped that stupid smile off the new Chao's face was victory enough.

"... I'm sure it's fine," Sorun assured Razor, not sounding very convinced himself. "But anyway, yeah, I... flew in on the plane and crashed here on the island. Still trying to figure out how that actually happened."

"You flew?" Razor asked in an incredulous tone. "Like... like a bird? You flew in the air?"

"... Yeah...?"

"In that ?"

"Man, have you never seen a plane before?"

"No! But wow!" Razor's expression grew from disbelieving to astonished. "That's really amazing! How do you get something so heavy to fly in the air!?"

The sudden enthusiasm made Sorun take a step back. "Uh, you know, w-with aerodynamics and propellers and... stuff..." Sorun trailed off, unsure of how to describe exactly how a plane flew. In all honestly he wasn't sure of the science himself. Likewise, Razor's amazed look began to fade. "I don't know, dude, I didn't build the thing," Sorun said with a sigh, making Razor grow a bit disappointed. He looked off to the side and saw that the sun was beginning to dip towards the horizon. "You think we can pick this back up over by the plane?" he asked, turning back to Razor. "It's getting late. We can make a camp or something."

"Hm? Oh, sure." Razor gave him a nod, the prior disappointment disappearing in an instant. "Yeah, come on. We'll meet up with our Chao and pick it up from there."

"Alright, so let me see if I got this right." Razor took in a deep breath, flattened his hands together, and pointed the tips of them at Sorun. "There's Overlanders, which aren't Mobians, and then there's humans, which are like Overlanders but aren't, and you're a human, but, like... not a human human."

"If anything I'm the human human and the rest are offshoots, but sure, yeah," Sorun confirmed with a nod.

"And... the thing that separates humans from Overlanders is... the location...?"

Sighing, Sorun shook his head. "Not exactly, Razor, no."

"Gah!" Razor leaned back on the log he was sitting on and grabbed at his face. "This is so confusing! Why does this have to be so complex!?"

"I ask myself that a lot," Sorun mumbled, leaning forwards on the log he sat on opposite to Razor as he stared at the small, smoldering campfire between them. "You really are clueless with what goes on in the world, huh, Razor?"

The shark's hands lowered from his face. He made a huff and turned his head away from Sorun, pouting slightly. "All the going-ons that happens in Meropis City pretty much only involve things under the sea. Nobody involved themselves with the surface communities because there's no point. It's all too far away on land and we already have everything we need in the sea. Why bother?"

It was a narrow-minded view of the situation, but Sorun could see where he was coming from. There was apparently a gigantic underwater Mobian community according to Razor. One he didn't even knew if the others back in New Mobotropolis knew about because, according to the shark, they were a reclusive bunch that didn't bother with anything outside the sea. It showed from how much Razor knew of the surface world's history, which was to say, he didn't know jack. Sorun probably should have been clued into that fact the moment he mistook Sorun for a Mobian.

He didn't even know what an Overlander was, or anything surrounding humans. From the way Razor made it sound, any history was self-contained to the underwater communities, and anything outside of that on land was a mystery to them. A mystery they'd rather keep shelved and never explore since they were all content with what they had under the ocean.

Closeminded, maybe, but with all the insanity that happened on the surface he wasn't too sure he blamed them for the reclusion.

Probably more peaceful that way. He wouldn't be one to criticize a community with how it chose to work.

Sorun glanced off to the side when some movement caught his eye. Virgil and Razor's Chao, Crusher, were chasing each other around, sometimes catching one another and wrestling on the ground for a bit. Ten out of ten times Virgil would win, but no matter how many times he was beat down, Crusher wouldn't be deterred. And much to Sorun's shock, he actually caught Virgil smirking a few times as a result. Not a full-on smile; a mean little smirk that was more amused than anything else. But he was fully welcoming the other Chao's defiance of him. And Crusher seemed to be having fun with it, too.

"Those two sure got along quick, huh?" Razor asked, looking towards the two Chao with a smile on his face. "I was kinda worried when you told me about Virgil, but they look fine to me."

"Mf." Sorun made a grunt and poked at the fire with a nearby stick he had on hand.

"Still though," Razor continued, looking back at Sorun, "your Chao looks weird. How come he doesn't have that, um, that thing?" He pointed above his head. "The weird emotion dot thing? Every Chao's supposed to have one."

Sorun glanced to the side at the Chao. Crusher had that floating dot above his head. A green, spiky thing, but a dot was a dot, he supposed. He recalled Virgil formerly having one, too, back when he was an ordinary Chao. "He lost it when he evolved," Sorun answered. "Dunno why. Chao're weird."

"That they are," Razor agreed. "It's nice seein' Crusher have so much fun. None of the other Chao back where I'm from ever like playing rough with him like this."

Leaving Razor to his thoughts, Sorun turned to the object that was sitting at his side. The blue Chaos Emerald, with its glow illuminating the surrounding area darkened by the twilight sky. He took hold of it, rolling it around in his hand while giving it a contemplative look. In a flash of blue light and particles, it'd turned into Yamato. With some concentration, he managed to turn it back into a Chaos Emerald, and while he was holding onto it, he felt something resting on his shoulders. The blue claws of his Bringer Claws. He dispelled them immediately and continued staring at the Emerald.

"I can use any one of my powers while holding onto this thing without having to absorb it. But only when I'm in physical contact with it," he thought. "It keeps defaulting back to Yamato for some reason, though. I have to concentrate to get any of the other powers. But Yamato just comes to me immediately. I don't know why."

He felt that he could absorb it if he really wanted to. He figured that's what that tugging sensation he felt was: the Chaos Emerald wanting to go into his body. But he was... what, resisting it? Controlling it? He didn't know what it was. He did know he didn't want to absorb it. Getting permanently locked to a single power wasn't too appealing, nor the twelve years off his life. Temporary access to any power he wanted at no cost seemed more efficient. Especially since he was planning on using Yamato to go back to New Mobotropolis at some point. Once he'd worked up the nerve to show his face to the others.

"But why now? Why is it doing this to me now? What changed?" Sorun wondered to himself. "Did something happen to me to change the rules on how this works? Am I just that much more experienced with it, or is this a result of something happening? I'm not sure. Maybe the others back hom- back in New Mobotropolis will have answers. I sure don't."

It was curious. Terribly curious. And like many things, Sorun just didn't have an answer for it. At least he had some power back now, albeit temporarily. As much as he'd disliked them, he'd admit he felt... somewhat naked without the powers. Vulnerable. Having just some back helped to put him at ease.

"So what's the story with that?" Razor asked, dragging Sorun out from his silent musings. He looked up to see the shark pointing at the Emerald. "The glowing thing you keep turning into a sword and all that other stuff?"

Turning the Emerald back into Yamato, Sorun looked further up into Razor's yellow eyes. He seemed intensely curious over the sword which, Sorun would grant, made enough sense. Probably wasn't every day he saw someone conjure a magical katana. "It's a really long and sad story I don't wanna get into," Sorun said, making the shark deflate a bit. "To make it a short and mildly depressing story, me being a human human, as you put it, makes me special. And because of that I can make special things with Chaos Emeralds."

"And Chaos Emeralds are...? Ow!"

Sorun had reached forwards and softly bonked the tip of Razor's nose with the tip of the sheathed Yamato's scabbard. Not very hard, but enough that the shark had still recoiled in shock while swatting an amused Sorun's sword away.

"Get out more," Sorun said as he pulled the sword back to his side. "They're special rocks with nigh-unlimited power. And I get to turn them into swords. Ain't life grand?"

"Grand's a word for it. Sure," Razor mumbled as he rubbed at the spot on his nose Sorun had touched. "Could you not touch that? My nose's sensitive."

"Is it, now?" A small, mischievous smile played across Sorun's face as the katana turned back into a Chaos Emerald. Blue electricity momentarily arced around his body. "You should probably tell that to him."

"Huh? Him-?" Razor was cut off when a blue, spectral hand reached up from behind him, grabbed his nose, and squeezed it. Softly, not enough to cause harm, but it'd been startling enough that Razor jumped off the log he'd been sitting on in fright while whirling around to his attacker. He saw Sorun's spectral Doppelganger waving at him right before it disappeared, followed by him hearing Sorun's soft laughter at his expense.

Razor turned towards Sorun, his rows of sharp teeth showing as he grinned savagely at Sorun. The laughter the human was making was slowly cut off when he saw that grin and the eyes locked right onto his body, and before Sorun could get a word out, Razor lunged right at him. No words of warning. Not even a sound. He just jumped at Sorun with his arms outstretched towards him.

He'd tried Tricking away, the Emerald was still in his hand, but Sorun was still locked onto the Doppelganger power. He wasn't able to switch it to Trickster fast enough to avoid getting jumped on by Razor. The Emerald flew out from Sorun's grasp, with the teen making a soft grunt when his back impacted the sand. He felt Razor's hands reaching out to pin Sorun's arms down, after which he opened his eyes to see the other teen leaning over him with a victorious, tooth-filled grin.

"Ha ha! Gotcha," Razor said through that grin.

"It would seem so." He tried to sound annoyed, but the incredibly small smile Sorun held betrayed his amusement. He didn't feel as amused when he couldn't lift his arms up from Razor's hold, though the smile remained.

Razor, however, grinned even wider when he felt Sorun's resistance. "You're not very strong, are ya, Sorun?" he asked.

"It's a fact I lament more and more with each passing day," he responded. "Please let me up."

"I dunno. Technically you got my nose twice and I only paid you back once..."

With an annoyed huff, Sorun rolled his eyes. "Razor..."

"Alright, alright." Laughing a bit, Razor released his hold on Sorun's wrists. The human teen sat up, while Razor had already retreated back to the log he had been sitting on, with Sorun returning to his. They both sat down, with Sorun proceeding to return to poking at the small campfire with his stick.

Overpowered by a shark. Somehow not the weirdest thing that happened to him in the last month.

"So what were you doing all the way out here in the middle of nowhere, anyways?" Sorun idly asked. "You said this place was pretty out there even by aquatic Mobian standards."

"A-ah, yeah. Uh, how do I..." Razor began kicking his feet as an uncomfortable look overcame his face. "Sorun, have you ever... you ever have girl troubles? You know, with girls?"

Sorun shook his head. "No. Never. I'm an expert on women."

Nearby, Virgil ceased wrestling with Crusher and stared over at Sorun with a skeptical look.

"Oh, man, really?" Razor let out a nervous laugh and darted his eyes away from Sorun. "I-I bet you get girlfriends all the time then, huh?"

Sorun shook his head again. "Nope, never had a girlfriend. And nobody's ever been interested in me. Believe me, I'd know if somebody was."

Virgil's eyes narrowed to slits, and his mouth opened a bit in disbelief.

"Oh, alright. Cool." Razor cleared his throat. "I, uh... I only ask 'cause, well... this is all about my sister."

"Your sister," Sorun echoed. "Okay, a bit weird, but I'm not one to judge."

"It ain't like that!" Razor yelled out. "It's... agh, it's hard to explain." Razor held a hand to his face and let out a sigh into his palm. "Where do I even start with this...?"

"The beginning?" Sorun suggested.

Razor sent him a pointed look, but then nodded. "Alright, so, don't laugh but... I used to be a pirate."

"... Ha."

Razor grit his teeth and lowered his hand. "Sorun, I'm serious!"

"Sorry. Couldn't resist," Sorun apologized, though he still had a faint smirk on his face. "A pirate, huh? Didn't you say you were as old as me? How'd you get into the pirate game?" He paused and looked out into the ocean. "How is there even a pirate game?" he asked in confusion. "None of the continents trade with each other. All the settlements and places like the Overlander government and the city I come from are all self-sustaining. If there is trade, it's all done in-continent between smaller settlements. Nobody's sending ships full of anything worth stealing, let alone goods, across the ocean to other continents. There's nothing to pirate out there."

A consequence of the fact that this was a post-post apocalyptic world, far enough along that the actual apocalypse was a thing of legend. The "Days of Fury", or whatever Sally had called it. Civilization came a far way since then to the point governments and kingdoms were back, but there wasn't anything even remotely close to a global economy. Any and all economies were all self-contained. And as he said, most settlements were self-sustaining. He doubted there were even ships period that traveled the ocean, especially considering flight was probably an easier option to those it was available to. He knew Tails had that submarine of his, but that was to be used for specific circumstances.

How the hell could there be pirates in conditions like that? They wouldn't be able to sustain themselves with nothing at all to steal.

"It's 'cause of those metal things," Razor explained to him.

Sorun tilted his head. "The metal things?"

Razor nodded. "It's been a problem for the last decade or so. These... I don't even know what to call them. These things made of metal, machines, except they were moving around on their own and doing stuff."

A lot of bells were ringing in Sorun's head. "They have a logo of a really round, grinning face on them?"

Not surprising him at all, Razor said, "Yeah! You know 'em?"

"It's part of a large-scale problem the entire world has to deal with, though with recent events it should be dealt with soon. I'll give you the details later if you really wanna know since it'd take a while to explain," Sorun offered. "Just call 'em robots if you want."

"Robots. Alright," Razor muttered, whispering the word out and nodding at how it sounded. "Well, almost for as long as I remember these... robot things had been making a mess of the undersea world. Nobody knows where they came from; just that they kept comin'. Harvesting minerals and other things from the sea floor, spreading this awful black stuff around the water that kept making everything sick, it was... it was pretty awful. There's still some areas today that are still polluted with that stuff. One time they stopped for a bit, and then the robots came back looking different and way more dangerous," Razor explained, his expression hardening a bit. "They suddenly stopped coming altogether, though, fairly recently. Nobody really knows why. Not complaining or anything, but... well, it's just weird."

"So Robotnik was doing some undersea operations, and then he died and stuff died down for a bit until Robotnik two-point-oh came to replace him and ramp things back up. Probably upgraded the Badniks in the process. Then during the time when he really had a hold on the whole world with the Emeralds he was really upping the pressure on everyone down there. But then he started losing ground to the Freedom Fighters around the same time I showed up, likely withdrew his forces in the ocean to help with things on land, one thing lead to another and we're at the point we're at now with him down to almost nothing and hiding in the ruins of New Megaopolis." If that was true then the problem of his Badniks accosting the undersea life should already be taken care of if what Razor said was true. The pollution was another issue, but Sorun didn't have a solution for that. They'd have to deal with it on their own.

"They were never able to take over Meropis City since the guards managed to defend it so well, even during this last year where things got especially bad," Razor continued. "And there was this small group of sea animals that were always fighting against the robots, but the whole ocean was a lot of ground to cover for just them. They couldn't be in every place at once so they weren't able to help with every problem."

Sorun's head picked up. "Was one of them a talking whale?"

"I think so, yeah," Razor confirmed.

"Huh. I know a guy that knows that guy." Sorun gestured to Razor. "I assume a lot of places weren't as lucky as the city?"

Razor grew a bit saddened. "No. Some people just didn't... there wasn't a lot they could do. Whole villages would be destroyed and harvested for resources by those things," he said in a soft voice, hints of anger in his words. "It's not that bad anymore since the robots stopped coming, but back then it was real bad. And for a long time me and my sister were with this one group that kept sailing around the ocean. We'd go to scavenge what was left of the destroyed villages, always moving from place to place and never stopping for long. Just surviving, you know?" He made a bitter laugh. "But... just sometimes, there were survivors. But the captain, he... he never batted an eye at them, never helped. Sometimes he'd even tell us to steal what little they had left just so we could live off it."

One of Razor's fists began to clench hard enough that Sorun heard his leathery skin strain from the pressure. The two Chao had long since stopped fighting, both looking towards Razor and listening to the story with somber expressions. Sorun was doing much the same.

"I was the only one ever against it. Even my own sister never questioned it. 'Do what we need to survive,' she'd always tell me. 'It's us against the world, so suck it up.'" He made a loud sigh. "I just couldn't do it, Sorun. I was fine with looting abandoned villages. Those days were... they were fun. But then a couple years ago that thing with survivors started happening and I just couldn't go through with it. I told everybody we should stop, maybe even try to help people. I mean, we'd been doing this for so long that we had more than enough to help people besides ourselves, maybe even do some trading with Meropis City to try and help rebuild some of the outlying settlements."

"And how'd they respond?"

Razor grit his teeth in a mixture of anger and anguish. "They threw me overboard and left me for dead. Just like that. Like I never mattered to them. My own sister didn't even try stopping them."

Sorun hissed through his teeth and lowered his head a bit so he didn't have to see Razor's face. It was upsetting him seeing the shark look so down. "That's rough, buddy," he mumbled out in sympathy. "I'm not so surprised, though. A while ago I ran into this group of jackal Mobians back on land that were harassing this one village. They were these... nomadic bandits, I guess, doing what they could to survive. Just like your pirate pals. Their leader almost cut the head off this one guy that helped me out when I was lost. He was caring for a kid whose parents died."

Razor looked up to Sorun's eyes, horrified by what he heard. He looked almost scared when he asked his next question. "A-and... what happened with them?"

"I broke all his limbs and told them to never return to that village again," Sorun stated in a low, even tone. Razor's eyes had widened dramatically while his body had gone rigid, and his long shark tail made an uncomfortable-looking flinch. Off to the side, Crusher looked towards Sorun in surprise while Virgil made an approving nod. "The old man's alive in case you cared," he added.

"Oh. That's good." Razor exhaled and shook his head while making a nervous chuckle. "Eh-heh, wow. You really don't mess around, huh?"

"... I liked the old man and the kid. That's all," Sorun mumbled. "And I was in a pretty bad place at the time."

"Yeah, I bet," Razor commented. His face lowered a bit as his shoulders drooped. "Why do they do that, Sorun? People like the ones I used to be with and those jackals? How come they keep hurting people?"

"To live, I guess. The world's pretty messed up because of the person behind all the robots. It's as bad up here as it is down there, but it's getting better." Sorun looked up towards the darkening sky. Stars were beginning to become visible. "People that are too scared to die will do desperate things to live. I used to share the sentiment. These days though, I'm... I'm not too sure."

"What is that supposed to mean?" A worried look overtook Razor's features as he looked towards Sorun. The human sighed, and lowered his gaze to meet the shark's eyes.

Sorun didn't know why he was considering telling Razor about his home. A complete stranger. Something about Razor, though... Sorun couldn't quite pin it down. There was just something he liked about him. Maybe it was the fact he was a fellow Chao-owner. His attitude, maybe. He didn't know. He felt at ease around him. And as it was he needed to get this off his chest. Besides, Razor had already shared a lot of personal stuff. It only seemed fair to Sorun's eyes.

"My home is gone, Razor. Everybody I ever knew there is dead." He slumped forwards and looked towards the slowly dying fire, not missing the hurt look Razor had adopted. "I don't know why, and I don't know how, because I can't even go back to the ruins. And now I'm stuck living among Mobians trying to live a lifestyle in which I have no idea what I'm doing. Nobody understands me. I can barely understand anybody. Everyone's... different. In more than just our bodies. And I'm supposed to just figure out how to do all this while I'm coming to grips with the fact my home's gone? I'm just supposed to accept New Mobotropolis as my new home and move on like nothing happened? I can't even get a job to keep myself fed, and most days I'm just staring at a ceiling. What am I supposed to do?"

"... You feel like you're being suffocated. You're aimless, like you're stumbling around, and your mind just keeps replaying the same things over and over and you can't get past it." Razor's words caused Sorun to raise his head, with the human growing surprised at the content of his words as he stared towards the fire with Sorun. "Everybody feels like a stranger, and when you try to figure out what you're supposed to do you don't-"

"- Even know what you want," Sorun finished.

"Yeah..." Razor mumbled with a nod. "Can't say I've had something as tragic as what happened with you happen with me, but getting thrown overboard half-alive by the only family you ever knew is probably a close second."

"Some would argue it's probably worse," Sorun quietly agreed. Which was worse? Everyone dying or everyone betraying you? Sorun didn't know the answer. Didn't even know if it mattered since the end result was the same either way: loneliness.

Maybe that was why Sorun liked Razor so much. He understood in some capacity. They were similar. When Sorun spoke Razor could actually comprehend what he was describing. It was like taking a breath after nearly drowning. That was how relieved Sorun felt listening to the shark speak.

And then he grew sad. Because the only reason Razor understood was because he went through something similar to Sorun. It hurt him knowing somebody else was hurt the same way he was.

Razor made a sad chuckle. "Maybe. I dunno." The corners of his mouth lifted a bit as he looked back at the fire. "I was rescued by a couple of good friends. They look after me. They're all that look after me," he added. "Nobody else in the city really looks at me the same way as they do. Because I'm an outsider, a former pirate. And city life is just so different from what I'm used to that I can't really understand it all, so I just stay with my friends at this little temple they live in. Simpler that way. There's even a Chao Garden there, so that's a nice distraction."

Sorun made a small hum. He really did understand. "I know the feeling. I have friends, too, but they're so busy trying to help everybody that they can't spare much time for me. Beyond that, I can't do anything. I just feel like a deadweight." He made a small scoff and gestured towards the nearby wreckage. "Involuntary or not, it seems I ended up running away. Again. I couldn't handle life so I stole my friend's plane and crashed on an island in the middle of the ocean. Worst part is I don't even remember doing it." Sorun shook his head. "You ever screw up this badly? Trying to cope with all this?"

"Nah, never." Razor flashed Sorun a light tooth-filled grin, causing the teen to scoff and roll his eyes. "I've been in the same place, though. But the people who rescued me, my friends who I practically spend all my time around, make it easier. I didn't know what I wanted until I realized I didn't want to be without them. So I decided I'd stay. For them." He gave Sorun a considering look. "Don't you have people like that?"

Nicole's image briefly flashed through Sorun's mind. "Perhaps," he answered, glancing towards Virgil and then back to Razor. "Does it help?"

Razor had to pause to think on the answer. "I... think it's a way forwards. Forwards to what, I don't know. I'm not really good at this thinking thing. But it's a weird thing. You don't feel yourself getting better, but then after a while you look back and realize how worse off you were back then than you are now. So I think that means it works?"

"Maybe," Sorun admitted. He didn't know, either. "You never answered what your sister has to do with you being here," he suddenly said, wishing to change the subject.

"I don't want my sister to be with those guys anymore, Sorun. They're bad news," Razor said with a sigh. "The robots are gone. Villages aren't being destroyed anymore, and the only way they supported themselves was from raiding those villages that were ransacked by the robots. What happens when they run out of places to loot? I've already seen them stealing from people that need it more than them. I don't want to see my sister end up like those jackals you told me about," he said with a shake of his head. "Even if she disagrees with me, even if I have to drag her away from them kicking and screaming... I don't want my sister to do something she can never take back and will regret for the rest of her life. She's my sister. My only family. I can't bear the thought, Sorun." His eyes narrowed as Razor's face grew more determined as he looked out to the ocean. "This is a travel route they frequent. I know from my time with them. They like to come here for some of the fruits that grow here," he explained. "When they come here, I'm taking her back to where me and my friends live." A chuckle, a nervous one. "She, uh... she's probably gonna really hate me for what I'm about to try. But I have to do it, you know? For her sake. Even if she never talks to me again."

"All for family, huh?" Sorun couldn't say he shared the sentiment. He never had siblings, after all. A mother, but that was it. He could understand it somewhat in that respect. Not so much when she let him be thrown overboard. "Even though she left you for dead?" he asked.

Razor nodded. "Yeah. Even then."

Foolish. Maybe. Probably. Sorun couldn't rightly say. Maybe he was wrong in thinking it foolish and Razor was in the right after all. He couldn't blame the guy wanting to save his sister from crossing lines that couldn't be uncrossed. Not when there was an alternative. "The rest?"

"I'm turning them into the city guard. They're wanted criminals anyways," Razor said. "What they do isn't exactly unknown. Maybe it'd even get the guards off my back. They keep sneering at me whenever I cross one. This one uppity guard even accused me of bein' a thief once when it was a completely different guy. Aaaaand maybe I wanna get a little even for what they did to me," Razor quickly added when Sorun gave him a look. "But it's mostly to save my sister! And to stop anybody else from getting hurt."

"So that's your plan? You're gonna singlehandedly fight a whole band of pirates?" At seeing the shark nod, Sorun made a sigh. "Numbers?" he asked.

"Including my sister? Six."

"Okay. So six pirates versus you and your Chao?" Sorun asked, raising an eyebrow.

Hearing that made a troubled look cross Razor's face, which made Sorun think he hadn't even thought of the odds yet. So desperate to save his sister he'd jumped at the plan without thinking on it. But, instead of looking worried, he just gave Sorun that tooth-filled smile of his. "Eh. It'll work out."

He doubted that. "Will it?" Sorun mumbled. "Your friends even know you're here?"

"Yours know you're out here?"

"... Fair." Sighing through his nose, Sorun looked off to the side. The blue Chaos Emerald was lying in the sand nearby. He regarded it for a few moments, and, after making a resigned sigh, reached forwards to grab it. "I'm supposed to be retired from fighting, you know. I don't like doing this kind of thing." He firmly grasped the Emerald between his hands and turned back to Razor, who was giving him his full attention. "But I guess I can make an exception for you."

"Wait, what?" Razor's features brightened up immensely. "Y-you will!? Seriously!?"

"Against my better judgement," Sorun muttered under his breath. "But," he continued in a louder voice, "I will. We're friends, after all."

"R-really...?" To Sorun's horror, the shark was starting to get misty-eyed. Not only that, but his smile was threatening to split his face. "Sorun, I-"

"If you cry the deal's off and I leave," Sorun snapped, making Razor visibly jolt. He was already struggling with all these emotions. He didn't need more, dammit. It was too much as it was.

"Huh!?" He hadn't even noticed what was going on with his eyes. Razor was quick to lift his wrist and wipe away at them. "I-it's the heat from the fire! I'm not used to it!"

"Ah. Of course." Sorun didn't even care about the state of the shark's eyes. He was more focused on trying to figure out why he just agreed to fight pirates. A thing he was explicitly supposed to be avoiding. He should just take Yamato right now and leave Razor to his fate.

But... he didn't want to. He didn't like the odds the shark was facing. They were abysmal, and frankly, Sorun didn't think he'd win without help. And he was too scared and worried to think about what Razor losing would mean. It shocked even Sorun how quickly he'd grown fond of him, but he didn't want to see anything bad happen to him. And he deserved to have family back, even if it was an ungrateful sister. Didn't deserve to be lonely like Sorun. No one did. So he'd help. He'd help once and leave.

At least he'd get to say he fought pirates. That surely had to be a plus.

"So what's the plan?" Razor questioned him. He still had a big smile on his face.

"I've dealt with way worse than a band of pirates with way less. You deal with your sister. Leave the rest to me. We'll let the Chao do what they will." Sorun paused, and then looked to Virgil. "Hey, no dismemberment."

"Chao." That didn't sound very committal to Sorun's ears. He shrugged, not very much caring if a pirate or two ended up permanently crippled. Less risk of something going bad.

The way Razor fidgeted in his seat didn't make it seem like he shared the sentiment. "Er, uh, that's a joke, right?"

"You know those robots you hate so much?" Razor gave Sorun a nod. "I've seen Virgil cut through them with ease."

He started fidgeting more. "Could we, uh... not go too far with this?" Razor asked him. "I just want them captured so they stop hurting people. I don't want to seriously hurt them over it."

Another Mobian too soft to do what was needed. Sorun repressed a groan at hearing the request, but still gave Razor an agreeing nod. "Can't promise I won't break bones. Neither me or Virgil will do anything permanent, though," he promised. "... Except teeth. Some people might lose some teeth."

"I think I can live that that," Razor said with a grin.

"Good enough for me." Sorun looked to the side, up at one of the palm trees. He formed a Bringer Claw using the Emerald he was holding, and had it extend towards the nearest coconut he saw. "We'll have a devil of a time with them. Don't you worry." He grabbed the coconut and reeled it back to him. Afterwards, he grabbed both ends with the Bringer Claws, and had them pry to coconut in two halves. The water inside sloshed around as Sorun handed one of the halves off to Razor. "To, uh... us, I guess."

The awkward toast didn't seem to bother Razor in the slightest. Even though it seemed impossible, it only went to make him even happier. "Ha ha! Yeah! To us!"

They bumped their coconut halves together. Sorun was the first one to drink the water inside of it... and then immediately regretted it. He'd had coconut-flavored candy and snacks back on Earth. He expected the water inside the coconut to taste at least similarly to what he'd had in the past.

It didn't. It really didn't. It just tasted like off-flavored, sweet water. And that off flavor wasn't a good one.

"I've always wanted to eat a coconut. Suddenly the reward is feeling less fulfilling than the journey here," Sorun mumbled as he poured the water out from the coconut. Razor made an amused noise as a result. When Sorun finally drained the coconut, he tore some of the white meat out from the inside, threw it into his mouth, and began to eat it.

It was even worse.

"W-wow, this is... this is awful..." Sorun mumbled as he continued chewing the coconut piece.

"You're nuts. These things are great," Razor claimed. "What'd you expect out of a coconut?"

"I dunno. Flavor?" There wasn't any flavor as far as Sorun could taste. Just... nothing. "Ugh, and this texture. Feels like I'm chewing on a piece of styrofoam. This is the worst. Why do people eat these things?"

This was nothing like a coconut snowball at home. He'd rather starve than live off these things while stranded on an island.

"Heheh. I dunno what this styrofoam stuff is, but it sure sound funn-uh." Razor looked into the coconut in his hand, and then paused. He blinked a few times. "Hey, Sorun? You didn't eat any of this, did you?"

Sorun looked up and gave the shark a deadpan stare. "No, Razor, I only put it in my mouth while in full view of you."

"Oh." A beat passed. "Sorun, this isn't a coconut. Er, well, it is, but a different species of coconut." He turned his own half of the coconut over for Sorun to see, and then held it out in the light of the campfire. When Sorun leaned closer, he could see that there were small, purple spots in the white part of the coconut. "Yeah, I was warned all the time about these when we came here. You're not supposed to eat these. The purple stuff puts you to sleep."

"... Why is that even a thing?" Sorun mumbled as he looked down at his half of the coconut. Indeed, when he looked closer he saw purple. Purple he hadn't noticed earlier due to the low light. And just when he did notice, he felt his arms go numb, causing him to drop the coconut. "Aw, come on, not agai-"

Sorun was out like a light before he even finished his sentence.

A/N- Yeah, Razor and all the other aquatic Mobians are from the Post-Genesis Wave timeline in the comics. I said like a million years ago that timeline had some stuff in it I liked and wanted to use. I had to heavily modify the characters to make them fit into this setting, but I think it worked out.

Chapter 66

Recursion Error

Episode 66- See that pirate? See his face? Punch it.

Waking up after getting knocked out by a goddamn coconut of all things was much like waking up at the doctor's office after being put under by anesthetic. You went under and snapped back awake seemingly in the exact same second, like no time passed at all. That's what being put under from the coconut felt like to Sorun.

No dreams, not even a brief memory of black, nothing. It was like blinking, except that he felt way more groggy all of a sudden when he opened his eyes. His mental faculties seemed to be in working order, though. And Sorun used this opportunity to curse the coconut.

"Exactly what environmental factors makes a separate genus of coconut evolve the ability to put things to sleep? That's just messed up." A tired sigh left him as he attempted to raise his arms up to rub at his eyes. "... Okay, why can't I move my arms?"

He opened his eyes. Shockingly, it seemed to be the middle of the day. Even more shocking, Sorun wasn't on the ground. He saw why when he looked down further and saw his arms were bound to his sides with rope tied around his entire torso. The same rope was tied to the top of a palm tree, suspending him in the air.

"I am extremely displeased with this."

"O-oh, uh... hey, Sorun. You finally awake?"

That was Razor's voice. Sorun couldn't rotate his head very far, but he was able to look back far enough over his shoulder to see one of the fins on the side of the shark's head. So he was up here with him, the both of them tied back-to-back and suspended up off the ground.

Went to explain the weight Sorun felt pressing against him. Not so much the why of it.

"Razor. Why are we tied up?" Sorun asked, trying to maintain a calm voice. On the inside he was growing worried. Significantly less panicked knowing Razor was tied with him, but the situation as a whole was still disconcerting to him. He wanted answers.

"Eh-heh, yeah, about that... it's a hilarious story, actually."

"A real side-splitter, I'm sure," Sorun deadpanned. "Of all the scenarios I wake up tied and bound by rope, this is the least favorable one."

"... How is there a favorable scenario to this kind of thing?" Razor asked, clearly sounding confused.

"You'd be surprised. Now what exactly happened while I was under?"

"The pirates showed up while you were sleeping."

"... Ah." As far as explanations go that was probably the only one that made sense. "So how'd that go?"

"They... snuck up on me and held you hostage. While you were sleeping. There wasn't really a fight."

Oh. Well now Sorun was the one feeling bad. The shame of being used as a hostage combined with the embarrassment of being in this position. It was a very heated emotion that Sorun didn't like at all. Emotions that were giving way to anger. Pure indignation at this entire thing. And to make it even worse Razor was forced to share the same fate as him. Somehow that was making him even more angrier.

"Okay, remember what Bunnie said. Just breath." Using the trick that'd probably saved him a thousand times by now, Sorun deeply inhaled and exhaled. He felt himself calm down, an insignificant amount as far as he was concerned but it was something, after which a heavy scowl settled over his features. Focus on the now. Attain bloody retribution later. None of this would matter as long as it ended with them saving... well, getting Razor's sister and capturing the pirates.

Maybe he'd string them up on a tree. See how they liked it.

"I'm sorry, Sorun," Razor apologized in a saddened tone. "I dragged you into my mess and now look at us. I shouldn't have talked you into-"

"I talked myself into it, now shut up." Razor did so, letting Sorun focus on their surroundings. "Where're the Chao? Didn't they help?"

"So don't get mad, but, uh... they got into the purple coconuts."

"..." If he wasn't restrained Sorun probably would have bashed his head against something. It took a lot of willpower not to beat the back of his head against Razor's. "Hey, Razor?" he asked when he suddenly realized something was missing. "Where'd the Chaos Emerald go?"

"It was a big, glowing jewel and we were attacked by pirates," Razor said in a mimic of Sorun's deadpan. "What do you think happened?"

Sorun idly began wondering if the concept of keelhauling existed in this world and if he should introduce it.

"But hey, it'll be fine!" Razor assured him. "I'm sure we'll find a way to get out of this. Somehow. Hey, do you know how to undo knots?"

Sorun made a hum. "Razor, my friends are all guerilla fighters who spent a majority of their lives fighting a maniac overlord with an army of robot henchmen. I learned a lot of stuff when I got inducted with them. I can arm bombs, pick locks, sneak into highly-secure facilities and commit various acts of subterfuge with... well, not with the best of them but I'm halfway decent."

"Oh, cool! So you can undo the ropes?"

Sorun hung his head. "No, surprisingly ropes never came up alongside all that other stuff."

He could almost feel the flat, disappointed face Razor was surely making at Sorun. "Wow, Sorun..."

"What do you want from me, Razor!? I can't even move my hands anyways!"

"Alright, sheesh. I hear ya." A sigh escaped Razor. "So any ideas?"

"I'm working on it." In other words, Sorun had none. But he wouldn't admit that to Razor.

The shark sighed. "Alright, well, tell me how that works out."

In fairness to Sorun, he did try thinking of a way to free them from their binds. He never came up with any decent ideas that could be put to practical use, but he'd tried. If he still had his powers he'd be able to just use his Bringer Claws to rip through the rope. Or use his Summoned Swords. The Doppelganger. He could have just shrugged the ropes off if he still had Devil's Body.

But he didn't have any of that. Without that Emerald he was as good and weak as any ordinary human. And because of that they were stuck. It was a frustrating feeling Sorun didn't like. The helplessness.

"Maybe I should have just absorbed it for Yamato. Nicole woulda killed me for taking twelve years off my life, but jeez, at least I wouldn't be stuck here. Sheesh..."

Why couldn't life ever be simple with him here?

"You know, Razor, I figured you being a shark would mean you'd have really rough skin, but now that we're tied together I gotta say. You're skin is unusually smooth and soft." It was downright comfortable, actually, which was a welcome distraction from the chaffing rope keeping the both of them aloft. Sorun was just glad he had the shirt and vest on to keep it from digging into his torso, but his arms weren't spared. He imagined it probably wasn't going as well for Razor.

Caught unaware from the compliment, Razor made an abashed chuckle. "W-well, um, uh, th-thanks, Sorun. You, er..." Razor trailed off, and Sorun felt his head move as he looked down. "Hey, look!"

Sorun looked down towards the ground. Coming out from the shrubbery in the center of the island and wadding through the sand towards them in a position they both could see was a black and green Chao. Razor's Chao. He looked a bit bleary-eyed, likely from recently waking up, but he still seemed to have enough lucidity to look up at the two hanging teens.

"Crusher! Help!" Razor called down.

The Chao blinked up at them. Curiously, its gaze shifted over from them to a palm tree that was right next to him. Crusher waddled over to the tree, reared back one of his hands, and then punched forwards and struck the tree's trunk.

The tree and its giant palm leaves shook. A coconut had dropped down from the top and right in front of Crusher, who then proceeded to punch the coconut once. It split in half, after which the Chao proceeded to begin eating it in full view of Sorun and Razor, who the Chao seemed to be outright ignoring.

"... Your Chao's an idiot," Sorun said in a flat tone as he stared down at the Chao.

"H-hey, he's not... a little, yeah," Razor admitted with a sigh.

More grass rustled as a second small form came out of the same spot in the brush as Crusher had. A black and blue Chao. Virgil.

"Virgil! Help!" Sorun called down.

The Chao had only briefly regarded the two of them before he looked up, and then flew to the top of the nearest palm tree. He slashed his bladed arm out once, causing a coconut to fall down to the ground. He landed right besides it, after which he used the blades on his arm to cut the coconut in half and then began to eat it.

Sorun could have scoffed. What was two teenagers tied up against their will to a coconut? Betrayal had never hurt as much before.

"Why do we keep these things as pets?" Sorun asked, staring down at his own Chao with narrowed eyes.

"I don't know." Sorun felt Razor shift a bit behind him. "So what now?"

"Aren't you a shark?" Sorun asked as he craned his head as far as it could go over his shoulder. "Can't you just bite through the rope?"

"Does it honestly seem like I can get my mouth in a good position to bite at ropes pressing against my chest?" Razor asked, tone a bit tired and irate.

"I meant the one above us."

"Oh." Making an apologetic wince, Razor looked up at the rope holding them up. "No, it's a bit too far. I could probably get my head far back enough to saw through it with a single tooth."

Sighing, Sorun shook his head. "Nah, it'd take too long to cut through with... wait, cut, don't you have a knife?" He distinctly remembered Razor having a knife. His hands were tied to his sides, but he had just the barest amount of movement and could feel Razor's hips. He could probably... "Wait, there's no way they would have actually left him with the-"

His thoughts cut off when, during his fumbling, he managed to feel the hilt of the knife. Sorun blinked in surprise, and even made a confused noise when he located it.

Razor, for his part, seemed much more enthusiastic. "Oh, right! You think you can get it out and cut through the ropes?"

"... Probably?" He'd already managed to pull the knife out from its sheath. Awkwardly, due to how little space his hand had between the ropes, he'd managed to flip the knife around and press forwards. He saw the knife's blade peek through the ropes tying Sorun to Razor, after which he began sawing through the nearest cord. "Why did they leave you with this? You'd think they would have stripped you of something you could have used to get through the ropes."

"Eh. I guess they're not very good at this." Razor did his best to shrug. "I mean, it's not like we've ever done something like this before. At least they didn't when I was with them."

"Ah. So they're not just pirates. They're mediocre pirates." The first cord of the rope was sawed through. The knife was sharper than it looked, apparently. "I guess I shouldn't have expected much from a small group of people who made a living looting and stealing from helpless folk that can't defend themselves. They probably don't have a lot of experience dealing with people. This'll be easier than I thought if that's the case. They won't be as prepared to deal with us."

Cutting through the second cord of rope seemed to be what did the trick. The second the knife cut all the way through, Sorun felt the ropes binding both him and Razor slack completely. And then gravity took over, resulting in both teens yelling out in surprise when they began falling.

There was a small burst of sand when Sorun and Razor impacted the beach, followed by the loose rope coiling on top of the both of them. Sorun was the first one to move, making a sigh as he pushed up off the sand and looked up to see Virgil and Crusher right in front of him, with both of their coconuts right in front of them.

"I'm glad we keep such dependable company," he grunted out as he stood up to his feet. Razor rose up alongside him, and then paused in surprise when Sorun handed him his knife back. He was stuck staring down at the knife while Sorun had walked completely past him, making his way towards the end of the beach.

"Now I gotta hunt down a band of fucking pirates just to get the damn rock back," Sorun thought to himself. He couldn't tell what was worse- his frustration over this whole situation or the anger at him and Razor having been tied up. Both made him feel miserable. And beyond that he felt rushed to find them as quickly as possible since they held his only means of returning to New Mobotropolis. He didn't want to lose them. "Maybe Razor'll have an idea of where... seriously?"

He saw it once he made his way to the edge of the beach where the waves were rolling over the sand. A classic-ass pirate ship. Anchored a good eighty-ish, maybe a hundred meters away from them.

"Oh, hey, they're still here." Razor had caught up with Sorun and stopped right besides him. Sorun, meanwhile, was still dumbstruck and staring out at the ship in silence. "Pretty lucky of us, huh, Sorun?"

Sorun finally found his voice and asked, "Why are they still here?" in a defeated, confused voice. He would have thought the whole reason they tied them up in the first place was so they couldn't follow them. That should have constituted them moving far away from the island. He couldn't fathom why they would stop so close.

"Eh, they actually do this sometimes," Razor said in response to Sorun's question. "You were asleep when they took it but they were pretty excited when they got that big, glowing gem of yours. Said it'd make 'em a fortune and last them years. I guess they couldn't wait to drop anchor and celebrate. They'd do it all the time whenever we got a big score."

"Didn't even bother to put a decent amount of distance between us," Sorun muttered. "They really are amateurs."

"What do you mean 'didn't put distance between us'?" Razor asked as he gestured out to the ship. "That looks pretty far to me."

Sorun shook his head. "That's not distance. It's not distance if we can still see and track them."

"Sure, but how are we supposed to get over there? Our only option is to swim and it's broad daylight. They'd see us coming a mile away and they'd haul anchor and take off before we got close. I can swim fast, Sorun, but I can't swim faster than a ship." He glanced at Sorun. "And you don't look like you can swim fast at all."

"Can't you just go deep enough they can't see you approach?"

"Well, yeah, I can. But you can't."

He had a point there. Distance really didn't matter all that much if they'd see them coming. Even further was that Sorun himself didn't have a chance of swimming out that far. The distance alone was daunting. Running a hundred meters was something Sorun could pull off reasonably well, but swimming ? He doubted he could even do that, and if he could, he'd wind up exhausted in the process. Razor could make it easily, he was built for that kind of thing, and the Chao could just fly, but he didn't have a good shot. He didn't count on him being able to hold his breath for that long, either.

"That's... a potential problem, yeah," Sorun admitted. "Well, we still need to get over there, Razor. I need the Chaos Emerald they stole to get back to New Mobotropolis, and you need to deal with your sister."

"And stop the pirates," Razor reminded.

"Ohhh, don't you worry about that, Razor. I'll deal with them alright." By the time he was done with them they were gonna wish they never became pirates to begin with. "Just gotta figure out how we can get over there..."

During Sorun's and Razor's silent contemplations, Virgil had flown over to the pair and started looking between the both of them. He looked back and forth a couple of times, and then looked forwards towards the ship in the distance. He nodded to himself, and then flew up to Sorun's face.

"Chao." Virgil pointed out towards the ship when Sorun began looking at him. "Chao."

"Yeah, we gotta get over there," Sorun said. "You got an idea of how we can get there?"

"Chao."

Sorun's eyebrows rose in surprise. "Really? How?"

Instead of making another sound, Virgil pointed over towards the plane, at the front where the mangled propeller was. Sorun looked over towards it, and then back at Virgil, who had lowered himself into the water. His V-shaped wings were folded as far as they could go, and his bladed arms were extended out to his sides.

And then, he began spinning. Like a small, blue and black propeller. Virgil's body became little more than a round, blurred object as he began spinning, causing water to fly and splash out in all directions. But most importantly, he was moving . Extremely fast. Almost too fast for Sorun's eyes to keep up with. He'd even gone out far enough that Virgil was so deep under the water he wasn't disturbing the surface, though Sorun could still see his dark form zipping around underwater.

Eventually, the Chao made his way back to Sorun's and Razor's position. He quit spinning and rose up out of the water. He was dripping wet, but otherwise he seemed completely fine.

"Chao." Once again, Virgil pointed towards the broken propeller, seemingly ignoring the wide-eyed looks Sorun and Razor were giving him. "Chao." He pointed back to the ship.

"You... learned how to spin really fast from watching a propeller work...?" Sorun mumbled in disbelief. "What is it with things in this world and spinning? Kinda reminds me of the Vortex technique from the first 'DMC' game." He made a hum and looked towards the ship. "Virgil ain't really that physically strong... he is fast, though. Fast enough spin like that, at least. Could that work...?"

"Sorun, please don't tell me you want Virgil to spin us all the way over there." Razor seemed to have already caught on to the idea, and had taken a step back away from them. He seemed queasy from the thought alone. "I don't really handle spinning that well..."

"I mean, it should work." Razor let out a groan as Sorun began rubbing at his chin. "We can make a chain or something. You hold onto Virgil's foot with one hand, hold onto my hand with the other, your Chao can grab onto me, and then Virgil the living propeller-"

"Chao."

Sorun winced at the harsh-sounding chao Virgil gave him. "Then Virgil uses Vortex to propel us over there."

Razor's eyes squinted a bit in confusion. "Vortex...?"

"Don't worry about it." Waving off the shark's confusion, Sorun turned to Razor and said, "I can hold my breath for a minute. Ish. Give or take ten seconds. Should be enough time for him to get us over there while hiding us underwater."

"Okay, but can you hold on while doing that and being spun around?"

"Well, no. That's why I need you to hold on for me." If he tried doing it he'd just lose his grip and get flung away. But Razor was a Mobian with freakish Mobian strength. He could hold on fine. All Sorun needed to do was endure what was hopefully a very short ride.

Razor, however, did not seem very onboard with the plan. In fact he was shaking his head and hands while backing up further. "Nuh-uh, no way. I don't do spinning. Sorun, come on, think of something else-"

"You want to save your sister or not? If you got a better idea then I'm all ears."

That managed to stop Razor in his tracks. He looked towards the ship, and then took in a deep breath while gripping his hands. "Grrr... fine, fine ." He pointed up at Sorun. "You better be sure this works, 'cause if it doesn't-"

"I have the utmost fate in Virgil, Razor." Sorun glanced to the side at the Chao, who gave him a nod. "See? He's got it. It'll be completely fine. Now hurry up and grab onto him. I wanna get this over with quick."

"You and my both..." Razor grumbled as he began dragging his feet towards Virgil. Literally. His feet were leaving trenches in the sand. "This is gonna be a mess."

"Razor, it'll be fine. Trust me."

In Sorun's defense, it had worked.

That was the only good thing he could think to say about the plan.

Oh, they'd gotten there. For sure they'd arrived. Sorun hadn't been able to see it because his entire world turned into a blur when Virgil started spinning. He was glad he had Razor hold onto both him and Virgil, because there was no world where Sorun would have been able to hold on during all that chaos. He was pretty sure halfway he'd failed at holding his breath and accidentally swallowed more seawater than he was comfortable with.

The only upside was that the duration of the trip was just under twenty seconds. Eighteen, maybe. Sorun hadn't counted. Probably couldn't have if he tried.

He was so dizzy afterwards that he hadn't recalled what happened next. Razor, with the help of the two Chao, had hauled him somewhere. Now all he knew was that he was lying down on something flat, everything was dark, and he smelled a lot of wood. That's all his senses could perceive past the intense vertigo and nausea he felt.

"Sorun... you're not allowed to make plans anymore..." Past all the blurriness in his vision Sorun managed to turn his head and catch Razor sitting next to a square hole in what he assumed was the ship's hull. "Never... never again-"

"Shut up. Just shut up." Sorun groaned and lifted both his hands up to rub at his face. He heard a faint ringing in his head and his shoulders felt like they were about to fall off. They still worked, at least. "Where're we?"

"Virgil cut a hole in the ship. We dragged you in," Razor mumbled back in response. He didn't sound much better than Sorun. "We're, uh..." He took a second to look around. "I think this's... storage? Yeah. Looks right..."

"Sure. We'll go with that." The dizziness and nausea was slowly fading, thankfully. Moving slowly, Sorun had rolled onto his stomach and pushed up onto all of his fours. "Would the Emerald be around here somewhere?"

"Probably. Our luck's still holding." Groggily, Razor rose a hand up and pointed to the side. "Look over there."

Sorun followed towards where Razor was pointing. There was... definitely stuff over there, that much was certain. A blurry pile of items he couldn't make out. That was as far as Sorun got because the vertigo returned, and when he tried standing up it only resulted in him falling onto his back.

His legs weren't working. Or gravity. Something. He couldn't stand. Was barely resisting the urge to throw up as it was.

"Virgil, can you... do me a favor a go see if the Emerald's over there somewhere..." Sorun mumbled out, lifting up his hand and waving in the general direction Razor had pointed to.

Wordlessly, the Chao flew over Sorun's form towards where he pointed to earlier. There was the sound of things being shifted and tossed around, some cutting and bashing sounds as boxes were cut into. Clinking sounds as metal objects fell down to the ground. Sorun didn't know what any of it meant. And with how he felt, he just couldn't find it in himself it care.

"Chao." Something glowing was placed next to Sorun's head. He turned to the side, seeing Virgil float next to him and a blue, glowing gem having been set down besides his head. With a single, drawn-out groan, he lifted his closest hand up and placed it on the Emerald.

A couple seconds after making contact with the Chaos Emerald, Sorun's hair began to shift from the color black to a pure white color. He made a sigh of relief as a pleasant, cooling sensation began to race through his body. The pain in his shoulders vanished seemingly instantly. The nausea and dizziness left. From the moment his hair turned white, Sorun had went from the mess he'd been seconds prior to feeling fine. Better than fine. Like he could take on the entire world and win.

"Forgot how good this feels," Sorun thought as he sat up straight. Completely fine. So light he felt like he could float on air. The power, the strength he felt... it truly was intoxicating. Alas, he only wanted Devil's Body to heal the vertigo, and thus cut the power off. His hair darkened back to black, and the inhuman vitality Sorun had felt faded with it. He actually found himself frowning when he got brought back down to... to this . Back to normal human physical limits.

"Alright. Back at a hundred percent," Sorun said as he stood up. He didn't feel at a hundred percent despite the fact he was. Being deprived of that supernatural vitality was responsible, he supposed. It wasn't pleasant snapping back from having so much power to having an ordinary human body again. He didn't like the sensation. "Um... apparently you aren't," Sorun observed when he saw Virgil laying at his feet. Sleeping seemingly. When he turned to Razor, he saw that Crusher was in a similar state.

"I don't think they can handle all that spinning," Razor groggily explained.

"Unfortunate. You doing okay?" Sorun asked Razor.

"Gettin' there," he mumbled as he shakily got up to his feet. "How are you already okay?"

"Wacky magic nonsense." Turning away from the shark, Sorun turned back to where he presumed Virgil had obtained the Emerald. They'd ended up in what he assumed was the cargo hold. If Razor hadn't already told him they'd come in from the bottom through a hole Virgil cut he could guess as much based on how the contours of the walls curved in a way that suggested they were at the bottom of the ship. It was mostly boxes and random items strewn around in random piles in the spacious room, some bound to the walls with nets, other seemingly haphazardly thrown about in the aforementioned piles.

Coins he didn't recognize here, jewels, silverware, and other valuable-looking items there, barrels of something he was sure was stolen, crates of likely equally-stolen goods, even some nice-looking furniture. Food, too, that Sorun managed to spot in some of the crates that happened to be open. A lot of food. Way more than six people could ever go through even if they rationed for a whole month. There were some classic-looking pirate chests as well, some of which looked like they'd been cut into. Virgil must have broke into them looking for the Chaos Emerald. Probably the one that had other jewels spilling out of it.

"So this is is where they store the swag, huh? The swag storage." He heard some footsteps as Razor stopped right next to him. "They actually do anything with this stuff or are they just hoarders by trade?" Sorun asked.

"Eh. Depends," Razor answered with a shrug. "The captain has all these ties to all these fences and shady people in the not-so-white market they hawk this stuff off to most of the time."

"Even the food?"

"What they can't get through before it spoils, yeah. There's a market for everything down in the undersea. Only stuff we never got rid of was stuff we could use. Or wanted to keep just because."

"I see." Sorun glanced to the side at Razor. He was staring down at the stolen goods with a saddened expression. "It took everyone betraying you to realize maybe this wasn't such a good thing to be doing?"

He only grew sadder. "Wasn't always like this. Used to be we just did it to survive. And we never hurt anybody raiding abandoned ruins. Now I... I just don't know when it changed."

Sighing, Sorun turned back to looking at the stolen things. "Sometimes there isn't something as definitive as a changing point. Sometimes it's just gradual, little things you don't even notice adding up over time. You don't see the change happening because you get used to all the little changes. Then something like what happens with you happens and I guess it becomes really obvious when you look back and remember how different it used to be."

"Yeah." Razor hung his shoulders. "I guess you know the feeling, huh?"

"A bit." A moment passed. "What are you planning on doing about your sister? You even have an idea of what you're gonna say?"

"I was thinking of appealing to her better side to try and convince her to stop."

"Alright, and when that doesn't work?"

"Tie her up, bring her home, and kinda just leave her alone until she calms down?"

"..." Sorun huffed out a breath and shook his head. "It's honestly a horrible plan, but I don't really have a better idea."

A nearby rattle caused Sorun and Razor to perk their heads straight up. The rattle soon ceased, after which came the soft, squeaking sound of a door opening. Both teens turned their heads towards the source of the noise, at which point Sorun noticed a door that was at the end of the cargo hold. A door that was currently open. An open doorway with a short, purple-furred Mobian standing in it and giving them a wide-eyed look.

Before the Mobian could do anything a blue, spectral hand shot past the space separating them and gripped his face. The Mobian made a muffled scream into the spectral palm holding him and frantically scratched at it as the hand pulled him into the cargo hold, closer to where Sorun and Razor were, the former having formed his Bringer Claws. The panicked, muffled screaming was abruptly stopped when Sorun willed the arm holding him to lift him in the air and slam the back of his head down on the wood floor they stood on. The Mobian went limp, prompting Sorun to let him go as he calmly stared down at the fallen Mobian.

Razor didn't look nearly as calm. "Geez, Sorun, did you have to be so rough with him!?" he whisper-yelled at the human. "You probably concussed him doing that!"

"We're gonna have a very difficult time going about this if you criticize me for every wound I'm gonna inflict on these guys," Sorun said back. "Gimme a break. He's fine. Just knocked out."

"I..." Razor took in a deep breath, and then released it as he looked back at the purple Mobian. "I know, you're right. I'm sorry. But out of everybody here Dive's the best one. He was always in it more for the adventure than anything else."

"Well, too late to do anything about it now." There was, admittedly, some twinge of guilt Sorun felt upon Razor telling him that. He managed to convince himself it didn't matter; a pirate was a pirate and they all had to be captured by the end anyways. He was complicit by staying with them. Razor wanted to capture them all and take his sister away from this life for a reason.

He was only unconscious anyways.

"I promised you I wouldn't leave any permanent damage on any of them, Razor, but that doesn't mean I'm not playing it safe. They're pirates." One Bringer Claw stretched out to lift up the purple Mobian's body. The other one shot out to punch the lock off a nearby chest and open it. "I do things quick a brutal. It's efficient. And less risk for either of us."

Ironically it was a lesson he'd had to learn for himself as opposed to it being taught to him by the Freedom Fighters. The fictional media he'd consumed during his life on Earth helped in that respect, but back when he'd had very few powers and was fighting things much more strong than he was it was a quickly-reinforced lesson. Others like Sonic, who liked to crack those never-ending jokes of his mid-battle, never seemed to learn that lesson. Maybe because people like him never needed to because they were so strong. Shadow was an exception, likely due to a case of over-professionalism Sorun suspected, and other Freedom Fighters weren't completely ignorant to the method. Couldn't afford to since some didn't have powers and had to rely on other means.

Then there was Sonic who always had to fool around in fights...

None of them had ever been as weak as Sorun, though. Nobody on this planet was. Not until he'd gotten the powers, and even then a number of those missions he'd been on so many times back then had been dicey. So he'd learned quick to end it fast. Perhaps it was one of the reason his subconscious took such a taking to Yamato. It and its in-universe owner were the epitome of dispatching enemies with utmost precision and efficiency. It certainly served him well enough.

Probably wouldn't in this case when he wasn't allowed to sever body parts. He'd promised Razor.

"Can we please not put him in the box?" Sorun paused halfway to placing Dive in the open chest when Razor's voice reached him. He turned towards the shark to see an uneasy look on his face. "He doesn't like the dark. He'll freak out if he wakes up in there."

Sorun could barely repress the sigh that almost left him. "Razor..." he half-groaned, half-whined out.

Razor bent down and picked up a nearby bundle of discarded rope. "Here, just give him to me. I'll tie him up."

A pirate afraid of the dark. Sorun would have laughed if he wasn't so busy handing the Mobian off to Razor so he could tie him up, prompting the Bringer Claws to disappear off Sorun's back. He crossed his arms, one hand still holding onto the Emerald, and leaned back on a nearby pillar as he watched Razor work. Virgil, meanwhile, had floated up and landed on Sorun's shoulder to watch alongside him. He'd woken up finally. Still looked half-asleep, but hanging in there thankfully enough

"So is there a plan on dealing with the rest of them?" Sorun asked. "Besides just leaving them all to me and Virgil while you deal with your sister."

"Yeah, about that." With a final pull of the rope to tighten the knots Razor used to bind Dive, he got up from his kneeling position to look at Sorun. "You think we can try talking to them first?"

"No."

"Chao-chao."

"Guys, come on!" Razor half-shouted in a pleading voice. "I at least wanna give them a chance first!"

This time, Sorun did sigh while reaching up to pinch the bridge of his nose. "Razor, our goal is to incapacitate these people so the guards in the city you live in can incarcerate them. They're not just gonna give up their freedom 'cause it's the right and proper thing to do. They're gonna fight for it." He glanced to the side. "'Sides. They're pirates. You don't honestly think there's a chance they'll see reason?"

Hesitantly, Razor looked down to his feet. "My sister might," he said.

Sorun doubted it. Extremely doubted it. He looked back at Razor and opened his mouth to say so, but when he saw that miserable expression on the shark's face, he paused. He wanted to tell Razor it was a futile effort and they should just go in swinging for the surprise advantage, that it'd be less risky that way and that talking would just make it that much harder for them. But then there was that look on Razor's face, and Sorun didn't want to make it worse.

Thus, Sorun groaned loudly and looked up at the ceiling. "Fiiiine, we'll... we'll talk first. For whatever good that'll do," he grumbled.

He wasn't so sure if adding extra danger onto all this was worth the smile Razor gave him. Felt nice, at least. "Thanks Sorun. It'll be fine, you'll see."

"'It'll be fine, you'll see,'" Sorun mockingly repeated in his mind. Holding in the scoff that threatened to come out, Sorun pushed off the beam as Virgil floated off his shoulder. "If you say so. Alright. Let's get this show on the road."

Before he could even get a single step in, Virgil's eyes rolled into the back of his head as he fell back into unconsciousness. He dropped back onto the floor.

"... Guess he ain't over it yet..."

It'd taken some creeping around the ship by the two of them to confirm that the five remaining pirates they were looking for weren't even in the ship. Razor had pointed out that they were probably all celebrating up on the top deck of the ship, which, after approaching it from the inside of the ship, they managed to confirm through the myriad voices they heard above them.

This lead to Sorun and Razor, the two unconscious Chao cradled in Razor's arms, crouching behind a nearby gathering of barrels on the edge of the deck of the ship after having snuck up a small flight of stairs. Sorun himself never got a single look at the five pirates. He imagined the one that was Razor's sister would be a shark like him, but he didn't know about the rest. He was a bit tense, but otherwise calm.

Razor wasn't so calm. He was breathing a bit heavier than what should have been normal, and his hands were clenching and unclenching under the Chao. From whether it was nervousness over what was about to happen, or him feeling some emotion due to him having to confront what basically amounted to a family that abandoned him, Sorun didn't know.

"When oh when was the last time I fought Mobians? Just that one time with Infinite? I only had two powers then." Sorun looked down at the Emerald in his hand. "Now it's whichever of the seven I need. So which one do I use?"

One of the ranged ones, maybe. Tricking was nice for defense, but dodging wasn't going to get him anywhere, and he wasn't good enough to switch them too fast to make it viable. Yamato would be nice, but that was too easy to hurt with... Bringer Claws? Worked last time.

He would have thought on it further if Razor's current state wasn't distracting him so much. He looked up to see the shark gripping the handle of his knife, not having yet committed to pulling it from its sheath. The two Chao were laid down at his feet. "You gonna be alright, Razor?" he whispered to Razor over the nearby talking.

Razor gave Sorun a staggering nod. "M-mhm. Yeah. Just... gettin' psyched, y'know?"

Sorun didn't find himself believing Razor. He sighed, and then looked ahead. There was nobody in the raised section of the ship where the steering wheel was, with a guardrail being at the front edge of that section and a small set of stairs on either side. Sorun tossed the Emerald up and down in his hand once in thought, and then glanced back at Razor.

"I'll start it off. Just follow my lead," he said.

Razor's eyes widened. "Wait, wait, I'm not ready!"

"No time like the present."

And with that, Sorun Tricked away and reappeared sitting on the guardrail above the main section of the deck. He saw four of the five Mobians that were supposed to be there down below him, conversing with each other with calm expressions on their faces. It looked like a completely normal gathering.

"What a crock." Sorun looked closer at the group. "Kinda a tall-looking Mobian with a pirate coat and eyepatch an' everything. Teal-furred... fuck is that, a mouse? Eh." He looked at the others. "Red-skinned shark girl, gotta be Razor's sister. Yellow... Jesus, that a jelly fish?" By and large she was a normal looking Mobian, save for the fact she had a circular, gelatinous... thing on her head with wavy tentacles hanging around her like extremely-deadly hair. "Then there's the fourth guy..."

Sorun didn't even know what he was. The biggest one by far, at least twice the size of a normal Mobian. A white-furred thing with, oddly enough, claws for hands. A big shell on its back and a yellowish, round head with antennae. Some kind of sea creature, but for the life of Sorun he couldn't figure out what it was.

"What the hell in the ocean has white fur and claws? A..." Sorun's thoughts stalled. "No, I got nothing."

While he was thinking one of the pirates must have noticed him. He noticed all the conversation had ceased, and when he looked back down at them, they were all looking up at him with surprised, confused faces. There was complete silence between them that lasted for a whole twenty seconds before Sorun pointed at the big guy.

"Before we begin somebody tell me what that is," Sorun requested. "I can't figure it out."

He saw the blue probably-mouse blink his left eye, the right covered with a patch, and look to the side at the large Mobian. He looked back at Sorun, visibly confused and bewildered at the request and Sorun's presence. "He's, uh... he's a yeti crab," he answered. Sorun had twitched slightly when he heard that pirate-like accent leave his mouth.

"The abominable snowman?" Sorun mumbled, more to himself than the group. "Huh. All the continental drift must have made his species relocate from the north pole. So I guess that means they're real? Huh. Weird."

The captain's mouth opened a bit in confusion as he tilted his head to the side. "I haven't the slightest wha' I just heard. Who are ye?"

"Who I am is nobody. The reason I'm here is twofold." Sorun held the Chaos Emerald up, and watched as the captain's eye widened in recognition. "Half that reason is 'cause of this. You stole it from me."

"Ahhh, now I remember ye," the captain said with some realization. The other three around him began frowning up at Sorun as the confused looks faded. "You were the sleepin' beauty we found alongside with that traitor on the island. 'Fraid that gem there was rightfully taken, lad. We didn't steal nothin'."

"It's mine by right of finders keepers," Sorun argued, making the captain grin a bit in amusement. "I found it, so I get to keep it. But then you took it while I was sleeping. I'm here to take it back."

"Aye, by that logic we get to keep it by findin' it. 'Tis yer fault fer keepin' yer eyes offa it," the captain argued back.

"Is that so? Because I just happened to find this in your cargo hold," Sorun said. "So I guess that means I get to keep it."

"Ha!" The captain barked out in amusement, even going as far as to slap his knee. "Ya got spirit, lad. I can't letcha go wit' that, though. Ya even know what that little item is worth?"

"Do you ?" Sorun challenged. To embolden his point, he had the gem shift back into Yamato, making the four flinch back in surprise. "You idiots don't even know what this is or what can be done with it. Just let me have it." He slung the sheathed katana over his shoulders. "The purple guy down below didn't like finding me."

At that, the four of them stiffened. The deep frowns had turned a bit worried at seeing the katana, but now they were all throwing hostile glares at him when he mentioned Dive. "An' jus' what exactly ," the captain ground out, "did ye do to Dive?"

"He's breathing. Scarred for life. But breathing," Sorun said. "Mentally scarred, but eh, they don't gotta know that. The intimidation factor might work with me here."

"Sorun, cut it out!"

"And then he comes in and ruins my fun," Sorun mentally sighed out as he watched Razor pop up from behind the barrels. Surprisingly the demeanor of the pirates didn't change all that much even with Razor's reveal. They looked a bit more shocked as he marched towards the front of the grounp to down directly under Sorun, but they were still mainly angry. And at Sorun, of all people. It made the human grow a bit confused himself at all the ire he'd earned.

"An' there he is. The traitor hisself," the captain said in a scathing tone, single eye narrowed at Razor.

"He's the other half of the reason I'm here," Sorun helpfully supplied in a light tone, his feet playfully kicking off the edge of the guardrail.

"You shut up!" This had come from Razor's sister. The shark pirate. Red-skinned with bits of black on the tips of her fins and other parts. Same eyes as Razor. She stomped forwards towards the head of the group and angrily pointed at Razor. "And you !" she yelled out. "What are you doing back here!?"

"What am I doing here!? I'm here to get you out of here!" Razor yelled back. "I need to get you away from these people before you do something you can't take back, Blade!"

"What- that doesn't- just who do you think you are, you-!?"

"Now, now, lass. Let's all calm down." The tall, teal-furred Mobian placed a calming hand on the red shark's shoulder. She was still practically snarling at her brother, who was shying back a bit in shock, but her eyes were up and focused on Sorun as well. But she'd still allowed the captain to gently push her back into the crowd as he stepped back ahead of them again and cleared his throat before speaking. "I shan't be speakin' with the one that abandoned us, but I think you an' I be needin' introductions. Sorun, was it?"

Sorun blinked, but otherwise said nothing. They were all staring up at him again. And they still looked beyond angry. Rage, pure and simple. Razor's sister, Blade, especially. Her sharpened teeth were practically gnawing. The captain seemed more guarded than anything else, but there was no mistaking the anger in his eye as well.

What had he done to make them so mad at him?

"... Yeah, I'm Sorun," he confirmed. "You the captain?"

The Mobian nodded. "Aye, that be me. Captain Shellbreaker of this here band of merry misfits."

Sorun snorted. "Shellbreaker the mouse?"

The frown on Shellbreaker's face deepened. "Otter, lad. Otter."

"Ah. I'm a human, in case you cared. It's not important if you don't know what that is." Probably should have figured out he was an otter in hindsight, but oh well. "Listen, Shelly, my good friend Razor here's worried about his sister. And the fact you guys are kinda terrorizing the deep sea. So that's gotta stop."

"Alright, I think I'm seein' how it is." The frown disappeared off from the captain' face. In its place was a small smirk that formed as he began pacing in small amounts back and forth in front of the group of pirates, making a random gesture with his arms at some points. His eye would sometimes flicker down to Razor, but for the most part his focus was maintained on Sorun. "We're naught but outcasts tryin' to get by, lad. Despite what this traitor may 'ave said to ye-" He drew the cutlass at his side and pointed its tip at Razor, "- we didn't choose to be dishonest folk makin' a dishonest livin'."

Sorun tapped his shoulder a few times with Yamato. "Maybe," he admitted. "I don't know anything about what happens in the ocean. I'm really just here to get my rock back and help a friend out. I couldn't care less what the circumstances that lead to all this are." His fingers began drumming along the handle. "And I don't care what happened to you. He said you're going around robbing folks in need."

"Whatever Razor told ye was a gross overexaggeration of what we did."

"I don't care about frequency. You still did it." Sorun's eyes flicked down to Razor. "And it ain't my choice. It's Razor's choice. And he wants his sister back and for you all to stop." He glanced back up at the one-eyed Mobian. "So you stop. Or I make you stop."

He noticed Razor look up Sorun. Surprise and gratefulness was written on his face, which made Sorun shift a bit in his seat out of the emotional uncomfort of the attention given to him. The captain had seen the reaction, too. He was actively looking between Sorun and Razor as a dawning look settled on his face. And then he resumed pacing and tried talking again.

"Oh, Razor. Ye couldn't fight yer own battles, so ye tried bringin' in new talent to do it for ye," Shellbreaker said in a admonishing tone.

By now, Razor had pulled his knife out. He was gripping it roughly as an angered expression grew on his face. "It isn't like that!" he growled out. "Sorun chose to help me with this! It was all his decision!"

"An' I can respect that. Loyalty. It be a precious commodity these days. Wouldn't ya agree, Sorun?" The one-eyed Mobian looked back up at Sorun. "I've been havin' a stroke o' bad luck when it comes t' loyalty, Sorun. The traitor firs', then another of our crew up and left us."

"Yeah, I was wondering about that," Razor spoke, eyes narrowed and both hands still firmly gripped around his knife's handle. "Why're you acting captain, Shellbreaker? What happened to Abyss?"

"She left," Shellbreaker informed him in a clipped tone. For reasons Sorun didn't know due to a lack of context, that caused Razor to drop his guard slightly. "The piratin' life weren't good enough for her. Said she was leavin' to go pursue bigger ventures. Feh. Whatever that be meanin'," the teal Mobian grumbled. "I've been havin' crew betray me left and right, Sorun. I know very few 'sides Mr. Bristles right here-" he nodded his head at the weird shelled yeti, "- who I'd trust with me own life. Lads like you who'd lay it all down for a friend I'm presumin' they jus' met is a rare thing. Rare thing indeed." He flipped his sword around in a reverse grip, and then stabbed its point into the deck to lean on it like a cane. "How's life treatin' ya, Sorun? It must be grand if you're able t' be lookin' down yer nose at us lowly pirates like yer doin' right now."

A scoff left Sorun. "Charismatic fucker. This his recruitment pitch?" Knowing one's way around words was a must for being a pirate captain, he supposed. Even Sorun would admit there was something to that captain's words that were drawing him. The charm, the accent, the content of his words. It was alluring, to an extent. Not the man himself, but the words. If he didn't know any better from seeing how many of the same example in movies in games, he'd probably be completely captivated.

Well, he'd seen 'Pirates of the Caribbean'. He knew what the score was, and he wasn't gonna be fooled by this. Even if he didn't see the way Shellbreaker kept sneaking those scornful glances at Razor. Sorun couldn't say if the otter was faking it or being genuine with Sorun, but there was no denying that he had an intense dislike of Razor. Which meant Sorun didn't like Shellbreaker.

It was sad in a way, Sorun realized. Razor going against them really did seem like a genuine betrayal in their eyes. And it was here he realized why they were so upset when he implied he hurt Dive badly. The concern over him, and the resentment of Razor. They really were a small little family out here.

"You've dragged me into something really complicated, Razor," Sorun silently lamented with a sigh. "It's too bad it'll end the same regardless. I could have gone on not knowing these details. I'll play along to what Mr. Pirate Man has to say, though. For clarity's sake."

"I can't hold down a job and I'm slowly starving to death 'cause nobody'll give me a chance. Life ain't too grand at all," Sorun said to him in response to his previous question.

The grin on Shellbreaker's face grew. All it did was make Sorun sigh again when it confirmed his suspicions. "See, we're not so different after all, now, are we? We're vagrants. Vagabonds. The world we live in wouldn't accept us, so we take what we want from the world to go on. Outcasts drawn together by a common need, all of us."

The other pirates behind him were nodding to the captain's words in agreement. Blade especially, much to Razor's visible sorrow.

"We took the twins in when they had nothin' jus' like us, and how did Razor repay us? By questionin' everythin' we stand for," Shellbreaker continued. "But Sorun, you and us? Cut from the same cloth, we are. Can see it even with one eye. I'll tell ye what. I can't letcha keep the gem, but if ye were to stay with us, well then that ain't givin' it away, now, is it?" His smile widened at Sorun. "Come on. Said so yourself. Why keep goin' on when ye can join yer fellow misfits?"

"And there it is," Sorun whispered, just loudly enough that everyone managed to hear him. "I ain't that desperate, pirate-man. Gonna be a hard pass for me." He slung one leg over the other, with one hand resting in his lap while the hand holding Yamato continually bounced it off his shoulders. "You're raggin' on about loyalty this an' that, but you're leaving the part out where I'd have to betray Razor's trust by doing that." He made a "tch" sound and turned his head. "Besides. I wouldn't be caught dead lowering myself down to your lot."

After that, the smile on Shellbreaker's face was all gone in an instant. The kindness and welcoming look left his eye. Now he was deeply frowning again and holding his sword in a normal grip. "What's that supposed to be meanin'?" he asked Sorun. "You steal from us and claim you aren't on our level?"

"I was born with a higher moral standing than some filthy pirate like you," Sorun said, once more drawing the ire of the four pirates. "And regardless of right or wrong, I'm taking this back. If you want it, then you'll have to take it." He stopped bouncing the sword on his shoulder. "You don't have a problem with me taking the gem just because I can, right? You people do it all the time after all."

He sent a cold glare down towards Shellbreaker, who met his gaze and matched it with a cold gaze of his own. They continued to stare at each other, unflinching and holding their own respective swords with rigid postures. The other pirates, likewise, were sending their own glares at Sorun. It was Razor who broke the silence of the stare-off after he began looking back and forth between them with an uncomfortable look.

"H-hey, Sorun, you can tone it down a bit, man," Razor said. "I'm not out to-"

"Just who do you think you are?" That fiery, tomboyish voice. Razor's sister. She stepped up to the head of the group, looking up at Sorun with sharp teeth practically gnashing. "I don't care what my brother said to you! You don't know a thing about us! Not a single thing!" she screamed up at him. "I don't care what life for you is like. You just got here, so don't you dare sit up there and look down on all of us like you know everything and you're better than us!"

"I'll do what I want." Ignoring the red shark completely, Sorun looked back to the captain. "I'm done with words. You giving up or not?"

"I shan't be thinkin' we'll be doing such a thing, Sorun." Shellbreaker rose his cutlass up in a more defensive posture. The tentacles around the yellow jellyfish Mobian began waving threateningly, the strange aquatic abominable snowman began snapping his claws, and Blade had drawn a knife of her own. "I'll give ye a counterproposal. Drop the gem and I'll let the both of ya walk away. Or fight and we'll throw you overboard to wash up and be stranded on that island."

"Bet."

With a small groan, Sorun slid off the guardrail and dropped right next to Razor, who was looking at the four pirates with a worried expression. He was switching on which person to aim his knife at, looking unsure as he glanced at Sorun.

"Hey, uh, Sorun? It's great Abyss is gone, but this is still four on two. Are you sure we got this?"

"Just deal with your sister," Sorun said. His voice was free of all worry, though that and his expression seemed a bit tight as he looked at the four pirates. "I'll help out if you don't finish by the time I'm done."

"You sure? Sorun!" Razor's yell went ignored by Sorun, who continued to slowly walk towards the pirates. He saw Blade walk past him in his peripheral, who'd given Sorun a hateful sneer as she approached her brother. He let her pass and focused on the last three pirates.

Three on one. Better odds than he'd come in thinking he'd have. Support from the Chao would have been nice, but he'd make do. It wasn't like they had any special powers. Just normal Mobians. Though the jellyfish one was making him nervous with those tentacles, and the size of the big, white-furred one was making him a bit nervous. Best not to get grabbed by either of those.

"You're makin' a mistake, lad," Shellbreaker said to him. "By the time the day's ended we'll be sailin' for the sunset-"

Sorun tore Yamato out from its sheath and made a high slash in a single movement, causing the three to duck their heads. A single, blue slash appeared in the middle of the mast of the ship, which quickly disappeared to reveal a neat gash cutting clean through the pole. A snapping noise and the sound of groaning wood was heard, making the three turn around to see that the mast was tilting off to the side. Quicker than Sorun would have thought it'd have gone the mast, and the sails connected to it, fell over the side of the ship and right into the water, with the three pirates watching with widened eyes.

"Gonna be pretty hard to do that without any sails," Sorun pointed out in a calm tone.

Tightening the grip around his cutlass, Shellbreaker snarled and turned around to Sorun. "Now you've done it, you-!"

Sorun swung the Yamato out again. There was a small, metal ting! sound as the katana's blade effortlessly cut through the cutlass blade being held out to Sorun, leaving the sword cut down to the hilt. The actual blade was sent spinning end-over-end through the air, with four sets of eyes following it as it fell down and impaled itself in the ship's deck.

"You were saying?" There was a flurry of movement in the corner of Sorun's vision, though he was too slow to react as a pair of flat, yellow tentacles wrapped around his sword arm. "Hey, now."

The tentacles were coming from the head of the yellow Mobian. The one wearing the black dress with skulls on it. There was just the faintest hint of fear in her eyes, but the confidence in that smirk of hers overshadowed it massively. Sorun wondered why until he felt it- the sharp feeling of something puncturing his skin in the same areas the tentacles were grabbing him. Multiple puncture sensations going off simultaneously.

"Tch!" It'd felt like feeling a shock race up his whole arm up to his spine. Sorun'd nearly lost his grip on his sword as a result. What did happen was that he began to feel dizzy. Intensely dizzy. That and a burning sensation beginning to grow in his arm. Mild for now, but it was exponentially growing worse and worse with every second.

It got bad quickly enough that Sorun was forced onto a single knee, with the human hissing out as he grabbed at his arm, which wasn't listening to him anymore. The sword slipped through his fingers, turning back into the blue Chaos Emerald which he caught with his left hand. That alone took a lot of effort for him: the dizziness and burning was increasing more and more, and the jellyfish wouldn't let go of his arm.

"Hah... you... you got 'im, Opal?" Shellbreaker panted out, looking towards Sorun as the concern in his eye began to fade.

"Oh, don't you worry." The cockiness, the sheer smug that came out of the Mobian woman's mouth, was enough to get through the pain Sorun was feeling in his arm. He'd frozen and felt strong indignation begin to course through him at that tone. "There's enough venom in him to put Mr. Bristles down. Even if the pain doesn't knock him out, he isn't going to be getting up." A small laugh left her. "Guess he was all talk after all."

Panic and worry began to set inside of Sorun. Panic and worry that was being massively overshadowed by the anger swelling in him. Anger over being inflicted to this pain. The humiliation and that tone the jellyfish had. That superior, cocky tone. So much like his. Sonic's. Sorun hated it so much.

His hair turned white.

"Huh?" The jellyfish stepped back in shock when Sorun stood back up to his feet, lips peeled back in an angry grimace as he felt the burning sensation in his arm immediately begin cooling as feeling returned to it. He even felt the yellow Mobian, looking more worried by the second, try to inject him with the venom again and again. He wasn't feeling its effects, though she still wouldn't let go of him. "Wh-why isn't it working!?"

Growling, Sorun made the arm being grabbed by the tentacles reach up and grab at them. Ignoring the small, stabbing sensations in his hand and arms, he yanked back and forced the jellyfish to stumble towards him. Once she was close enough Sorun shot his bound hand forwards and gripped her shoulder roughly, trapping her in place.

And then, he reared his head back, only to then bring it forwards and smash his pale forehead right into the Mobian woman's mouth. She screamed out in shock and pain and tried to wrench herself away from Sorun's grip, and he felt the stabbing sensations increase even more as she tried injecting more venom into him, but no matter what she tried Sorun didn't let go. He just continued to smash his forehead into her mouth, over and over. He'd noted drops of blood fly past his peripheral, and just barely managed to notice the scared Mobian was missing a number of teeth in her mouth after a few headbutts, but he didn't relent and reared back for another one.

He was interrupted at a flash of steel, after which Sorun felt the Emerald get knocked out of his hand. His hair darkened back to black as a result. At the same time the sound of it rolling away reached his ears Sorun saw that Shellbreaker was standing next to the jellyfish, a new cutlass in the otter's hand with a panicked look on his face. After that was the stabbing sensations Sorun felt in his hand and arm, along with the new sound of bones creaking and cracking as the tentacles tightened around him. Sorun hissed out in pain, but before he could do anything the tentacles flexed, and then flung Sorun away from the pirates.

Flying through the air for a brief second, Sorun felt his back impact the edge of the ship before he collapsed on the ground. The shock of the impact made it hard to move, and the burning sensation was returning to his arm. He'd cracked his eyes open and noticed a blue glow in his peripheral, and turned his head to see that the Emerald was sitting right next to him.

By some stroke of luck, he'd been tossed right next to the Emerald. Sorun didn't think too hard about it and instead reached out with his left hand to grab the Emerald. Yamato without its scabbard appeared in his hand automatically upon touching it, and in that moment, in an instinctual act of wanting to get rid of the intense burning sensation in his right arm that was becoming unbearable, he stabbed the blade into his arm as one desire raced through his mind: to separate his body from the sensation of pain.

It was like a switch had been flipped in almost the same moment the blade's tip dug into his flesh. Just like before in the past, all sensations disappeared from Sorun. Pain, sensation, even the ambient temperature. He breathed out a sigh of relief as a result, though much to his worry he still couldn't move his right arm. The venom, he wagered. That or the fact it was probably broken. When he looked down at his arm he saw it was bent in odd, unnatural angles at multiple points.

With a groan, Sorun collapsed right onto his back. The three pirates maintained their distance and kept away from him, too wary to approach. Opal, as she'd been called, coughed out and rose a shaking hand up to her face as Shellbreaker came to her side.

"Lass? Lass, you doin' alright?" He placed a comforting hand on her shoulder as he looked to her in concern. "Opal?"

"M-muh teeth, he..." Tears of pain mixed in with the blood spilling from her mouth as the shaking jellyfish rose a quivering hand to her mouth. "H-he..."

"It's alright, lass, it's alright..." Stroking the Mobian's back, the one-eyed otter looked out to Sorun's still form. He was still on his back and clenching the katana in his left hand. "Bristles, don't go anywhere near 'im," he instructed.

The large Mobian looked down to Shellbreaker with an unsure expression. "Are you sure-?"

"He's got tricks. Too risky," the captain said with a shake of his head. "Jus' let the venom deal with 'im. Won't be too long. Poor lad's likely to die with how much Opal pumped in him."

Their words all reached Sorun's ears. He cared for none of them, more focused on trying to stay awake as he stared up at the sky. The pain was gone, but the numbing sensation was quickly spreading up his arm and up to the rest of his body. His vision was blurring, and the edges of his sight were darkening. He didn't think his right arm was even functioning anymore.

"So fighting when the source of all your power is a rock that barely fits in your hand isn't that great an idea. Good to know," Sorun sarcastically thought. "Let them get the drop on me. Didn't go for the bigger threats first. Rookie mistakes. How'd I let it come it this? Shouldn't I be better than this?"

He couldn't tell which was worse. The venom that was likely destroying his body from the inside, or the frustration that he was feeling. So much confidence he'd had now that he'd had that bit of power back, only for it to be taken away with a single hit. It made him fearful, strangely moreso than the fact he was dying. That his power could be taken away so easily like that. It was making Sorun's confidence quickly crumble. And in the wake of all that was the anger. Anger at himself for letting some two-bit band of pirates overcome him. Render him to this state. Him . After everything he'd done and accomplished. He was supposed to be better than this.

This kind of thing wasn't suppose to happen anymore.

What would the others think if they saw him in this state? Sorun blanched at the mere thought. He was glad enough knowing the Chao were unconscious and Razor was likely too busy to notice. But it wasn't a pleasant thought to even consider, what any of his friends back home would think seeing him in this state. Broken and dying due to venom. Brought down to heel in moments. The expressions they'd grow. What they'd think and say to him.

The horrified look Nicole would likely have flashed through his mind.

"Not again." Gritting his teeth and fighting past the dizziness and fading vision, Sorun sat upwards. The three pirates stilled and cast him wary looks as he began to shakily stand up. "Relying on an item for power isn't good enough. Not when it can be taken away so easily." Flipping his grip on the Yamato, Sorun rose the sword up. "I promised Razor. I need to help him. I need to go back to the others." He roughly gripped the sword's handle. "I need more power...!"

It was only inexperience on the pirates' part that saved Sorun. He knew this. Anybody that knew better would have done their damnedest to keep the Emerald away from Sorun. That would have made him helpless. Probably would have even led to him being killed. His friends captured. The thought horrified and scared him to no end. Paranoia that made it hard to focus on much else.

Holding an Emerald that could be so easily taken from him just wasn't good enough. Power that could be stripped away so easily wasn't reliable.

So he stabbed down right into his own stomach.

The act came as an unexpected one and caused the three pirates to step back in shock, with all three becoming petrified in fright when Sorun dragged the blade across his stomach, just under his vest and through his shirt. Blood spilled out from the slit in his stomach that, thankfully, Sorun couldn't feel at the moment. And at the sight of it, Sorun laughed. A single, high laugh that made the three looking at him that much more uneasy.

"Kid's insane..." Shellbreaker mumbled to himself. He watched as the sword turned back into the blue gem, which, much to his an the others' disgust, Sorun proceeded to shove into the slit he'd cut into his abdomen and into his torso. "You sick... jus' what are you doing to yourself!?"

Sorun didn't answer him. He pushed hard enough until the Emerald was settled deep inside of his guts, with more blood gushing past his hand and onto the deck of the ship. With the Emerald safely nestled within him, he pulled his hand out, his fingers dragging themselves along intestines as Sorun finally removed his hand from the slit in his stomach. And then, he took a deep breath.

Rapidly, Sorun's hair faded back to a white color. There was a brief, momentary flash of pain that assaulted Sorun as his sensations returned, but it had been just that: a single millisecond of pain. After that came the cooling relief that washed over his entire body. The hole in his stomach healed, the Emerald safely tucked inside his innards. The venom assaulting his body was neutralized by his demonic metabolism, and any wounds they caused were healed in an instant. The dizziness disappeared, as did the blurriness and darkening of his vision. Aside from the heavy sensation he felt in his gut, Sorun felt better than ever.

Taking a deep breath, Sorun lifted his head up to the three pirates. His irises were constricted to pinpricks, and he had a small smile on his face. A relieved, manic smile.

"I guess I should thank you guys for that," Sorun breathed out as he brushed a lock of white hair out from his eyes with his newly-healed hand. "I should have known holding onto that thing wouldn't be too reliable. This is why I never liked using consumables in games..."

Before another word could be said, Sorun shot forwards in a burst of rapid speed. Black speed lines trailed behind his body as he stopped right in front of the jellyfish Mobian, who stared at him with wide, fearful eyes past her bloodied mouth. A single backhand from a white-haired Sorun was enough to send her sprawling towards the deck of the ship. She'd rolled into a still position and wouldn't rise back up.

The last two Mobians were quick to act. Shellbreaker had sprung backwards, shouting out, "Get 'im, Bristles!" as he backpedaled away from Sorun. The large, white Mobian did the exact opposite and charged towards Sorun with a furious yell, his right claw raised up and poised to strike right down at Sorun.

Sorun watched the Mobian thrust the claw down towards him with a curious, half-interested expression. The claw coming straight towards him was, in a word, slow. So painfully slow due to the supernatural reflexes afforded to him by the white-haired body that Sorun was able to blink his eyes and tilt his head at the claw mid-strike . It was enough that he was even able to casually sidestep it, cup an elbow with one hand, and use the other to rub at his chin with an amused expression as the claw slowly pierced down towards the position he'd been standing at prior.

"Ah, this just ain't fair for 'em," Sorun thought as he, at least from his perspective, slowly stepped in front of the claw as it punched a hole into the deck of the ship. "Despite Bunnie's best efforts, I never picked up hand-to-hand all that well. On the other hand I'm so absurdly stronger and faster than them right now that I don't think it really matters. Although..." He rose his right hand up to his face and clenched it. "I never did make the Beowulf Devil Arm, but I still know the moveset. I wouldn't dream of trying it with a normal body. With Devil's Body, though?"

It was when the white-furred Mobian's clawed hand fully sunk into the ship that Sorun bolted forwards. A left hook with his fist sunk into the Mobian's torso, with Sorun feeling bone crunch under his fist. This was followed by a low right uppercut, him spinning and releasing a flurry of kicks with his left leg, and finally him dodging backwards and rushing back forwards with a straight right punch. A sequence of attacks that proved sufficient in forcing the large Mobian to stumble backwards after his claw was forced out from the ship.

"Combo B, followed by a Dragon Breaker and a Lunar Phase... this body really makes pulling these moves off way too easy," Sorun internally marveled. "Probably not carrying nearly as much oomph or speed compared to if I actually made the things, but... well, he's big, but the guy's still just a normal Mobian. Those things might've killed him if I tried making them. Or blown my own arms off from the force since I'm limited to using these powers one at a time."

It was strange, though, how naturally performing the movements came to him. He was familiar with them through the games, of course, but something about the way Devil's Body changed Sorun made the movements flow so easily to him. Instinctually. And he liked it. He felt a strange sense of freedom doing it, in flawlessly pulling these moves off and staggering this giant foe in front of him. Every successful hit sparked some small amount of glee in him.

This is what he missed. This power. Not being helpless. The freedom.

As the large Mobian stumbled back, Sorun dodged right below him and crouched down a bit with his right fist cocked downwards and at the ready. He made a short hop, his right fist extended upwards in an uppercut and his entire body spinning around as his fist struck the Mobian's body. He touched down afterwards, and then sprung right back up with enough force that the wooden planks under his feet had cracked. Body spinning with his right fist extended upwards, he'd jumped up far enough that his fist cracked against the Mobian's head, snapping it backwards.

It was only then that, with his right leg extended, Sorun leaned forwards and span. Span hard enough that for a brief moment Sorun's body was a circular blur until he'd ceased his momentum, with his right leg extended over the Mobian's snapped-back face. The momentum of that spinning was carried right into the back of Sorun's leg and heel as he smashed it into Mr. Bristle's face, making blood splash out from his surely-broken nose and his eyes roll back into his head. Sorun then softly touched back down onto his feet while the Mobian tilted backwards and fell right onto his back, unconscious.

All in all, from the moment Mr. Bristles took that first swing to when Sorun had knocked him out with that final kick, the entire exchange had only lasted roughly five seconds.

Blinking in surprise, Sorun looked down at his leg. "Didn't think Lunar Phase would be that easy to pull off. Must be the body," he thought. "All that spinning, though... ugh. Don't even think I can get nauseous in this state, but my vision... how the hell does Sonic handle-?"

Sorun's thoughts were cut off when he noticed something stabbing towards him from the corner of his vision. Something shiny with sunlight glinting off of it. He rose his right hand up just in time for a cutlass to cut straight through his palm. Standing his ground and allowing his nostrils to flare out in anger, and with half a sword's length poking through his hand, Sorun turned to his aggressor.

It was the otter captain. Shellbreaker, and his newly-acquired cutlass. If he'd been trying to maintain a calm façade, it'd all but faded away at this point. Despite the fact he'd just ran Sorun's hand through, the man looked like he was panicking. The widened eye and heavy breathing. Sorun even noticed the sweat past his fur.

He liked that look. It meant Sorun was winning.

"You're running out of moves." Sorun slid his impaled hand through the sword's edge, towards his fingers. The gash cut into his flesh and bones instantly healed behind the wake of the blade, until finally Sorun pulled the sword free of his hand and grabbed the blade. Shellbreaker looked like he was going to vomit from the sight. "And I'm running out of patience."

"Yer a demon," Shellbreaker hissed out as Sorun casually bent the blade of the sword sideways. "Jus' what are ye?"

"A very concerned friend. You really should have just given up."

With his free left hand, Sorun snapped his fist upwards and punched Shellbreaker right in the face. He crumpled like a sack of potatoes afterwards and collapsed to the deck of the ship just like that. Sorun let out a disappointed scoff at the sight and tossed the ruined sword away.

"Weak. Hm." He looked to his left towards the raised section of the deck, where the ship's steering wheel was. He heard the sounds of a struggle up there. Where Razor and Blade were facing off, he reckoned. "Alright, let's bring it to a close," Sorun mumbled to himself as he made his way towards one of the short set of steps that lead to the raised deck.

Making his way up the stairs and past the steering wheel, likely useless now seeing as Sorun cut the mast away, the white-haired human saw the twins facing off at the very back of the raised deck. Knife fighting of all things. Poorly, too. It was mostly just wild, infrequent stabs and jabs towards one another. Slow, telegraphed strikes both were easily jumping out of the way of. Probably for the best, as Sorun saw, with some relief, that Razor had no wounds on him. Neither did Blade.

"Why did you have to come back and ruin everything!?" Blade screamed as she stabbed at her brother.

Razor jumped out of the way of the knife. "I came back for you!" he screamed back. "You're my sister! Why can't you understand I'm trying to help you!?"

"Why can't you understand I don't need your help!?"

When Blade had reared her knife-wielding hand back in order to commit to another stab, she wasn't able to bring it back forwards. A vice-like grip clamped down on her hand, causing her to wince and look behind her. Her fury only grew when she saw Sorun standing behind her, holding her wrist with a single hand and with an apathetic look on his face as he gazed at her.

"..." He wasn't even able to find the words. With a short sigh, Sorun turned his arm to the side and released Blade. The red shark had been thrown back as a result, with her back impacting the railing of the ship hard enough that the wood cracked and broke away.

She slid down to the deck just as Sorun and Razor stepped in front of her. The knife Blade wielded had been dropped, and both hands were used to support her upper body as she looked up at the pair. Sorun still held that apathetic expression as he looked down at her. Razor was much more emotional in his expression. He practically looked grief-stricken, enough that his own knife had slipped from his grip. All that did was make Blade appear more and more furious as her head turned towards Sorun.

"What... what did you do to them...!?" The golden eyes she shared with her brother were practically burning as she looked up at Sorun. So much hate that covered the visible worry she wore past that snarling mouth full of teeth.

"... What do you think?" Came Sorun's quiet response. "I said I'd come help Razor out if I finished before he did, didn't I?"

Disbelief. Hopelessness and sorrow. Shock. All of that played over Blade's face, and for just a moment all the anger faded away as Sorun's words registered with her and she realized there was nobody else around them. Then the anger began to return to her face. Seething and burning. And in addition to that were the tears. Hot, angry tears that streamed down her angered face as she looked up at Razor's face, whose shoulders had fallen at seeing his sister's expression.

"Why...?" she asked him. "They took us in when nobody else would... when we tried to steal from them to survive, just like they did! The world threw us away and they were the only ones that accepted us! We were a family!" she screamed at him. "So why!? Why did you throw us away!?"

"Blade..." Razor's voice came out as soft and broken. "It's gotta stop. This isn't what it used to be. You're hurting people, and the machines that kept ransacking those villages are gone. This can't go on." He sent her a pleading look, his voice practically begging. "Just come back with me, please. We'll go to Meropis, you can just live with me instead of getting imprisoned like the rest-"

"Back to a city full of people that never bothered to help us!?"

"Big words from the person that just stood by and watched as his brother was thrown overboard," Sorun mumbled.

Blade's gaze snapped to Sorun. "You don't know anything . You weren't there. You..." Her teeth began to bare as her muscles tensed. "You're just... just a monster that came and destroyed my family..."

She lunged forwards. Sorun had seen it easily, but the pity he found in looking at the shark Mobian found him rooted to the spot. He still held his right arm in front of himself to defend him, only for Blade to bite down right on his forearm. He didn't make a sound as the numerous, sharp teeth pierced his skin and muscles with enough force he felt his bones creak and crack. Razor, off to the side, was too shocked by the sight to do anything.

Sighing, Sorun's free hand shot forwards and gripped around Blade's throat. Even as he squeezed down and began choking her, she wouldn't release her bite on his arm. She kept clamping down harder and harder, like she was trying to saw through his entire arm with her maw. If it weren't for Devil's Body she very well might have been able to sever his arm with that single bite. But the regeneration kept her from biting clean through the arm, but even as her eyes began to dim, and her movements began to slow, she held on. Biting him, clawing at his face and kicking at his midsection in outright defiance and rage for everything he'd done.

It was only after her eyes closed and her limbs went completely limp did Sorun release Blade's throat. Her mouth was still clamped to his arm despite the fact she was unconscious, forcing Sorun to carefully pry her off and set her down on the deck. The wound on his arm had already healed by the time he'd laid the red Mobian down.

When he stood back up, Sorun looked to the side at Razor. A single tear was running down his face as he looked at his sister. Varying emotions from pity to sorrow marred his face, and when he looked up at Sorun, it took everything the human had to not look away at seeing the pitiful look in his eyes. It made his heart hurt seeing Razor like this.

"... Your arm fine?" Razor asked, voice hollow and quiet.

"Regeneration. Emerald." It was the minimal amount of words Sorun could say to explain the situation and assuage Razor's fears. It seemed to be enough, as he nodded at Sorun and looked back at his sister.

"... We were orphans fighting to survive," he said in a remorseful tone. "No parents, no... nothing. People in Meropis wouldn't even give us the time of day, so we left. When we tried stealing from these pirates, they... took us in." He made a low sigh and shook his head. "I wasn't lying when I said the days when we just raided abandoned places were fun. It was...nice, you know? Having a family that understood where we came from. What we had to do. I just wish she could see what I see."

"I know." How could he not? It felt like he was in the same situation back in New Mobotropolis. "Hell. I even thought about stealing from the food storage site. Didn't because of Nicole, but..." He pursed his lips and looked at the other end of the ship. Towards the unconscious pirates. "I never wanted to hurt anybody. Not like them. Did they, even? Is that how it starts? Does it even matter?"

Surely at some point it was for the sake of survival; something that could be understood, even if it was at the cost of others. Unforgiveable, maybe, but understandable. Sorun saw the cargo they had, though. That much went beyond mere survival. Or maybe it didn't, seeing as their source of abandoned villages would be cut off due to a lack of attacks. Where did that leave them? The whole reason why Razor chose now of all times, Sorun supposed.

"You think she'll ever forgive me?" Razor's voice drew Sorun's attention back to him. "Blade?"

"... I really don't know," Sorun honestly answered. "In time, maybe. If not... well. I guess all that really matters is if you can live with what we just did."

Razor made a small grimace. "I don't know if I'm okay with that. None of this feels okay." He looked up and past Sorun's shoulders. "They're...?"

"Alive," Sorun confirmed. "Don't worry. I didn't break my promise."

"..." Nodding, Razor looked back down at his sister. "Thank you, Sorun," he muttered.

"I'm going to get some rope." Sorun hadn't waited for a response from Razor. He simply turned around and left, leaving Razor to have some time with his sister. He felt it was the least he was owed.

It was some time later. Sorun was lying on his back, staring up at the bright, clear sky. Razor had gone about rounding up the pirates and tying them all up while he had simply been thinking on his own.

Sighing, Sorun rose his right hand up in the sky. There was a flash of blue light, and Yamato found itself in Sorun's hand. At the same time his hair turned black, and he felt the heavy weight in his gut vanish. "Hmph. Convenient," he thought. "Come to think of it... I promised Aurora I wouldn't pursue this power again, didn't I?"

Turning the sword back into the blue Emerald, Sorun lowered his hand and looked back up into the clear sky. He wondered if she was watching him right now and what she was thinking of him.

He rose his middle finger to the sky.

"Who cares what she thinks?" He bitterly thought as he sat upwards. "I wonder," he continued as he clutched the Emerald with both hands. "I can make the seven powers. Can I... make anything else?"

It was something he only now considered. The seven powers he was familiar with, of course. Yamato came naturally for some reason. Other things, though? If he could actively control it to some extent now, he didn't see why. At the very least it wouldn't hurt to experiment.

"Beowulf."

The blue Chaos Emerald dissolved in a flash of light and particles that swarmed to Sorun's limbs. In flashes of white light gauntlets and greaves appeared over his hands and feet. Gray, bestial-looking implements. Gloveless gauntlets with open hands shaped like a screaming maw. Greaves with three metal claws for toes. Lines of white-purple light softly pulsed around the gauntlets and greaves, like veins of pure power.

"Vergil's secondary melee weapon. Neat." Beowulf transformed back into the blue Emerald. "... Death Note."

Nothing happened. Sorun frowned, and concentrated harder on the mental image. The black notebook and the white words written on its cover. Despite this, nothing happened. The Emerald remained an Emerald.

"Figures it wouldn't be that easy. You live another day, Eggman." A huff left Sorun. "Is it seriously still only things from the 'DMC' games? Power shaped by the heart, sheesh... if that's the case I'll just stick to what I had."

Standing up to his feet, Sorun turned around. The deck below him had five pirates completely bound in rope and all laid next to each other, the yeti crab significantly moreso. All still unconscious. In front of them was Razor, who'd just finished with them.

Moving down the stairs towards the deck Razor stood on, Sorun noticed some movement out from the corner of his eyes. Their two Chao seemed to finally be awake and were groggily making their way out from behind the barrels Razor had left them at. Crusher was stumbling around in a stupor, while Virgil was shaking his head and looking out towards the bound pirates.

"Chao?" he mumbled out, sounding confused.

"We took care of it," Sorun said as he stopped next to him. "It seems all that spinning didn't do you much good. Sorry for that, Virgil. We still managed, though, so it's fine."

"Chao..." He actually almost sounded upset, for whatever reason. Sorun tilted his head a bit in surprise at the sound, but then shrugged it off and made his way back towards Razor.

The shark noticed his approach and waved at him. "Hey, Sorun," he called out. His mood seemed significantly better than it had the half-hour prior, which Sorun saw as a plus. He didn't look happy by any means, but he wasn't bad enough that Sorun felt bad seeing him. "The Chao are back up?" he asked at seeing the two Chao float around.

"Yeah. They seem fine. Bit dizzy, maybe," Sorun answered as he stopped in front of the shark. He took a momentary glance at the pirates, and then looked back at Razor asking, "What now?"

"Now I go back to Meropis, inform the guards, and bring them here so they can transport the pirates back to the city for trial. Dunno what they're gonna do with the ship," he said to Sorun. "Why'd you go and cut their mast?"

"I felt like it? I dunno. I was in the moment," he answered with a shrug. "I didn't want to say it earlier, but... you sure you can make it so your sister doesn't go along with the rest of them?" Seemed like a stretch; Razor didn't exactly strike Sorun as someone with a lot of political pull. Or any, really. And his circumstances were different than Blade's.

Razor seemed to share Sorun's concerns, as evidenced by the slight grimace he made. "It doesn't look good, I know," he said, voicing Sorun's thoughts. "One of my friends is really important, though. She's this, uh, priestess, you see, and... well, she promised to help me out with this if I managed to pull this off. Said she'd talk with some people, give my sister a chance. Make the rest's punishments not so bad."

"After all they did?" Sorun asked. "Really?"

"More suffering's not gonna fix anything. I just want them to change and stop hurting people. That's it," Razor confessed to him, sighing as he looked down at the pirates. "They're still important to me, after all."

Even after all they did to him, he still cared. "Mobians..." Sorun thought. He couldn't help but admire it- admire Razor himself. A part of Sorun longed to help him.

"... You know, you... if you wanted, you... you could maybe just come back with me..." When Razor looked up at him in surprise, Sorun made a breathy noise and turned away from him. "You and that frenzied terror of yours."

Razor made a small laugh. "Crusher isn't that bad, Sorun."

"Meant your sister. But sure, the Chao, too," Sorun said. "You said not a lot of people in that city look at you right. It wouldn't be like that in the place I live in. You could just leave it all behind and come live with me. I have the room for it."

He technically did since his house had a guest bedroom. Small one, but it was there. He noticed Razor giving Sorun a surprised look, however, and at seeing it Sorun found himself being surprised at his own words. He admittedly hadn't put much thought into the offer- he'd just said it. It was more a passing thought, really, but even so he really did mean it. He just wanted to help Razor. Even his sister, if only because she was related to him. And... perhaps having them around wouldn't make the house feel as lonely.

"Wow. Sorun, that's, uh... thanks." An unsure chuckle left Razor, with the shark reaching up to rub the back of his head as he glanced to the side. "I appreciate it, I really do, but... I-I can't. Leave my friends behind, I mean. I have too much in Meropis. And I think it'd be a bit too dry for me over there anyway," he added with another chuckle. "And I don't think it'd do my sister too much good."

"Yes, right, of course," Sorun quickly said. "I understand. Forgive me for offering, I just..."

"No, it's fine. Thanks. Really." They both looked back at each other. Awkward looks were present on both of their faces. "I have a home, is all. I can't leave that."

"I... perhaps have one as well," Sorun quietly admitted as he looked down at the gem in his hands.

"You do." Razor's words made surprise appear on Sorun's face as he looked up at the shark. He was grinning at him. "Home's less a place and more the people, y'know? At least that's what I think."

Home. It still hurt to call New Mobotropolis his home. It felt like he was abandoning what his old home was by doing so. His home on Earth. Earth itself. Accepting that place as his home, and so soon, felt like he was throwing all that away. What it used to be. But people... maybe that was a different matter. The same? Sorun didn't know. He didn't think he was even close to adjusting to life there yet. All things considered, though, Razor acted like he did. Sorun was somewhat envious of him for that fact.

"People, huh? Well, if it worked for Razor..." The blue Emerald shifted back into the Yamato. "Maybe you're right," Sorun said as he looked to Razor's eyes. "I'm still figuring all this out. How to move on, how to... settle, I guess. But I'm glad I managed to help you with this. I think it showed me a lot. You showed me a lot," he said to Razor. "So... thanks for that, Razor."

A third, more nervous chuckle left Razor. He looked abashed at Sorun's words. "I think I should be thanking you," he said. "I don't think I would have managed this without you."

"You're right. You wouldn't have."

"H-hey!" The smile on the shark's face became a bit more strained, especially when he saw the small, wry grin Sorun held. "Ugh, for the... you don't gotta rub it in like that."

"I couldn't resist. Hey, by any chance do you have a map that says where Meropis City is?" Sorun suddenly asked.

"Huh?" Razor blinked, but still reached down to look inside the small, green pouch he had attached to the rope he wore as a belt. "Err, yeah? Why?" he asked, pulling something out and tossing it to Sorun.

The human caught the object and examined it. It was... wasn't paper, exactly, but something akin to it. Some waterproof variation of it. Felt thicker and rougher, and was slightly darken than normal paper. Sorun hummed a bit, and then opened it up to peer at the contents of the map. Much of it was illegible to him, drawings and paths he couldn't make heads or tails of, but there was really only one thing he needed, and that was the coordinates listed near a landmark he assumed to be the city seeing as "Meropis City" was written above it.

"I just wanted to help you with one last thing," Sorun said as he tossed the map back to Razor. Yamato was unsheathed afterwards, and following that a blue cross was cut into the air. The cross folded inwards to create a portal, making Razor jump back with widened eyes at the sight of it. "That's a portal that's directly above the city. I, uh... didn't feel safe opening a portal underwater," Sorun explained. "It should take you directly there. You and the guards will have to take the long way to get here and back with the pirates. I'm not sticking around long enough to ferry you all back and forth."

"Oh." Razor's face fell a bit. "Does that mean you're going back?"

Sorun nodded. "I kinda have to return the plane. Or what's left of it," Sorun explained. "And I suppose, like you, I have those back there I... deeply care for, and they're probably worried sick about me."

"So you're going home?"

"... Home's a strong word," Sorun admitted. "It's all I have anymore, though. So I want to try and work towards it. Like you did."

A hand found itself resting on Sorun's shoulder. He looked towards it, and then trailed up the hand's arm and up to its owner's face, who was giving him a warm smile. "You'll do fine," Razor said. "I really think that."

Sorun reached up and placed a hand over the one on his shoulder. A light blush settled on his face. "Thanks, Razor." He removed the hand from his shoulder, and then gestured to the group of unconscious pirates near them. "Good luck with... all of this," he added, making circular gestures with the hand.

"Yeah. I'll try," Razor sighed out. He made to move towards the portal, with his green and black Chao floating up to grasp onto his shoulder. "So... I just jump through, right?" he asked, stopping in front of the portal and turning back to Sorun.

"Mhm, yeah," Sorun confirmed. "I'm trusting you'll be able to find your way back from there."

"Should," Razor agreed. "Well, um... bye, Sorun. Hope we'll see each other again." He turned back to the portal. "C'mon, Crusher. Let's go home."

"Chao." The Chao on Razor's shoulder turned around and waved towards Virgil, who'd settled on Sorun's shoulder. Virgil only reacted by giving the Chao a small, curt nod and nothing more. Razor had seen the sight and made a small laugh at it, and after casting one last glance at Sorun, hopped through the portal. Sorun swiped his sword and closed it the second Razor and Crusher left through it.

Right as the portal closed, Sorun made a small sigh and lowered his sword. Afterwards, a small laugh left him as a grin grew. "He's gonna be mad when he figures out I opened that portal twenty meters over the surface of the ocean," he said, making Virgil roll his eyes. "Alright. Our work here's done. Let's get back to the plane."

Another couple of swipes with his sword was all Sorun needed to form a portal back to the beach this whole mess started on. He'd made sure to close it behind him as his feet went from walking on hard wood to sand, with the crashed plane sitting there right before him. Sorun had risen a hand to his chin, and began to stroke it contemplatively as he looked at the mechanical wreckage.

"... Alright, how am I actually gonna do this?"

The answer in the end had been "just open a portal under the wreckage and let it fall through back to the hangar". It worked for the most part; Sorun was ninety-percent sure all of the parts had made it through. The important bits, at least. That and a lot of sand. But in the end he'd managed to get the wrecked plane through, and then stepped through with Virgil still clinging to him. He'd swiped the portal closed, and then sheathed Yamato as a small sigh escaped him.

He'd managed to successfully create a portal that lead back into the hangar in the New Mobotropolis airfield. Currently vacant, thankfully, as he wasn't really prepared to face anybody yet. Also... startlingly dark, he realized. When Sorun looked towards the open end of the hangar he was shocked to discover it was nighttime outside.

"The hell- how far did I go? It was daylight over on that island," He thought to himself. "Eh, whatever. Doesn't really matter."

He turned back towards the plane wreckage. For all intents and purposes, it was still a wrecked, inoperable plane. He didn't have a clue if Tails would even be able to salvage this or not. Or how mad he'd be at Sorun that he destroyed the pride and joy that was his plane after stealing it. He flipped out at Sorun for merely scratching it once way back when he piloted it. And this seemed like a bit more than a scratch.

"... Eh, it's probably fine," Sorun mumbled to himself as he walked towards the wreck. He sighed, and then lowered himself to sit on the ground with his back pressing against what was once upon a time the cockpit. Virgil floated off his shoulder and hovered besides Sorun. "Any idea what I'm supposed to say?" Sorun asked his Chao.

Virgil shook his head. "Chao-chao."

"Cool." Clicking his tongue, Sorun turned to the side. A glint of something poking out of the crumpled cockpit he was sitting against caught his eye. He made a small, confused noise, and then reached forwards to grasp at it. He felt his fingers grasp something smooth and cool, and then pulled it back to examine it. "How in the world did these make it...?"

It was the purple sodas Mina had given him. The remaining two, still in their carton holder. He'd figured they'd been lost in the crash, but it seemed they were completely fine, hidden in the cockpit. He made a surprised noise, and then, after a moment's contemplation, removed one of the bottles, set the carton with the remaining bottle down, and then popped the cap off the bottle he had in his hand.

Virgil grew visibly concerned for some reason.

"It was one heck of an adventure we had there, Virgil," Sorun said after taking a drink of the soda. "Now to figure out how I'm supposed to explain myself. And this," he mumbled, shaking the sword held in his other hand. "Yeah, this'll be a doozy and a half to figure out..."

Chapter 67

Recursion Error

Episode 67- Charity acceptance

"Sorun stole my plane!"

Sometimes Sorun did things that gave Sally a migraine.

She always tried to give him the benefit of the doubt. She understood things weren't especially easy for him, especially now of all times, and tried to be patient with him as a result. They all did. And for all his faults she really did like him. He was... well, somewhat responsible. At least tried to be dependable, and most of the time managed to be so. It was hard not to like somebody who'd fought besides them all for months and risked his life on multiple occasions to save the kingdom. He was odd, sure. But he was still one of them.

It was why it especially hit them hard when it turned out Sorun's world was dead and he had to remain on Mobius. Sally knew that he was heavily into the grieving process, as she hadn't even seen him leave his house since that day. She and the others had been too busy with their resistance duties to check in on him other than the small, random visit here and there. The only one who was able to visit him on a consistent basis was Nicole, and while she tried her best with him, whenever she talked to Sally about him she'd become increasingly worried with each day and would continually fret over him.

Any other day Sally would have found it cute if she wasn't so worried over Sorun, too.

But then he did something stupid and stole Tails' plane for some reason, which she learned when Tails flew up to her practically screaming. Upon reviewing the city's security footage it was revealed that, yes, Sorun stole Tails' plane. And took his Chao with him. Thus followed an extremely stressed Sally trying to process all this as she had to listen Nicole's hologram pace around her as she voiced her worries. "What if he crashes, he's probably lost, what if he starves out there, Sally, he could be hurt and I'm not there to help him, he might be cold."

Sally didn't think Nicole mentioned the theft of the plane once.

It carried on like this for an entire day while Sally tried to figure out what they were supposed to do - she couldn't think of anything - and how she was supposed to punish Sorun when they finally got him back - she did have some ideas there -. They were apparently saved a lot of effort as, in the following night, Sorun returned according to the security systems. How wasn't clear, since he obviously hadn't flown in without them noticing, but they still managed to see him in the hangar through the security systems. Following this Sally had assured Nicole she and Tails would handle this, mostly to try and keep things as stable as possible, and the pair of Mobians had gone off to the hangar to meet Sorun.

She didn't really know how to tell Tails that his plane was completely wrecked, which she'd seen through the cameras. She opted to just let him see it for himself and keep quiet on it. The fox's reaction had, well... been about what she expected. They entered the hangar to see Tails' blue biplane a complete wreck, something that barely even resembled a plane anymore. And a lot of sand for some reason. Tails' tails had stopped spinning and he'd dropped right onto his feet as he looked straight towards the wreck, jaw slack and eyes bugging out of his head.

"Wha... what the... why... my plane..." He kept stuttering over his words, uselessly gesturing out towards the hunk of broken metal as confusion, shock, and dismay all mixed into his features. "H-he destroyed the Tornado!"

Sally winced when she heard the anger mixed in with the disbelief when Tails shouted out. "Um, Tails..." she began as she placed a comforting hand on his shoulder. "I'm sure it's not that bad-"

"Not that bad? Not that bad!?" The fox's head whipped towards her, a livid expression on his face. "You think I can actually salvage anything from this!? It's wrecked! Totaled! I'm gonna have to build a new a new plane from scratch!"

Again, Sally winced, deeper this time. It wasn't a secret that Tails practically loved that plane. Maintaining it was his favorite hobby. Probably his only hobby aside from inventing things here and there and talking shop with Rotor. Seeing the plane he'd spent so many years with had to be a deep blow. Knowing a friend was responsible likely another blow.

"Nicole can make you a new plane with her nanites like she did with the Freedom Fighter Special," Sally tried in an attempt to calm him down.

It didn't work. "It wouldn't be the same plane, Sally," he angrily grumbled. "It... it wouldn't be mine ..." His ears flattened against his head, and a frustrated growl left him. "When I get my hands on Sorun-"

"Heeeey...~"

The call from the familiar voice drew their attention back to the plane. They stepped around to its other side, and then saw, to their surprise, Sorun. Sitting there against the plane. Virgil was there, too, sitting on what was once the plane's wing and staring down at Sorun with a vacant expression. Sorun seemed oblivious to the looks everyone was giving him, and held empty, purple bottle in his right hand and-

Sally's heart skipped a beat when she saw the sheathed katana clenched in his left hand. That sword. His... Yamato if she recalled the name correctly. Tails, likewise, had instantly frozen when he caught sight of the sword. The sword made as a result of Sorun absorbing a Chaos Emerald at the cost of a chunk of his life. A sword that should have left with the rest of his powers.

So why did he have that sword?

"Sorun?" Sally took a careful step towards him, wary of that blade. "Are you okay...?"

"SSSSS ally . Always so nice and - hic! - considerate. What a shining example of Mobian virtue you are." Sorun stumbled up to his feet. He had a blush on his face and looked like he was half-asleep. "Howzit goin'?"

She opened her mouth to speak, but an intense scent hitting her nose caused Sally to close it and hold a hand to her face in revulsion. It was a scent she was the faintest bit familiar with. A distant childhood memory of back when she was four, had got into a cabinet in the castle, and opened a bottle of something that vaguely had the same scent. She'd almost drank it before her panicked father found her, took the bottle away, and scolded her severely for what she'd almost done. It was only years later she realized what that bottle was and what she'd almost done. Even so she'd never experienced it again due to the average Mobian not being able to afford alcohol strong enough to actually effect them, and even then nobody saw the point in it. Part of the reason her own father had that bottle was because he was a king, and of course he could afford it. Even then it was only to be used for special occasions. At least before the coup happened.

Sally had never, ever encountered the scent of alcohol ever again in her life until she smelled the scent coming off of Sorun.

"Sorun, are you... are you drunk ?" she asked him startled disbelief.

Tails, already confused from the way Sorun was acting, looking up to Sally. "Hey, Sally? What do you mean by that?" he asked. "And... and what's that weird smell coming off of Sorun?"

"I-it's nothing, Tails," Sally quickly said, biting her lower lip. She wouldn't be the one to expose Tails to this kind of thing. If she had it her way he'd never be exposed to it, which was why she was so appalled that Sorun would do such a thing. "Sorun," she tried again, face going stern as she faced back towards the human. She actually started to feel anger at him over the fact he'd have the audacity to do something like this. "Are. You. Drunk?"

"Uhhhh... nah, nah man," Sorun denied with a shake of his head, the least bit affected by her burning stare. "I-I-I'm not... I drank thish," he slurred out, holding the empty bottle up for Sally to see.

Sally squinted her eyes so she could read the label on the bottle. To her surprise it was... a brand of grape soda? "Huh?" The anger began to fade from her as confusion set in. "That's... Sorun, where did you get that?"

"From the, uh... the yellow lady," he slurred out. "Midna... yeah..."

"Do you mean Mina...?" Sally slowly asked out.

"Mina! That'sh tha one!" Sorun loudly confirmed. Tails' confusion grew while Sally began to grow worried. "Sh-she gave me thish tashty purple-y shtuff. An' you know what? I think it's magic, Sally."

"Sorun, I really don't-"

"'Cause I drank shome, and poof! I was on an island," Sorun regaled. "An' I met thish nice guy. And I fighted some pirates!" Sorun dramatically swung his left hand, which was clenching the handle of his sword. The scabbard, already loose, flung off and dissolved in a show of blue particles. "And then bif, and bam, an' I beat 'em all!" Sorun made an exaggerated swing of his sword, its edge glowing blue. Sally made a strangled sound when he swung it towards the destroyed plane, while made the wreck fall apart as it was split in half. A large, straight gash was left in the hangar floor. "It was straight outta the 'Pirates of the Caribbean" movies. 'Cept there... there weren't no skellingtons. There were fish people, tho'!"

And now the worry Sally had was exploding into full-blown panic. A drunk Sorun was bad enough, because she didn't know how to deal with that. A drunk Sorun waving around a sword capable of cutting apart anything , and at a distance, was the worst-case scenario as far as she was concerned. It was bad enough that she began to breath heavily at the sight of the dangerous and very lethal weapon in the hands of somebody not even fully lucid at the moment.

"Tails, sweetie, listen to me very carefully," Sally instructed in a deadly-serious tone. The fox looked up at her, blinking rapidly in worry. "Move away from Sorun. And do not make any sudden movements."

"W-what's going on with him, Sally?" Tails asked. "He's acting weird. I don't like it."

"I don't either, Tails. He's gonna be fine." She gently tapped his shoulders a couple of time. "Just please move back."

Wordlessly, Tails did so, slowly stepping back away from her and Sorun. Sally then held her hands up towards Sorun as she very carefully began moving towards him.

"Sorun?" she calmly called out. "How come you have your sword back?"

"Hm? Yamato?" Sorun waved the blade up to his face up to look at it. That same movement caused a deep slice to appear on the hangar's roof, making Sally flinch. She started shuffling towards him faster. "Found it," he answered. "Why?"

"Can you please put it down before you hurt someone?" The last thing, the very last thing, she wanted was for somebody to get cut in half because Sorun was drunkenly waving around a deadly, magical weapon. Or for him to cut his own head off handling it the way he was.

"Huh? Put it down?" Sorun mumbled. His eyes, droopy as they were at the moment, sharpened a bit. "I won't. No one else can have this, Sally. It's mine. It belongs to a... what was the line?" He waved the sword down and caused a gash to appear in the floor. "It's my power, Sally. Mine. It belongs to me and nobody else."

He thoughtlessly waved the sword around again. Another clean fissure appeared in the ground, and following this was a loud, scared yelp. Sally glanced behind her shoulder as saw that the new gash in the floor was inches away from Tails, who'd leapt back in fright at almost being cut.

Gritting her teeth in frustration and fear, Sally reared her head back towards Sorun. "SORUN, PUT IT DOWN RIGHT NOW!"

Before anybody else could do anything, there was a black and blue blur as a small object zoomed past Sorun's hand. There was a loud slckt! sound, followed by a small spray of red and the sword falling out of Sorun's hand and clattering on the ground. It remained there for a single second before the sword reverted back into a Chaos Emerald.

Both Sally and Tails adopted shocked looks and stepped back from the small creature, which was revealed to be Virgil. The Chao ignored them and looked up towards Sorun, an annoyed, troubled expression on his face. Sorun himself didn't react all that much to the deep gash that had been cut into his hand that forced him to drop the Emerald, not even looking surprised as he looked at it. More apathetic than anything else. He glanced from the wound to the Chao, still looking up at him, and then made a sigh as he bent down to pick the blue gem back up.

Instead of the gem turning back into a sword, Sorun's hair turned white. The cut on his hand instantly sealed shut and healed, and in addition to that Sorun's eyes widened. Clarity and focus began to become apparent on his face, his eyes widening and becoming much more alert as the blush disappeared. He stood up to his full height and looked down towards his feet, confused. A dawning look went across his features, after which he turned towards the broken plane. His eyes traced the lines in the ground back forwards, where he saw the two Mobians looking at him.

"... I see." He looked down at the Emerald in his hand and sighed. When he looked back up, Sally was standing right in front of him. "I-"

"Hospital," she demanded, not looking amused in the slightest. "Now."

There wasn't any room for argument. Not with that look she was giving him. So with another sigh, Sorun turned towards the opening of the hangar and began walking out.

The experience as a whole had been as frightening as it had been confusing for Sally. Frightening in that she'd been legitimately concerned for the health of everybody involved when Sorun began swinging around that sword. Confusion was for everything else: what happened with the plane, why Sorun took it in the first place, why he'd been acting inebriated one moment and completely fine the next, what was happening with him and the Chaos Emerald. Things she could have probably asked him on their way to the hospital, but she was more concerned with actually getting him in that place and getting checked out by the doctor before anything else.

Tails elected to stay behind and look over what was left of his plane. He'd found a full bottle of whatever that purple stuff had been Sorun had been drinking. She'd brought it with her for the doctor to examine while he was looking over Sorun. So she was left in the main hospital lobby, sighing and holding her arms as she stared down at the floor. She still wanted answers to a lot of questions to clear this whole thing up. Hopefully the doctor and Sorun would be able to answer them. And after that...

Well, after that Sally had no clue what she was supposed to do with Sorun.

"Sally?" she looked up from her feet. Nicole materialized ahead of her, hands clasped together and a small frown on her face. "I informed Mina that you needed to see her and that she should come to the hospital. She's on her way right now." She glanced a bit off to the side. "I would also like to inform you that my security feed caught Sonic at the hangar talking with Tails. It seems he caught wind of a disturbance and went to see what was going on. He... appeared less than pleased."

Sally groaned into her hands, and then began rubbing at her temples. "Not the news I wanted to hear, but... ugh, we'll deal with it. Thanks, Nicole."

"Is Sorun well?"

Sally dropped her hands and looked back at Nicole. "The doctor's checking him out, but he seemed okay. Physically, at least," she said. "Sorun, he, um... I'm not really sure to be honest. He got into something and we're trying to figure out what it was. And then there's the whole thing with the Ch-"

She was interrupted when the door leading to the lobby opened up. Both she and Nicole turned towards the door to see a yellow-furred head with purple hair glancing around and stopping on the two of them. Sally sighed in relief and stood up off of her chair.

"Mina. Hey," Sally greeted. She stepped right next to Nicole, while the mongoose stopped in front of the pair with an unsure expression on her face.

"Was something the matter?" Mina asked. "I heard from Nicole that Sorun came back. Did something happen?"

"Kind of," Sally admitted. "Mina, did you... did you give Sorun anything recently? Something drinkable?"

"Hm? Oh, right, that." Recognition flashed in her eyes as she gave the two of them a nod. "Ash and I were visiting him because his Chao got... mischievous with Ash. I gave him some sodas as a present."

"... Sodas?" Sally repeated. "Just... normal sodas?"

"They were a gift from a fan back when I went on tour," she clarified. "I had one myself and wasn't very partial to it. I gave them to Sorun because, well... he seemed like he needed it."

The explanation did little but cause more confusion on Sally's part. Nicole, on the other hand, suddenly became much more attentive of the yellow Mobian in front of them. "Why do you say he needed the gift?" she asked.

"Oh, right. I wanted to tell you this earlier, Sally, but then I heard Sorun, er... left and decided to hold off. But now we're here, so..." Mina took in a deep breath and began to explain. "Sorun said that he isn't able to get a job. He said that since he's a human and can't do much people won't hire him instead of employing Mobians capable of doing more. I looked inside of his kitchen when I was visiting him and it looked like he was out of food."

Sally's eyes widened in shock at that. Nicole's reaction was much more apparent than hers, with her hands unclasping and her entire face becoming borderline-horrified. "W-what?" she stammered out. "Why didn't he tell us!?"

Seeing the visible shock on their faces, Mina grew uncomfortable and looked to the side while rubbing at her arm. "He said that he feels like an inconvenience to you all and would have rather starved than bother you with his problems."

"Oh, Sorun..." With a small sigh, Sally pressed a hand against her throbbing forehead. It certainly sounded like something he would do, which was the exact reason she believed Mina when she heard it, and immediately began to feel worry for her human friend. And irritation. That worry multiplied twofold when she glanced to the side at Nicole and was forced to perform a double-take. The AI's hands were clenched at her sides, and a disbelieving, angered look was beginning to settle over her face. " Oh , Sorun."

She needed a quick distraction. An awkward cough was enough to gain both Nicole's and Mina's attention. "That's... disturbing to hear, Mina, but thanks for telling us." Sally made another sigh and rubbed at the back of her head. "I'm honestly not surprised he'd try and pull something like that. It's not really the first time. But I'm still trying to wrap my head around what was making him act so off..."

"I think I can provide an answer to that."

Three heads turned around to see a one-eyed duck Mobian enter the hospital lobby. He closed the door behind him, letting out a small sigh before he turned around to face the other three staring out at him. A clipboard was held in his right hand, and the final bottle of the purple soda Sorun had possessed was clutched in his left.

Sally was the first one to speak out. "Dr. Quack," she greeted. "How is Sorun doing?"

"All things considered he's as healthy as he could be," he answered. "That, uh... that thing he does, where he changes is hair white. He says it has a regenerative property. As far as I can tell it cured of him pretty much any and all of his injuries and cleansed his system of any toxins. He's completely fine."

The news brought visible relief on everybody present. "That's good," Sally said. "Has Sorun explained how he's able to do that?" she asked. "The way he was handling that Chaos Emerald wasn't normal."

"He said he can freely switch between his powers now with an Emerald," he answered, looking down at his clipboard. "Wanted me to look into it for him; apparently he's as much in the dark about it as you are. I found something, but I'd rather discuss that with him."

"I see..." One mystery solved, partially at least. "Do you know why he was acting the way he was?"

"Well, about that... I did some analysis on this stuff you brought in that you said Sorun was drinking." The doctor held up the purple bottle. "Sorun mentioned that this stuff was pretty old. You're the one that gave them to him, right, Mina?" he turned to the singer. "That true?"

She nodded. "Yes, but I had one of them shorty before I gave the rest to Sorun," she explained. "I felt completely fine. I don't see how they could of hurt Sorun..."

"Well, that's the thing. To put it in terms you would understand, some of the ingredients in this thing, well... fermented over time."

"Fermented?" Mina's eyes widened. "M-meaning it... it...?"

"It's alcoholic, yes," Quack answered, making the others' faces fall in realization. "Weirdest thing is that I ran tests on this, and the actual levels of alcohol in this are low. Really low. A Mobian child would have to drink fifty bottles of this stuff to even get a little bit tipsy."

"But... Sorun isn't a Mobian..." Sally realized with a small sigh. She quickly felt the anger that had been bubbling up over Sorun drinking began to fade away, replaced be relief that it'd been the result of a horrible accident and nothing more. Nearby she noticed Nicole relax a bit as well, though Mina seemed to be doing the exact opposite from how much she was suddenly fidgeting.

Quack nodded. "Yep. As far as I can figure, his system can't handle alcohol like a Mobian's can. In fact I'm pretty certain a bottle of alcohol meant for Mobians would more than likely kill him. Not that I know how he'd get one in the first place since I don't even know anybody in this city that can afford something like that," he added. "Like I said, the white-hair thing cleaned his system out, but I'd strongly recommend you keep him away from stuff like this from now on."

"So he's fine, then?" This question came from Nicole. "There's nothing wrong with him?"

"Physically, no. Mentally..." The duck hummed and looked back down at his clipboard. "Look, I'm not sure what's going on in his head that the first thing he decided to do when he lost all his inhibitions was steal a plane and leave the city for a bit, but based on what I heard about what happened I think I can guess he's not in a good place up there. He practically had no energy when I was talking with him and kept making morbid jokes. A sign of levity, maybe. Means of coping."

"No, Sorun always says weird stuff like..." Sally trailed off, blinking a few times and looking down at her feet. "Oh."

In some fairness, it was easy for her to see. Part of the reason she tolerated much of Sorun's actions was because she was aware of just how much the human had to endure. And while she hadn't thought he'd just be able to walk off the knowledge Earth was gone, Sally hadn't realized that just maybe Sorun was a bit worse off than what he suggested. She shared a knowing look with Nicole and looked back at the doctor.

"Is there anything you'd recommend?" Sally asked.

"Listen, princess, I'm not that kind of doctor. In fact there's nobody in the city qualified for that kind of thing," Dr. Quack admitted to her. "Just... I don't know, talk to him? Be there for him? I fix wounded bodies, not wounded souls." He turned around back to the door he'd previously come out of. "There's a couple more things I needed to discuss with him, but after that he should be fine to go home. Have a good night, all."

He left shortly after saying that. Sally was left with slumped shoulders, exhaling an exhausted breath as she massaged her forehead to quell the growing headache. Nicole didn't seem to be doing much better than her, and Mina had a mortified expression on her face.

"You guys, I am so sorry," Mina apologized in a distraught tone. "I-I would never have given those to Sorun if I knew-"

"No, Mina, it's... it's fine," Sally tiredly sighed out. "We didn't know, now we do, and nobody was hur... it worked out."

"I still feel like I should stay and apologize to-"

"We'll do it on your behalf," Nicole offered. "It's late and I'm sure that it's been a trying enough time for you. We can handle things from here."

Mina blinked and looked towards the AI, who was staring right at her, expression blank and unreadable. After a few moments, she said, "Alright, then. I guess I'll go home." She turned towards the exit to the lobby. "Tell Sorun I said hi. And, you know... that I'm really sorry about all this."

Shortly after Mina left, Nicole wordlessly turned towards the nearest chair and sat down in it. Sally quietly observed as she slumped forwards, cradling her head in her hands and letting some of her black hair spill between her fingers. Sally watched the display, and then sighed and moved to sit down in the chair right next to her. She watched Nicole for a few more moments as she held the position of holding her head, and then reached up to place a comforting hand on her back.

"Hey," she quietly mumbled in her best helpful tone. "You doing alright?"

"He frustrates me so much sometimes, Sally," Nicole mumbled back. "I care for him dearly but he keeps acting out like this."

"The plane?" Sally guessed.

Nicole shook her head. "It was an accident, I can't blame him for that," she said. "It's... it's everything else."

"Right, the food thing..." the chipmunk realized. "Yeah, I hadn't realized things were that bad with him. I wish he'd come to one of us and told us about it."

"But he never does!" Nicole bolted upright in her seat fast enough that Sally leaned back in surprise. She was even more surprised to see the angered look on her face return. "He puts so little value on his own life. It feels like he doesn't even acknowledge how we feel about how he treats himself." She looked to the side at Sally with a pleading look, asking for help. "Why is he like this, Sally?"

"Look, Nicole, he's... Sorun is... the thing you have to understand..." When her mind came up blank, Sally groaned out loudly and shook her head. "There's no getting around it. Look, Nicole, guys are just idiots sometimes."

"Even Sorun?"

" Especially Sorun..." Sally ground out, startling Nicole. "He does a lot of things that makes me question his intelligence, but looking past all that he's... it's just this thing with guys. I don't know if it's a pride thing, or some stupid universal rule they all like to follow or what, but sometimes they just do stupid things for stupid reasons." She took a calming breath and held a hand to her forehead. "I really am upset about what happened when he tried finding work, but it's not like I can just go out there and force somebody to give him a job. On the other hand, yes, we could have helped him and he should have come to us."

"But he stayed quiet," Nicole muttered, almost sounding bitter. "Again. He always hides behind that excuse that he doesn't want to trouble us." Her face fell drastically. "Why can't he just understand I want to help him...?"

"I don't know. I think there's more going on than just that," Sally said. "You have to realize he just lost his entire world, and it's barely been half a month. I can tell you from experience, back when Mobotropolis was lost when we were kids, that... well, that kind of thing doesn't just go away overnight, Nicole. Everybody has different ways of coping, but Sorun's always been odd so I don't-"

"I've tried being there for him, though," Nicole argued. "He wouldn't say a single word during that first week. I was worried enough that I thought about bringing him back to the hospital until he said he tried to find work to support himself and keep himself occupied. Things seemed fine in the following days, and he'd opened up to me more. He truly appeared to be getting better. I wish he'd just told me things were going so poorly..."

It sounded to her like he'd been lying again about his own wellbeing. And as unfortunate as it was, Sally was fully aware that Sorun had too much experience in that field. Much more than she was comfortable with anybody having, especially an experienced liar like him. "I wish he'd do a lot of things," Sally agreed with a huff. "Listen, maybe... if he really needs something to do, and if he does have some modicum of his power back, maybe he can go back to being a Freedom Fighter. We could keep a closer eye on him and-"

"No."

It'd been such an intense "no" that cut Sally off she was forced to blink and stare at the lynx sitting next to her in bewilderment. Nicole held a completely different gaze, leveling her eyes with Sally's without a single hint of amusement to be found in her features.

"It was only a suggestion-"

"It's an ill-conceived one," Nicole interrupted, silencing Sally once again. "You saw what he was like, Sally. How he is right now. He isn't mentally fit to be going back into the field as he is at the moment." Her expression softened some, and she looked down a bit. "Beyond that, he... confides in me things he doesn't share with the rest of you. He doesn't like fighting. Every single mission he went on was a struggle that strained him more each time. It's too mentally taxing for him, and he needs less stress in his life, not more. He can't anymore. And I don't want him to try."

Surprising show of protectiveness over Sorun aside, Sally understood, at least in some part. Some people weren't cut out for the life they lived. On the day Sorun found out his world was gone, and he'd flat-out stated to them that he didn't want to go back to being a Freedom Fighter, she understood he didn't have the same limits they did. Saw it all the time when she watched him grow more and more tired and haggard with each and every passing day when he was one. It was only when the truth was revealed to them all she saw that he only put up with it because he had no other choice and was dying anyways. He'd practically run himself ragged working with them for under half a year.

Add into his world and people being gone and recent events and she suddenly realized it was probably no wonder he was acting the way he was. All that stress was likely crushing Sorun. Powers or not, that wasn't something she wanted to put in live combat. More than that she just didn't want to put Sorun through that kind of thing again when he really wasn't willing or able. Physically or mentally.

"You have a point," Sally finally admitted with a sigh, relieving Nicole a great deal. "He's done. I know, I just... I don't know what we're supposed to do with him." She rubbed the side of her head in thought. "Maybe I can ask around, see if I can find something for him since he can't on his own. And maybe in the meantime we should spend a bit more time with him. All of us."

Nicole looked unsure at the prospect. "Is that the wisest decision? With the way things have been going-"

"Eggman's and his new private army of henchmen been quiet ever since we started squashing down every operation he attempts to get a leg-up. We all need a break in the downtime anyways," Sally reasoned. "Now's actually the best time to try and do this kind of thing the more I think about it. I'm sure everyone would be fine with it, and it'd do him some good." She reached over and gave Nicole's shoulder a reassuring squeeze. "It's gonna be fine, Nicole. He'll get better. We just need to give him some company and time."

"... Perhaps it's for the best, then," Nicole admitted in a quiet tone. Her face tensed again. "I shall be having words with him about his lying habit. It's beginning to become problematic." She glanced to the side in thought. "Perhaps I should begin monitoring him again as well."

"Um." Sally blinked a few times and tilted her head. "That's going a bit far, isn't it?"

"It's only for a short time. Until I'm convinced he isn't a danger to himself," she reasoned. "Seeing as he evidently crashed an airplane as a result of him trying to 'deal with his own problems on his own,' as Sorun would likely put it, I'm not convinced." She glanced back at Sally. "I'm just worried for his safety. He's fragile."

"Yeah, I know." Even as Sally said this, she watched as Nicole went back to silently contemplating to herself over Sorun, no doubt. What those contemplations entailed was honestly something she figured she was better off not knowing, and decided whatever Nicole had planned Sorun would just have to deal with it. It was his fault, after all.

She had enough headaches as it was.

"In my defense, how was I supposed to know that stuff was alcoholic?"

"Chao chao-chao. Chao-chao chao chao."

"I didn't understand a word of that."

Virgil made an annoyed huff and turned his head away from Sorun. Sorun, meanwhile, made his own huff and turned his head towards the window to look out into the darkened city.

In some strange twist of fate the duck doctor decided to put Sorun in the exact same hospital room he'd been staying at back when he used to have only one arm and eye. He didn't even know if the doctor did that on purpose or if he did it just to mess with Sorun. He'd been more keen on running all sorts of tests on Sorun, some unnecessary in Sorun's opinion due to the regeneration, others in response to the inquiry Sorun had given the doctor regarding what could have changed in him to cause him to hold and use a Chaos Emerald like he could now.

It wasn't normal. Something in Sorun changed, he just didn't know what. And the doctor, after Sorun had explained this all to him, had agreed and decided to run additional tests. Lots of questions, lots of poking and prodding, lots of needles and blood being drawn, lots of Sorun wishing he'd been anywhere but there at the moment. This was all in addition to him testing to find out why Sorun had been blacking out, which, in a shocking twist, turned out to be because Mina quite literally gifted him poison.

... Perhaps that wasn't doing the mongoose justice. From how Dr. Quack put it Mobians had a stupidly high tolerance to alcohol. Or maybe everything on this planet did since the evolutionary curve was so high above him and he was the strange one weak to alcohol. Wouldn't be the first time him being the most un-evolved being on the planet bit him in the ass. So he couldn't blame Mina seeing as there as no feasible way she could have known how harmful those purple drinks would be to Sorun. And maybe he should have realized that the drinks had something to do with it and shouldn't have opted to go for a second one when he came back.

Probably what Virgil was so upset about now that he thought about it. Apparently he'd been drunkenly waving around the Yamato and Virgil had to cut him to get him to drop it before he accidentally sliced Tails or Sally.

Wasn't one of his finer moments.

"Well, if there's a silver lining to any of this it might be that I might be able to spin to Tails I wasn't in the right state of mind so he can't blame me for the plane. Maybe. Hopefully." Sorun sighed and ran a hand over his face. "What a huge mess."

His hand fell away, and he peered through his locks of dark hair towards the Emerald sitting on the counter nearby, with Virgil sitting right next to it. He hoped the doctor would be able to come up with some sort of answer to what happened to him. It kept nagging at him and he wanted it answered.

Sorun's silent prayers were answered when the door to his room opened and was shut again once the duck doctor, clipboard in hand, walked in. Sorun gave the doctor a half-wave. "Doc. Hey," he greeted. "Uh, things going alright?"

"Hm? Oh, fine, fine." He stopped in front of Sorun and began thumbing through some of the sheets on his clipboard. "You're the picture of perfect health, at least by your species' standard. I'm assuming. I was trained to treat Mobians, you see, but from what I can tell you're looking fine."

Sorun pursed his lips and glanced to the side. "Meant with the others," he quietly mumbled.

"Oh. The one that brought you in." Dr. Quack cleared his throat. "The princess isn't particularly thrilled about all this."

"Oohh..."

"Nicole was there as well. She looked aggravated."

"Ooo oohhh ..." That was worrying on all sorts of uncomfortable levels. "Problems for later," he tried to reassure himself as he focused back on the duck. "Well, in any event, I'll try and be careful with what I eat from now on. On another note, that other thing I asked for." He glanced to the side at the blue Emerald. "Did you figure anything out in regards to that?"

The duck followed Sorun's gaze to the Emerald. "You're sure you're not just misinterpreting this?" he asked, looking back at Sorun.

"Doc, there isn't exactly a precedent I'm followin' here. But every time I used to touch one it got, I don't know, subsumed into me?" He gestured towards the gem. "Now I can touch it and use its power without doin' that. It's odd. It's abnormal. I'm trying to rationalize it."

"Does it really matter all that much?" he asked him. "If there are no ill effects-"

"These things are literally poison to me," Sorun pointed out. "For all I know using it just like this is as harmful as me absorbing it, and I'd rather not get years taken off my life again. Had enough of that the first time around."

"Fair point." Dr. Quack looked back to his clipboard. "I told you already that I'm not really an expert on Chaos energies. I'm a doctor, not a... well, I'm not even sure what profession would study that sort of thing. But you'll recall earlier that I examined you with some equipment we have for measuring Chaos levels."

"Really, now?" Sorun demurred. "You claim not to be an expert on it, but you monitor the phenomenon?"

"It's on the off-chance somebody with Chaos-enhanced abilities come to us. I used to examine Sonic a lot."

"Ah." Sorun nodded in understanding.

"Anyways," Dr. Quack continued, nodding his head next to the collection of equipment next to the Emerald that Virgil was resting against, "as far as I can tell you still don't have a link of any kind connecting you to the Chaos Force. That said..."

"Yeah?"

"I compared your bloodwork from the first time you were in here to this time. There were some differences I saw that I wanted you to be aware of." As the doctor flipped through a sheet on his clipboard, Sorun leaned forwards with clear interest. "Minute differences, small changes, mostly in your genetic coding I found."

Sorun sputtered. "T-that don't sound small, doc."

"Well, other than that I haven't noticed any changes with you physiologically speaking, and you haven't noticed any behavioral changes with yourself. Barring, um... outside factors going on in your life, of course." He cleared his throat and focused much harder on the clipboard. "From what I can tell these changes in your genetic structure are what allows your unique interaction with the Chaos Emerald. As for the cause, the only conclusion I can come to is that exposure to the radiation that bled in from the portal leading to your world caused this."

Sorun blinked. He blinked again, and then gave the duck an odd, dubious look. "You said those meds you gave me would clear that up," he warily said.

"Of any potential illness caused from radiation poisoning, yes, but evidently your exposure still caused some inherent change in you," the doctor clarified. "A... mutation of sorts, you could say."

"A muta- come on," Sorun groaned. "Look, doc, I never studied at an accredited institution, but even I know radiation doesn't mutate you to give you super powers." Or magically grant one the ability to suddenly wield cosmic energy capable of doing anything. Energy his entire species was allergic to. That killed him. A mutation couldn't change something that fundamental within him, could it? "Th-this ain't a comic book," he said, partly in disbelief. "Mutations that give me a tumor, sure, but-but that ? How does that make sense?"

"How does a gem of mystical energy giving you the ability to conjure a sword able to cut through space-time make sense?"

Any further argument Sorun held died in his throat.

Sighing, the doctor lowered the clipboard and looked straight into Sorun's eye with his one good one. "Look, Sorun, I don't have all the answers. Like I said, Chaos energy is just too far outside my field. You asked why you're suddenly able to interact with the Chaos Emerald like you can, and I told you. I can tell you the how of it, just not the why. You'll have to take that as you will."

It wasn't a very satisfactory answer, but it was one Sorun realized he'd have to accept. There was already plenty of weirdness surrounding him and this world. All in all hearing this from the doctor didn't do much to breach that weird ceiling. Disconcerting, slightly, but the doctor had assured him there was actually nothing wrong with Sorun, which was relieving on that note at least. Nothing wrong. Just changed.

"It's weird, but... whatever. Mutation. Sure. I'm a mutant now. Why not?" Sorun sighed and slid off the bed. "Well, 'least my hair ain't falling out," he reasoned as he stepped towards the counter. "Thanks for this, doc."

"Sure, it's no problem," he heard the duck call from behind Sorun. "You might wanna meet back up with those two waiting outside for you, though. They're, uh... well, I think they'd like to have a word with you."

"Yeah, don't I know it. Don't be surprised if I wind up right back in here," Sorun sarcastically remarked in a bit of a gloomy tone. He didn't know what to expect walking out there. Other than it'd probably be painful. And Mina had probably told them of his food problem too, which... he didn't imagine Nicole would take a liking to. There'd probably be yelling. At him. Because he was a terrible person who burdened everybody around him no matter what he did. "Christ, maybe I shoulda just stayed on that island."

He reached out towards Virgil, pausing when he saw the Chao was still sleeping. He tilted his head at the sight, and then scooped up the unconscious Chao's body and carefully hung him on his shoulder. It was when he was moving his hand away from the counter, though, that some movement caught his eye. A red needle on one of the doctor's instruments, like the gauge on a speedometer. It was attached to some dish-like implement fitted to a handle. When Sorun moved his hand away, the needle on the gauge went back to resting on the left side, where he assumed zero was amidst all those tick marks behind it. But when he moved his hand back in front of it, the needle went wild, moving left and right in the gauge like it didn't know where it wanted to be. And when Sorun moved his hand back away, it settled back down to zero.

"... Hey, doc?" Sorun picked the instrument up and held it up for the doctor to see. "What's this?"

"It's a tool I use to measure levels of Chaos energy," Dr. Quack answered.

"..." Sorun brought the tool closer to his face. "You said I don't have a link."

"You don't. I checked."

"... Alright, then. Weird." Shrugging, he set the instrument back down on the table, and then reached over to pick the Emerald up. More weirdness he didn't understand. At this point he was more concerned with what was ahead of him than whatever was going on with his body, though. "I'm gonna go. Take care."

The duck Mobian waved him off without another word. Sorun took that as his cue to leave, exiting the room and making his way towards where he remembered the lobby was. Where Nicole and Sally were likely waiting for him if what the doctor said was true. A lot of the time spent walking there Sorun had spent trying to think up what to say. As always, he failed in this regard and had to resort to rubbing his thumb over the Chaos Emerald in an attempt to comfort himself.

It did, somewhat. Holding that power in his hand. A bit of security that he doubted would help him weather this coming storm. It was something, though, and the sleeping Chao on his shoulder sure wasn't much help.

"Maybe I should use Yamato to teleport back to the house? Nah, won't work, Nicole can teleport anywhere in the city. And that'd just make her more mad at me. The ability to stall for a few more minutes sounds rather tempting, however..."

Finally making it to the lobby door and stepping out into the lobby was a harrowing experience in of itself considering how hard Sorun's heart was thumping in his chest. He immediately saw Sally and Nicole, both of which had snapped their gazes towards Sorun. Sally had an assortment of conflicting emotions on her face while Nicole oh she looked pissed .

"..." Sorun made a low breath and collapsed in the nearest chair he could find, not having the energy to stand when he saw Nicole giving him that look. Angry. She'd never looked that angry with him before. He didn't know how to deal with that look. It hurt just acknowledging it, knowing he was the cause of her distress. Made him feel miserable.

"I'd... like to apologize for any trouble I've caused," Sorun quietly mumbled in a guilty voice, eyes trained right on the ground out of shame so he didn't have to look at the girls whose gazes he could feel boring into his soul. "I wasn't in the right state of mind at the time."

"Clearly not." That sharp tone Sally took with Sorun had him wincing. He saw her feet stop right in front of him, and then, oddly, saw her outstretched hand enter his vision. "Before anything else, though, I think I should hold onto that."

Sorun immediately knew what she was referring to. He glanced at his left hand holding the Chaos Emerald, which had automatically shifted into the Yamato without him even thinking of it. Reflexively, he curled the sword into himself, holding its sheathed blade with both hands. "Why? Why's it any better with you than me?"

He glanced up at Sally, who was giving him an exhaustive look. "You almost hurt me and Tails with it," she said. "I just feel it's safer away from you for the moment."

Valid argument. Sorun didn't care. "That was an accident. I wasn't thinking clearly." He hugged the sword closer to his chest. "It's mine. It belongs to me. You can't have it."

"Sorun, you can't claim ownership on a Chaos Emerald ."

His eyes grew challenging. "Seeing as how I died because of them I figured I'm more entitled to them than anyone else on the planet," Sorun shot back.

"That's not how it works." Sally's face grew frustrated. "Why won't you give it up?"

Because it was his only source of power. Without it he was vulnerable. People he cared about were vulnerable. It was the only thing that gave him any worth or value. Without Yamato he was nothing. "I need it," he mumbled out.

"Sorun..." Sally eyes trailed downwards to the sword, and then back up to Sorun's face. She made a short sigh. "You have no reason to have that," she tried in a softer voice. "You're in the city. You're safe. You don't need a weapon that dangerous, okay? Now please give it to me."

Her words caused him to loosen his grip on the katana somewhat, though he still held it close to him. Sally was giving him that look, though, that compassionate look that was becoming more and more impatient, and he knew deep down, one way or another, she was going to get it from him. Fighting her on it wasn't going to do him any good, and he didn't need to add any more tension to an already tenuous situation. So, with extreme reluctance, he handed her the katana. If turned back into the Chaos Emerald once it left Sorun's hands to transfer to Sally's, but he still felt the effect of it leaving regardless.

Emptiness. Vulnerability. Weakness. He felt frightened knowing the gem was no longer in his possession, and immediately yearned to have it back once more. He knew better than to beg for it, though, no matter how much he wanted to. He had an image, however shot that was at this point. It didn't stop him from maintaining eye contact with the gem.

"Thank you, Sorun," Sally said, though she still kept a wary eye on the human still staring so intently at the Chaos Emerald. "Now do you want to talk about what's been going on with you?"

"What is there to say?" Sorun's gaze dipped back down to his feet when he saw, beyond the Emerald, Nicole was staring at him from behind Sally. She still had that look on her face. "I don't know why I stole the plane. I don't remember because of that purple stuff. I came back as soon as I could. I found the Emerald and found out I can use them freely now."

"I'm glad to hear that, Sorun, but do you want to talk about why your... inebriated self decided to take Tails' plane on a joyride?" Sally asked. "Or maybe we should talk about your home life and how it's going so poorly?"

Sorun sank further into his chair. "I don't know," he murmured in a quiet voice. He could practically feel the dissatisfaction his answer garnered from both Sally and Nicole. "Maybe drunk me realized how much of a problem just me existing is for everybody around me. Maybe I thought everybody was better off if I wasn't around." His head sagged to the side. "I don't even know why I bothered coming back to life when-"

A flash of green light signified Nicole teleporting right next to him, making Sorun flinch in his seat. He flinched again when he felt her hand grip his wrist, and when he looked up at her, he visibly withered when he saw her expression had grown worse.

"I will not hear any more of this." She glanced towards Sally. "I will take care of things from here." She looked back at Sorun, her gaze nearly burning. " You are going home."

"What-?"

Sorun didn't get a chance to finish. In another flash of green light he found he was no longer sitting on a hard folding chair. He was sitting on something soft. A couch. His couch. The one in his house. The house Nicole made for him.

The same Nicole that was standing in front of him looking more cross than he'd ever seen her. A part of him wanted to jokingly ask if she intended to teleport him every single time he did something to displease her. His wiser half smacked the other half and told it that was a terrible idea and that they needed to be silent at the moment.

"I can forgive the incident with the plane, as that involved factors outside of your control," Nicole began, sounding so very close to shouting. "But this ? Concealing that you were starving yourself and doing nothing to try and remedy the problem? Sorun, why ?" She took a step closer to him, her fury visibly worsening. "And questioning the value of your own life like that?"

It was amazing how she could sound so icy and heated at the same time, Sorun thought. "I didn't mean that," he attempted. "It slipped out."

"It 'slipped out,'" Nicole repeated. "I won't even pretend to believe that. And I will not hear of you demeaning your life like that again. There are many within this city alone that find your life precious, myself included. I would think you would be of the same mind, but it appears I am mistaken." She leaned closer to Sorun so her face was closer to his, with the human's own face having broken out in a cold sweat. "Why is this?"

It was as much a demand as it was a question. One Sorun didn't know the answer to, because in all honesty, it had slipped out. "I don't know."

Such a childish answer did nothing to placate Nicole, though perhaps the look on his face did. The terror combined with the intense guilt on Sorun's face had given Nicole pause, and a second later she'd stood back to her full height while relaxing slightly. Still visibly angry. But it was a step in the right direction.

"We will broach this subject later in the conversation," she decided, making Sorun uncomfortably squirm in the couch under hey gaze. She wouldn't let it go. "Why did you keep the fact you were starving to yourself?"

"... I did try doing something about it," he weakly mumbled. "I couldn't-"

"You could have come to me!" The dam burst. It wasn't shouting, but the raised, angered tone Nicole took still made Sorun meekly shrink back further into the couch in an attempt to fuse with the cushions. "You could have come to any of us for help! We would have aided you!"

"You always do something to aid me." His hair had long since been brushed in front of his face in a feeble attempt of trying to hide Nicole from his sight, and his own face from her. "I always have to go to people for help. You know what that feels like? Having to rely on everyone for everything all the time?" He sighed and looked up towards the ceiling. "It should just be me that has to deal with all my issues. I shouldn't have to drag down people I care about just for my sake."

Some of the visible anger Nicole held left her in an instant. In its place grew sadness as she looked towards Sorun. "You don't have to do everything on your own, Sorun. You have friends for a reason." She approached the couch and sat down next to Sorun. He flinched when he felt the cushions next to him compressed, but relaxed a second later. "And I try, Sorun. I truly do try to help you, but sometimes it feels as if you push me and every other person away. But at the same time you hold such disregard for yourself it seems as if you don't even want to help yourself." She looked towards him with a questioning look. "Do you truly believe you don't deserve our help?"

"... It's not that, it..." Sorun trailed off, unsure of what to say. He reached towards his shoulder, plucking a sleeping Virgil off and placing him on the armrest near him. "Well, maybe," he admitted to Nicole without looking at her. "Ever since I lost my home it's felt as if I've been in a haze. I don't know what to do, what I should do, why I should even keep on going. I don't know what the point of it is anymore. Living for the sake of living just seems... hollow, at this point. I'd say it makes me feel like a Hollow, but, well... you wouldn't understand what that means."

"Another obscure reference from your world?" she asked.

"It's from a game. A series of them, actually. But I think the tone they had was a bit too dark and dreary for this place," Sorun answered. "... Dave would have appreciated the reference."

Nicole's shoulders fell. Her eyes glanced towards the floor for a moment, and then rose back up to Sorun. She placed a hand on his shoulder while Sorun continued to stare ahead. "Is this why you place so little value on yourself? Why you question being alive?" His silence was enough of an answer for her. "Sorun, that is no reason to be thinking like this. People care about you. I care about you."

"I don't see why you care for me when I keep dragging people down. You included."

Some of Nicole's frustration returned. "I told you why I care for you. Or did you forget everything I've said to you?"

"Of course I haven't," Sorun mumbled.

"Then stop speaking foolishness," she said. "I care for your wellbeing, Sorun. It's not a burden if I want to help you. That's why it hurts when you treat yourself like this without even thinking of how I and the others feel. It's as if you're willfully negligent of how I feel. I don't like it."

"That was never my intention. But... for what it's worth I'm sorry. I didn't mean for any of this to happen." When he looked to the side at Nicole's face, it felt like a punch in the gut. All the anger was gone at this point. It was more anguish now compared to anything else, complete with her ears completely flattened against her head. Anguish directed towards him. "I meant somebody while I was gone," Sorun said, making her ears perk up a bit in interest. "He... had similar circumstances to me, believe it or not. Despite that, he seemed, well, normal. I asked him how and he gave a predictable enough answer. He just stuck by to people he was close with." A small breath him, and his eyes glanced to the hand on his shoulder. "I realize I haven't been very... cooperative with your efforts to help me. I really do want to get better," he continued. "Like he did. I... just don't know if I can. Between my home and myself, it's all so much."

Nicole's expression changed, and her entire body straightened. Her face brightened the barest bit, pleased with at least something he said. "I'm glad to hear you say this, Sorun. But you need to stop pushing people away from you." She moved closer to Sorun and, tired of him avoiding her face, gripped both of his shoulders, and then turned him so that they faced each other. "I want you to stop wasting away alone in this house and start interacting with the others. And no more lying to spare others' feelings."

Sorun grew visibly uncomfortable with the prospect and tried leaning out from Nicole's grip. She wouldn't let him go. "You visiting is enough," he tried, though Nicole clearly wasn't convinced from the flat look she gave him.

"Evidently not, as you wouldn't be starving yourself and stealing planes otherwise. I'm still coming to see you, but the others are going to make time to try and get you more involved."

"They have busy schedules, I'm sure they have more important things to do than-"

"That is not for you to decide," Nicole told him in a firm tone. "We're doing this for your sake, whether you like it or not. As for the food situation..." She glanced towards the kitchen, her expression falling a bit at the empty sight. "I'm aware you at least tried to make some effort, Sorun, and that this environment is apparently... not very accommodating of you. Sally said she would ask around and see if she could find anything for you."

There wasn't any room for arguments. That much was clear for Sorun to see, especially with that look she was giving him. Saying "no" just wasn't an option, because if he did they'd probably break down his door and force him to hang out with them. Or whatever they were gonna do. Or even worse Nicole would just make his door disappear. Wouldn't be the first time she used doors against him.

So, with a resigned sigh, Sorun reached up and placed his hands on top of Nicole's. "Fine. If it'll get you to stop worrying about me. No more bottling up my problems. No more bottles period. That was a horrible experience all around drinking that stuff and I don't even remember it."

The faintest amount of amusement played across Nicole's face. "That would be preferable. Speaking of which, you needn't worry yourself over Tails' plane; I'll endeavor to replace it tomorrow. You'll need to explain yourself to him yourself, however." Her form began dissolving away in green and black squares. "I'll bring some food tomorrow to help tide you over until we figure something out. We'll discuss more afterwards. Until then, I've matters to attend to. Have a good night, Sorun."

She disappeared before Sorun could get another word in. He stared after where she disappeared from on the couch, and then made a small groan as he sat back against the couch. Besides him, Virgil turned around where he lied and continued sleeping.

"I feel like she's worried enough that she'll force-feed me if I refuse to accept charity," Sorun grumbled to himself as he rubbed a hand over his face. The weariness was beginning to get to him, and it was only now he realized how tired he really was. "Ugh, man..."

Chapter 68

Recursion Error

Episode 68- It's a step forwards

Sorun didn't know how to deal with depression.

He'd never taken a psychology class. Never was even remotely invested into the subject. Had he seen it? Sure, of course. Half the people he knew on Earth were depressed. Here on Mobius? The concept existed, of course, but Mobians themselves were... robust creatures.

The teen tried looking back at his memories of fiction at severely depressed fictional characters, with his other half reminding him that maybe taking advice from fictional characters about psychological issues wasn't such a great idea, but he'd been desperate and tried it anyways. What had he learned from that mental excursion?

Well, nothing, really. Other than he knew a lot of depressed fictional characters that were either saved through the power of friendship or became raving psychos. Or just... kind of stayed the same throughout their entire screen time with some character development here or there. Or died. Neither fate seemed to appealing to Sorun. All of his friends seemed to collectively agree that the power of friendship was all he needed to boost him out of this "funk" as it were.

Power of friendship be damned, because he was pretty sure they didn't know what they were doing, either.

"Yeah, Amy, because this is what I wanted to waste my day doing. Go shopping with you."

The basic gist was that everybody was given the rundown of Sorun's situation. So of course they volunteered to help. To that end, they'd all decided he'd be rotated between everybody for "friendship sessions" with them to help him get better. He didn't know how that was supposed to work. He was pretty sure they were just trying to distract him as much as possible in the hope that he'd eventually get better on his own if his mind was taken off the more bad parts of his thoughts. He kind of hoped they were right.

Thankfully nobody actually used the phrase "friendship session", because he probably would have punched the person who suggested it.

First on was Amy, who decided they'd do something she enjoyed doing. Which was shopping for clothes. Because nothing cheered Sorun up like watching someone buy something so he could be reminded he was flat broke.

Every man's dream, really.

Amy, in response to Sorun's flippant disregard of her hobby, had pouted at him and placed her hands on her hips. They stood outside the city's market, with Amy's back to its entrance and with Sorun staring at the pink hedgehog with dull eyes. She didn't seem to approve of his attitude. He couldn't find it in himself to care.

"First of all, it's not a waste. Second of all, it'll be fun!" she claimed.

Sorun scoffed. "How's buying stuff for you fun?"

"It's not all for me. Mostly," she quickly mumbled while turning her head to the side. "I just wanted to get some gifts for the others, and I thought maybe you could help me out! Maybe you could buy something for someone you really like if you find something in the process."

"Yes, of course. I'll just use my not-money to buy an extravagant gift." His voice dripped in sarcasm, though it was seemingly lost on the pink hedgehog standing in front of him.

Amy squinted and tilted her head to the side. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"I live in poverty."

He could practically see the gears in Amy's head begin to turn. After they finished, she grew an incredibly awkward I-can't-believe-what-I've-done look, and then began speed walking forwards and away from the market. She'd grabbed Sorun's wrist and began dragging him away in the process, with the human forced to walk with her.

"You know what? Gifts are overrated anyways," Amy claimed. "I'm sure we can find something else that's fun to do! What do you like to do for fun?"

"Sleep," Sorun deadpanned as he was dragged along the streets.

A frustrated huff left Amy, after which they stopped on a sidewalk corner. She released Sorun's hand and turned to face him once more. "That's not what I meant and you know it," she said. "What about those video game things you like so much? I know you have the console from the HQ back at home. We could do that!"

"That wouldn't be fun."

Amy gave him an inquisitive look. "Why wouldn't it be fun?"

"The same reason I wouldn't get any satisfaction from punching a child in the face," Sorun's mind snarked. "You're terrible at games. I wouldn't get anything out of beating the likes of you. A complete novice."

She dared to look offended by the claim. "Sorun, come on, that's not fair. I know I've barely ever touched that thing, but don't you think calling me terrible at it is a bit much?"

"Are you Nicole?"

"... No?"

"Then you're terrible."

"Come on!" she stomped her foot down in indignation and gave him a heated look. "You say that like she's the only fun person you can play those things with."

"She is. She's the only one that can challenge me. She even wins half the time," he said to her. "Not even Sonic compares to her. They're on completely different levels." The corners of his mouth twitched upwards. "Being the fastest thing alive doesn't mean much when the game has a hard limit on how fast it can read controller inputs. And he fails to grasp the finer arts that is playing those games. Pattern recognition, timing, situational awareness and adaptivity. He's too headstrong for most of these. He relies on pure reflexes alone." Given they were Sonic's reflexes that actually carried him quite far. In fact, he was fairly certain the only reason he and Shadow were in the middle of the leaderboard, right between the gap separating him and Nicole from everyone else, in those games was because of their absurd reflexes. Vital, sure. But reflexes weren't everything. Sorun was a walking testament to that.

It was because Sonic couldn't learn that button mashing wasn't everything that Sorun would always be superior to him in that regard.

"Sheesh. If you like playing them with her so much then why don't you do it more often?" an exasperated Amy asked him.

"We do. Frequently." Almost daily, really, and times they didn't were just when they decided to talk the whole time. "Speaking of which..."

Sorun turned his head to the side, towards a street lamp. He looked up it, and he could have sworn that the lightbulb in the street lamp looked awfully similar to a camera lens. But then he blinked, and of course when he opened his eyes it was back to being an ordinary lightbulb. Like he'd just imagined it.

Nanites really were interesting.

"She's watching me again," Sorun intoned, making Amy follow Sorun's gaze to the street lamp. "Nicole keeps sneaking cameras around me thinking I don't notice. I notice," he said, a bit more loudly than he normally spoke. "You have any idea what she's doing?" Sorun asked in his normal volume when he looked back down at Amy.

Amy bit her lower lip when she turned back to Sorun. "She's... just worried about you. We all are," she confessed. "You just haven't been yourself lately. We know why , we just... we just wanna help you." She made a frustrated sigh and crossed her arms. "And can you really blame Nicole? You didn't see because you left, but you really, really scared her when you stole Tails' plane. She wouldn't calm down the entire time you were gone."

"I... hadn't known that." Nobody elected to tell him what he would have assumed to be pertinent information. He made a resigned noise and glanced to the side. Another mistake he had to rectify. "It isn't so bad," he said. "At least she respects my privacy and only spies on me outdoors. As far as I know, anyways," he quietly mumbled out.

He didn't think she'd go that far. Honestly doubted it, really. There were a lot of hard lines and boundaries Nicole refused to cross out of decency, and disrespecting the citizens' privacy was one of them. Public spaces like sidewalks and the park were one thing. The inside of homes may as well have been a whole other world, and she was acutely aware of this.

"Sorun, come on. You know Nicole wouldn't do that." Amy softly punched Sorun in the arm and gave him a half-grin. "Now come on, think of something fun we can do."

"You decide," Sorun said. "What do you even like doing outside of shopping?"

"Well...~ We could always go visit Sonic."

Sorun mentally recoiled from the idea. "I thought we were supposed to be doing something fun?"

"You don't think it'd be fun to go see Sonic?"

"It feels more like a punishment than anything else." A deserved one, maybe, but just because he deserved it didn't mean he was inclined to endure it.

"Sorun!" That offended shriek from Amy could have probably shattered glass if she tried hard enough. It was enough to make Sorun wince at her while she glared at him. "What do you have against him, anyways?"

"I don't have anything against him," Sorun denied. "He's... obnoxious at times. That's all."

"Tah!" Amy waved him off and turned away from Sorun. "Well, I don't know what you want to do, Sorun. You didn't want to look at dresses with me, you didn't want to go shopping-"

"No man wants to do these things."

"And who decided that!?" As Amy yelled that towards the sky, Sorun turned around and began walking the opposite direction of her. "Just because you don't like doing things which I think are perfectly normal for everybody to do doesn't mean every guy has to hate it! You like doing lots of things I think are just for children! Like those stupid games of yours." She rounded towards him. "And another thing-!"

Her voice cut off when she saw the space behind her was empty.

"Uh... S-Sorun?"

"Yeah, still here." Amy jumped when she heard Sorun speak just behind her. She spun around to see the human calmly standing behind her with his hands tucked in his pockets. "I walked off halfway through that, but then realized that was kind of a jerk thing to pull and came back," he explained. "Look, Amy, I don't want to be rude, I just... I really don't want to do any of that, you know?"

"Ah, well..." Amy sighed out and rubbed the back of her head as she glanced away. "I don't know, Sorun, do you at least wanna go get lunch? Speaking of which, you've been eating again, right?"

An embarrassed sigh left Sorun. "Sally's been donating some food to me 'til I figure something out. And Nicole threatened to lock me in a hospital room and have the doctors feed me intravenously if she saw signs of me getting skinnier and not eating." He made a "tch" sound. "Wouldn't be the first time she locked me in a hospital room."

He was pretty sure she was serious with that threat, too. She'd had a pretty serious tone when she said it. And a rather serious face.

"She's just trying to look after you," Amy rationalized. "You... don't really make things easy. For anyone."

"Yeah, I know..." Sorun let out an airy breath and kicked at his feet. "I'm tryin' here." He looked back up at Amy's eyes. "So. Lunch?"

"Oh! Sure, follow me!" The pink hedgehog began to practically skip down the sidewalk. Sorun dragged his feet in following her. "I know this one place that makes these really great crepes and I was thinking..."

Lunch had been... well, lunch. Nothing more, nothing less. Amy tried having a discussion with Sorun, though most of the words she spoke had been tuned out by Sorun with him nodding along to whatever she'd been saying. He didn't even know if she knew he was indirectly ignoring her. He felt bad, in a way, but the crepes helped alleviate some of that guilt.

As long as she at least thought she was helping, he supposed... She at least left looking pleased with herself.

Well, she was gone, and now he was here. At the back of Antoine's house. The coyote himself was absent, out on an errand, apparently, but his wife and Sally were there, with all three of them sitting around awkwardly and not knowing what to do. Sorun himself was sitting on an artificial tree stump, Sally was sitting down on the ground next to him, and Bunnie was standing off to the side with her arms crossed.

He only got here in the first place because he ran into Sally after leaving Amy, and she'd all but dragged him here under the pretense of just wanting to hang out. He wasn't sure he bought it, but then again it wasn't an entirely inaccurate statement. But he still knew why, and knew the consequences of saying no, but he'd still went along with it.

Didn't help that this was more or less an impromptu gathering and neither of the three actually knew what to do to pass the time.

"You know, there's a world of difference between friends coming together to hang out and do whatever and... whatever this even is," Sorun said, hands on the side of the stump. "I appreciate the effort, but you don't think this is awkward?"

"There has to be a reason for us to get together?" Sally asked him. "We're all friends, aren't we? We really need a reason to socialize whenever we feel like it?"

He looked towards her, and much to his surprise she seemed genuine. And, in a way, she wasn't wrong. Sorun knew that. It didn't help how... forced this all felt. Maybe because he felt more like a hostage than a visiting friend. "What do you even want?" he asked her.

"Why do you have to say it like that?" she asked back. "You've been cooped up inside your house for weeks and I just thought you needed to bond with us a bit. What's so wrong with that?"

"I meant right now," Sorun deadpanned. "What do you want to do right now?"

"Ah. Right." Clearing her throat, Sally gestured to him. "Why don't you decide?"

"Hopeless." Shaking his head, Sorun turned to Bunnie, who'd been all but silent for the most part so far. "Bunnie, what do you even like to do for fun?"

"Fun, huh?" The rabbit cupped her chin and looked up towards the sky. "Ah suppose... ya probably wouldn't understand what ah mean, but ah like to fly around a lot," she answered, looking back down at Sorun. "With the thrusters in mah feet. It's freein', ya know? Jus' bein' up there."

Sorun hummed. "Huh. I didn't know that," he said. "I used to be able to fly. I can't do that anymore." His gaze shifted to Sally. "Well, unless someone wants to let me-"

Sally caught his meaning immediately and shook her head. "No, Sorun. The Emerald's staying locked in the vault in the castle," she said.

Tsking, Sorun leaned in her direction. "Well, what about you? What do you like doing in your free time?"

The princess shrugged. "Well, exercising is always fun. Plus it helps me keep in shape and-"

"Yeah, but that's not something Bunnie can do with us," Sorun quickly stated in a higher than average pitch. He turned towards the rabbit in question. "I mean it's not like she can work out her legs and arm when they're made of metal and-"

"Actually there is some physical therapy ah do have to do regularly," Bunnie corrected him, making Sorun freeze. "It wouldn't be too hard for us-"

"Now that I think about it flying isn't something we can all do, either," Sorun said, almost in desperation. "We should do something we all can do. Equally. All equal-like."

At this point he was down for anything as long as it wasn't exercise.

Both Bunnie and Sally narrowed their eyes in his direction. The deflection was a clear one, though Bunnie had made an agreeing sigh and dipped her head a bit, making Sorun sag in relief. "Alright, then. What do you think we should do?"

"I dunno... baking?" Sorun suggested with a shrug. "You tried to give me a piece of that carrot cake stuff you said you made once. We could do that?"

Bunnie's green eyes sparked in interest, though she also looked a bit doubtful. "Antoine told me about you tryin' tah bake once. You really wanna try somethin' as advanced as carrot cake?"

Sorun shot her a questioning glance. "What's so complicated about it? It's the exact same recipe as normal cake but with carrots thrown into the batter, ain't it?"

"..." Bunnie's calm look became a bit strained as she glanced away from Sorun. "Maybe we oughta hold off on baking," she suggested, pushing down the brim of her hat over her face to hide her grimace. She blinked a few times when the action caused her to notice something, followed by her removing her hat to look at its underside. "Goll-darnit, I think there's a hole here."

"That's from the last mission, right?" Sally asked. "I think I saw a laser blast graze your head."

"Yeah, looks like the heat jus' barely got to the hat. Ah think I can fix it..."

A tinge of worry grew in Sorun's stomach. Probably a natural reaction to anybody learning their friend was almost shot, but then he remembered just what exactly almost all his friends did for a living. And that he'd stepped away from that life for a very good reason. His fingers began to unconsciously tap against the tree stump and, eager to divert the conversation, said, "You know if I had the Chaos Emerald I could show you a really cool hat-"

"Sorun," came Sally's warning voice, causing him to sigh and drop his shoulders.

It was a topic Sally steered away from whenever Sorun asked about it. Since he wasn't a Freedom Fighter anymore, nobody thought he had any reason to gain powers from the Chaos Emerald he brought back. And since they didn't have any other use for it, they locked it away somewhere in the castle so nobody else could use it for any misdeeds. That was the justification Sorun was given, at least. He personally thought they were just withholding it from him because he'd proved to be "irresponsible" during the drinking incident, but it was a baseless theory. And beyond that he saw the logic.

Even so, he felt incomplete without at least the Yamato at his side. It didn't feel right to not be holding the sword. And he didn't like his supposed "friends" were keeping what was rightfully his away from him, even if he saw the reasons behind it. He didn't find himself caring. He wanted his sword.

"When are you going to give me back my Chaos Emerald, Sally?"

"It's not yours, Sorun," Sally rebutted. "And I already told you. You don't need it."

"So when can I have it back?"

A half-frustrated, half-exhausted sigh left her. "Why do you even want it so bad?" the chipmunk asked him. "I get they can't hurt you as long as you don't permanently absorb them, but do you really need it just to hold onto it?"

Sorun scoffed and threw his hand up. "Because everybody has their own thing that makes them distinct," he said. "You're the princess with the genius tactical mind, Bunnie's the cyborg, Sonic has his speed, Tails can fly and is a genius, Rotor's up there with Tails' brain, Antoine's... got his thing-" Sorun coughed to the side when Bunnie shot an annoyed glare at him, "- and Amy's got her hammer. Need I even mention Nicole? Everybody's got all these different niches, and what do I have?"

"Sorun, you're the only human that lives in the whole city. You have more niche than anybody else," Sally stated, an unconvinced look on her face. "What's this really about?"

She'd sent him a scrutinizing look, and Bunnie had joined her with an equal glare. The looks they both were sending him caused Sorun to sigh. He could try getting out of it, but he didn't find the effort worth it. And he didn't want to give them any misconceptions, whatever possible misconceptions the pair could draw up from this.

"The Yamato is... important to me. On a personal level," Sorun admitted to the two of them. "It's not just about the power. It's the sword itself."

"I think I remember Eggman mentioning something about it. Something about a storybook," Sally said. "Back when we were all in those Egg Grapes."

"Yeah, I remember hearin' that, too," Bunnie added. "What'd he mean by that, Sorun?"

"You guys honestly thought I just created that sword from a mental picture I made up on the spot?" Sorun made a bemused laugh, drawing confusion from the two Mobians. "Well, not entirely inaccurate, I suppose. It's from a story, yes. One very personal for me. There were a series of these stories, and I was introduced to the very first one by my mother, on a birthday when I was young." He looked off to the side, avoiding the two's looks. "It was an exceedingly bad time for me. The gift wasn't even wrapped, like it was a last-second thing. I think my mother just bought the first thing she could find at a store to help distract me."

Sally's expression grew worried. "What happened?" she asked him.

"... It's not for Mobian ears."

"And just what is that supposed to mean?"

"It means I won't speak of it," Sorun stated as he looked back at the two, noting the confused, irritated looks both Sally and Bunnie had adopted. "Look, the point is those stories were important to me, and the sword came from them." He looked down towards the stump. "It's my only connection to my home," he continued in a quieter voice, making the two Mobians freeze. "I have nothing else from Earth. Not a single possession. Even the clothes I came with were lost when Knothole fell. That and a gum wrapper I'd kept for good luck. But that's all gone, now. Yamato is the only connection I have left." He looked straight into Sally's eyes. "And you're keeping that from me."

It was only a half-true. Left unsaid was how he detested how vulnerable Sorun felt without the Yamato's power at his side, or any power granted by the Emerald. But even disregarding that the sword alone held incredible sentimental value to Sorun, and he did not like being left without it.

Sally made a deep sigh at the accusatory glare he was sending her. "Sorun, that isn't fair." She almost looked sympathetic with that look she was giving him, though she met his glare with one of her own. "I understand why you want it, but there's nothing I can even do at this point. It was the council's decision to lock the Emerald away since its power is so dangerous, and my word alone isn't enough to overturn a decision of theirs." She leaned forwards a bit and folded her arms over her knees. "I only took it away from you because you were acting irresponsible. Hearing that, and seeing as it was a one-time thing, I would give it back to you. I really would. But like I said, it's not my choice. And I really don't think the council or my brother would have the same reaction I do."

He had the same doubts she did. It brought some comfort knowing she would let him have it if she could, and he was thankful for that.

And a bit guilty-ridden for the tone he'd taken with Sally now.

"I'm sorry if I seemed a bit overbearing. It's just important to me," Sorun apologized. "Listen, I don't think this is really working out. I appreciate the effort you're going through, and I'm thankful you all want to help, but this is too awkward." He slid off the stump he'd been sitting on and stood up, hunched forwards with his hands in his pockets. "If you wanna invite me to group things, fine. If either of you or anyone else wants to invite me to something or just swing by my place to hang out, then sure. But forcing an outing like this isn't... it's not doing it for me," he admitted with a shake of his head.

"I know." Sally rubbed a hand over her face and stood up along with him. "I'm sorry if this got weird. We're just-"

"Tryin' to help, I know, I know," Sorun tiredly sighed out. "I already said I appreciate it, but I prefer a natural progression of friendship as opposed to this ," he said, gesticulating his hand around to the general area. "This damn pity parade," he thought, but didn't dare speak. He figured the other two got his meaning anyways.

... Or maybe they'd taken it the wrong way, because all of a sudden Sally was stroking her chin with a thoughtful look. "Natural, huh...?" she'd mumbled, making Sorun blink in worry and turn away.

"Right, well, I'm going home." He began walking away from the pair before any of them could say anything further. For better - or worse - he'd managed to get away without them making a single sound. He'd left feeling a slight sense of foreboding, but in the end chose to ignore it in favor of just being able to head home. For however much good that got him.

The next day found itself proving that the sense of foreboding Sorun had felt the previous day was correct.

His best guess to why any of this was happening was that Sally misinterpreted Sorun's meaning of how yesterday's little gathering had been too forced. That must have translated into her convincing "the guys", because that's what he had to deal with now, crashing his home and inviting themselves in under the pretense of hanging out with Sorun was the best idea ever. Which, in fairness, was what they were doing.

In fairness to Sorun he was pretty sure he could classify this as a home invasion if he really wanted to. Then again, he wasn't sure anyone would actually listen to him.

With a sigh, Sorun's relaxed eyes stared forwards at the TV screen telling him he'd won the game. Again. And with one single hand at that, because at this point he needed the handicap to make things at least a little bit interesting. He looked to his right side to Sonic, who was staring at the TV in muted shock with his controller loosely held in his hands.

If there was one thing, one thing, he could forever hold over Sonic's head for being better at it than him, it was games. He may have been faster than Sorun, and stronger, and everything-er, but this was something Sorun could have. His element. His specialty. His... well, it was just his. Nobody was allowed to be better at it than him.

... Nobody but Nicole, anyways, but she was special. She was the only one allowed to beat Sorun.

"Maybe I should start using less fingers. Give you a better chance at beating me at this," Sorun dryly remarked to the stunned hedgehog. "What did I say about button mashing?"

"It's gonna work eventually..." Sonic growled under his breath, his mouth set in a thin pout.

"In some situations, yes," Sorun amended. "In most cases, though, it won't. And this ain't one of 'em."

"Well could you maybe show me how exactly that's supposed to work?"

"Tch. You're Sonic the Hedgehog. Figure it out yourself." If Sorun were a better man he would have loved to volunteer to help Sonic learn the finer intricacies. But that would entail Sonic becoming marginally better in an area Sorun liked proving his superiority over in. And would lessen the gap separating him and a spot he personally reserved for Sorun and Nicole. Both of these were unacceptable. So the blue bastard was on his own.

Sonic blinked at Sorun, and then set the controller down. "Okay. Didn't have to say it with that much emotion, but alright," he said. "Things are going fine with you, right? Like, you're okay?"

Sorun exhaled through his nose. Sometimes he had to remind himself there was actually a reason he was friends with Sonic. He actually was a nice guy. Irritating, too, but nice. "I'm getting on," he answered.

"Really? 'Cause Tails-"

"There's only so much I can do to apologize for an accident," Sorun interrupted with a tired half-scowl. He looked past Sonic and towards the kitchen. He saw Tails sitting down at the kitchen table, arms folded and tails slowly swishing behind him. Antoine was rifling through cabinets Sorun knew were empty in the hope of throwing something together for them all. He wouldn't find anything, but Sorun let him search anyways. He liked seeing him fumble around in futility.

"You did break his plane."

"How much of that plane was his plane, anyways?" Sorun asked, focusing back on Sonic. "I know the Special was completely lost in the Knothole bombing, but how'd the plane make it out?"

Sonic winced a bit. "In fairness Nicole had to recreate a lot of the parts with her nanites, but it was still the plane. Mostly," he said.

"You know, there was a proverb about a ship or a axe or something where I'm from. Some philosophical thing that asked the question of whether something is something even if you replace all the parts or... was it about the integrity of the spirit, or...?" Sorun frowned a bit, not quite remembering what he was trying to say. Eventually, he shook his head. "Look, even if all the parts are different does it really matter? It's the same plane. You know. In spirit."

"Yeah, try tellin' that to Tails," Sonic grumbled. "Look, he's gonna get over it, just don't, er... don't do that again."

Sorun clicked his tongue. "Guess I'll have to dash my plans for hitting the sauce and stealing vehicles again..."

A small amount of laughter was shared between the two of them. In ended in tapering sighs on both their parts, with Sonic sinking further into the couch as Sorun began idly tapping the controller he held in his hand.

"I'm sorry Rotor couldn't come over with the rest of us," Sonic suddenly said. "Guy's been swamped with all the council work. I hear my uncle complain about it a lot, too. They're practically drowning in paper over there."

"Ah, yeah, I heard Rotor got voted into the council." He couldn't exactly be remiss about the walrus not coming to visit. Three was already stretching Sorun's patience. And while the two were friends, Sorun wasn't overly close to the guy. Worked with him, had a few conversations and hung out a bit. But that was about the extent of that friendship. There wasn't much beyond that. "Must be strange, going from being a Freedom Fighter to politician." And probably as equally stressful.

A wry laugh left Sonic. "Yeah, well, the whole back thing kind of threw that career out of the window. He says he likes where he is now, but sometimes I catch him complaining that being on the council takes a lot of his tinkering time away."

"Right. His back." Sorun clicked his tongue. "That never cleared up?"

"... He said it's manageable."

So no, then. "How'd that even happen, anyways?" Sorun asked.

"I don't even know. We were all fighting, or at least trying to fight, Egghead in that big dumb mech of his, and out of nowhere this giant rock just flies in and nails Rotor in the back," Sonic recounted. "I don't have any idea where it came from. Couldn't have been Eggman, 'cause he was right in front of us. Wasn't Snively, 'cause the Chaotix were dealing with him." He shook his head. "I dunno. I think an explosion from the bombardment chucked a piece of rubble at him. Only thing I saw when I looked back was a bunch of red. Probably all the fire and explosions."

Sorun's head snapped to Sonic. The speed at which his head turned caused the hedgehog to jump a bit in his seat, though the slightly startled look Sorun had on his face quickly died away. "Right. Must have just been an explosion," Sorun quietly muttered out, not quite believing his own words. "Red, huh..."

"Sorun! What iz zis travesty of a kitchen!?" Sorun was more impressed that Antoine had the audacity to say such a thing more than anything else as he looked back into the kitchen. All the cabinets had been opened to reveal they were all empty. "How am I supposed to be making zomething from ze nothing!?"

"My sincerest apologies you weren't able to find food in the kitchen. A kitchen that's my kitchen. In my house. The same house you all barged into like you owned the place. Without asking. That house."

"Oui, but where iz ze food!?"

Sorun deeply inhaled through his nose, and was aiming to say something he would have likely regretted saying before Sonic had zoomed off the couch and stopped right behind Antoine. He wrapped an arm over the coyote's shoulders and practically began steering him towards the front door to the home.

"Hey, you know what, I just remembered my mom had a bunch of extra stuff lying around the house," Sonic voiced as he half-guided, half-dragged Antoine towards the door. It was at the same time they left that Sorun realized that only left two people inside his house: himself and Tails. The latter of which was sulking in his depressingly empty kitchen.

"I feel like Sonic did this on purpose." Sorun made a sigh as he stared out towards Tails. "I could kick him out. Technically. It's my house." It was all too tempting seeing as he didn't want to deal with feelings talk right now. Then again, he'd have a hard time explaining that away to the others. With in inward grimace he shook his head and rose up off the couch. "Egh, fine..."

With a large amount of hesitation weighing his footsteps down, Sorun had somehow managed to trudge his way to the kitchen. If Tails even noticed him sit down in one of the other dining table chairs next to him, he didn't so much as move in acknowledgement. Sorun almost took that as a sign that he didn't want to talk and almost left at that. For some reason his mouth began moving before his feet did.

"So did Antoine not get the memo my pantry is as barren as my wallet?" Sorun asked, resting in arm on the table as he looked to the side at Tails. "Thought you guys had this whole big friendship gathering just to discuss little ol' me."

"He thought you still had some of the food Sally gave you," Tails airily answered, not even looking his way. "What happened to that?"

"She gives me enough to get by. That's about it." Sorun drummed his fingers along the table. "Tails, I'm sorry about the plane."

"I'm not... I..." Tails finally looked over to Sorun. There was some hurt in his eyes that made Sorun inwardly flinch. "I just can't understand why you would do that. Why? You know how much I like that plane."

"Mina poisoned me." He tried to keep his head high and his voice even and steady. It came out a lot quieter than Sorun would have liked.

The excuse didn't do much to placate Tails. "And what does that have to do with anything!?"

"Apparently very little," Sorun mumbled out. He had to be very careful with his words here due to the fact that Sonic and Sally had made it very clear they didn't want the concept of alcohol introduced to Tails. Plus his mom was on the council. He didn't need political figures angry at him. "Tails, I can't tell you why I did it because I genuinely don't remember. The, uh... the stuff Mina gave me, it..." He clicked his tongue a few times. "You know I'm from Earth, and this is Mobius, and the fact is there's stuff here on this planet I can't eat because my body isn't accustomed to it."

"Oh... is it like allergies?" Tails asked, looking much more understanding. "I know Sonic's allergic to these specific kind of berries, but he doesn't like talking about it."

"Pfft." Sorun couldn't hold in the laugh that hissed through his teeth. "Sonic's allergic to something? Fuckin' dweeb." He didn't feel it was okay to demean something like an allergy, but for Sonic, he'd make an exception. "Yeeeeaah, it's... sorta like that," he said to Tails once he'd calmed down. "'Cept instead of getting bloated or hives or whatever I just... kinda lose my mind a bit. Hence me not remembering what happened," he explained. "The doctor said it blew away all my inhibitions for a bit."

Tails blinked in confusion. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"No idea." A lie, he knew exactly what that meant, even if he didn't know why drunk him decided stealing Tails' plane was the best idea in the whole world. "I don't know why I did it. I don't even remember doing it. I wouldn't have done it if I knew that stuff was poisonous to me."

Part of Sorun found it odd he was trying so hard to get the fox to forgive him. At the end of the day, it didn't change anything. Nicole would fix the plane and Sorun could walk away with relatively little to no accountability from the whole thing. The only thing hurting Tails was sentimentality over the plane itself, and even then Sorun couldn't find it in himself to care enough to that extent. He cared about Tails, though. Not so much his opinion, but... well, he did have an image. A poor one, maybe. But he still had it.

"... Ugh. I get it," Tails finally said with a slump of his shoulders. "The Tornado's just special to me, you know? Seeing it all busted up by you of all people... but it's fine. I can understand it wasn't really your fault."

That was probably as good as Sorun would get. He breathed out a sigh of relief and sat back in his chair. "Yeah, I know. You know, there's this old saying about the grandfather's spaceship, or... eh, forget it, I don't remember," he said upon catching Tails' confused look. He faced ahead at the empty cabinets so he didn't have to look at the Mobian. "I never thanked you," he said suddenly.

"Huh?" Tails looked over at Sorun again, who was making a pointed effort not to look at him. "For what?" he asked him.

"If it weren't for you pulling me through that portal I would have suffered through a world-ending armageddon and died," Sorun said. "So thanks for ruining my life. Because apparently that saved it."

Figured it'd be prudent to say that now, because it had to be said at some point. If not for his sake, than at least for Tails'. Maybe it'd go to make the fox feel better, which was a win as far as Sorun was concerned.

"O-oh. That." Tails' ears and twin tails wilted a bit, and he turned his head away from Sorun. "You still died," he mumbled.

Sorun made a humorless chuckle. "Yeah, guess I'm doomed no matter what I do," he agreed. "I came back, though. As it is I'm too stubborn to die." Sorun sat forwards in his seat and clasped his hands together. "If you really still feel bad about it just consider the plane my way of paying you back and we'll call it even."

That actually managed to elicit some small laugh from Tails, who looked back towards the human. "Sure. I can live with that," he said. "I just... always felt kind of responsible. You wouldn't have had to go through all that if I'd never brought you here, but... yeah, it feels better knowing it was for the best in the end. For you." He looked away from Sorun and began to idly rub at his shoulder. "Are you really okay, Sorun?"

The small amount of amusement that had been building on Sorun's face began to fall off. "What brought this up?"

"You've been acting weird ever since we found out what happened to your zone. Everybody keeps talking about you like they're really worried about you, and then there's this." He gestured to the empty kitchen. "It's got me worried, too," he added, looking back towards Sorun. "So is everything alright? Do you need something?"

"A job," Sorun morosely thought, but chose to keep this to himself. "It's been hard coping with everything on one side and juggling with adjusting to my new life here on the other side," he admitted to him. "I'm trying my best, but this kind of thing has never been... I'm not good at this. And I didn't wanna tell the others for stupid reasons, and that didn't work, so now they're trying to help, I dunno, normalize me?" He shook his head, dropped it, and placed a hand on it. "Don't tell Sonic this, but I really do appreciate you all coming here to check on me and everyone for worrying. It helps."

Helped tell him he wasn't so alone, at the very least. If it wasn't a step in the right direction, it was at least a step forwards towards somewhere better. Dulled the aches in his heart just a little bit more each day, which, Sorun supposed, was a sign of good progress. It'd be better if he could find some way of supporting himself, but it was a start.

He said he'd fix himself. He didn't know how long that was supposed to take or how he was supposed to go about doing it exactly, but he guessed that was why the others were there. To help, because try as he might, this wasn't something he could do on his own. And as suffocating as they were at times he enjoyed the company despite his disposition and outward appearance.

"Well, you're getting better, right? That's what's most important, I think." When Sorun looked back up at Tails, he caught him smiling at him. "But seriously, if you need something you just have to ask. You know we're here for you."

"You've all made that abundantly clear," Sorun half-grumbled, though he still had an amused smirk on. "In that case, would you be willing to break into the castle and steal the Chaos Emerald they have there for me?"

The smile Tails held dropped off in an instant in lieu of confusion. "Huh? N-no. I'm not doing that. Why would I do that?"

"Could you at least ask your mom? I know she's on the council. You can't pull some political strings for me and just, like-?"

Tails shook his head. "I don't think she'd do that for you," he said.

"Can't blame a guy for trying."

The rest of the conversation was cut off when Sorun's front door was opened again. Sonic sauntered in without as much as a single item in his hand. Antoine, by contrast, stumbled in holding so many food items Sorun wasn't even able to see his head. Both Sorun and Tails glared towards Sonic as a result, who gave them both his best innocent grin while shrugging.

"What?" he asked. "I held the door open for him."

"Oui, and I am very grateful." From how sarcastic he sounded Antoine didn't sound very grateful. He somehow found his way to the kitchen and set the food items down, muttering something in French Sorun couldn't understand as he bent down towards something. "I am just being glad your mother was gracious enough to- mon dieu, Sorun, have you even used zis oven!?"

"I have an oven?" Sorun looked closer towards where Antoine was crouching down towards. That thing had gone so unused by Sorun he'd forgotten its existence. "Huh. Yeah, no, I never really used that."

"Incroyable." With the way he said it Antoine almost sounded disgusted. He'd shaken his head as he stood up, and then turned towards Sorun and grabbed at his wrists. "Alrighty, up, up!" he ordered, pulling a startled Sorun up out of his chair. "Eef you are to be living on your own I will not be 'aving you starve because you did not know how to even work a oven. You are helping me weeth zis."

Sorun's only protest to all of this was a very visible scowl on his face. He'd still obeyed Antoine without any resistance and stood at the kitchen counter next to him. "Ugh, do I have to? Don't even know how to cook."

"All ze more reason to be doing zis." The coyote shot Sonic an annoyed look. "We should all be more zan grateful Soneek's mother 'ad more zan just hotdogs to spare and gave us actual food."

The short sound of rapid footfalls followed Sonic standing next to the pair with his arms crossed. "You tryin' to say somethin'?"

"Nothing I am not needing to prove," Antoine grumbled under his breath. He reached towards one of the items he'd been carrying and held it out to Sorun. Sorun only needed a quick glance to confirm his fears: it was a bundle of vegetables. "Sorun, can you start cutting zese?"

Sorun visibly blanched. "I don't want vegetables."

"Oui, well, I am wanting you to be healthy and not go back to ze hospital, so you are eating zem whether you want to or not." Without another word Antoine thrust the vegetables into Sorun's arms, and then turned around to fiddle with the oven while Sonic began searching around for pans.

"What is he, my mother?" Sorun, scowling down at the vegetables and already planning on how he could avoid eating them, reached to the side, grabbed a knife, and then turned to Tails who'd flown up towards the three of them. "If you can handle a plasma torch I imagine you can handle a knife," Sorun blandly stated as he handed the fox the knife and vegetables.

"Uh, sure." Hesitantly, Tails accepted the items. "What're you gonna do?"

"He can show me where the stupid pots and pans are," Sonic loudly grumbled from the side. "Seriously, Sorun, where'd you put them? And the plates? And the... everything else? I can't even find the utensils!"

"Oh, yeah, I put literally everything in a single, really large cabinet because I figured I'd never use it and it'd be easy to find something if I did need it."

Repressing a loud groan, Sonic rubbed a hand over his face and stood up from his kneeling position in front of an open cabinet. "Okay, I guess we're organizing your kitchen while we're here, too..."

Thus was how Sorun ended up hosting dinner to some of his friends that night. And how he learned to actually make a dinner. One kind, at least. The kitchen was a mess, too, but they'd all promised to help him with that.

... Well, Tails and Antoine had. Sonic acted evasive whenever the state of the kitchen was brought up.

Overall, it wasn't the worst. Sorun didn't know if the French accent attributed to it or not, but Antoine was a startlingly good cook. And it was nice, having people just... be there for Sorun. Even if he wouldn't verbally admit it. All of them talking around a dinner table in an actual house made Sorun almost feel normal for a change.

It was nice.

Chapter 69

A/N- Alright! We made it to the funny number.

Recursion Error

Episode 69- The Great Deliverer

These days Sorun felt dread whenever he heard somebody knock on his door. Mostly because nobody would leave him the hell alone . Nicole was one thing, he could never mind her, but it seemed like all his friends made it a personal mission to interact with him every single day now. Not all at once, of course, since everybody had their own lives, but in addition to Nicole he couldn't go a single day without seeing somebody.

It was as endearing as it was exhausting.

As Sorun dragged himself to the door, he debated not answering and pretending he just wasn't home. Hell, he debated leaving the city as a whole for a few hours just to get a break from everyone, but Nicole was still watching him like a hawk, and Sorun didn't actually know if he was allowed to leave the city. Or if that was a morally correct thing to do to him. Realistically speaking if he gave a good excuse he'd likely be able to leave the city, he had extreme doubts anybody would hold him captive here, but when he entertained the hypothetical world where he was held here indefinitely he realized he didn't really care one way or another. Lack of freedom didn't really mean much when he didn't want to go anywhere else and exercise that freedom. Moot point anyways, but an entertaining thought nonetheless.

"Maybe their plan is to exhaust me to the point I'm too tired to do stupid shit. I wouldn't put it past them," Sorun thought as he reached for the doorknob. "There's gotta be a limit to this kind of thing. Who is it this time?"

He expected a lot of people to be on the other side of that door. Sonic wanting to take him out and do something. Antoine wanting to hang out. Sally. It wasn't Nicole, because when she did decide to knock on the door instead of just teleporting into his house he recognized her knock.

He didn't expect to see the king standing there when he finally did open the door.

"I didn't do it." It was the first thing Sorun thought to say. A knee-jerk reaction more than anything. The reaction had garnered a bemused smirk from the crowned Mobian standing across from him.

"And what, pray tell, are you not guilty of?" Elias asked him, the smallest amount of amusement mixed in his tone.

"Whatever it is, I didn't do it." Plausible deniability. Sorun was pretty sure that's what it was called. "Can I help you?"

"Well yes, actually. May I come in?"

The idea left Sorun hesitant. "Am I in trouble...?"

"... Partially, but-"

That was all Sorun needed to hear. "I think you're good out there." The door began to close as Sorun slowly pushed it. "In fact, I... I'm just gonna go ahead and do this..."

"Sorun, please don't close the door." The door was halfway to being closed. "Sorun." Almost there. "Sorun, really!?"

Elias' cries fell on deaf ears, as Sorun had closed and locked the door. He let out a sigh of relief, nodding to himself at a crisis averted. "Now I never need to think about that again. Wonder what I should do today-"

"Sorun, I will get Nicole, and she will open this door." Elias' muffled voice coming in from the other side of the door made Sorun freeze as he made to turn away and retreat back into his house. "I wouldn't even need to order her."

"... Dammit." He had a solid point Sorun couldn't refute. Sighing again, this time in irritation, Sorun went back to the door and opened it. Elias was still there, his earlier smile replaced by an exasperated expression as he stared at Sorun's face with his arms crossed.

Sorun couldn't fathom why he was so upset. He was the one choosing to accost Sorun with whatever this was.

"May we speak now?" Elias requested in a neutral tone.

"Eeeehhh... sure." The blasé tone Sorun used made Elias make an irritable sound and shake his head. "Come on in, I guess."

Sorun stepped to the side to allow the king to enter, with Sorun making doubly sure the door was closed and locked behind him before following. He found Elias seconds later standing in the living room and looking around. Around at what Sorun couldn't even hazard a guess at since the room was barren save for a couch, TV, and game console. He almost looked surprised at how spartan the place looked, eliciting some bitter chuckle from Sorun as he leaned against a nearby wall.

"You want some water?" he asked. "'Cause it's all I got since it's free."

"No, I'm quite alright. Thank you." Elias stopped looking around the room and focused in on Sorun. "How are you acclimating to living on your own here, Sorun?"

Pretty terribly if he was being honest. "I'm scrapin' by," he answered in half-honesty, pushing off the wall. "Hasn't exactly been spring roses around every single corner, but hey, that's life I guess. I thought for a second this place was a socialist paradise what with the free healthcare and everything until I ran out of food and got desperate enough I had to start leeching off my friends." He stopped right in front of Elias, hands tucked in his pocket as he grinned at the king with a semi-friendly, sardonic grin. If Elias was disturbed in any way by it, he didn't show it. "But that's neither here nor there. How's life being a king living in a castle, Kingy?"

"It's well," was Elias' clipped response. "Is there something you would like to tell me?"

"Not particularly." Sorun gave a shrug. "I wouldn't dream of burdening people with my own problems. Oh, wait..."

Repressing a sigh, Elias reached up to rub at his forehead. "My sister was right. You do cause headaches..." he mumbled out. "Sorun, I realize you're not completely satisfied living among us-"

"Now you're just putting words in my mouth," Sorun interrupted. "Elias, real talk, there's nowhere else in this world I'd rather be living in. I don't not like living here. Ain't home, but second best is second best." He shrugged. "It's just my financial troubles troubling me. And the depression. Mostly the money thing."

For whatever reason Elias only grew uncomfortable once Sorun mentioned money. "Right, of course. And... you're dealing with these issues?"

"Work in progress on both fronts." Everyone was trying their damnedest to try and normalize Sorun, himself included. He'd probably never be able to repay them that much. It was almost funny to think he was practically drowning in emotional debt but had no monetary debt given his situation. "Why are you here, man?" he asked, wanting to get to the heart of the matter for why this guy was in his living room.

"Yes, right." Elias cleared his throat, squared his features, and clasped his hands behind his back. Sorun laughed a bit at the sight.

"Besides your own personal issues, how do you find this city, Sorun?"

"It's nice." The people were great enough, lack of anyone willing to give Sorun a job aside. He had neighbors that gave him friendly waves, which was about all Sorun ever wanted from neighbors. All his friends lived close by, the place was clean, crime wasn't even a thing in this city, and he didn't have to worry about dying. Aside from the fact Sorun was destitute he couldn't really find anything to complain about.

If the rest of the world wasn't such a fucked up place he'd go as far as to call New Mobotropolis a paradise. As it was Sorun only considered it for slice of heaven status.

"That's good to hear," Elias said, looking somewhat relieved. "The Kingdom- pardon, Republic of Acorn tries very hard to provide a safe and caring environment for its citizens. That does include you despite the fact you're not a Mobian. I'd like to think everyone is seen as an equal here."

Sorun bit his tongue to stay the scathing remark that threatened to spill out. "Mh-hm."

"But, as such, a k-republic needs resources in order to continue to function properly. Funds. A functioning economy." When Sorun just continued to stare at Elias blankly, he made a sigh and shook his head. "You've been neglecting to pay your taxes, Sorun."

The world slowed to a crawl for Sorun. Elias' words echoed slowly in his head, repeating multiple times at lowered and slow pitches. Tunnel vision set in over Elias' form. The hairs on the back of his neck stood up, and his hands suddenly felt very clammy in his pockets. He found himself wishing this was all just a terrible, horrible dream, and even made a heavy blink in the desperate effort to try and wake himself up.

No dice. Elias was still there, looking more confused than ever. And Sorun was left reeling from merely hearing the word "taxes".

"Dear god, no..." To the everyman it was a cursed, evil word. A necessary evil, some might say. Sorun would agree with them if he wasn't so strapped for cash these days, and for the briefest of moments he could have sworn he saw his life flash before his eyes. Again. "Come again?" Sorun softly requested in a strained whisper, wishing beyond all hope he'd misheard.

Elias unclasped his hands and used one to palm his face. "Sorun, what do you think our government runs on? The goodwill of the people?"

"Everyone sure acts like it!" Sorun shouted in a frightened voice. "I-I didn't even know taxes was a thing! This's the first I'm hearing of it!"

"The republic sent you notice letters!" Elias argued. "In fact, I recall signing a good portion of them!"

Lies. "I've never seen these so-called letters of yours!"

"Because you never check your mailbox! I looked inside! It's so stuffed full of letters I wouldn't be surprised to learn you've never once checked it!"

Sorun clammed up. He hadn't even known he had a mailbox. "... Was there anything important in there?"

"If we're going by your definition of important, no, I don't imagine the deed to your home and the welcome letter I signed is of any significance," Elias claimed with a roll of his eyes, voice heavy in sarcasm. "It's documents such as the tax notices, among other things, I'm worried about."

With a sigh, Sorun flopped onto his couch and began rubbing at his eyes. This wasn't what he needed right now. He needed anything but this. He'd take Eggman attacking the city over taxes right now. He didn't even know how to pay taxes! "So why is the king of the republic coming here to tell me this?" he asked.

"Because we're friends and, knowing you, I figured the issue was due to something inane. Such as you not checking your mailbox," Elias deadpanned. "Councilwoman Prower wanted to send guards to drag you off to the castle to explain yourself. Councilmen Rotor and Chuck heavily objected to this and I elected to come and sort the issue personally."

He sat up straight in alarm at hearing that. "Man, what did I ever do to her!?" Sorun shouted, staring up at Elias with disbelief. "I never even met the woman!"

"I... believe she holds you somewhat in contempt," Elias answered, looking a bit uncomfortable as he rubbed at his arm. "She claims you cause her son an undue amount of stress and grief."

"I cause him grief...?" Sorun repeated, eyes wide and disbelieving. "Fucking Prowers, man..."

"You did destroy his plane," Elias reminded him.

"Yeah, and he kidnapped me and condemned me to furville. There's been more than enough grief being flung on both sides."

"An act that saved you from death by nuclear annihilation, did it not?"

"Details! Semantics! Shut up!" He turned away from Elias in a huff, but inside he knew the king won the argument. Much to his chagrin, Elias had a knowing look in his eyes when Sorun turned back around to him. "Alright," he sighed out, "let's negotiate."

Elias' mouth dropped open a bit in confusion. "You... wish to negotiate on paying taxes ...?"

"Yep." Sorun clapped his hands together and pointed the fingers at Elias. "Ignoring I have no job and no basis from which to pay taxes, I just plain don't want to." Nobody did. Not really. Nobody except the patriotic nuts who claimed it was an "honorary civic duty", but Sorun wasn't one of those people. He was, however, reasonably certain he was crafty enough to get out of this situation.

It'd be his biggest undertaking yet. Evading taxes.

A frustrated breath left Elias. "Sorun-"

"I ain't even got a job, dude," Sorun lamely stated. "And I've tried. Believe me, Mr. We-Treat-Everyone-Here-Equally. Except when it comes to jobs. Nobody wants to hire a guy who's barely a leg-up from a cripple by Mobian standards."

"I can hardly tell people how to run their own businesses," Elias said. "But regardless, Sorun, you're a part of this republic. You've a civic duty."

Trying to guilt trip him by saying he needed to do his part. It wouldn't work. "I saved everybody's lives once. Literally everyone. That don't even buy me a grace period 'til I get back on my feet?"

Elias shook his head. "I'm afraid not. The laws are equal for everybody, and you're no exception, despite your accomplishments. I really am sorry, Sorun, but as a property owner and citizen that's just how it is for you."

An idea popped into Sorun's head at the mention of him being a citizen. A grin spread over his face, and he wagged his finger up at Elias. "Ahhh, but I'm not a technical citizen, am I, Elias?" he challenged. "Illegal alien, remember? Since I'm not a legal citizen the legal laws don't apply to me. So no taxes."

He didn't take the bait at all. He didn't even flinch at the logic. "That's not how that works. For one, if that were even true I could label you a squatter for living on property while here illegally and kick you out of the city." The finger Sorun was waving in Elias' face shriveled and fell away with the rest of Sorun's arm. "And second," Elias continued, forming his own grin, "that isn't the case for you anymore."

"Huh?" Before Sorun could fully register the statement, Elias pulled something out of his pocket and gave it to Sorun. A piece of paper. A fancy piece of paper, much to Sorun's mounting horror. He saw things like his name and the word "citizen" on it, which caused his heart to begin to race. "Huh!?"

"That's right," Elias happily said. It wasn't even the malicious type of happiness. It was genuine glee at Sorun's sake, who looked the opposite of happy at the moment. "I finally got around to finalizing your papers! You're officially a legal citizen of the Republic of Acorn as of... well, a few weeks ago, actually." Elias looked to the side. "I found that buried under all your other mail in the mailbox. I meant to give it to you personally, but never had the opportunity. Ha! I suppose it worked out in the end anyways, huh, Sorun?"

"SHIT, I'M LEGAL!" This was bad. Legal citizenship meant a solid basis for taxation. Doubly so since he owned a house on Acorn soil. Nanite dirt. Whatever the ground here was labeled as. The prospect of worming out of taxes suddenly seemed much more bleak. "Alright, calm down. You've gotten out of worse. There's gotta be some bullshit I can pull here."

Calmly, he set the piece of paper down besides him. It was a losing battle, but he wasn't going to give up yet.

"I still lack a sufficiently-paying job to support my financial wellbeing," Sorun pointed out calmly, looking back to Elias. "It's quite obvious I am unable to pay these taxes of yours despite my best efforts. Surly there is some sort of system or safety net to help support unfortunate fellows such as myself who have fallen on difficult times."

"None whatsoever." Elias' eyes narrowed in Sorun's direction once the human became startling more verbose. A sign that he was taking this matter gravely serious. And as far as Sorun could see, the king wasn't budging. "If you're truly finding difficulty procuring work I am sure you could avail yourself to the educational facilities we have in order to try and better yourself?"

No way was he going back to school. Not with a bunch of Mobian kids. He wasn't even keen on school in general. Besides, he didn't have the time. "You're not my mother," Sorun said. "You can't force me to go to school. I'm technically an orphan."

"Oh, truly? In that case that would make you a ward to the government, seeing as you're an orphan without any living relatives or guardians. In which case, yes , I can in fact force you into school, Sorun."

"... I'm sixteen."

"I don't see how that's relevant," Elias said. "Sonic and the rest of the Freedom Fighters are around the same age and were forced into book learning back when we had an actual school built in Knothole."

"Yeah, I heard that didn't last long," Sorun snarked, angry at losing ground in the battle. "What were they there for, a month? Max? Before there was a robot attack and they all went back to Freedom Fighting?"

"I'm sure they'll all be going straight back to educating themselves once this sordid business with the Doctor is sorted," Elias snarked back, the heat in his voice matching Sorun's. "You, however, are not an adult, and are no longer a Freedom Fighter. So you've no excuse."

Sorun's teeth clacked together. His mind ran a million miles a minute as he attempted to parse together something else to use. "There are many cultures in the world I originate from where the age sixteen signifies adulthood. As the sole human being from the zone from which I originate from you have no say in dictating-"

The king held a hand up. "I'll stop you right there, Sorun. Laws supersede whatever nonsense you were about to feed me," he informed him. "Cultural differences or not, if you live with us, you follow the same laws as us. I'm afraid it's as simple as that."

Sorun inhaled deeply. "I don't want to."

"..."

"..."

"... Well I'm king and you're not, so there."

Sorun made a loud "tch!" sound and turned his head away. He played the king card. He didn't have anything better than that. "Hypothetically speaking..." he drawled out, turning back to Elias, "what happens if I don't pay taxes? You lock me in the detention center or something?"

Surprisingly he seemed appalled at the notion. "Goodness, no! Why would you even suggest such a thing? Of course we wouldn't imprison you," he said. "We would temporarily repossess your home, though, until you begin the tax payments. Which would effectively leave you homeless."

"I think I'd prefer prison at that point," Sorun mentally groused. "Elias, I don't exactly have the time to go to school to learn how to hold a job that uses my brain and not my unimpressive brawn," he said, deflating in his seat as his defeat began to set in. "What exactly would you suggest I do?"

"That I cannot tell you, Sorun," Elias said. And damn him, but he actually sounded sad and looked sympathetic when he said it. Hard for Sorun to be mad at the guy at that point when he seemed actually sorrowful for his plight. "I did hear mention of my sister searching for something, but I honestly don't know if that search will bear fruit. But chin up!" he said in his best cheery tone at seeing Sorun look so dejected. "You've accomplished more dire tasks than something like this. I'm sure a solution will present itself to you in time."

For all the useless advice Sorun had ever received, the words Elias gave him were up there. Even so, he couldn't find himself blaming him, if only because Sorun couldn't think up anything better than to just sit around and wait for something good to happen. Didn't stop him from feeling terrible.

"Ah-huh, sure, man," Sorun muttered out. "How long until this tax thing becomes a serious problem for me?"

"I wouldn't worry too terribly about it, Sorun. Just, um, try and do something about it. Relatively soon," Elias advised him. "I'm already giving you a lot of leeway as it is."

"Okay but can I get a hard number, 'cause I would feel better if I had a date to work wi-"

"Sorun. Don't worry about it. As long as you're diligent you'll be fine." The reassuring smile Elias gave him didn't feel very reassuring to Sorun, who could only silently stare up at him in mild astonishment. "Now as it happens I've other matters to attend to at the moment, so I'm afraid I'll have to depart here. But do come by the castle sometime if you ever have some free time. I've quite missed our chats."

"Diligent. I don't think I've ever been diligent at anything in my entire life," Sorun thought to himself as he watched Elias leave. It was only after he closed the door behind him did he let out a loud groan and go limp against the couch, his head tilted up at the ceiling. "Well, now I got this to deal with. Goddamn. Even in another dimension I can't escape the tax man."

How he wished he would have been able to talk his way out of paying taxes. But like most other things in his life he fucked it up. He spent a long time on that couch, tens of minutes, trying to figure out what he could do to rectify this situation. Everything he thought of pointed to getting a job, at which point he was reminded that didn't work when he tried it.

"I don't know what I'm supposed to do. I ain't innovative. I can't invent. Don't have any kind of marketable talent. How about writing? How much shit can I steal from Earth to sell as books here?" He made a contemplative hum and cupped his chin in thought. The idea had merit. "Hm... nah. I'm a gamer, not a writer. Don't think that'd work out."

Sorun's thinking was cut off when, once again, he heard a knock at his door. He groaned again, briefly considering just ignoring it before deciding against it and sitting up off the couch. The last thing he needed was company at the moment, but then again he wanted a distraction to keep him away from the reality of the situation. So, ignoring his internal protests, he dragged himself back to the front door and opened it.

He only opened it halfway before he saw who was on the other side and immediately tried to slam it back closed.

"Hold it, you!" He'd been too slow in closing the door. Yellow-furred fingers grasped onto the door's edge before it closed fully and wrenched the door back open. Sorun's response was to have his arms go completely slack as he looked out at the now very irate-looking cat standing on the other side of his open door. "Just what was that supposed to be!?" Honey yelled out at him.

If there was anything Sorun needed at the moment, a demented cat wasn't one of them. He was starting to regret trying to slam the door on her, too, because her tail was angrily swishing behind her and her hands were planted on her hips. The cross look she was giving him was probably another sign at her anger.

Normally Sorun would have thought to himself that there was too much going wrong in his life right now to deal with Honey's brand of crazy, but he refrained from acting on these thoughts. He may have had a lot of opinions over Honey, but she was good people. In her own way. And like it or not she was a distraction he needed right now.

"Honey, what do you want?" Sorun tiredly asked, sounding like he'd rather be anywhere than there at the moment.

"'What do I want?'" She'd said it in a mocking tone that mimicked Sorun's own tone. "That's quite the thing to say to me. You know how it feels having to hear about all this awful stuff happening to you from other people and you don't even stop by to see me!?"

"... Oh, right, the last time I saw her was before I left for Earth. And came back..." Sorun realized. With so much going on with him he never even thought to go see Honey for any reason. Not very surprising, he figured, seeing as he wasn't even in the mood to visit his friends. Or anyone, for that matter. Didn't stop them from coming to see him. "I've been busy."

"Busy doing what? Being sulky and wallowing in self-pity?"

Sorun let out a slow exhale, and then shook his head while making a bemused chuckle. "Never change, Honey," he said. "I really am sorry. I've... I haven't been well."

"Yeah, so... so I've heard..." Honey trailed off and looked past Sorun's shoulder and into his house. This only lasted for a few moments, after which she looked up and down Sorun's body, ending on his face. Her gaze seemed to linger on Sorun's face the longest, causing some discomfort to the human at being scrutinized so deeply. Honey, by contrast, had made a heavy frown while the ears on top of her head lowered. Finally she sighed and reached her hand forwards and grabbed Sorun's right wrist. "Alright, come on."

"Huh?" Before Sorun even knew what was happening he was being dragged away. "Wait, hold on." Despite his protests, Honey kept pulling him away. "Honey!"

All shouting out her name got Sorun was the cat roughly tugging on his arm so he'd keep up with her pace. Figuring there wasn't much point in resisting against somebody vastly stronger than him, Sorun heaved out a loud sigh and resigned to his fate as he was dragged off to wherever Honey was taking him.

At least his mind was taken off the taxes. Or it was until he'd saw on their way out there was a mailbox in front of his home practically overflowing with papers. Sorun briefly wondered if he should convert to using a mail slot in his door as he was lead away by Honey to wherever she was dragging him off to.

The destination of his apparent abduction ended in what he assumed to be Honey's new shop. He'd never been to this one, only the one in Knothole that'd been blown up, but from what he could tell it looked largely the same as the original. The sign bearing Honey's name was more updated, a lot more red and gold and the writing was stylized, but otherwise it was still a shop. Even the interior was nearly identical to the original, which Sorun was able to see as Honey dragged him inside and through the shop.

Eventually he was lead into a large back room. Not too dissimilar, he'd realized, to that one room full of the many racks and mannequins full of clothes he'd saw, way back when he first went to Honey for clothes. This room, however, was actually very well-lit, and opposed to mannequins the room just had a few tables and chairs. And boxes. Lots and lots of cardboard boxes, some on the tables and more resting on the ground, with a few clothing sets and paper strips strewn about on the tables next to the boxes. It was such a haphazard, chaotic setup that Sorun could barely process what he was looking at.

"Feels like I just got dragged into the post office from hell," Sorun thought to himself. Honey had finally released his wrist, though Sorun had paid less attention to this and more on the chaotic spread out before him. "What exactly is all this?"

"So as you can probably can see, this is the main issue I've been having," Honey explained, talking like Sorun had a single clue what was going on. "I get it's not the most organized mess, but I'm sure you can sort it out-"

"Whoa whoa whoa, Honey, slow down." Deciding enough was enough, Sorun rose both his palms up to stop that cat as he turned to face her. "What exactly is going on right now? What is this?"

Sighing in an annoyed manner, Honey turned to face Sorun directly. "I'm trying to give you a job, you moron."

"..." It was almost like Sorun's brain short-circuited. He heard the words, but couldn't find the means of processing them. He tried opening his mouth to respond, but all that came out were unintelligible sounds that emphasized Sorun's confusion over the statement he'd just heard. "H-hurh?"

A job? For him? From her of all people? Why now, why seemingly out of nowhere ? It seemed too good to be true, which was in part the reason Sorun hadn't leapt in excitement at the simple prospect. He was just so confused over what was happening all he could do was stare at Honey in befuddlement.

Seeing Sorun's reaction, the cat shook her head and looked away from him. "Look, Sally came to me and laid out everything that's been going on with you. About the thing that happened with your home and how you're really struggling because you can't find anything to do in the city." She reached a hand up and began aggressively rubbing at her arm as Sorun continued to silently stare. "I felt bad because I wouldn't be where I am right now without everything you did for me, so... I wanted to help you out like you helped me." She looked back at Sorun. "So I'm giving you a job. And you're going to take it because you need it and I'm not going to see my friend suffer any longer."

It took a few moments for the words to register with Sorun. "We're friends?"

The awkwardness that had been on Honey's face instantly evaporated in place of the anger that overtook her features. She'd actually growled out and swiped her hand at one of the nearby boxes to fling it up to Sorun's face. He'd reflexively batted the empty box away, blinking in surprise at the angry cat in front of him.

"Of course we're friends!" she yelled out at him. "You're one of the only people I know outside of business that gives me the time of day!"

"Uh... I-I mean it's not that bad, is it?"

"Ugh, you don't know what it's like being me." Honey turned around from Sorun and approached one of the nearby tables. She began to fold some of the strewn-about clothes seemingly on automatic as she began speaking. "People see my brand and the clothes I make and the name and they automatically assume the woman behind it all is this incredibly talented individual. A pioneer of the industry with fresh ideas and unprecedented skills who's as cute as a button. And they'd be right," she added, making Sorun roll his eyes. "But then people here come to me personally for clothes and they meet the person behind the business and they all think I'm some sort of loon. Can you believe that?"

"I literally called you crazy to your face," Sorun deadpanned.

"Yeah, but you never mean that," Honey added, waving a hand over her shoulder as Sorun scoffed. "I mean, you could have went anywhere for clothes, but you put up with me. And tolerated me when barely anybody else does. And advertised for me and helped grow my business to world-renowned fame." She finished folding the set of clothes and turned to Sorun. "That really meant a lot to me, you know?"

He was surprised to find that her face looked so heartfelt and sincere. Emotions Sorun realized he'd never seen on Honey before. He also felt embarrassed by her claims and turned his head away from her. "I only put up with you because you're the only person I know in the whole world that can make me pants."

"Pants of the best quality," she reminded him.

"... Yeah, fine, they're beautiful pants," he admitted, turning back to her. "And I mean, you're... I've heard the word eccentric get tossed around, but you're no Crazy Ricky."

Honey sent him an odd look. "I have no idea who that is."

"He was this homeless guy that lived behind the grocery store back where I'm from. I think he was psychic. We always went to him during the winter and he was able to perfectly predict when we'd have a snow day at school." Sorun reached a hand up to scratch at the back of his head. "Then again he was always going on about how he picked up government radio signals from the fillings in his teeth. So maybe he was just hearing weather broadcasts and was secretly some kind of meteorological savant." A moment passed. "I guess he's dead now." Another moment. "But, uh... point is I've seen crazy. You're not on his level. I don't even think anyone here is on his level." He shook his head. "What I'm trying to say is you're alright. I... don't think you're that bad at all."

In the past Sorun had. There'd been a time he only tolerated her because she provided quality goods he couldn't get anywhere else and dreaded every conversation he had with her. But, overtime, he supposed he'd gotten used to her at one point or another. And in her own way she'd shown she had a caring side to her. So he'd freely say Honey was cool in his books, even if Sorun himself was surprised at him admitting it to himself. He'd even go as far as to say he liked her.

It was odd times he lived in.

"Well, that's nice to hear you say." Honey made a small smile and looked down at her feet as she leaned back against the table with her palms supporting her. "Fact is I don't know a whole lot of people that would say the same thing. The clothes are one thing; everybody loves those. Me?" She shrugged. "I honestly never really cared. But it's nice having people like you around."

"..." Letting out a resigned sigh, Sorun turned to the left and swept his eyes over the box-filled room they were in. "Alright. So why don't you tell me all about this job of yours?"

Nodding, Honey pushed off the table. "Right. So as you know, I get orders from all over. Different settlements, different continents, I even get requests from Station Square. Problem is I've kind of been getting flooded with requests. Lots and lots of requests." She made a tired laugh as she slumped her shoulders. "I tried raising my prices to cut down on the demand, but that barely made a dent. Between going back and forth from the post office to make my deliveries, sorting out all the request forms and shipping labels and actually packaging my products, I just don't have the time of day to do all that and actually make the clothes." She turned to Sorun. "So I need somebody to do all that boring stuff for me."

"You want me to pack the clothes you make into boxes and bring them to the post office?" Sorun asked with a raised eyebrow. "That's it?"

"And figure out the shipping labels and organize the order slips for me, but you can figure all that out," Honey claimed, waving her hand to the side in a dismissive manner.

It seemed easy, if not a bit mundane. But a job was a job, Sorun supposed, though it still sounded a bit too good to be true. "That doesn't really seem like a lot to do in terms of a job," Sorun pointed out. "Moving boxes back and forth? That's it?"

"Sorun, I'm basically leaving you in charge with my entire distribution. That's pretty important."

Point to her. "And you'd rather leave this with me than anyone else?"

"Why wouldn't I?" she asked him. "You need the job and I like you more than most other people in this town. Besides..." Honey gained a small smirk. "I'll be completely honest with you. Ever since I've been getting all these orders and raised my prices I've had more money than I know what to do with. So I can easily afford to hire somebody like you."

"So grow the business," Sorun suggested. "Open up another place and hire other people to make-"

"Nope, not happening," Honey interrupted him with a shake of her head, surprising Sorun. "I do this because I love doing it. It was never for the money. Though the money is nice..." Sorun shook his head and rolled his eyes as Honey looked up towards the ceiling with a dreamy look in her eyes. "Beyond that the only person in the whole world I trust to make my brand is me. And I was really only in it for the fame and because I love doing it. But now that I have all that I don't see why I can't use what I've got to make life for myself easier and help a friend out." She jumped up to sit on one of the tables, legs playfully swinging back in forth in time with her swishing tail as she looked Sorun in the eyes. "So! What do you say?"

All in all she made a lot of pragmatic points. And after hearing her side of it he really couldn't blame her for wanting to shift a lot of the boring stuff in the business off to someone else so she could focus on what amounted to a hobby she made a successful business out of. And it didn't seem like that hard of a job to do. Sort labels and boxes, pack clothes, and bring said boxes to a post office? Being a glorified personal mailman wasn't the most glamorous job Sorun envisioned, but hell, it was an actual job he was in desperate need of. And even more than that his boss was a person he liked.

With that all thought out he really couldn't refuse, could he?

"Well, when you say it like that... I'll take it. For sure," Sorun said. Honey's eyes lit up enough he could have sworn they started to sparkle, and she gave him an open-mouthed smile large enough he managed to see her teeth and fangs. "Alright, calm down. Sheesh. So do you want me starting now, or-?"

"Nah, no, it's fine." Honey held up a hand to him and shook her head. "We'll start the... what's it called, orientation? Yeah. We'll go over the hours and pay and what you'll actually be doing and all that tomorrow. It's a little late in the day to be doing that right now." She paused, and then blinked in realization as she reached a hand behind her red dress. "Oh, one more thing. I made a hat for you to wear at work."

"... A hat?" Sorun repeated in a questioning tone.

"Well you need something to tell the people at the post office who you are and who you work for when you're delivering stuff. Duh," Honey explained.

"W-why does that matter?"

"Because it's my business and I said so. Ah, here it is!" She held up the hat for Sorun to see. To Sorun's surprise, it was a black cap with gold trimming. He wasn't as surprised to see "Honey" written in the same stylized font Honey used for the sign outside her shop, embroidered in gold on the back of the black cap. "I pitched the hat idea to Sally," Honey continued as she gave him the hat. "She... had a pretty unusual request for the hat. Said you'd get it. I didn't see what was so funny about it, but I went ahead and put it in anyways."

"Hm?" Examining the hat in his hands, Sorun turned it around so he could see its front. "Why, what'd she... oh."

It was hard to miss it considering the letters were embroidered in large block letters on the front of the hat. He only needed a momentary glance to confirm it was "GREAT DELIVERER" sewn into the hat, the words stacked on top of one another. He made a small, sighing laugh at the sight, mostly in amusement at realizing she'd remembered that ridiculous title he'd used for himself on those delivery missions he'd done for her back then.

"Come to think of it, this is only happening because Sally reached out to people on my behalf. And I'm probably only getting this job because I happen to be friends with Honey." He felt a small tug in his chest at the thought. A warm feeling he didn't find entirely too displeasing. "Maybe... maybe I was wrong in trying to do everything myself after all. Maybe I really should have just gone to my friends for help in the first place. And probably why they all got so pissed I let it get this bad."

To think he'd actually feel sorry for the things he'd done and for how he'd gone about this entire thing. And there everybody was, pretty much ignoring it and doing their best to help him. He really didn't feel he deserved them.

"Uh... Sorun?" Honey's voice drew him from his musings, causing him to look up at the cat. "I got it was probably an inside joke between you two, but I didn't realize you'd like the hat that much."

He was confused on her meaning until he felt the strain in his facial muscles that signified he was smiling. He made a small laugh at the discovery and looked back down at the hat. "I just find it funny she remembered this silly little title," he said, brushing his thumb over the golden letters. "It was a stupid reference from a really pretentious game. A game that had messages about connecting with other people and helping others hand-in-hand as opposed to going it alone. Maybe I should have paid better attention." He looked up at Honey. "Thanks, Honey. Not just for the hat, but for helping me out with the job. You help me out a lot more than I deserve, so I kind of feel bad-"

"Oh, that's nonsense. You're fine." The cat hopped off the table and clapped Sorun on the shoulder. "I'm gonna head on home. Come back here first thing in the morning, alright?"

"Yeah, Honey. Sure." He saw her flash him one more smile before leaving the room. There'd been more words of gratitude he'd wanted to say to her, but the amount of emotions he was feeling had him too choked up to say much more of anything. He was already fighting to not let any tears show, because he absolutely refused to let anyone see him in that state. It hadn't stopped his eyes from becoming incredibly glossy as he looked back down at the hat in his hands.

"Maybe I can make life here work out after all."

A/N- Coincidentally I know there's a bunch of tax evasion memes floating around the internet right now, so I found it kinda funny I got to writing this part around the same time. I was really tempted to put a boss title in just for Sorun trying to talk his way out of paying taxes, but decided against it since it woulda been a bit too goofy.

Chapter 70

Recursion Error

Episode 70- Writing letters for beginners

They'd started to fall into a sort of routine as time went on. Or at least enough of a regular routine that Sorun stopped noticing whenever Nicole neglected to knock on his front door and instead just teleported into his home, at which point he'd elected to just begin expecting her.

Really, she didn't understand what the issue with knocking was when it was far more efficient to just instantaneously appear into the home of somebody who always welcomed her unconditionally.

But eventually Sorun had stopped flinching in surprise whenever she teleported into his home, and after trading their pleasantries and greetings they'd more often than not wind up in the same place as almost always: sitting on Sorun's couch and facing a TV as they played away at whatever game they'd agreed upon.

Nicole would freely admit she'd used to have a hard time of understanding the games' appeal until after she'd met Sorun. She'd had a passing interest in them when she'd been first introduced to them, of course, but when she was able to completely master them in a single playthrough at a level nobody else could compete with they quickly lost the appeal. In the same vein of thinking she didn't think a puzzle was very interesting if one already solved and figured out the mechanics behind that puzzle. Fun for a time, but not something that could last.

Of course Sorun happened, and he had possessed that uncanny ability to be so good at those games. Enough to challenge her . Enough that he mastered them at relatively the same speed she could. It was enough that, yes, she did enjoy the games, but only with Sorun. With him the games were stimulating. They were fun.

She tore her attention away from the screen briefly and looked down at Sorun's hands. Pale, practiced fingers were flying over the buttons that, to anybody but her, would have looked like a chaotic showing of mashing buttons when it was really a long series of patterns calculated in split-seconds. It still surprised Nicole how deft Sorun was when it came to these, how much thought and skill he put into them. So much effort that she'd think he was playing like his life depended on it, but when she glanced up at his face, it was set in a relaxed, content expression. Happy, even.

Sometimes Nicole wished Sorun put this much effort into chess, but he didn't like that game. Nor was he particularly good at it... But nobody was perfect, and besides, she liked Sorun as he was currently. She liked he put aside the time to play these games with her and conversed with her about whatever she wanted. Like she was a person.

A real, actual person. It was something that still astonished her, how easy and open he'd been with her since the moment they met. From day one he'd treated her like a living being and not an artificial creation. He'd gone out of his way to say as much to her, back in the digital world. His argument that it didn't matter what she was, just who she was, and after some time she'd found herself grateful for saying these words to her.

Nicole replayed that memory frequently. She did that quite often with a lot of her memories of Sorun.

A sound from the TV drew Nicole's attention back towards it. Normally she would have felt the slightest bit of irritation when she saw she'd lost, but at the moment she couldn't find herself to care all that much. She couldn't place why this was, a fleeting, ephemeral feeling she just couldn't quite grasp, but in the end she didn't find herself caring all that much because it was a nice feeling she only ever got around Sorun.

"Um..." Sorun, by contrast, looked a bit confused as he continually blinked at Nicole's way. She realized she'd been staring at his face for some time now, and tilted her head a bit so she faced further towards the screen. Even so, Nicole kept looking at the side at him. "You, kind of just stopped for a moment there," he pointed out.

"Did I? I'm afraid I was a bit distracted with some of my own thoughts," Nicole idly admitted. "You look better."

"Better" was an understatement. Compared to how he'd been weeks prior Sorun had made a phenomenal improvement. He still looked tired all the time, but he wasn't as lethargic and nonresponsive as he was when he first began living in this home. In fact, he'd been getting progressively livelier ever since he'd taken on that position in that cat Mobian's clothing establishment. His sleeping hours were beginning to normalize and he was eating a healthy amount again. And every day he looked just a little bit less sadder and mentioned Earth less and less in their conversations.

It was a sign he was slowly but surely improving, and for that much, Nicole was grateful. Her own distraught feelings over the human and his wellbeing were fading more and more with each day, and in its place was joy at merely being in his presence and him continuing to act with her the way he did.

"Right..." Still looking somewhat confused at the lynx's claim at being distracted, he sat back in the couch and looked towards the screen while setting his controller down. "So, how have you been?"

She looked back towards him. "Sorun, I should be asking you that."

"You know how I am," he argued.

"In that same vein of thinking you know as well as I do there have been no notable events of interest that has arisen. The city is still functioning nominally and the citizens are still peaceful." She could have talked about what had been going on in the Freedom Fighters and their missions, but she'd long since learned that discussing such things brought Sorun stress. She'd decided this information was more harmful than good and endeavored to just never bring it up with him. Fortunately, Sorun never asked or wasn't very curious about what everybody in the Freedom Fighters were doing. "You've been doing well, correct?"

"I mean... I guess," Sorun answered with a half-shrug. "That job Honey gave me has... well, it's been keeping me busy and I'm well-off enough now I don't really have any money worries anymore." He sat back in the couch and ran a hand through his hair. "Everything's been so quiet and meanwhile my life's, I dunno, stable? I'm..." He trailed off, unsure of what to say. "It's..."

"What is it?" Nicole asked, leaning closer to him.

"I don't know. I mean, everything should be fine, right? I have a house to call my own, a job, friends, the whole community here. I don't really have anything to complain about. But something feels... I don't know. Something's missing." He looked over at Nicole, after which Sorun's gaze lingered on her for longer than average. He quickly looked away from Nicole just as she noticed how long he was staring, sighing out and brushing some of his hair over his face. "It's nothing, forget it. What time is it?"

She wanted to ask further about what exactly Sorun felt was missing, but out of concern for worsening his current condition decided against it and answered the question. "It's ten minutes until noon."

"Really? Ah, man." Sorun sighed and began to leave the couch. "I have somewhere to be."

"It was my belief you had the day off from work today," Nicole said as Sorun walked over to the TV to turn it off. "Did something happen?"

"Hm? Ah, no." After shutting the TV and game system off, Sorun turned to face the AI. "The boys decided to go and take me fishing for some reason. I've never really done something like that before, so I figured, you know, why not? Might be neat." He placed his left hand in his pocket and looked to the side. "Maybe if we actually catch something Antoine can make something out of it. Haven't had fish in... yeesh, I can't even remember."

A fishing trip. It wasn't all that surprising to Nicole; Sonic and co. had been rather adamant in trying to involve Sorun with the lives of his friends and other Mobians more, mostly for his own sake, and seeing as where he was at the moment she couldn't say it wasn't working. For that much she was grateful, even if she did catch Sorun complaining about Sonic every now and then and how... enthusiastic he could be sometimes. They were always half-complaints said more out of jest than anything that she found somewhat amusing, and she'd rather have Sorun's mind focused on trivial matters such as that than anything that would cause him grief.

And yet, still, she felt somewhat envious. Confused at the same time- she knew what the act of fishing was, and couldn't completely understand why they were going out of their way to go through the tedium of catching fish when there was already a stock of food readily available in the city. But it was still something new Sorun got to experience without her since her being was confined to the city. And it meant less time with her.

Eventually, Nicole dismissed these thoughts. Diversifying his time with others was good for Sorun's mental state, and he needed to get out more anyways. And if he was going to be with some of the Freedom Fighters while outside the city she didn't need to worry about his safety.

"I see. Well, I hope you enjoy yourself," Nicole said to him.

"Dunno what's so enjoyable about sitting in a boat with two guys for hours, but yeah, I'll try," he assured her. He took a few steps forwards in front of Nicole, stopping in front of her with an unsure look on his face. Nicole gave him a curious look back, while the pale human had darted his eyes away from hers. He reached his hand up, Nicole looking towards it in interest and, oddly, a sense of hopefulness she couldn't quite place began to grow in her as he reached for her.

It was promptly lost completely when Sorun's hand froze halfway, followed by him reeling the hand back, followed by him extending his thumb and pinkie finger and lightly shaking his hand back and forth.

"Er, uh... so yeah. Thanks. Um, for the well wishes and coming to see me and... yeah," Sorun said, voice a bit higher and cracking as he continued shaking his hand with the two digits extended.

Nicole, for her part, remained completely perplexed at the gesture, and it showed on her face with the confused expression her mouth was in and the way one of her eyes were half-lidded at him. In a bizarre turn she decided to silently reciprocate and mimic the gesture Sorun was giving her while still maintaining that perplexed expression. And then Sorun immediately turned away and began walking towards the exit of his house at a much faster rate than she normally recorded him walking at.

Moments after Sorun closed the door behind him, Nicole lowered her hand and began to lightly stroke the sleeping blue and black Chao sleeping in her lap as the AI pondered the meaning behind the strange hand gesture Sorun showed her.

Beyond New Mobotropolis' walled perimeter was a river that was relatively close to the city. "Relatively close" may have been an understatement, actually, as it was really only a five minute walk away from the city to reach the river. It was here that, for reasons beyond Sorun's comprehension, Sonic and Antoine decided to take him fishing.

He didn't know why. He couldn't parse together the rhyme or reason behind barely anything Sonic ever did. All he knew was that they planned an impromptu fishing trip and decided to bring Sorun along. And Sorun, with a lack of much better to do, was a fool and said yes to it.

And so, here he was: sitting in a boat, floating along a river surrounded by natures and trees. Two Mobians sitting near him as they fiddled with their fishing poles. Sorun himself was holding his pole up to his face, looking intensely at the hook at the end of his fishing line and the squirming worm impaled on the hook.

"We're in the true man's world now," Sorun sarcastically thought as he looked at the worm. A sad fate, to be sure. To be skewered on the hook to await being consumed by a fish, which would promptly be caught and consumed by Sorun. Someday he'd die and his body would be food for the worms, and the cycle would continue indefinitely. Such was life.

Well, unless they cremated him. He still didn't know how Mobians handled dead bodies or if there was even a plan to dispose of his upon his termination from existence.

"You already made me put the worm on the hook, Sorun. You seriously need me to throw it in the water for you, too?"

Frowning, Sorun looked up at Sonic, who was sitting ahead of him in the small wooden boat they, and by they Sorun really meant Antoine and Sonic as he'd watched, dragged to the river. He'd already cast his line into the water and was giving Sorun a mocking smirk. In response, Sorun made a "tsk" noise and cast his own line in the opposite direction.

"I'm perfectly capable of doing this on my own," Sorun grunted out, scooting closer towards Antoine, who sat right besides him and looked like he was trying very hard to tune out the conversation happening near him.

"'I'm perfectly capable of doing this on my own,' says the guy too squeamish to touch a worm," Sonic said with a roll of his eyes.

"Worms are gross." There was no way he was touching that damn wriggly thing with his bare hands. It came from the ground. He had standards. "Did you really invite me to this fishing trip just to ridicule me, Sonic?"

"No, I thought, 'hey we need a third guy for the fishing trip and Sorun's a great friend who could use a change of pace. Let's invite him,'" Sonic answered. "Why's everything gotta have this dark reason or ulterior motive with you? I invited a friend to go fishing. It ain't that complicated."

At that point, Antoine snapped. "May we now cease discussing ze ultimate locomotives before your incessant babbling scares ze fish!?" he screeched out.

Both Sonic and Sorun stared towards the coyote in surprise at his outburst. Antoine, suddenly looking very bashful at the looks, made a nervous chuckle and started to focus very intensely at the water. "Pardon moi," he shyly muttered out.

After both teens blinked in surprise at him, they proceeded to focus on their respective spots where their hooks were sunk in the water. Silence reigned out for the most part as they sat in silence, just waiting for a passing fish to swim by and take the bait. Droll, uneventful silence that was already beginning to strain Sorun's patience.

Time continued to pass. Time so small in its length it could barely be perceived. Moments. Seconds . For Sorun it felt like he'd been sitting there for eons waiting for a damn fish to bite down on his hook.

Sorun made a quiet sigh. This had to register as some sort of strange, cruel torture. Cruel and unusual punishment. He played fishing minigames in video games. It didn't take nearly this long to catch a fish in 'Red Dead Two'. And he'd been a fishing god in that game, if only for the items it brought. Same for 'FF15'. And the 'NieR' games.

"Aw, fuck, I'm never gonna play that remake of 'NieR' they were making," Sorun suddenly realized. "Damn. I was looking forwards to that. Wonder if it even finished before...? Nah, probably not. God dammit..." More torturous moments passed. "Man, I guess I'll never get to play 'Cyberpunk', either. What a shame. That was shaping up to be the best game of the decade. I wonder if that one came out before Earth got nuked?" Sorun looked up towards the sky. "Bet Dave got to play it if it did. I wonder if it shaped up to be the masterpiece it was advertised as? Probably, right? Of course it is, there's no way- fuck, I just realized Keanu Reeves is dead, too."

Looking past the tragedy of knowing Sorun was the sole human being from his zone left in the entire multiverse left him with the realization there was so much he'd never get to experience ever again. Games, movies, anime and other shows, music, internet in general. It was all massively overshadowed by Sorun's previous life and anybody associated with it being dead along with every single other person asides from himself, but it still held a place in his mind. Like strawberry decorations added onto the cake of sadness that was his life.

A sudden tug on Sorun's pole tore these depressing thoughts away from him. Gripping the pole tightly, the teen pulled it up while also rapidly winding the reel attached to his pole. There was resistance, but surprisingly not as much as Sorun would think there would be. He continued to reel his catch in, both Antoine and Sonic peeking over his shoulder as the hook rose up out of the water- it was a weed, goddamn it.

"Pfft. Nice catch," Sonic snickered out, eyes affixed to the tangle of green weeds hanging off Sorun's hook. The human didn't look nearly as amused as the hedgehog, and with a barely suppressed growl he tore the weeds off his hook and chucked it back into the river. Miraculously, the worm was still hooked onto the hook. "Do me a favor and see if you can catch a salad next for us."

Breathing in deeply, Sorun tried his best to ignore Sonic's jab and threw his line back into the water. Both Sonic and Antoine went back to their own respective lines as well, though by now Sorun couldn't focus on his line. Sonic's words were still burning at Sorun's ego, and when he looked over his shoulder at the blue Mobian's spiny back, he felt a sudden urge to kick him into the river.

Naturally he tapped on Antoine's shoulder to gain his attention so he might be assisted in this endeavor.

Humming, Antoine looked to the side at Sorun. The human was currently nodding his head towards Sonic, though, based on the confusion the blonde Mobian held, it was clear he didn't know what Sorun was trying to say. Frowning, Sorun turned around halfway and made a kicking gesture towards Sonic while also pointing to the river with his free hand that wasn't holding the pole. Catching his meaning more easily now, Antoine widened his eyes and then profusely began to shake his head.

With him now being confused, Sorun gave Antoine a questioning look. Antoine made a show of using his arms to make a swimming gesture, and then pointed to Sonic. Afterwards, he made a face that looked like it was drowning while also holding his throat with his free hand. It took a few seconds for Sorun to catch the meaning of what he just witnessed, but after he did, he burst out in laughter startling both Mobians.

"Ha! You can't swim!?" Sorun exclaimed. "Seriously!?"

Sonic's shoulders began to shake as his two-handed grip on his fishing pole tightened, all but confirming the assessment for Sorun. As a result, he laughed even harder, causing Sonic to sigh out and hang his head. "Mr. Sonic T. Hedgehog, hero to all on Mobius, can't swim? For real?"

"Oh, and you're such an expert on swimming?" Sonic shot back, voice irritated as he looked over his shoulder at Sorun. He looked genuinely offended, and then surprised when Sorun nodded at him.

"Of course I can swim," Sorun stated with a blank face.

"What!?" Sonic shouted out. "How!? When!? You said you grew up in a city!"

"It's called a community swimming pool, dude," Sorun explained in a flat tone. "Also, pro life tip, never go to a community swimming pool. Like, ever. Place is nasty. And anyways, how do you not know how to swim? It's the easiest thing in the world."

It'd been easy for Sorun to learn, at least. All he'd done was jump in the water and kept doing stuff until he stopped drowning. From what he heard it was a pretty effective way of teaching kids to swim. He was honestly shocked Sonic didn't know how to swim since he was such a nature-loving person. And then double surprised when he realized that swimming likely should have been a standard skill for a Freedom Fighter to have.

For pete's sake, they made Sorun learn how to climb a tree when he was starting out, but swimming was optional apparently?

"Look, me and water don't have the friendliest of relationships, alright?" Sonic snapped his head over his shoulder to glare over in Sorun's direction, though from the amused look Sorun held it wasn't that effective. "I don't see why I need to know how to swim when I'm fast enough to just run over it."

"Yeah, but what if I just kick you in the water? Then what'll you do?"

"..." Sonic's eyes narrowed at Sorun. "You wouldn't dare."

"I'm still debating it." After saying his piece, Sorun turned around to face towards the water where his line was. "Are you guys sure there's even fish in this river?"

Sonic's eyes lingered on Sorun's back for a few moments after he turned back around. He made a unsettled hum, and then turned to his own side of the river. "It's a river. Fish live in rivers. There's totally fish here," he reasoned.

"... But you did check, right?"

"Sorun, it's a river, we don't need to check."

"Oui, zis iz ze same river Rotor and some of ze other Mobians in ze city go to catch fish for zemselves," Antoine added. "Zey 'ave a net set up and everyzing."

"Yeah, see, it's fine- wait." Sonic cut himself off and looked back at Antoine. "We put the boat upstream of the net, right?"

A few moments passed. Antoine shifted uncomfortably in his seat. "Hm?"

"I asked if we put the boat upstream of the net. We did, right?"

"Hm."

"Ant, that's... that's not an answer."

"It is to me," Sorun sighed out, shoulder and head dropping as his grip on the fishing pole went slack. "Antoine, if you're gonna sit there and tell us we're wasting our time when there's nothing-"

"Zey only put ze net up on certain days and zis iz not one of zem!" Antoine shouted out. "You both truly zink zis little of moi!? Zat I wouldn't check!?"

"Alright, geez, chill. We trust ya." Sonic exhaled through his nose and turned back to the water, the other two doing the same. "Maybe it's just a slow day. It's getting close to winter."

"I'm... not sure that's how fish work, but sure," Sorun agreed. Any excuse to explain away why they were all such poor fishermen.

More silence reigned for an ungodly amount of minutes. Once in a while Sorun's line would tug, but he'd been advised by Sonic that it was just the current moving it or the hook getting caught on a weed or something and that he'd know if a fish really started biting down on it. He took his word for it, if only because he sounded as impatient and tired as Sorun felt right now. It was bad enough that Sorun was deciding if they should head back after one of them caught a single fish. He couldn't handle hours of this monotony.

Because that's all it was. Tedium. More and more tedium as the minutes stretched into tens of minutes. Maybe even a half hour had passed by now, much to Sorun's horror. And yet, somehow through this torment, whenever he glanced over to the side at Antoine the coyote seemed completely content with everything that was happening. Peaceful, even. How this was Sorun didn't have the faintest idea.

It kind of reminded Sorun of himself in a way, back in the day when he'd been grinding away in 'Warframe' or 'FF14' or some other MMO he'd play back then. Lulled into a dull, peaceful calm. He could admit he could see the appeal in the ability for one to shut their brain off for a while as they committed to a mindless task as a way of relaxing, Sorun was guilty of doing that himself as he ground away in games, but this wasn't the same thing and he didn't see how Antoine managed to reach that state when he was restless in his seat. It couldn't be a Mobian thing, either, because Sorun could practically feel Sonic fidgeting away in the seat behind him.

Maybe it was just a Antoine thing.

"You guys hear that Aly's taking in requests in the newspaper again?" Sonic asked, breaking the unbearable silence that'd been permeating the entire boat.

Antoine made a frustrated sigh. "Oui, my wife iz an avid readair of ze column, but now iz not ze time to be discussing-"

"Forget that, discussion's all we got at this point," Sorun interrupted, desperate to have something happen to break up the monotony. "Who's Aly and why should I care about her existence?"

"Eh, nobody really knows who she is. Kinda doubt Aly's even her real name," Sonic said. "All these girls with romance problems send these letters to her in the post office and she somehow gets the newspaper to print her responses in this column. Love and Loss or something like that, prints every Wednesday. And they always use these really flowery and geeky pseudonym names so nobody knows who they are."

"She... runs a romance tabloid...?" Sorun asked in a mixture of shock and disbelief.

A tired, annoyed sigh left Antoine. "I hear eet iz quite popular weeth less fortunate mademoiselles who cannot unravel ze mystery of love. Zey'll write to zis mystery woman telling of zeir woes, and zis Al-y person will write back in ze newspaper responding to ze letters and offering her advice." He shook his head. "Feools, ze lot of zem."

"... Wait," Sonic began, "didn't Bunnie once-?"

"Zat was different, she was dealing weeth ze other me at ze time!"

Rolling his eyes, Sonic continued with, "Yeah, well, according to every girl I know it's gold advice." He blew out a scoff and turned back to the water. "Yeah, right. I'll never understand girls and why they do these weird things, man. Sounds like it'd be way simpler to just talk to whoever they like instead running around in circles writing letters to some mystery newspaper lady."

"Er... right." Sorun contemplatively tapped at his fishing pole in thought. "I've never heard of her before."

Sonic shrugged. "Eh, she stopped writing months and months ago. I always figured it was because there could have only been so many women with relationship issues in Knothole, but now that we're in the new city and everything's calmed down I guess she started getting requests again, 'cause I saw her responding to more letters in dad's newspaper last week."

"It's just girls that write to her?"

"I mean, traditionally, yeah, but everybody uses fake names so I guess it wouldn't really matter if a guy did it," Sonic said. "Don't think I know any self-respecting guy that'd go that far, though."

"... What's the tabloid called again exactly?"

"It's called Love and Loss, I think you just write a letter addressed to her name and drop it off at the post-" Sonic suddenly cut himself off, and then, slowly, turned around at Sorun. Sorun, meanwhile, had gone completely still and continued staring at the water. "Why do you want to know?" Sonic asked, sounding suspicious.

A nervous sweat broke out on Sorun's face. "I'm curious, man, conversation topic, we need to talk about something because it's almost been a half hour and not one of us has gotten a single bite out here."

"Ah-huh." Sorun didn't like the smug sound in the hedgehog's voice. "Right. Of cooourse. Because you're so known to be an eager reader of the newspaper."

"Maybe I am. Maybe I'm considering getting a newspaper subscription." He pretty much had to now for research purposes, among other reasons. "I just wanna know what I'm getting into."

When he glanced over his shoulder, Sorun internally winced when he saw that smirk on Sonic's face. That knowing smirk. The urge to kick him into the river was rapidly increasing, and he felt his right foot begin to itch.

"I dunno," Sonic began, "sounds a lot like you might actually be interested in- wah!"

The urge won out. Sorun spun around and kicked Sonic in the small of his back. The hedgehog yelled out in surprise and tipped forwards right into the water, dropping his fishing pole and leaving it in the boat. Not even a second later Sonic popper up out of the water, flailing around with a horrified expression as he reached a hand up to the sky.

"Help! Help, I- urk, hrk!" Some water had flooded into Sonic's mouth while he cried out for help, making his flailing increase. "Heeeelp!"

Antoine looked on towards the struggling hedgehog in alarm. Sorun had a much more calm and neutral expression as he continued fishing on his side of the boat. "Sorun, mon dieu! What have you done!?" he screamed out. "He could drown!"

Not looking concerned in the slightest, Sorun leaned over the boat a bit to look into the water. "Yeah, in that perilous waist-deep water," he dryly remarked. He wasn't cold enough to play on somebody inability to swim to actually put them in danger. He wasn't above it when they could just stand up and walk out of the river. Especially when Sonic wouldn't shut up about the stupid newspaper article.

It was all his fault, really.

"Hm? Oh, hey! Finally!" Easily ignoring Sonic's panicked screaming behind him, Sorun began reeling his fishing pole when he felt the line begin to sharply tug. "Oh-ho, that's it, come to... man, really?"

Well, it was definitely a fish he'd pulled up. It wasn't any bigger than his finger and the worm he was using as bait didn't even fit inside its mouth, but it was still a catch. Even if Sorun was mentally debating with himself whether this was better than zero.

With more disappointment on his face than he'd felt in a while, Sorun held up what could barely be called a fish up to Antoine's face. "You think you can make something out of this?" he asked over the screaming near them. The unimpressed look Antoine gave him back said enough. "Yeah, thought not," Sorun sighed out, unhooking the fish and tossing it back into the river.

"Are you not going to help Soneek up?" Antoine asked him.

"..." Sorun looked over to Sonic. He was still flailing around in the water. "Let's give it, like, five more minutes and if he hasn't realized he can just stand up by then we'll lend a hand."

"... Fair enough."

The next day

The greatest challenge in his life laid before Sorun. One man. One singular piece of paper. A pen he'd stolen from Honey's front desk. All gathered in what was effectively his workspace inside of her shop, e.g. the room full of boxes he'd painstakingly organized so that it was neat and orderly. Here he sat, at a table in the dead-center of the room, the overhead lights beating down on him and reflecting off the yellow wallpaper as he stared at the blank piece of paper staring him in the face, pen in hand.

It was time to write a goddamn letter.

"I'm gonna write the shit out of you." Breathing in deeply, Sorun held the pen up to the sky and thrust its tip down towards the blank page. The tip of the pen neared the paper, the ink almost close enough to stain the white material-

Breathing in deeply, Sorun tore the pen away from the paper before it could make a mark. His heart was racing. Stupid. This was a stupid decision. Why had he decided to do this?

"Right. Because of her," Sorun thought out. He went slack in his chair, slamming the pen down on the table as he stared forlornly at the blank paper staring back at him. It was almost like it was mocking him. "Nicole..."

There'd been a time that had stretched on for months where he'd try to deny these feelings on account of him literally dying and wanting to save both himself and her from any ensuing heartbreak that would result from pursuing these feelings. He came back, of course, and a small part of himself went far enough to debate on the merits of staying behind just for her.

He'd manage to convince himself that it was probably a foolish idea to stay behind in a world not his for a girl that potentially didn't even like him back.

But that was the crux of the issue. He was here to stay now with Earth gone. Here to stay with her . And while his heart was still heavy with the loss of his home, due to everybody's efforts that weight had been significantly lessened, and the void in his heart made room for these feelings to return. It didn't help how supportive Nicole had been of him all this time. Spending so much time with him, the talks, the house, she'd given him a house of all things, sometimes it was just too much. Any reservations he had over what she was were squashed under all the feelings he felt.

But then the paranoid side of his took over. What if she wasn't interested in a relationship with him? What if she didn't want that kind of thing with anybody? What if she rejected him and he ended up ruining their friendship by asking one single thing? She was his best friend; he didn't want to jeopardize that. But on the other hand Sorun was slowly growing less and less satisfied with what they had right now. He wanted... he wanted something, he wasn't sure what. More of her, he guessed. Something deeper between them.

"Hell, I don't know what I'm thinking. I've never been in a relationship. I don't... what am I doing?" Sorun wondered to himself. "I-I-I don't know her feelings on this. Should I ask her? No, impossible. Nicole can't know. Unless...? No. Absolutely not." He sighed and ran a hand through his dark hair. "What do I do?"

Sonic inadvertently informing him about this Aly love tabloid person was what jumpstarted this whole thing. They'd been thoughts Sorun had been wrestling with for weeks now, and it seemed like a golden opportunity had presented itself to him. Air out all his questions and worries to a completely anonymous source under a false identity? Why, that amount of complexity was just perfect for him. But he didn't know what to write. Or if he should even go through with it. What the potential consequences were.

What if somebody found out? God, what if Nicole found out? He'd have to move. Go live somewhere else forever. He'd never be able to face her again.

"... Screw it. It's something as opposed to doing nothing. And nobody could ever find out." Breathing in and out, very, very deeply, Sorun touched the pen down on the paper. "Alright. Alright, there's nothing to it. I'll just... I'll go for it, and at the end if it turns out this is a horrible idea I'll just burn the letter. Yeah. Yeah, that's a great idea. 'Dear A-'"

"Whatcha doin'?"

A shrill shriek left Sorun as he twisted his body to the side. He saw Honey leaning over his chair, hands tucked behind her back with an inquisitive look on her face. Sorun almost reacted by jabbing the pen he held towards her nearest eye, but managed to hold the urge off and release a calming breath.

Doing his best to focus and act natural, Sorun faced Honey with the straightest face he could muster. "Nothing. Nothing at all. What are you doing?"

"Checking on you...?" The cat took a quick glance around the room. "You got that delivery from the post office I asked for, right?"

"I left it by the front counter."

"... Oh, that's what that was." She blinked and looked back to Sorun. "So what are you doing now?"

"Nothing, seeing as I already packed all the things you asked me to pack for today and dropped them off at the post office for shipping. And got that thing you asked for." Sorun dragged his chair a bit forwards towards the table and slightly leaned his body across it to block Honey's view when she looked closer at the table's surface. "I'm not doing anything."

"Thennnn what's that?"

"... A table."

"My table. Move it." A hand was placed on the side of Sorun's head and was used to forcible push him away. Sorun hissed out in protest and attempted to swat at Honey, though this went ignored by the cat as she looked down at the letter Sorun had barely started. "You're... writing a letter?" She released her hold on Sorun and glanced towards him, with the human sending her a heated glare. "Who's A?"

The anger in Sorun's eyes slowly began to turn nervous as he just began to realize how deep he was in it now. "A... ntoine. Yeah. Him."

"That guy with the goofy blonde haircut with the weird accent?"

"Mmhm, yeah, totally, we got a pen pal thing going on," Sorun lied. "He's actually a really good cook. He trades me recipes and I trade him..." He trailed off, not being able to think of anything he'd have of worth that Antoine would actually want. "... Stuff, yeah, point is we trade letters."

Honey didn't look convinced in the slightest. "Didn't you say once it's only a two minute walk from your house to his?"

"Bit less, actually," Sorun admitted, then went rigid when Honey gave him an accusing glare. "It was his wife's idea?"

"Uh-huh." Looking back at the letter, Honey stuck her tongue out from her mouth as she gave the paper a scrutinizing look, with Sorun growing increasingly nervous from besides her. It was only after a few moments of staring at the letter did Honey's form go completely straight as the realization hit her. "Noooo..." She whispered in awe as looked back towards Sorun.

"Shut up."

"I don't believe it."

"Shut up shut up shut up ...!"

"You're writing a letter to her !?" And now she was laughing. Cackling, really, hard enough that she'd thrown her head back in her mirth. Sorun, past all the embarrassment he was feeling, was contemplating stabbing her with the pen he was still holding. The pen he was fairly certain he was crushing in his grip. "Sorun, you nerd! Only girls write to Aly! It's a girl tabloid! For girls!"

"I was gonna use neutral pronouns so nobody knew a guy writ it!" Sorun yelled out. "Why does it even matter anyways!?"

She didn't answer him, instead choosing to continue laughing. This left Sorun stewing in his seat as he stared at the cackling cat, having slammed his pen down on the table as he angrily crossed his arms and waited for her to finish laughing at him.

It was a good five minutes before she finally calmed down. Sorun stared at Honey the entire duration, burning in anger and embarrassment. Eventually she lowered her head back down from the ceiling with a sigh while wiping a tear away from her eye. "Ahahah... ahhh. Oh, Sorun. Sweet, sweet Sorun."

"If you're done laughing at me can you leave me alone?" Sorun bitterly ground out, elbow propped on the table with his head resting on the fist. "I don't make fun of your life."

"That's because there's nothing to make fun of. Unlike everybody else I'm perfect." She turned around just in time to miss Sorun sputtering at her in outrage. "Ah, I just can't believe it," she continued, putting her hands on her cheeks. "I always kinda pegged you as the clueless romantic but I never imagined you'd go to these kinds of lengths. It's so sad yet precious at the same time." She pulled up a nearby chair and sat in it backwards, arms folded over the top of its back as she grinned towards Sorun. "So who's lucky girl, mmm? I bet it's the computer girl."

Sorun's breath choked in his throat when Honey guessed correctly. He even felt a bit of fear begin to build. "H-how-?"

"Oh, Amy gossips about you two all the time. She figured out you had a thing for her all the way back when you kept bugging her for that Power Ring to take her to the concert Mina was having."

"I'll stab her." The worst part was he actually remembered a lot from that day, and how the two of them had been tittering away at Sorun while all those bags he'd been carrying for Amy tried to crush him to death. He couldn't believe Amy came to that conclusion, let alone gossiped about it. "She seriously talks about me behind my back?"

"She talks about a lot of people. She's a regular of mine and we're into a lot of the same things, so we talk a lot," Honey answered. "But yeah, she mentions you a lot."

A horrifying thought struck Sorun. "... She hasn't told anyone else about this, has she?"

"I'unno." Honey shrugged. "I mean, probably not. Not with the guys at least."

"I take it back, I'm gonna drop a building down on her one day. This I swear." A growing migraine forced Sorun to reach up and massage his forehead. "Honey, this is really private for me, so can you just leave it alone?" He glanced to the side at the letter. "Fact is I don't know what I'm doing so I need advice, and if Amy figured it out then I literally can't go to anyone about this without them putting the pieces together. I'm kinda strapped for options."

Honey gave him a lame look. "Or you could just ask me."

Sorun mirrored her expression. "You ever even been in a relationship, woman?"

Thinking the question over, Honey looked up while touching a finger to her chin. "Not really. No guy's ever asked me out for some reason," she said, causing him to sigh out. "But clothes have always been my passion, so I'm not too broken up about it."

"A match made in heaven, I'm sure," Sorun dryly remarked. "Look," he continued, picking up the nearly blank letter, "why do you even care?"

"Because I care about you and this is the most exciting thing happening right now," she easily answered. "I know I'm not an expert on the subject, but here's a great idea: talk to her about this."

"Ha ha, no." Shaking his head, Sorun turned around to face the table and picked the pen up. "I... I have reasons, okay? I would, but..." A deep frown settled over Sorun's features as he began tapping the pen on the table. "I'm just trying to cover all my bases here," he settled on. "Wanna get as much info as possible, maybe wait it out a bit more to see what happens. Don't wanna screw something up."

"Sounds like you're just stalling to me."

"Says the woman married to shirts." Sorun waved his hands over his shoulder. "Don't you have a blouse to go make or something? Let me suffer in peace already."

Pouting, Honey stood up from the chair. "It's raiment for a fancy dance a client of mine is going to," she corrected him as she pushed the chair in. "I can tell this is actually stressing you out, so I'll leave you alone. And... for the record I actually do know a couple girls who say Aly's advice did help save their relationships. So it's not the worst idea in the world, this whole thing." She gestured to the table, and at the same time Sorun's ears perked up. "I still think it's hilarious you're going this far, though."

"..." Sorun said nothing, and instead began writing out words on the paper. Rolling her eyes to the ceiling and shaking her head, Honey turned to leave.

"And put that pen back when you're done," she called over her shoulder as she left the room. Sorun watched her leave out of the corner of his eye, scoffing once she left his sight completely and then turned back to the letter.

The next two hours were filled with the sounds of small scratching noises and a light amount of curses as he worked to compile what was most definitely the most awkward letter in Sorun's whole life. Which just so happened to also be the only letter he'd ever written.

The next day

There'd never been a point in Sorun's life he'd ever posted a letter. Mostly on the account he didn't know anybody that lived far enough away from him to warrant sending mail during his life on Earth. He never imagined it'd be this stress-inducing, though.

Bright side it wasn't a love letter he was sending through the mail. Downside was, well, it wasn't very far from one.

"Come on, man, snap out of it. This ain't a love letter. Love has nothing to do with any of this. This is..." Sorun looked down at the sealed envelope in his hand, and then up at the post office in front of him. "... It's..."

"Love letter, plea for romantic advice, it's kind of the same thing at the end of the day, ain't it?"

"Not even remotely." Frowning, Sorun turned to the mirror image of himself leaning next to the entrance to the post office. "This is foolish. I'm not going through with it."

"Aw, come on, don't puss out now. I had to watch you put this thing together for hours." Sorun pushed off the wall and slinked to Sorun's side. "Look, homie, it's simple." He draped one arm over Sorun's shoulder and gestured to the post office with the other. "Ya go in, ya mail the thing, we go get a newspaper subscription later 'cause we really need to do that at some point, we read the article when it comes out Wednesday and after that, hey, who knows?"

Sorun batted Sorun's arm off of him. "I thought you were opposed to a relationship with someone here," he thought.

"No, I was opposed to staying here for a potential relationship, but seeing as we're stuck here forever with fuck all to do I don't care what we do anymore." Sorun turned away from Sorun and interlocked his fingers behind his head. "Just do it, dude. I'm tired of us fumbling around when you're around her."

"I have time."

"We have nothing but time. My plan is for us to be a mailman for forty years until you die with nothing to do in the meantime, so for Christ's sake post the goddamn letter already." Sorun looked back at Sorun. "You know you wanna. Honey's right. You're stallin'."

"..." Sighing, Sorun looked down at the letter. "I'm just scared." Scared of making a terrible mistake he couldn't fix. Scared of the unknown. Scared of doing this when he had no idea what he was doing or if this was even the right thing to do. Too much of not knowing anything and too scared to do so much as take a step forwards to fix any of it.

Hanging his shoulders, Sorun turned to face Sorun. "I know, I'm scared about this, too, but compared to living through the days wondering if we were gonna get a lance skewered through our face by a robot I find this a hell of a lot better. I want this too, you know?"

"Mh..."

"Just man the fuck up and post the letter already."

"Tch." When Sorun looked back up, Sorun was gone. All that was left was the post office in front of him. "I am a man. A man about to write to a girls' column in the newspaper... yeah..."

Hanging his head and resigning to his fate, Sorun made his way to the post office. One microstep at a time.

Dear Aly,

Well, here I am, writing this thing out. I didn't know how to start this out and spent twenty minutes staring at a blank page before I decided to just go for it. So here I am. Going for it. I've never really done anything like this before, so you'll have to forgive me if this is a little, I dunno, odd? Unconventional? Unorthodox? That's pretty much how everybody treats me anyways, so I wouldn't even be surprised at this point if this is how the letter's perceived, so... yeah, just bear that in mind.

Romance was never really a thing that ever popped up in my life. No one wanted me, I didn't want anybody. Life was simple. I didn't care enough to even think about it. But then is happened and now everything's all backwards and I don't know what I'm doing. But I should probably start from the beginning, give the context to this whole thing. That whole jazz.

I'm not from New Mobotropolis, or Knothole, was never really a native anywhere. For lack of any better way to put it I was separated from my home and was forced to relocate here. All I remember from those early days was being in a constant haze of confusion and fear around everything. Unfamiliar surroundings, unfamiliar people, felt like I was in a nightmare every day. I was lashing out at everyone around me because I hated every second there. I didn't know what I was supposed to do.

But then I meet this one person, and they're... they're different from everyone else. In more than one way, but I never paid any mind to that. I actually found it kind of cool, actually, but that's besides the point. We shared a hobby, which was more of something in common than I had in with literally anybody else around me. It felt like a connection, you know? Like I could sit down and hang out with this one person doing the one thing in the world I'm good at that I enjoy doing, and in those moments everything felt fine, and I felt normal, like I was back home. This friend of mine had some personal issues, though, and because of that there wasn't a lot of times we could hang out, but we tried to make do with the time we had.

Then... I find out I'm dying. Terrible sickness that's entirely incurable. I didn't even know how much time I had left at the time, chalked it up to months, probably, and my reaction was about what you'd expect. Denial, grief, enough anxiety I'm honestly surprised I didn't die of a heart attack at some point, you probably get how it is. I think I acted poorly as a result of it all. There was a time I ran away for a bit as I tried to come to terms to all of it, and when I came back it didn't get any better. There were people that tried supporting me, but for reasons that are my own I never actually told anybody what was happening to me, so when all these people start acting nice and caring around me it just felt patronizing. It wasn't anyone's fault, I get it, they were all just trying to help, but it was still a bad time for me. I just became apathetic to everything. Withdrawn. Distant, going through the motions towards the inevitable. It felt like I was completely isolated from the whole world.

Except for that one person. The one true, actual friend I had in the whole world, who I was only able to get together with for a few minutes, maybe some hours if I was lucky, or sometimes not at all some days, to make it all go away for just a little bit. Looking back I probably clung onto them a bit too much for the support they were unknowingly giving me, which eventually became part of the problem. I was dying and didn't wanna leave behind holes in anybody's hearts, so there was a moment where I tried distancing myself from my friend. Hoped they'd just forget about me so when I died they'd just move on with minimal damage to them. Figured it was the last kindness I could provide with my impending doom on the horizon.

Yeah, that didn't work. They got mad at me for avoiding them and I... well, to put it honestly I missed them too much to go through with it. So I bite the bullet and decide to just go for it and continue going along with it all 'til the moment I died. I felt bad, more for them than for me, oddly enough, but it's all I could do.

Well, the time comes, and guess what? I don't die. To say I was cured of this disease would be wrong; "survived" would be a more accurate term. Point is I'm not dying anymore, so yay for that. It's around the same time that Knothole got blown up and that cool Sorun guy saved everyone and Nicole made the new city for everyone and everything, so yeah. All's good. Those problems my friend was having were cleared up around the same time, too, so suddenly they can go do whatever they want because they had a lot more freedom to work with now. So overall everything's great. I had a, uh... kind of an adjustment period to work with, but I managed to get through it. And during all that time when I was dying I did manage get closer with those trying to befriend me, if only because going it alone kinda sucks.

I find out later on that my home is gone. Blown up, burned to cinders, Eggmanned or something, I dunno. Everyone there was gone and I was the last one left. This left me in another depressive mood for a bit, and I made some stupid decisions in my grief, but hey, who hasn't? But I had my friends. And that one specific, special friend. Things weren't easy, still aren't, but it's getting better. It's working out.

So where does that leave me? Healthy new life in a new city, new home, new job, a community of supporting friends and a bright future ahead of me. By all rights everything should be golden. And it is. But there's a problem.

I don't know, it just feels like something's missing from my life. And I look at my friend, my one best friend that's been there with me to support me every single day since the whole my-home-got-blown-up thing, and how I feel whenever they're around and the fact that I kinda wish they'd stick around more than they already do. It feels selfish because they've done more to help me than I'd ever be able to repay in a hundred lives over, but a large part of me wants more than what we have currently. I can't explain why , I just... it's what I want.

But then I look at them, and I look at myself. There's my best friend: smartest person I know, infinitely more talented than I'll ever be, stronger in every capacity imaginable. Kinder and more generous than me by a large margin. In terms of looks, er... look, I don't mean to sound offensive, but I've always been "different" than everyone else around me and if you asked me if I'd date anybody else I'd say no, but my friend's special in that their looks don't even register with me, and I don't know why. What I'm trying to say is they're perfect. And then there's me: a talentless hack. Kind of a jerk. Don't really have much going for me besides a sense of dry sarcasm that kinda gets on everyone's nerves.

I'm not good enough for them, plain and simple. But I want to go for it all the same. But I don't know what I'm doing. I don't know if I should just go for it because I don't want to mess something up and ruin what we already have between us, I don't know what I'm supposed to do even if we do agree to something, I don't... I'm not romantic, okay? I don't have experience with this, I don't even know if you could call this romance. It's a giant mess is what it is and I'm tired of pretending it's anything else. And I'm also tired of ignoring my feelings. But I'm too scared to act on them.

Thus is the tale of why I wrote this letter to you. I'm sorry if it's a bit longer than most letters you get; admittedly I just heard about you the other day and decided to just go for it because I don't have many options at the moment. So if I could just get some advice, please? Just a smidgen of wisdom on what I'm supposed to do here? I'm completely lost here.

Yours,

Xx_1337G4m3r_xX

"..." Slowly, the letter held in her hands was slowly set down on the desk in front of her. Blue eyes continued to stare at the paper, after which a tiring sigh left their owner.

Under any other circumstances Sally would have put a lot of thought into the letter she'd just read. That was the whole purpose of the service she'd set up, after all. But there was one particular reason she couldn't put her sole focus on that letter, and that was that there was a second letter sitting right next to that one.

Normally this wouldn't have made that much of a difference - she got through all letters sent to her - but there were certain peculiarities that caught her attention when she saw this letter arrive with the second one. Mainly it looked like it was printed as opposed to the handwritten letters she always received. The letters were too uniform to be anything but typed and printed and the paper was neat. And as it was she didn't know many people with a working printer.

"I swear, if this is the reason why Nicole asked me if I was still doing the Dear Aly thing the other day..." Sally thought to herself as she picked up the letter and began reading.

Dear Aly,

Greetings. I am writing to you in hopes of gaining insight into a matter that has proven to be particularly elusive for me.

The prospect of emotions has always been a peculiar case for me. To put it simply, due to certain factors outside of my control I was somewhat stunted in my intellectual understanding of the subject. I've many friends who I've lived alongside for years now that have helped me to understand just what it all means, and one friend in particular has been of great help to me in many areas. Him specifically is the reason I find myself writing this letter.

I'm not so uninformed as to not understand the concept of love; I'm not some gormless machine. I hold great fondness for all those that live around me in the city, and I truly do hold love for the friends that have stood by me all these years. It took much effort on my part to understand just what these feelings meant exactly, but I'm glad I've made the effort.

Strictly speaking, however, this is a platonic love I hold for those around me. It's romantic love I find myself being inadequate in understanding.

Of course I've seen numerous examples from couples in the city, and even a close friend of mine has a spouse. I understand the function of a pairing - the propagation of offspring and continuation of genetic material of the parents -, but it's the emotional aspect of the act that always fascinated me. Though, try as I might, I could never understand it. How two individuals could be drawn so close together as to pledge so much trust in one another and live so closely and intimately. I didn't know if there was a criteria to follow or if there was some natural, instinctive drive that I just lacked for one reason or another. I tried analyzing those around me and how they came about pairing off with others, but these results were... inconclusive, and sporadic, and so chaotic I had to wonder if I'd done something wrong.

But then there's him.

As you can probably imagine the aforementioned circumstances surrounding the reason for my stunted education of emotions has caused some to look at me oddly. This isn't usually the case with many, and I'm fortunate enough that my friends accept me for who I am regardless of such things. Even so, I'm aware there is some unconscious bias among them, though I cannot fault them for this.

There is, however, an exception in the case of one of my friends. A very dear friend of mine. That is not to say the rest of my friends do not treat me as an equal or a person, but he is special. From the very first moment we met he treated me normally, and on occasion has been very vocal on the subject to me, for which I've been thankful for. Beyond that we share many likes and enjoy each others' company. Enough that I've found myself spending more time with him than anyone else and have been longing to spend longer with him. As much as he'll deny it he's a kind and considerate individual who often puts others before himself. Sometimes to a worrying degree, though fortunately he's lately been slowing down and taking things easy, which I've been grateful for.

He's also prone to making... very questionable decisions and is, on occasion, a source of consternation for me and many of my friends, though like me he is the victim of irregular circumstances and I can often overlook a majority of his shortcomings and bad decisions. I've often been told by one of my friends that somebody whose flaws are very evident is more trustworthy than someone seemingly without flaws, so I suppose, in this respect, my friend being this way is a fortunate thing.

Ironically, despite the fact I've known him the shortest time compared to all my other friends, I find myself longing for his company more than any of the others'. He goes very far out of his way for my sake, another endearing aspect of his, and I usually do the same for him despite the fact he doesn't expect me to. I'd once thought that us being somewhat "irregular", as it is, amongst all of our peers and friends was what originally drew us together, but his continued companionship and acts of kindness towards me, an affection he does not display towards anybody else, has caused me to develop feelings towards him I hold towards no one else, even those I hold dearest to me.

I... adore him. Sincerely. I cannot explain why, as try as I might these are feelings I cannot find myself comprehending. It's a vexatious thing, not knowing why I feel these things or how to properly describe and process them, but I simply do. He's always been there to help me experience life as it's meant to be lived since we've met. It's because of all this I desire to attempt to pursue what would be called a romantic relationship between us.

Therein lies the problem, as I've no practical experience in undertaking such a task. As much as I've tried to correlate the causes of others starting successful relationship, the why of it all still eludes me. More than that I've personally had a friend of mine as dear as the one I've mention suffer through a very traumatic breakup of their own. I do not wish the same to become of us, but do not know how to avoid such a thing. I do not know how to initiate this sort of relationship, or even if he possesses the same feelings that I do. I worry of possible negative repercussions that would result of me simply asking, but am at a loss for what else to do.

Another issue is that I simply don't know if now would be the ideal time to attempt such a thing. My friend as recently suffered through many personal tragedies in his life and is in a vulnerable state at the moment. He's improved by a substantial margin over time and has been doing well enough for the most part currently, though I cannot say for certain if he has made a full recovery. I've tried to be there for his sake, and I believe my presence did, in fact, aid his recovery, but I do not want to rush into something during a time where he might not be ready. I do not even know if I am ready.

As such, I require your input on the matter due to you being very prominent in this field. Do I be blunt and confront him directly? Should I wait until I am more certain? Should something be done to subtly hint towards him that I desire a relationship, or would that be too underhanded of me? These are all questions I cannot answer for myself, and so I plead you to give me whatever advice you see fit. Thank you in advance for your time in aiding me with this.

Signed,

"These names..." Looking between the two letters, each in one of Sally's hands, the chipmunk found herself making a flat, unimpressed expression at the two pieces of paper. "Sorun, I'm not surprised. I expected better from Nicole." She breathed out and put the papers back down. "What to do, what to do..."

Any other day she would have been ecstatic for her friend finally figuring out love for herself, but this was a bit of a tenuous situation. Not because of Sorun; she was actually somewhat glad it was him as opposed to anybody else. Amy constantly gossiped to her and some of the other girls how much time they spent together and how back in the day Sorun was near-relentless in his pursuit of Power Rings just to spend more time with Nicole. Even Sonic on occasion told Sally personally he suspected something was going on between the two of them.

Besides all that, the letters she just read pretty much all but confirmed those theories.

No, it was tenuous in that Sally felt like she was dealing with children that didn't know what they were doing. Children, except they were grownups, one was more intelligent than most adults she knew by default, and the other was... Sorun, who was definitely somewhere above a child. More than that they both seemed to have legitimately concerns about one another and were playing this extremely cautiously.

"Maybe a bit too cautious," Sally muttered to herself. "Or maybe not. I don't know. I'd agree that Sorun isn't in a good place for this kind of thing right now, but he has been pretty normal as of late. Something like this might even be good for him. Considering both their feelings really all that needs to happen is one of them saying something."

If this were a simpler world than she could have just walked right up to Nicole and given her Sorun's letter and be done with it, but that would be a betrayal of their trust. They'd both used poorly-made pseudonyms for a reason, and for one reason or another they wanted their problems to stay anonymous. Fine with Sally, as far as she was concerned. There was more than one way at tackling the issue. If they wanted Aly's advice, they'd get it.

"Geez, how'd I end up in the middle of all this?"

Wednesday morning

"What kind of rainbow-hippie, granola-eating bullshit is this?"

Sorun had nearly torn the arms off of the local mailman that morning when he came to deliver the paper. The teen had been huddled up by a nearby window, watching the small walkway that lead to his house in preparation of the man. He hadn't even reached the newly-installed mail slot in Sorun's door before he'd flung it wide, tore the paper from his hands, and slammed the door back in his face.

Most of the paper had been discarded onto the floor as he jumped onto his couch. Useless news and countless words he had no interest in. There was only one single thing he needed, and it was a specific column he'd written to recently. To his glee, this strange Aly person actually responded to his letter, among others. He'd had to take some deep breaths and got up off the couch to pace for minutes just to work up the nerve to read it. Eventually he'd found his way back to the couch and began to slowly read her response, word by word at an agonizing pace.

A pace that soon began to increase the further Sorun got into the letter.

Dear Xx_1337G4m3r_xX (Wow! What a name!)

(Sorun couldn't help but scowl at what he felt was sarcasm written in that compliment)

I'm sorry to hear about everything that's been going on in your life, but I'm happy that you seem to be on the mend and doing better! Mental wellness with oneself is an important aspect of daily life, not just relationships, so it's good to hear you're taking steps to get past all your hardships. Keep it up and don't give up!

It sounds to me like you've been dancing around your feelings for your friend and have been taking the wait-and-see approach to your problem. Playing the cautious game is all well and good for establishing trust with one another and to see where you are, but from how you make it sound the two of you are already extremely close if your friend would go as far as to help support you for days on end in a time of need. There's such a thing as waiting TOO long, and if you let an opportunity slip through your fingers you may find yourself wishing you'd acted sooner.

With that said, love isn't something to be rushed into. It's a slow process that takes time to establish, but no matter how slow a process is it still needs a starting point. And, of course, like any good relationship, communication is key. Don't let something like the fear of rejection turn you away from what could potentially blossom into something beautiful. The worse they could say to you is simply "no", so in that respect you really have nothing to lose by trying.

Bottom line, follow your heart and go for gold. You might even be surprised to find one of the reasons that friend spends so much time with you could be because they feel the same towards you. You'll never know until you act, so get to it! Y ou might be looking at a game over otherwise if you do nothing.

Signed,

Aly

Sorun stared right at the newspaper, never feeling more incredulous than he felt at that very moment. While he continued staring at the paper Sorun poked his head over Sorun's shoulder to stare down at it with him.

"Aw, that's cute. Look," he said, pointing to the column, "she used a bunch of gaming euphemisms just for you. You think she figured out what that stupid gamertag name you made up means?"

"No way. Nobody could have cracked the code," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "It's impossible. 'Sides, she doesn't even know us."

"Yeah, I guess," Sorun agreed. "Still, this article-"

"It's flim flam." Anger creasing over his features, Sorun crushed the newspaper article in his hand out of spite. "It's a bunch of boiler plate, generic dating advice I coulda gotten off the back of a cereal box. 'Stay true to your feelings and just talk and be open with-' I mean, come on! Anybody could have told me that!" His scowl deepened. "And I don't like how she kept tossing around the L-word, too. Nobody ever said anything about love. This isn't love. It's some other thing."

Leaning back on the couch and propping his feet up on the cushions, Sorun said, "Well, whaddya expect from some no-name romantic adviser who's probably never gotten a real taste of romance in her entire life?" He looked up at the ceiling. "On the other hand the advice she did give is so practical and simplistic I have to wonder why we're not going for it."

"Because that would involve talking about my feelings to Nicole. Which is a no-no." Unfurling the newspaper, Sorun looked deeper into the article, towards one of the other letters she'd responded to. A sneer crossed his features when he read another lengthy one like his. "I mean, listen to what she said about this one weird-sounding girl that wrote to her. And I mean really weird. She signed her name in binary. What kinda geek signs in binary?"

"Mm, yeah. What's the name?"

"I dunno, we can't read binary." His blue eyes scrolled down to the response letter Aly sent her. "It's practically the same goddamn thing. 'It can be a very scary experience to first start out a relationship,' blah blah blah, 'lots of people, males especially in some cases, can be rather adverse to opening up to others, even those they trust, so it can be up to us to get the ball rolling on these things,' there really is nothing new under the sun, I freakin' swear, 'gaining your potential partner's attention through special acts such as gift giving can often be a big hint you want to deepen the relationship, but if all else fails, just be upfront with your feelings-' this is all ludicrous."

"Okay, but what's actually wrong with the advice? Like, what's the big issue with what you're reading? It actually seems like pretty solid advice."

"It is solid, and that's what pisses me off." Sorun threw the crumpled paper to the floor and slumped back in the couch, opposite of the other Sorun. "It's actually more than solid. She's right, and I'm mad it took some random column writer to tell me what the right course of action was."

"... I mean she's kinda an expert on the subject-"

Sorun rose his head up to glare at Sorun. "You were just saying a minute ago how she was a know-it-all that didn't know anything!"

Sorun shrugged. "I was trying to be nice and stay on your side but even you admitted all the points she raised were valid points." The explanation caused Sorun to sigh and relax back into the couch. "What are we actually doing here?" Sorun asked him.

"I don't know." No matter how right the words on that paper were on how he should go about this, and they were very correct, it didn't change the fact he was too paranoid of something going incredibly wrong to act on his feelings. The worst she could say was no? Maybe, but what if that wasn't true? What if he made things irrevocably worse by even implying he wanted a relationship? He didn't want to ruin things when it was something Nicole potentially didn't even want.

Then again, the letter had some merit. Waiting to long was, Sorun would admit, something he was also worried over. It was already gnawing at his nerves how long this had taken; he didn't want to wait so long something couldn't happen because he was too much of a coward to take that first step. In the grand scheme of things it may very well be as simple as him flat-out stating to her his feelings and desires. A few sentences that wouldn't even take a full minute to get out.

But that was a path that either lead to heaven or hell, and he didn't know which way the road was winding. And he also couldn't see how fast the road was crumbling the longer he took. If it even was. He was practically blind in that sense.

"... Maybe we should wait longer."

Sorun slapped his own face. "And thus nothing was learned," he mumbled into his palm. "Dude, come on, we've been over this. Take the first napkin already."

"A bit longer," Sorun reiterated. "Just to... step back, look where we're at with each other. Figure out what I'm actually supposed to say." He looked to the side. "And, you know, on the off chance that... well, maybe she feels the same after all and she could just-"

"Sounds like hopeful thinking," Sorun said. "And laziness."

"Perhaps. But I'm beyond caring at this point." Sorun rose up off the couch and began to pick up the discarded pieces of paper. "Bit longer," he promised himself. "That's all. I'll... I'll deal with it when the time's right."

"You keep telling yourself that."

Sorun didn't find himself liking that response. He frowned at it, and turned around to look at Sorun who should have still been on the couch. But when he did turn around the couch was completely vacant, and Sorun found himself completely alone in the room, surrounded by newspaper pages. He made a low sigh and bent down to continue cleaning the paper off the floor.

A/N- Sometimes I imagine Sally sees Sorun like that one Invincible meme that's been floating around recently. Sorun's bleeding out and lying on the rock and Sally's crouching down next to him pointing at her head and yelling, "Think, Sorun, think!" Like, not seriously, but it's a funny image to think of.

It's a real mixed bag of good and bad for the time Sorun got taken away from Earth. On one hand he never got to see the SE edition of DMC5 and playable Vergil (which didn't really add that much new stuff to his kit compared to the other games, but still), but he also didn't have to see the heartbreaking travesty that was Cyberpunk, so hey.

There's a real issue I have with the format this site uses for text files. When I was making the letters I tried to structure it differently, use indented paragraphs instead of spacing out the paragraphs like normal and use spaces to space out the names so they're on the right side. But then I save it all and it autoconfigures so that the extra spaces used for indenting are erased so I gotta go back and separate the paragraphs anyway, and forget putting the names on the right side of the screen using spaces.

WHY ISN'T THERE AN ALIGN RIGHT BUTTON!? WHY!?

Foibles aside, I tried. Didn't work, we got this instead, moving on.

So I don't really do arcs, because the last time I did arcs I gave them overly-pretentious names I regret making to this day, but if I did still do that I'd consider the chapter Sorun began living in his new home in the city to now to be a kind of intermission arc of sorts. For those worried about it there's one more chapter after this one, and after that the story's plot'll start picking up again as we move on.

Chapter 71

Recursion Error

Episode 71- The best gift ever

Winter on Mobius was about the same that it was on Earth: cold. Which was surprising to Sorun, because he'd half expected winter to entail deadly frost storms so severe they'd tear his skin off if he didn't huddle safely in his home. Or weather so cold he'd instantly freeze solid and die in about thirty-two milliseconds if he was caught exposed.

But no. Winter was about as normal as winter on Earth was. Freezing weather, cloudy skies, and snow. That was about the sight that greeted Sorun as he stepped out of his home. It was such a normal sight that he wasn't even feeling all that annoyed by the cold and snow around him.

"Well, seven-odd months on this planet. Had to see winter eventually," Sorun reasoned to himself. He tugged on the black turtleneck shirt he wore beneath the navy blue vest - he'd finally been able to afford more clothes, thank goodness - and trudged on out from his home's walkway and onto the sidewalk. Hands covered in black, cotton gloves were tucked into his pockets as he calmly walked down the sidewalk. He nodded at one Mobian, one of his neighbors if he recalled, that waved at him as he passed by. Another thing he'd started doing: being more acknowledging towards people now that things in his life had calmed down and he didn't feel like he was dying on the inside. Well, at least not as much as he used to.

Life had been a significant improvement for Sorun. Things were stable, and quite honestly he didn't have much to worry about anymore. The Freedom Fighters' crusade against Eggman was still an ongoing thing, but from what he'd heard things there had quieted down. Again. Sorun wasn't privy to many details since he wasn't one anymore, and he didn't particularly care enough to search those details out. They had their things going on, and he had his. Admittedly he didn't have much of anything going on these days, but maybe that was an upside. Calm and quiet had its own appeal.

Things with Nicole were... well, the exact same. To Sorun's credit he did try saying something to her every time she visited. Of course he always failed, but he felt confident he'd be able to get something out. One of these days. Most likely.

Well, at any rate things were going great.

"I guess the seasons here don't align with Earth's since we're only getting winter now. If this was still Earth it would have passed already." Sorun found himself going all the way to the park. The sight that greeted him was a small field of pure white as opposed to the green that normally greeted him whenever he came here. Nicole even went through the effort of removing the leaves off of all the trees to give it that authentic winter feel. "Few more months and it'll have been a whole year since comin' here. Crazy to think how much has changed."

From fighting robots to the death and gaining poisonous powers he stole from a video game character to this. Domestic life. Wasn't the worst fate in the world, he supposed. Didn't replace his life on Earth, but the peace was still nice. He still longed for that Chaos Emerald they held in the castle vault if only because he wanted Yamato back, but people were still adamant on keeping that from him. He scoffed every time, but conceded that their reasons valid.

It was a very begrudging concession.

He felt the slight, cold wind blowing through his hair, though he didn't lift a hand to do anything about it. More content to just stare out into the white field. And it was because of all that white Sorun was barely able to perceive the object rapidly sailing towards him. A spherical, white object that spun through the air heading right towards Sorun's chest, comprised entirely of snow. In laymen's terms, a snowball. One Sorun almost hadn't caught flying right towards him, and then tried to dodge out of the way.

Unfortunately the snowball came too fast and he ended up getting nailed in the chest regardless, resulting in him falling onto his back right into the snow. This resulted in Sorun up staring at the gray skies for a whole five seconds before he took a deep breath.

"Someone's gonna die." He rose his upper half straight upwards and stared ahead towards where he'd seen the snowball come from. The blue, spike-backed Mobian in the distance was the only sight he needed to see. "He specifically shall die."

"Ha! Gotcha, Sorun!" Sonic crowed out from the other side of the snowy field.

"Tch..." Brushing the loose snow off from his vest, Sorun slowly stood up to his feet while scooping up a handful of snow for himself. "We'll just see..." He muttered out, balling the snow in his hands as he shot an indignant glare out towards the hedgehog. Without even a word of warning he'd thrown the snowball out towards Sonic.

Aside from it not being particularly the best throw, the frozen projectile was easily dodged by Sonic, who'd sidestepped it in a burst of super speed. The irritation spreading through Sorun was magnified tenfold when he sent a cocky smirk over in Sorun's direction.

"How am I supposed to hit somebody who can run faster than sound...?"

These thoughts, and the slow realization that Sorun may have been out of his depth here, were abruptly cut off when a hail of snowballs were sent towards Sorun's way. Snowballs thrown by a hedgehog who'd gathered up the snow to form them and then throw them so fast that Sorun's eyes hadn't even been able to keep up with the movements. Movements that, to him, looked like little more than blurry shapes moving around followed by dozens of snowballs heading towards him. He may very well have been buried alive if something hadn't tackled him down to the snowy floor.

He'd actually heard the snowballs whistle overhead when he'd been thrown to the ground. When Sorun looked up, he saw a yellow body staring down at him with large, blue eyes. And for some reason he had thick, black lines drawn on his cheek fur. It only added to the confusion Sorun was feeling.

"Er, Sorun?" Tails voiced out, looking and sounding equally confused. "What are you doing in the middle of the battlefield?"

"The what? Huh?" He reached up towards Tails' face. "The heck's on your face?"

The hand was swatted away before Sorun could touch one of the lines. "Hey, quit it! You'll smear it- look out!"

Before Sorun could inquire any further he was dragged upwards by the young fox and thrown against a nearby... snow wall. A small, chest-high barrier comprised completely out of snow. The second they'd both taken cover behind it dozens of snowballs sailed overhead, with Sorun hearing some thump against the other side of the barrier they were behind.

Sorun was just about to ask what the hell was going on when he took a closer look at their surroundings. He hadn't noticed it before, since everything around them was white and made of snow, but there were all sorts of makeshift snow structures around them. Barriers for cover, bunkers, the hell, there were even trenches dug into the ground. The place really did look like a warzone.

"Jesus, how hard has it been snowing? And how the hell'd they set this all up so quick?" Sorun thought to himself as he turned to Tails. "So did I just walk into the snowbattle of the ages, or what?"

"Huh? Oh, yeah." Taking a brief moment to peek over their cover, Tails crouched back down and looked to Sorun with a smile. "We're all having a snowball fight. Hey, you wanna join in?"

Did he? If he was being honest, kind of. If only because he was off today and didn't have anything else planned. And dare Sorun say it, but it almost sounded fun. Something he was in short supply of whenever Nicole wasn't around.

"Hey, I hear you!" Sonic yelled out from the other side of the field. "Sorun can't join you! It'll make the teams uneven!"

"You have super speed, you count for five people on your own!" Sorun yelled back over the cover. The response he earned from this was another snowball flying over them. He turned back to Tails and asked, "Can I throw a snowball at Sonic's face if I join you?"

"... I guess?"

Good enough for him. "I'm in, let's go."

"Day two-hundred and eighty six. It's been a long tour here in these ice-lined trenches. The enemy continues to pelt us with mortar fire every single night. Sleep escapes me between the constant bombardment, my bunk shaking, and the constant snow debris falling on my face. Every day I fear that one snowball that will be the one to break the camel's back and collapse the trenches on top of all of us when we least expect it.

"There's no hope for any of us. All entrances and exits are cut off by enemy fire and to try and leave is folly. Amy's already been lost to the no-man's land, claimed by an icy barrage from which there could be no recovery from. The last I saw of her was when Tails was dragging her frozen form off somewhere. I fear the same fate awaits us all and that we're struggling in vain to eke out what is simply the inevitable. Moral is at an all-time low. Hope is nonexistent. I can already hear the trumpets blaring as the darkness encroaches upon us.

"This may very well be my last letter to be sent out back home. I can only hope my dearest receives my final-"

"Sorun, what are you doing?"

Sorun looked away from the message he was carving into the snow wall. Ahead of him he saw Sally giving him an odd look. Justified, maybe, considering he'd been muttering under his breath while writing on a snow wall with his finger, but he'd had important reasons for doing that. Mainly him trying to get into the mood.

The two of them were holed up in a dugout carved into the side of one of the snow trenches. Sorun still struggled to understand how they all managed to construct all of this in a mere morning just for a snowball fight, but he hadn't really cared enough to look too far into it. Too nice a distraction to detract his attention. Would have been nicer if he'd manage to fully roleplay a war-torn soldier, but Sally had to go and ruin that.

"I don't have my war games anymore, Sally. Just let me have this," Sorun said to her.

"Your war... what?" She shook her head and then ducked her body out from the square indent in the trench wall. "Whatever, come on."

"Sure." He ducked out of the dugout along with her and followed her towards the other side of the trench. "I'm surprised you're not wearing any winter clothes or anything," Sorun continued when they reached the trench wall. "Still, uh... still just going with boots and the vest and nothing else, huh?"

When Sorun looked to his left at Sally, he saw her giving him a pointed look. "Fur," was the one-worded explanation she gave him.

"You know, you use that excuse a lot." Sorun turned away from her to look up past the trench and into no-man's land. "'Why no winter stuff?' Fur. 'How come nobody wears pants?' Fur. 'How come I don't wear a shirt?' Wouldn't you know it, the answer's fur."

"Why do you always seem to fixate on me not wearing a shirt?" Sally asked him. "You don't do that with anybody else."

Well there was an awkward answer he didn't wanna give. "I'm usually too busy complaining about the pants thing," he evasively answered.

"If you say so." Sounding like she didn't altogether really understand, she looked ahead towards the seemingly-vacant battlefield along with Sorun. "I'm more surprised you're just wearing what you normally wear out here," she voiced upon seeing nothing.

"I got a new shirt."

"Yeah, but I would have expected a jacket or something."

Sorun scoffed at that. "I'm from Michigan, Sally. Place is practically a frozen wasteland during the winter. I'm used to it. Everybody there was. There were people where I'm from that went out in t-shirts and shorts during the winter." Admittedly he was one of those people on occasion, too, when he was too lazy to throw much else on. Living through one brutal winter after another had a way of making one hardy to cold weather.

"I thought you came from a place called Detroit?" When Sorun turned his head back to the left, he caught Sally giving him a questioning look. "The city you said you grew up in," she clarified.

"Yeah, Detroit was in Michigan," he explained.

Her confusion didn't go away. "But... you said that was in a place called America-"

"America was the country."

"It's not the same thing?"

"Not really." That was the problem with living in a post-post apocalyptic world. Things like states weren't even a concept. There were the countries, the settlements inside those countries, and in the rare cases of the republic they lived in or the U.F. across the ocean on the Overlander side of the world or over in Station Square, a government. For better or worse the world never seemed to grow much more complex than that. "Anyways, don't worry about it," Sorun continued. "Snowfights were a whole thing back where I'm from back when there wasn't school because half the building was buried in snow."

"Oh, really?" Sally leaned her shoulder against the trench, arms crossed and still maintaining that lighthearted, challenging look. "So what did that entail that we can use here?"

"Well, that's the problem." Sorun turned back out to the pure white no-man's land. "Nobody on the enemy opposition wears pants, nullifying my ability to snow-pants people. So that's seventy-five percent of my strategy gone right there." When he turned back to Sally she'd gone back to giving him an odd, puzzled look. "So I'll leave the strategery side of things to you."

"Stop saying strategery. It's not a word."

"Ahhhh, but think about it, Sally. It might be a word where I'm from." Sorun turned back to the white field. "You know how much stuff I can get away with by claiming it's common practice back on Earth?"

"... You haven't actually been doing that, have you?"

"No, because I just came up with the idea now and you all know me too well for me to use it effectively anymore." He could probably find some way of using that excuse and making a lie up if he really needed to, but Sorun couldn't think of any situation he could get himself into that would warrant such a lie. More than that he plain wasn't interested in putting in that kind of effort. "More to the point, what are the actual rules we're playing with here?"

There was a moment of silence before Sally responded. "What do you- we've been doing this for twenty minutes!" she shouted into his ear, making him wince in annoyance. "I thought you already had an idea!"

"And that's on you for assuming things about me, so are we using a point-based system or-" Sorun cut himself off when he saw something in the distance, near the edge of the snow-laden field they were all fighting in. "Oh, hold that thought, Sally, I just thought up something nutty ."

It was a hill. An unusually large hill of snow, practically a small mountain. Sorun couldn't even figure out how something like that managed to form in the park, but it did give him an idea. A devilish idea.

"Does the trench extend all the way to that giant hill over there?" Sorun asked.

"Thereabouts, yeah." Sally answered. "Why? What're you thinking?"

"I'm thinking a childhood of Saturday morning cartoons is about to pay off."

The Snowball Effect was a common enough metaphor that even people on Mobius used it. On Earth it was even more commonplace. But the metaphor itself had to come from somewhere, and as it happened Sorun happened to know the metaphor's origin. That is, it came from a literal snowball that rolled downhill, collecting snow and growing bigger.

Well that was pretty much Sorun's idea in essence.

"Sorun, you can't be serious."

Sally didn't have as much faith in it as he did.

"Sh-sh-sh, relax, relax, it's gonna work." Sorun waved his hand behind him at Sally, who shook her head and leaned up against the large ball of snow sitting besides her. Sorun, in turn, was looking down from the top of the hill towards the far side of the snow field, in a trench on the opposite side of the one he and Sally left. He saw them down there. The enemy. The shock of cobalt blue that was Sonic's fur and spines contrasted sharply enough with the white snow that he was easy to see. Antoine and Bunnie slightly less so, but he could still see the three of them all grouped up in that trench. Plotting. Blissfully unaware of what was about to befall them.

It'd been easy enough for Sorun and Sally to get to the top of this hill. Their yellow and pink comrades were keeping the enemy pinned by chucking snowballs at their position, giving them the opening they needed. Sally had been extremely skeptical of the concept as a whole, even as she helped Sorun roll the giant thing together. Sorun tried assuring her it was a sound plan, but even now she wasn't very convinced.

"They're all lined up like dominoes." Sorun stepped away from the edge and turned to Sally and the snowball. "Alright. Help me push this thing over."

"This is a bit extreme, isn't it?" Sally didn't budge from her spot on the snowball, and was still looking hard at Sorun's face. "This was all just supposed to be in good fun."

"Sally, if I don't walk away from this having nailed Sonic in the face with a snowball, I'll have failed as a man."

"... What does any of that have to do with what I just said?"

"It's for my own personal enjoyment." Sorun walked behind the snowball, with Sally turning her head to maintain eye contact with him. "And I mean, come on, the guy's so fast that it's literally impossible for any of us to hit him anyways. Besides. He takes missiles to the face. He'll prolly walk away from this alright."

"I'm not worried about hurting him, I just don't want this to seem underhanded- you know what, fine." She shrugged her body off the snowball and stepped to the side. "Do what you want, but I'm not helping you push the thing."

"You're really gonna rag on me about cheating?" Rolling his eyes, Sorun began pushing the snowball forwards as the chipmunk watched. "I think you're too harsh. This isn't cheating. It's... creative winning." He looked over his shoulder at her as he continued pushing. "Besides, if you really thought that you wouldn't have helped me make this thing."

Sally shook her head. "I didn't say it was cheating. I just don't like playing dirty."

"Even against a guy fast enough to dodge bullets , let alone a snowball?"

"Yes, because it's Sonic . It's a game , Sorun."

"Yeah. And I win games." The snowball was pushed to the edge of the hill. Sorun halted it right there, and then turned around, crossed his arms, and leaned his back against it to face Sally. "Little fact about Earthlings, Sally. Nobody over there ever had enhanced physical abilities or overly-advanced technology or Chaos powers. When it comes to che- creative winning I'm not special in that regard. Everybody does it. Why do you have to get on my case about it?" He knew Sally had an overly large honor bone on her, most Mobians did, but hers was especially apparent. Sorun didn't know if it was because she was a literal princess or if that was just how she was. Both, probably. And while he could appreciate that, he appreciated winning more.

Honestly, it was the same reason she never let him use a gun, negative symbolism aside. He understood the reason behind it, and in the end Summoned Swords and the other powers had negated their need anyways. And he supposed it was an endearing quality of hers, in some respect.

"And yet," Sally said as a challenging smirk began forming on her lips, "never once do you ever cheat when you play your games with Nicole."

"That's different," Sorun defended, quickly finding his eyes darting away from the Mobian in front of him. "Those are fair games. The fairness is what makes it fun. Fighting Sonic isn't fair." His eyes narrowed as the grip on his elbows tightened. "It's never fair with him."

He hadn't played it fair when he challenged Sorun to that foot race.

"I don't think you're giving him enough credit," Sally said. "Speaking of which, how have you and Nicole been doing?"

"... Fine?" With genuine confusion written over his face, Sorun looked back up towards Sally. "Why are you- oops."

When he'd looked up Sorun had inadvertently leaned back a bit harder on his shoulder. This had the effect of nudging the snowball just enough over the hill's edge to tip it over. It rolled over with barely a sound reaching Sorun's ears as both he and Sally approached the edge to watch it roll down. At one point Sally had affixed Sorun with a deadpan stare, though the human remained looking completely unapologetic as he watched the snowball roll downhill.

Predictably, the snowball rapidly began to increase in size as it rolled further and further down the hill. From where Sorun was standing it was quite obvious, even from the large distance separating them, that Antoine and Bunnie saw the snowball approaching them. Sorun had snickered out loud at realizing he could see their eyes from here due to how wide they'd opened them. Sonic so far hadn't seen it coming, as his back was turned to the snowball. To further Sorun's amusement Bunnie had grabbed Antoine and then extended her mechanical legs far enough that she'd simply walked the two of them out of danger.

As the snowball neared, Sorun took delight in seeing that Sonic's back was still turned to the snowball. He seemed to watch the panicked couple depart out of confusion, and by then he'd either had the sense to turn around or just plainly heard the snowball rolling towards him. He'd turned around right when the snowball was mere inches away from hitting him, and by then Sorun had figured it was all but certain he'd be hit.

Except it wasn't. The moment Sonic saw the snowball his form was replaced by a blue speed line in his place. The snowball rolled past his previous position and sunk right into the trench he'd occupied previously, collapsing the structure entirely. Sorun felt his arms go limp and his back hunch forwards as he stared at the wreck and the noticeable lack of a buried hedgehog, while Sally seemed nonplussed at the whole situation.

"Wow, kinda a low blow, don't you think, Sorun?" Sonic's voice came at the same time Sorun heard him stop besides him. He looked to his left to see the Mobian standing next to him, all smug and smiling as he looked at the human from the sides of his eyes. "I'll grant you that it was a neat trick, but c'mon. You really thought you'd hit me with that?" He closed his eyes and had the gall to turn his nose up at Sorun. "Doesn't matter how big you make it. I'm just too fast-"

A snowball impacted Sonic in the face mid-sentence. He spluttered out in surprise and fell onto his backside, right into the snow. He shook the loose, white material off from his face, and glared up at Sorun who was tossing a second snowball up and down in his hand.

"Yeah, all that speed doesn't do you much good when your eyes are closed, huh?" the human snidely asked. "My actual plan was for you to dodge the snowball so you'd drop your guard while gloating in front of me."

Sonic's eyes narrowed disbelievingly at Sorun. "Was it really?"

"Pfft. Not a chance. You think I'm good enough a planner to think that far ahead?" He tossed the second snowball at Sonic. Predictably, he'd dodged and stood back up to his full height before the snowball even hit the ground. "We still technically win since I destroyed your entrenchment, though."

"That's not really how it works," Sonic grumbled as he looked to the side and downwards, towards the collapsed trench. "But yeah, you got a point. Don't really feel like digging that thing out again, so I'll call it here." He turned back to Sorun and Sally. "So what do you guys wanna do now?"

"..." Sorun and Sally turned their heads at each other. Sorun shrugged, causing Sally to roll her eyes and turn back to Sonic. "How about..."

"My greatest work yet. A masterpiece. Utterly stunning."

Words simply weren't enough to describe what laid before Sorun. A creation of his own making. Practically a wonder of the world in its construction, in its magnificence. He nearly shed a tear looking at the sculpture that sat in front of him. Or it may have been the sunlight reflecting off all the white around him.

It was a snow sculpture that stood just a head shorter than himself. A cylindrical body with a perfectly spherical head. Two large circles were carved into the head by his finger to simulate eyes, with no other features being added. Twin sticks were implanted into it for arms.

As far as Sorun was concerned it was a thing of beauty only one other thing in this world could compare to, but she wasn't around right now so he'd have to settle for admiring this.

"Hey, Sorun, you finished...?" The question trailed off as Sorun heard a crunching set of footsteps stop next to him. He turned around to see Sonic stopped next to Sorun, mouth frozen open in confusion as he gazed at the marvelous sculpture in near Sorun. "The heck is that?" he asked.

Sorun nearly bristled at the sign of disrespect. "It's a snow replica of a stubby machine from 'Automata'," Sorun answered.

"... Half of those words mean nothing to me."

"It was a game lauded for its creative gameplay mechanics and thought-provoking narrative. One of the best in its generation," Sorun succinctly answered, just a bit of pride detected in his voice. "And some very 'thought provoking' androids with very 'thought provoking' features."

"Ahh, I'm beginning to see." Sonic crossed his arms, a lopsided smirk on his mouth when he caught Sorun's meaning. "You know, I'm really starting to think you have a thing for robots, Sorun."

"What, just because one of my favorite games was full of hot android women? Blame the creator. Guy had weird taste." Sorun turned his head to the snow-stubby. "I mean, great taste, but weird, too," he continued. "Then again Yoko Taro always had- and I just realized he's dead, too, goddammit."

"Ah-huh. Suuuure..." The smirk Sonic had grew. "That's totally the reason."

Frowning, Sorun turned to Sonic, saying, "I don't know what you're insinuating, but you'd have to see 2B to know what I'm talking about, Sonic. Then you'd understand."

Scoffing, Sonic nodded his head to the snow-stubby. "If she looks anything like the ball-on-a-can you made, then I think I'll pass."

"It's art , you philistine," Sorun hissed out.

"It's lazy!" Sonic argued. He uncrossed his arms and stomped towards the snow-stubby as a very heated Sorun watched from the side. "It's a snow man competition, Sorun, not a... snowcan!"

"Alright, Michelangelo, then what's your big art piece?" At Sorun's question Sonic pointed his whole arm out to the side, towards the center of the snowfield. Sorun followed the arm's direction, seeing the others nearby working on their own snowmen. Some... very basic and bog standard-looking snowmen, three balls for a body and everything. He noted there was one snowman that was radically different, and then found himself wincing when he realized it was a replica of Sonic. Right down to the spines on the back of its head. "Very narcissistic of you, Sonic."

"Huh?" Sonic turned around and squinted towards where Sorun was looking. "Oh, no, that's Amy's."

"Oh." Should have figured that one, Sorun had felt. "Then yours is... the plainest-looking snowman I've ever seen right next to it?"

Somehow it looked even more ordinary than the ones the rest were making. Even worse was that Sonic only put in enough effort that it had two snowballs for a body. Barbarian hadn't even given it arms. Or a face.

"It's a work in progress," Sonic claimed. "And anyway, I gotta get back to it. Good luck with this thing."

Sorun huffed and crossed his arms as he heard Sonic stomp away and back towards that inferior thing he called a snowman. So what if his looked so simplistic? It had character. As far as Sorun was concerned that's all that really mattered, and at least he decided to do something different as opposed to stacking oversized snowballs on top of one-another.

"Erm... hello, Sorun. What is that supposed to be?"

"Urk!" Sorun heavily flinched and felt his anger begin to rapidly drain when he heard the familiar voice speak out to him. When he looked back, he saw Nicole standing behind him. There were hints of green lights around her that were rapidly fading away, a sign of her just now teleporting to his position, though her focus was mainly on the snow-stubby besides Sorun. "It's, um... contemporary art," he provided.

"I see..." She didn't look overly convinced, making Sorun's heart sink a bit. "It's... shapely. Both the body and head." She turned to him, and there was no hiding Sorun's despair when he saw the obviously forced smile. "I assume the correct word to use here is 'cute'?"

If it were anybody else he would have snapped at them for being so patronizing. But it was Nicole, so instead he just sighed out loudly and swiped his hand to the side. The spherical head fell off from the cylindrical body and collided with the ground, destroying the head completely and rending it little more than cold, white fluff.

And thus the world grew that much dimmer.

"It was more a placeholder for a larger project idea," Sorun lied as he turned back to Nicole. "What brings you here?"

"Ah, right." The lynx turned to the side a bit, towards where the others and their snowmen were. "The new year is coming up, and the others usually gather to celebrate the occasion at this time of year. It's a holiday of sorts. Since things with the Freedom Fighters has been incredibly hectic and this was the only predictable time they all had to spend in the city they decided to celebrate earlier this year than normal." She turned back to Sorun, smiling a bit. "I suspect they somewhat lost track of time. Sally told me to remind them all in case such a thing happened."

"Oh. Early New Year's party, huh?" As far as holidays went that was probably the first one Sorun had even heard of. He didn't know what Mobian holidays were like. Or even what they were to begin with. He doubted things like Christmas managed to survive the literal apocalypse that engulfed the world thousands of years ago. Maybe it survived in Station Square, and maybe it was something the Overlanders still had. He doubted Mobians had an equivalent. Or maybe this was the equivalent for them.

Well, it sounded nice enough. Sucked that they had to do it early since this was the only foreseeable "day off" they all had, but he could understand the logic. Couldn't fault them for working around their responsibilities.

"Yeah, Sally wanted to do a snowman building contest. I think at this point it's less a competition and more them just making whatever they want for the fun of it." Which is what he'd been doing until it was revealed to him nobody here had real taste in art. Ignorant savages. "I kind of lost the motivation to continue when some people , Sonic, I mean Sonic, couldn't appreciate the finer things."

"Fine. Yes. Of course." Nicole's green eyes had glanced down at the destroyed stubby head, and then looked back up at Sorun. "Well, perhaps I could join in. I still owe you that statue, do I not?"

For reasons other than the cold Sorun's face began to redden. "Huh-what?"

"It would only take me a few moments with the nanites." Even as she began to talk swirls of snow mixed in with green light began to swirl around her open palm. "It wouldn't be too difficult at all to make a perfect replica-"

"Ababa! It's fine!" Sorun shouted out, holding his palms up to Nicole. He really had been kidding back then with the statue; he wasn't nearly vain enough to have such a thing made in his image. He'd be too embarrassed. Especially if Nicole made it and people saw. "I really don't need... oh."

She made the statue. Granted it was only a few inches tall and easily fit into her palm, but a miniature statue was still a statue. A little mini-Sorun made of snow and standing on a pedestal also made of snow.

Sorun found himself laughing out in relief and the sight of it, glad it wasn't something as noticeable as a ten-meter statue or something ridiculous.

And it was a pretty good-looking statue, too.

"I believe this is sufficient," Nicole said, gently handing off the statue to Sorun. "I would have made something bigger, but I know you're somewhat sensitive to such things and didn't want to cause any embarrassment on your part."

"T-that's not true," Sorun denied, eyes darting down to the statue in his hand. Even though it had only been in his gloved hand for a few moments it was already beginning to deform. "It'll only last a few minutes before melting."

"Yes, well, most things in life are temporary." After speaking, Nicole looked back down at her hand. There was some leftover snow on her palm from the quickly-melting statue she'd made. "It's... cold," she observed.

Sorun looked up from the statue. "The snow?" He saw her staring at the snow on her hand, causing him to blink. "Yeah, it's... it's snow. Cold is kind of its defining feature."

"I realize this." She grasped the loose snow and began rolling it between her fingers. It spilled out between her fingers, causing her to shake the remaining material off. "It's been somewhat of a chore ensuring the city isn't too overburdened with snow. There's automatic measures in place I created to prevent flooding and the like, but the winter weather is providing its own challenge. I have to continually de-ice the sidewalks to ensure nobody falls on accident."

"Oh, right. I guess this would be your first winter without being stuck in that box, huh?" Sorun realized. He bent down and scooped up a handful of snow, rolled it into a snowball, and tossed it to Nicole. "You don't sound too impressed."

Nicole shook her head as she caught the snowball. "I wouldn't go so far as to say that," she denied, looking down and examining the snowball. She ran her hand over the ball to feel its texture, though she'd evidently pressed down too hard as the snowball completely crumbled in her hands. "The sensation of cold is a unique feeling," she admitted, "but I prefer nanites to snow. They're easier to shape and mold and don't melt. Still, though..."

She looked off to the side, towards the snow-covered field. The even blanket of white covering the ground and the artificial trees scattered around. Her smile broadened at the sight of it, after which she turned back to Sorun.

"... It's rather pretty to look at," she finished. While Sorun had gotten lost staring at her smile, Nicole's eyes had turned back to the headless snow-stubby next to him. And then the smile instantly dropped when she saw the sticks it had for arms. "Sorun. Did you snap branches off of the artificial trees to make those arms?"

The statue in Sorun's hand chose that time to fall off its pedestal and into the snow. At the same time Sorun had nervously gulped and darted his eyes away from Nicole when she sent him an accusing glare. "No," he lied.

"Sorun, I have to manually reattach those. They don't grow like organic trees."

"Oh, come on, it's two branches," he whined out. "It can't be that much of a bother."

Worryingly, her glare hardened. "Yes, because I have so many other pertinent matters to deal with. Between continually de-icing the ground to keep the populace safe to maintaining the city's systems and keeping an eye on meteorological reports to properly prepare the city in the event of potential storms. What's repairing trees you vandalized added to the list of tasks I must perform, Sorun?"

If it wasn't for the shame he felt Sorun would have been impressed with how admonishing Nicole sounded. There wasn't a hint of sarcasm to be found in her voice. And yet, somehow, he still felt like he'd been yelled at by his mother for doing something bad. Only somehow it felt worse. "I... I'm sorry?"

"We're all meeting at Antoine and Bunnie's domicile. Please be present with everyone else." Nicole turned her back to Sorun while the human began blinking rapidly in surprise. "I'm going to inform the others now."

With that, she'd teleported a short distance away to the others. Sorun visibly deflated at her departing words, and then made a sad, frustrated sigh as he pocketed his hands and turned around himself. Right in front of him laid the headless snow-stubby he'd been so proud of minutes prior.

He made a small grunt and gave it a solid kick, reducing the thing to powder in nearly an instant. The snow-stubby was already nearly forgotten by the time Sorun left the pile behind to depart the park. The memory of Nicole scolding him was less-easily forgotten.

The nice thing about hanging around in somebody else's house was that he didn't have to clean up after people. Granted, whenever people did visit his house they were often very good about not leaving a mess.

Except for the dishes. Nobody ever did those.

But here in Antoine's house it was nice for Sorun to relax and not have to worry about doing a chore because of somebody else for once. It also gave him a scope for how barren his house was compared to Antoine's, 'cause he and Bunnie decorated the house so much Sorun didn't even know if there was any house beneath it all. Lots of furniture, rugs and carpets, ornamental knickknacks and photos, tables. Creative-looking throw pillows. A plant!

And then there was Sorun's place, which was probably the most dismal house in the whole city now that he thought about it. He figured maybe he should do something about that one day. Maybe. If he ever felt like it. Sometime this year. Or next year, technically.

Then again, with all these decorations it was rather cramped accommodations, especially for eight people as opposed to the normal two. And then Rotor had come to celebrate with everyone as well, and with his size he practically counted for two and a half people.

Wasn't a lot of room for noise to travel, either, so the whole house was full of the talking and laughter of everyone present. Enough white noise that in another life Sorun probably would have been irritated at it all, but in this setting, with these people, it was different. Comforting, in a way. Much like the cup of hot chocolate he had in his hand.

"Rotor, my first ever experience with hot chocolate isn't for the faint of heart," Sorun had warned the purple Mobian sitting next to him on Antoine's couch as he swirled the mug around in his hands. "It's a daring story that leaves lesser men weak in the knees."

The walrus looked more exhausted than excited. "Why can't you just be normal, man? I asked how you were doing and now you're about to go on a rant on how hot chocolate traumatized you as a kid."

"It wasn't that serious," Sorun rebuked, looking up into the walrus' eyes. He noted how tired and baggy they seemed. "Politics really seem to be wearing you down," he noted.

"Eh, it ain't that bad," he denied. "Long hours of sitting in the same chair. I fully recommend it."

"... Can't tell if you're being serious." Sorun looked back down into the cup. "Anyways, when I was a kid I figured hot chocolate was literal chocolate melted in a liquid form, not, you know, cocoa powder mixed with water and milk and stuff. I mean, come on, it was in the name. So I took a bunch of chocolate bars, broke them up, put them in a mug and threw it into the microwave. Set it on full blast thinking I'd get a cup of melted chocolate so I could see what all the fuss was about." His expression darkened. "What I got was a charred rock of burnt chocolate surrounded by a pool of molten chocolate. I didn't even know you could burn chocolate until that day. Suffice it to say I was kind of turned off on the whole idea of hot chocolate ever since then." He took a drink of the hot chocolate. "But this is alright."

"Wow, Sorun, that's... that's something." Sounding half-asleep, Rotor turned his head off towards further into the living room, where he saw Sally and Tails talking about something. "Nice catching up with you and all, but I'm gonna go socialize with the others."

"Alright, man. Take care." At the same time he felt the couch decompress Sorun looked down into the cup of dark liquid in his hand. "I seriously gotta ask what Antoine puts in this stuff to make it so good. Guy's, like, some kinda chef savant."

When he felt the couch compress next to him again as somebody sat down next to him, he didn't even need to look up from his cup to see who it was. Mostly because he saw hints of the purple wrapping dress Nicole always wore. He waited a few moments for her to say something, but when no sound came out he decided to start speaking.

"So how are you finding things?" he asked, looking up and to the left at her. She looked happy enough, which made Sorun happy. And he figured that warranted another celebratory drink of the hot chocolate.

"Things are fine," she answered him. "You don't seem to be enjoying yourself as much, though."

Was that how it looked? "Nah, I am. Just, you know, on the inside," he assured her. "Christmas was never really my thing. Or, uh, Christmas-equivalent. Or whatever this is."

"I... am unfamiliar with the term." Nicole tilted her head a bit to the side. "Is this a holiday from your zone?"

"Mhm, yeah. It was, um... hm..."

How was he supposed to go about explaining Christmas? A time-honored tradition celebrating love, friendship, and family through the act of meaningful gifts and lots of food. Sorun didn't really know how to go about explaining that. Hell, he didn't even know the history of Christmas. Or why it was even called Christmas. He felt like something in the name should have made it a bit obvious, but he couldn't quite put his finger on what it was.

"... Eh, it was a holiday everybody used as an excuse to get free stuff," he settled on, taking another drink. "Lots of get-togethers and celebrating and Christmas specials about Santa Claus."

"Santa Claus?"

"An evil and vile man who would commit millions of acts of home intrusion once a night every year."

"That's appalling!" Nicole exclaimed. "And... also statistically impossible. How did he accomplish such a feat?"

"Time manipulation? I dunno." Sorun shrugged. "But nah, he'd break into people's homes to leave gifts for good children. Unless you were bad." Sorun's face soured and he turned his face away from Nicole. "Guess I was never 'good enough', 'cause he never visited me. My mom tried getting gifts every Christmas claiming they were from Santa, but I knew. I always knew." Fat bastard didn't even have the decency to leave Sorun any coal. Like he wasn't even worth visiting.

Well, now he was in another world and sacrificed his life sort-of to help save said world, so who was the good boy now?

"Ah, I... believe I see." When Sorun looked back at Nicole he saw that her smile was just a tad bit more forced. "How long did you say this Mr. Claus was running this strange business?"

Sorun shrugged. "Few hundred years or somethin', I dunno. Long time." He took another drink. "He's prolly dead now like everyone else over there."

The smile became significantly more forced while Nicole reached over to give Sorun a few comforting pats on his shoulder. "Were there any other holiday traditions your people celebrated?" she asked.

Looking up in thought, Sorun answered with, "Not really. Everybody kind of did their own thing. There was this one thing called Secret Santa I heard about and wanted to do, but I was never able to get enough people to do it properly."

Nicole smile grew much more genuine as interest flashed in her eyes. "And what did this entail?"

"You got a group of friends together and wrote your names down on a bunch of paper things. You put the names in a hat to jumble them up and everybody picks out a random name. Whoever's name you picked you have to get a gift, and nobody knows who's getting what from who until everybody gathers back around to give each other the gifts." He took another drink of the hot chocolate. "Always sounded fun, but like I said, was never able to get enough people to do it proper."

He didn't get a response from Nicole. What he did get was the lynx thoughtfully looking at him before getting up off of and leaving the couch to go talk with Sally, based on how she was heading directly towards her. Sorun had thought it a bit strange, her leaving without a word like that, but then shrugged it off and looked back down into his cup.

To his dismay, he found that it was empty.

"Mh." Frowning a bit, he reached over and placed the empty mug down on the lamp table next to the couch. On top of the cloth coaster Antoine had very heavily insisted they use so they didn't "ruin the furniture". An explanation that caused Bunnie visible exhaustion throughout the entire discussion. Sorun also couldn't have helped but notice it was mostly directed towards Sonic.

Well, he'd asked nicely, so Sorun had gone out of his way to get a coaster.

Even so, it was a very relaxing environment Sorun found himself in. Overly relaxing, even, because he was starting to feel drowsy from it all. Surrounded by friends he implicitly trusted. Their voices going through the air. The strange warmth of it all mixed with the actual warmth from the heating system. It was nice. Cozy. Sorun liked it.

He didn't know when he'd accidentally dozed off, just that he found it much easier than he likely should have. The overwhelming amount of comfort and safety he felt was likely a contributing factor. He didn't mind too much in the end, even if it did mean a little less time socializing with the others. It was still a nice feeling regardless until somebody decided to shake him awake.

"Sorun... Sorun?"

"Mhf? Huh?" The feeling of somebody gently rocking his shoulder had been what woke him up. He'd been forced to blink his eyes a few times to clear out the blurriness, after which he saw Sally standing in front of him. And she had an upturned hat in her hand for some reason. "Ah, sorry, I wasn't out for long, was I?" Sorun mumbled out as he sat up straighter in the couch.

Fortunately, Sally shook her head. "No, only a few minutes," she answered. "So... you want in on this?"

"In on what?" When his vision cleared further, Sorun looked past Sally's shoulder. Oddly enough he saw that everyone with the exception of her and himself were sitting in a circle on the floor, all looking towards the two of them. He blinked at the sight, and then focused back on Sally. "Wha's goin' on?"

"Well... it was Nicole's idea," Sally explained. "She said you had this funny Earth custom for the holidays and wanted to help you feel more included since it's your first New Year's here. And it sounded fun, so we decided to go with it."

"O-oh. Really?" He glanced past Sally's shoulder again, and caught Nicole staring right at him from the circle of Mobians she was sitting around with. The faintest hint of red dusted against his face as he averted his eyes from both her and Sally. "That was nice of you all," Sorun mumbled out. "You really didn't have to-"

"Oh, it's nothing! It sounded really fun actually!" Sally assured him. "In fact, Sonic overheard the idea and wanted to do it just because it sounded interesting."

The statement surprised Sorun somewhat, and when he glanced back at the circle, he caught the blue hedgehog giving him a thumbs-up and a smile from where he sat. Sorun blinked a bit in surprise as a response, and then quickly rose up out of the couch.

"Alright, alright. I'm in. Kind of obligated to since it was my idea anyways," Sorun muttered as he approached the circle. Despite how he sounded, mostly due to embarrassment, he actually was a bit excited. He'd been genuine when he'd told Nicole he'd always wanted to do something like this but never had the opportunity to, even back on Earth. It was nice of them to do something like this for him.

When he finally made it to the circle, he saw that Sally had beat him and taken the only vacant spot next to Nicole. He huffed out a bit and sat across from them, in the empty space right next to Sonic, who for some reason wouldn't quit grinning. "Why didn't you tell us your zone had fun holiday stuff like this, Sorun?" he asked as the human sat down next to him. "Every year it's the same gift-giving shtick."

"It's nice to know you think getting friends presents is getting old," Rotor sarcastically called out from the side of the circle.

"Hey, I didn't mean it like that," Sonic denied, holding up his palms in defense. "It's a fresh idea, that's all I'm sayin'."

"Sure, Sonic." This came from Sally, who'd rolled her eyes while holding out the hat to Sorun. The black-haired human had already written his name out on a paper slip provided to him by Antoine, who was sitting on Sorun's other side. He'd deposited it in the hat, prompting Sally to pull it back to herself and look down into it. "Well, that's everyone's names," she announced. "So we just pull out a random name and get that person a gift, right, Sorun?"

"Mhm, yeah," he confirmed with a nod. "And it's important you keep it secret 'til we give the gifts. That's what makes it a 'Secret' Santa."

"Huh. Alright, seems simple enough." Sally reached into the bag and pulled out a name. She regarded it for a few seconds, and then passed off the hat to the person next to her without showing much reaction. Amy's reaction to her name hadn't been nearly as subdued as Sally's seeing as she'd made an outraged cry and continued to sulk even after the hat was passed along.

"Who's name she'd get to make her react like that?" Sorun wondered.

Sonic snorted. "Can tell ya who's name she didn't get." He nudged Sorun with his elbow. "Hey, you're up."

And so he was. The hat had been passed to Sorun with around half of the names still inside of it. He'd pursed his lips and looked up while his hand rifled around inside of the hat.

"C'mon, c'mon, c'mon..." There was really only one name he was hoping to pull. He needed some surreptitious way of providing Nicole with a gift without seeming too obvious, and this presented him the perfect opportunity. Odds weren't the greatest, but considering everything else he'd pulled off in life, this seemed far easier. "And," his thoughts continued as he pulled up a name, "we got..."

Antoine

"God fucking dammit." With a look that could have killed he less handed off and more thrusted the hat into Sonic's midsection. Based on the amusement on the hedgehog's face he seemed to catch Sorun's dissatisfaction. "Ugh, he's one of those people that writes in a font so fancy you can barely even read it," Sorun observed as he stared down at the name. "Well, whatever, roll the dice and come up snake eyes. Or whatever the saying is."

Disappointing, immensely so, but he'd follow the rules and get him a gift. To not do so would ruin the whole fun of the game, and he wasn't about to tarnish a game of his own design technically. His standards were too high to do such a thing.

"So do you guys want to come back tomorrow for this?" Sally's voice drew back Sorun's attention, causing him to look up. The hat finally got passed to Nicole, who'd gotten the last name. She must have liked her name, too, from the way her ears were standing straight up, Sorun had saw. "Give us all a day to get something together for anyone?"

"If we're gonna do that, can we go a bit early?" Tails asked. "My parents wanted to do a special dinner tomorrow to celebrate the new year," he explained.

"Yeah, same here," Sonic said.

"Sure, I don't see why not. Now..."

"Wonder what I'm supposed to get him?" Sorun thought to himself, the surrounding conversations mainly being tuned out from his ears as he stared down at the name. "Something that appeals to something he likes, I guess. So what does he like? Swords? Can't get him that. Cooking? I feel like a guy as good at food as him already has everything he could ever need, and I don't know where I'd ever get some kinda rare, exotic spice or something like that. Or even if I could afford it." He made a hum as he pocketed the paper slip. "He loves his wife, but I dunno what- wait. Oh-ho-ho, yeah, that's perfect. And I know just the girl to make it."

A small smirk formed across Sorun's face as the perfect idea came to him. Maybe the holiday wasn't ruined after all.

"I'd just like to put it out there that this thing is an abomination."

The passive insult flew right over Sorun's head, who was lying on a table with one leg over the other, hands behind his head as he looked up at the ceiling. He'd lazily turned his head to the side, where he saw a yellow cat in a red dress hard at work at a sewing machine.

"I can't believe you'd go and insult some of your own work like that," he said. "I'm shocked."

"It's because I'm making it it's as good as an abomination," Honey shot back. "Honesty, I don't know what possessed you to give someone a gift like this. It's more a weapon than a gift."

"Hmph. And where's your gift to me, huh?" Sorun asked her, head facing back towards the ceiling. "I thought this was a festive time."

"Your gift is me putting a priority on this stupid thing in front of all my other clients." There was a hint of ire in Honey's voice. "You know how busy I am this time of year?"

"Well, no, mostly because I would have thought this was your first year after becoming a world-wide name." There was a small, indignant growl from Honey, prompting Sorun to continue. "'Sides, I'm paying you for this, aren't I?"

"You're so lucky I let you keep that discount." The sewing machine quieted down, and then turned off completely. Sorun sat up at the sound and swung his legs off the table as Honey approached him, holding out the thing she just made like it was some kind of contagious biohazard. "Here, take it before I throw up and give it character."

Rolling his eyes, Sorun took the item and held it up to examine it. He nodded in satisfaction, and then proceeded to fold it up. "You're the best, Honey," he said. "So, uh, 'bout my gift-"

"You can let me watch in amusement as you fail to giftwrap that sorry excuse for a gift and we'll call it even."

The folding was interrupted midway as Sorun clenched his hands reflexively. "I tape your boxes shut, don't I?" he asked, voice a bit slower and more cautious. "I could be great at wrapping gifts and you'd never know it."

A large, cheshire grin, the grin Honey always wore when she knew she was right about something, grew on her face. "So are you?"

At hearing that, Sorun sighed. Sighed knowing she was, in fact, right and he couldn't wrap a gift to save his life since he'd never done such a thing before. And after trying to prove it to her he could and failing miserably he'd have to ask her for help. Which, he supposed, was its own reward. For her. "You plan this in advance or was it just a spur-of-the-moment thing?"

"I wasn't gonna 'til you had the cheek to ask me for a gift." She sauntered past Sorun, her tail brushing over his face in the process. He sputtered out and swatted it aside, eliciting a small giggle from the cat. "Alright, hurry up. I wanna see you fail miserably at this and then overcharge you for wrapping paper."

Sorun had to really wonder to himself if it was really worth going so far just for a gift.

The next day

Well, in the end it turned out Sorun's Secret Santa idea had gone, all things considered, extremely well. There'd been a lot of light laughter and happy surprises throughout the entire thing, enough that everybody seemed to enjoy themselves. Even Sorun, oddly enough, had felt happy over the sight.

It was enough to make him forget his disappointment over not having pulled Nicole's name so he had a solid excuse to give her a gift.

Tails and Rotor had drawn each other's names and had made some technical doodads Sorun wasn't able to identify. Sonic, the lucky bastard who'd drawn Nicole's name, hadn't known what to give her and instead offered a service of using the friction of his super speed to de-ice the sidewalks for the next month to give her a break from doing it. She'd been grateful for the offer, and Sorun silently figured it was nice enough to pass. Amy'd gotten Sally's name and made her a batch of cookies, Antoine had gotten Amy and had given her a book of some sorts that she'd seem appreciative over when she'd read the cover, and Bunnie had went and knit Sonic socks.

He at least tried to appear appreciative over the socks.

"Boy, uh... yeah, these are great!" In Sonic's defense he sounded genuine, but he'd failed to pull it together in that the smile he wore as he held up the blue socks stylized to look somewhat like him looked marginally fake. Sorun, who sat besides Sonic as everyone chose to sit in the same places in the circle as the day before, couldn't find himself blaming the hedgehog too much on the gift.

When Bunnie shot Sonic a small glare, Sorun had felt a bit of sympathy go through him at Sonic's expense. "Sugah-hog, ya don't seem very appreciative. Why, it's almost as if-"

"Whaaa!? Nah, no way, this is the most genuine I've been in my entire life!" Sonic denied, the thing that was supposed to be a smile growing brighter as he held the socks up. "I'm gonna put 'em on first thing in the morning tomorrow! Promise!"

"Knowing you they're just gonna end up being lost under your bed like the rest of your socks," Sorun said, drawing Sonic's glare towards him. "What? Am I wrong?"

"I'll have you know that my mom's really been on my case about leaving clothes around everywhere 'cause someone that bunked with me for a few months had to go and set an example of cleanliness." Sonic turned away from Sorun and began rolling his new socks up. "My home life's ruined 'cause of you."

"Yes, I showed you the world of clean rooms. What a monster I am," Sorun deadpanned. There were grins and snickers from the others all around, making Sonic's shoulders sag and his small ears flatten against his head. "Well, in any event, I think mine's next."

Everybody turned towards him in interest as Sorun pulled out the thin box wrapped in pink gift paper that'd been sitting at his side. He held it up to examine it for a moment, and then looked to Antoine, who blinked in surprise. For some odd reason Sally seemed even more surprised than Antoine, which Sorun caught as he handed the coyote the gift.

"What's with that look? There's only two people left. It was a fifty-fifty chance of who it was," Sorun said to the chipmunk after giving Antoine the box.

"Yeah, but, you... you made it pink," Sally said. "I sort of figured... eh, never mind."

There was significant confusion on Sorun's part as he failed to catch her meaning. "You figured what?" He'd only gotten pink because it'd been the cheapest wrapping paper Honey had at the time. Even then he was sure she gouged him for it just for giggles.

"It's nothing." Quickly clearing her throat, Sally quickly gained her composure and turned to Antoine. "So! Antoine, what did Sorun get you?"

"We are discovering zis very mystery at ze moment..." Antoine mumbled out as he began... he wasn't tearing into it at all, he was carefully removing the tape and unfolding the paper wrapping the gift. "Mon dieu, Sorun, zis style of wrapping iz superb! I had no idea you possessed such talent in ze field!"

"Uh... yeah, totally." Sorun was too mystified by the act of how Antoine unwrapped gifts to even try and sound genuine. Fortunately, the coyote was too distracted by the gift he'd just opened to pay attention. "What kind of psychopath opens a gift like that?"

With the wrapping paper and box carefully set aside in such a meticulous manner that Sorun felt sick seeing it, Antoine held up the gift he'd been given to examine. He seemed incredibly puzzled by it at first, and then turned it over to the other side. "What..." he asked, "iz it excacataly?"

On the surface, it looked little more than a pink sweater. The names "Antoine" and "Bunnie" were skillfully sewn into the sweater overtop one another, with a white, silk-sewn heart separating the two names. The sweater itself, however, was far wider than Antoine was, and even more bizarrely there were two neck holes on top of the sweater.

"It's a two-person sweater," Sorun explained upon seeing Antoine's befuddlement. "It's designed so that both you and Bunnie can wear it. At the same time." He shrugged. "I dunno, seemed like a good gift to get a couple."

He knew it was supposed to technically be an Antoine gift and not a Antoine-plus-Bunnie gift, but at that point Sorun felt it was nitpicking and didn't matter all that much. Besides, horrible-looking sweaters were a tradition where he was from. It only seemed fitting he get Antoine one, especially since he'd had no other ideas at the time.

Utter genius, as far as Sorun was concerned.

"Aw, it's adorable!" Bunnie's reaction towards the sweater compared to Antoine's initial reaction was night and day. She'd snatched the sweater right out of her husband's hands as was positively gushing at it, to the point that Sorun practically saw hearts in the rabbit's eyes. "Look, hon! It's somethin' we can both wear on those nights when yer complainin' it's too cold or some nonsense like that!"

Antoine wasn't even looking towards his wife or the sweater, intent instead on giving Sorun a strange look. A what-have-you-done-to-me look that Sorun was somewhat acquainted with, but still found some amusement in it regardless. In some ways it made it worth all the hassles Sorun went through to get the thing.

"Oui, eet iz... a very magnifique gift," Antoine ground out.

"You sound about as enthusiastic as Sonic did about the socks," Sorun noted with a raised eyebrow.

"I am certainly not holding any ill will for you at ze moment for what you have done, Sorun."

Bunnie tore her attention away from the sweater to frown at her husband. "Hush, you." She lightly swatted him behind his head, making him wince slightly and hold the spot his wife hit. Meanwhile, Bunnie turned her head to Sorun. "He don't mean what he said, Sorun. It's a lovely gift." She rather harshly elbowed Antoine's midsection. " Ain't it , darlin'?"

"Would you quit assaulting moi!?" After clearing his throat with one hand while nursing his sore side with the other, Antoine took a deep breath before saying to Sorun, "Oui. Eet iz. Merci, mon ami."

"I'm really not feeling the love here." Despite his feelings Sorun chose not to say this, figuring the satisfaction of seeing the entire exchange was more than worth it. "Well," he announced, clapping his hands together, "that does it for everyone, right?"

"Actually, there's one more gift to give." Sorun's head snapped to the person sitting completely opposite of him in the circle when he heard the person's voice. Nicole's voice, to be specific. And she was staring directly at Sorun. "I believe, seeing as I'm last, that it's fairly obvious whose gift this is."

Just to make sure, Sorun began to mentally count off names in his head while simultaneously looking down to finger-count off his hands. In a short amount of time he'd come to a startling conclusion, and then just to make sure he'd restarted the count to make sure he hadn't made a mistake. He only made it through halfway the second count before Sonic cleared his throat.

"Uh, Sorun, buddy?" he called out. "You're the only one who hasn't gotten something, dude, come on."

"... Right. Of course." Clearing his throat, Sorun looked up from his hands. Nicole was already holding a box out towards him. It was wrapped in paper colored with green and purple stripes. "Thank you, Nicole," he shyly muttered as he gently took the offered box from her. She folded her hands back into her lap and patiently awaited as Sorun began to open the gift.

He wasn't so much of a neat freak like Antoine that'd he'd meticulously deconstructed the very essence of the wrapping paper, but since it was Nicole's gift Sorun had still taken great care in tearing the paper in such a way that it came off as a single, torn strip held together by the tape. He'd quickly wadded it up and placed it to his side as the stared down at the small, modest box he held in his hands. Gingerly, and with hands slightly shaking, he opened the lid of the box to peer down inside of it.

It was with a equal mixture of surprise and confusion he found the same game controller he always used when playing on the game console at home. A bit... sleeker in appearance than he was accustomed to, however. He picked it up out of the box to give it an appraising look, and then shifted his gaze to Nicole with a questioning look in his eyes.

The AI, at seeing the look he was giving her, decided to elaborate on it. "I notice you always complain about the cord connecting the controller to the console, so I took the liberty of taking it while you weren't looking to modify it somewhat," she explained. "It's wireless and should sync up well enough with the console. I went ahead with retrofitting the second one as well, and even fixed the stick drift issue on the one so you can't use it as an excuse whenever I beat you even though I know you learned to compensate for it."

"Oh." Well, as far as gifts went, it was probably the most thoughtful thing Sorun could think of. He always hated the wires on the controllers because he'd lived in a world of wireless game pads, but now that he had this it felt... it felt a bit closer to home. Sorun had nearly felt his heart stop when Nicole explained just what it was he was holding, and when he looked back up at her he was nearly speechless. Nearly. "Oh my god, Nicole, I love y- THIS CONTROLLER. I-it's, it's really good, yeah, extremely thoughtful of you, thank you, love it, we can try it out later, yeah."

And now he was quite literally biting his tongue because he'd nearly said something that would have damned him. A slip of the tongue he couldn't help but make because he'd been so stunned by how thoughtful a gift Nicole had given him. It seemed he managed to catch himself in time, though, because Nicole and a majority of everybody else around were giving him puzzled looks. Except for Sonic, who was sniggering away at something from besides Sorun. What it was he didn't know, nor did Sorun care. Mostly because he was feeling an intense amount of heat rise in his face and he suddenly couldn't stand sitting here anymore.

"Well! It's, uh, it's been fun, guys, real great. We should do it again next year." Quicker than he thought possible Sorun shot up to his feet from his sitting position, controller and its box safely tucked under his arm. "We should probably end it here, though, 'cause Tails had that dinner thing he said he had to go to, yeah?" His head snapped towards the sitting fox. "Yeah!?"

Flinching back a bit from the sudden outburst, Tails hesitantly nodded. "Y-yeah, I guess I should be going pretty soon-"

"You heard the man!" With acute awareness that all eyes were on Sorun, he began to step around the circle of Mobians. "Antoine, Bunnie, thanks for hosting us, it's been real great, guys, but there's something at home I need to go attend to so yeah, we should all do this again sometime, bye!"

"Er, uh, bye-?" That had been Sally, who tried to say goodbye to Sorun on behalf of everyone else, but by then Sorun had already bolted out from the home's front door and rapidly closed it behind him, just short of slamming the thing. And then he'd collapsed against the door, loudly exhaling to try and calm his heart that was beating so rapidly it was almost uncomfortable. The sudden, biting chill he'd exited out into didn't even register with Sorun due to all the heat he was feeling. It took nearly a minute for him to release a slow, calming exhale as he thumped the back of his head against the door he was against.

"Smooth," he thought to himself, peeling his body off from the doorway. The gift had been too much. Both in that it probably took more effort to modify the thing than Sorun was worth spending over, and that he'd felt like he had a heart attack while holding the thing. Even just carrying it under his arm felt like he was carrying a hundred-pound weight. All because it came from her. Nicole's gift to him.

A gift so incredibly sweet he had absolutely no way of ever topping it. How the hell was he supposed to reciprocate something this thoughtful? He loved the gift, he'd been sincere in that assertion, but still... she really didn't make it easy for him.

"Sorun?"

Once more Sorun nearly felt his heart stop when he heard Nicole's voice sound off right next to him. He'd been startled enough to jump up a few inches right as the AI finished materializing right next to him, though he was quick to regain his composure while trying not to look too flustered. He imagined he probably didn't too good a job in this aspect.

"M-mm, yeah?" he asked, blinking rapidly a few times at her. "You leaving just now?"

"The others are preparing to leave, yes. I'm just the first one out," she confirmed. "Mainly because I wanted to make sure you were alright. You reacted rather oddly in there." Nicole looked down to the gift tucked under his arm. "Was the gift not-?"

"No! It's great," Sorun assured her, and he noticed some part of Nicole's composure relaxed the smallest bit. "I... I just didn't expect you to get me something, you know, so thoughtful. Everybody else just got clothes and cookies and stuff, so I didn't expect something, you know, so high-quality." He swallowed the lump in his throat and turned away from her. "You really didn't have to go through so much trouble for me."

"It truly wasn't that difficult to splice the parts needed into the controller and reconfigure it for proper use. Especially with the nanites. I managed it in a single night while you were sleeping," she said. "Truly, it's harmful to think you regard my abilities so little, Sorun."

Instantly panicking on the inside, Sorun's head snapped back to her. "I didn't mean-!" he tried to explain in a quiet voice, though he trailed off when he saw the smile on Nicole face.

"Merely teasing," she said, causing Sorun to pout. "But back to my previous point. You sincerely were acting odd, Sorun." She took a step closer to him. "Are you sure you're alright?"

The small amount of concern Sorun heard in her voice only caused Sorun's heartrate to spike even further. "I, um... I was just flustered a bit. Is all. I'm not used to this kind of thing." His eyes traveled down Nicole's body when he found the will to look back at her. Oddly enough, he saw she was holding one more wrapped gift under her arm. A slightly larger box wrapped with blue wrapping paper. "What's that?" he asked her.

Nicole looked down to what Sorun was looking at. She remained completely still for a moment, and then looked back up to Sorun's face. For some reason she looked nervous now. "Well... it's your gift."

"..." It took a few seconds for Sorun's brain to process the sentence. Even then, he was sure he misheard. "But you already got me a gift."

"Right, about that..." Nicole reached under her arm to grip the present with both hands. "In truth, I'd been preparing this gift for you in advance, in preparation of the holiday. I'd already wanted to give this to you, but then you sprung that gift-giving event on us all..." Nicole glanced back at the house. "It was undoubtedly fun, but I'd drawn your name and didn't want to... well, this seemed too personal. So I decided to give you two gifts instead." She held the box out to him. "Here."

"I could have just given her something in private outside of the Secret Santa thing? What the hell, of course I could have. Idiot." Admittedly he wouldn't have had the excuse it would have provided, but still... a large part of Sorun was beginning to feel awful. One amazing gift was bad enough. But two? And one that Nicole was planning in advance at that? "Christ, and I didn't even get her anything... why the... why the hell is she doing so much for me...?"

Of course he'd still taken the blue-wrapped gift from her, albeit with extreme reluctance. Nicole had taken the box containing the controller from him while Sorun, with borderline reverence, opened the gift up. He hadn't gone as far as to tear it, instead just unfolding one side of the gift and allowing the cardboard box inside of it to slip out. He flattened the paper against the box and then opened it up so he could peer at the contents inside of it.

When Sorun saw what was inside of the box, he'd nearly dropped it out of shock. No, he'd nearly fallen over entirely when he saw what was inside of it. Something that should have been impossible to exist in reality, but there it was, folded up neatly right there in the box. A coat. A blue coat. An extremely familiar, tri-tailed blue coat. A coat that Sorun inherently recognized, down to the light, thorny, helical patterns running down each side of the coat's breasts and arms to even the shade of blue it held.

"How did... where in the world did she get Vergil's coat from...?" Utterly confused and baffled, he looked up from the folded coat up to Nicole, who was staring at Sorun expectantly. "How is this possible?" he whispered out in awe, still in disbelief over the thing he was holding. "I... I don't understand..."

Whether it be his reaction to the coat, or Sorun's sheer disbelief over it, Nicole seemed amused by how Sorun was acting. "Your digital avatar constructed that exact coat for yourself. Back during our adventure in the digital world," she explained, making Sorun's eyes widen in realization. "You kept thumbing and looking it over the entire time there and expressed a great amount of fondness for it. You even seemed disappointed when you learned you couldn't bring it to the real world. So I committed the design to memory for later use." She glanced down at the coat. "Before you ask, I went to that tailor you work for and told her you'd likely be wearing this from now on regardless of how she thought you should dress. Fortunately, she saw no issue with it." Nicole frowned. "She also had numerous opinions of my own attire. I dismissed them all."

In spite of everything Sorun managed to grow the smallest smirk. It still wavered heavily as he stared down at the blue coat and the raw amount of nostalgia he felt looking at it. "You really didn't have to... you... you really made this for me...?"

"It's made from my nanites. It has a self-repair feature. And self-cleaning. I... wanted to make something that would last," she explained at seeing Sorun's wide-eyed look.

"But wouldn't that mean..." He reached his hand forwards and lifted the coat up. For all intents and purposes it felt like a coat. The softest coat he'd ever felt in his entire life to boot. "This is a part of you?"

"I suppose, technically. You could look at it like that. It's an insignificant amount I donated towards making it."

It was becoming too much for Sorun. A coat was one thing, a coat this significant was another, but she'd even went and poured her nanites into it? He knew how precious those things were to Nicole. They were an extension of her very being. That she was giving some to Sorun to keep as a coat of all things was... he didn't know what he'd done to garner that kind of trust. What he'd done that she'd go so far for him for what amounted to a Christmas gift.

"Nicole, this is too much. It's really too much," Sorun mumbled out. "I-I can't take something like... I didn't even get you anything."

"I don't want you worrying about that." Nicole looked off to the side, a bit shyly. "You already saw how much difficulty Sonic had finding something for me. There's nothing materialistic I want for to begin with." She looked back to Sorun, a smile appearing. "I wanted to show you how appreciative I've been for the companionship you've given me. That's what I really want. So please, take the coat. I made it for you after all."

Wordless, and with great hesitancy, Sorun removed the coat that may as well have been more valuable than his own life from the box and gave it and the wrapping paper to Nicole. He unfurled it completely and held it out to examine it, noting, with shock, just how accurate it was. Down to every last detail he could remember, just like how it'd been in the virtual world. He slipped the blue coat on, pulling his hands through the long sleeves and pulling it snug against him while leaving it open.

It was a coat so comfortable Sorun could barely even notice he was wearing it. Somehow he wasn't too surprised at the fact.

"It's... warm..."

"... I really don't have the words, Nicole." Sorun looked down at the coat, and then back up at her. "It's perfect, so I can't... I can't really give any better praise than perfect." He looked back down. "You don't know how much this thing means to me..."

It was a reminder of home. A connection. A symbol of a significant part of his life that didn't exist anymore. Something he didn't have anymore when he'd lost all his possessions he'd originally brought to this world. But the coat felt different. A piece of Earth he could carry around with him now wherever he went. And... a piece of Nicole, too. He wasn't so sure how he was supposed to feel about that. About any of this.

What had he done to deserve so great a gift?

A sudden weight pressing against Sorun's torso halted all his thoughts. His mind was nothing more than a complete blank playing white noise and static when he saw Nicole and the hug she'd wrapped him in. He didn't even know how long she'd maintained it, as the ability to keep track of time had momentarily escaped him as he stared in muted silence, arms completely slack at his sides. He just knew that eventually, in a time that could have been seconds or hours, she pulled away and still had that smile on.

"Thank you for spending New Year's with all of us, Sorun. It was fun. I'm glad I could share my first time experiencing it in a body with you and the rest of our friends." She took a few steps back and glanced down at the items in her hands. "I'll dispose of the leftovers and drop the controller off at your home when I can. Maybe we could try them out then?"

"Y-yeah..." Sorun numbly mumbled out, still barely able to process any of what was happening. "Yeah, I... sure. We can do that."

"That's excellent to hear, Sorun. You're a truly wonderful friend." Parts of Nicole's body began to dissipate into green pixels. "I'm sorry to say, but there's some matters I need to attend to now." She managed one last wave. "I'll see you later, Sorun."

She left before Sorun could even open his mouth to try and say anything. Even if he had, the words never even formed in his head. There was a strong gust of frigid wind that blew past him, blowing his three coattails far behind him, though he hadn't even felt the cold. He was too distracted raising his hand up to his chest, around where his heart was.

"It's... still warm..."

A/N- I don't care what the comic lore says or doesn't say, it doesn't make sense that Mobians would celebrate Christmas. It's a bombed-out post-apocalyptic setting thousands of years in the future after the fall and erasure of human culture, it shouldn't exist. For the Station Square humans, probably, the Overlanders maybe , but I don't see why Mobians should have it when they should be using a new culture unique to them. I'm willing to waive things like everybody speaking the same language since English is the universal language everybody uses for zany comic reasons, but I'm drawing a line in the sand at Christmas.

Chapter 72

Recursion Error

Episode 72- It combines

Rubrum hated lots of things. A given with everything he'd been through, and still had to go through on a daily basis. Sources of catharsis were few and far between since he was entirely focused on the task at hand. The slaughter of a race of brain-tentacled, genocidal aliens and insane god tyrants from other dimensions helped ease the edge off a bit . Not entirely, but on the occasions he had to kill something he genuinely disliked it was a welcome distraction. Not overly so, since nothing really posed a challenge to him anymore, but he'd take what he could get.

But he couldn't fight a dusty, empty canyon. Well, he could , but it wasn't worth the hassle. And yet, it was so tempting because he was finding that he hated being in this place more and more.

"Never did like deserts," he muttered to himself as he walked along. The place was a canyon so wide it may as well have been a crater, but that didn't make it any less dusty. A small whirlwind had unfortunately crossed Rubrum's path as he continued walking, causing him to sputter out and cough as it passed him. "Pth! Fuckin' fuck, sand in my mouth. Ugh."

To come so far only to be inconvenienced by things as banal as sand. Some things really did never change.

He'd come to this canyon for one reason and one reason solely, and he strongly suspected he was in the right place due to what he'd stumbled across when he made it to the canyon walls: ruins. Clay and stone huts along cave entrances in the canyon wall, crumbling and ancient-looking. Areas that once upon a time may have been paved streets or roads people walked down. Shapes and symbols carved into the canyon wall eroded by time and were little more than unintelligible shapes at this point.

All of it was meaningless to Rubrum, but it at least showed him that he was in the right place. Now all he had to do was find the guy he was looking for and it should be simple from there.

"Certainly isn't the classiest of places," he remarked, stepping around some of the ruined structures while approaching one of the cave mouths. "Why do these wackos always gotta find the weirdest places to make their labs? Havin' me search around like some kinda archeologist just to find one guy, I swear..."

The conditions inside the cave were extremely low light. Winding, too, as there were so many alternating pathways that he would assume it'd be easy to get lost in the cave system, though fortunately he'd managed to find a recent-looking set of footprints and decided to just follow those. Cave writings and drawings were drawn onto the cave walls that largely went ignored by Rubrum as he continued following the path of footprints deeper into the cave. A journey that took him deeper and deeper into the cave, causing light to slowly recede more and more the further he went.

Just when he was almost completely encapsulated by darkness there was a change in the form of metal sconces bolted to the cave walls. Lit sconces as well, alight with, much to his amusement given Rubrum's snort at the sight, green fire. And rather conveniently the footprints he'd been following lead down the same way as the green-lit torches lining the wall.

"He's got the green shit, huh?" He made a small bit of laughter as he tucked his hands into his pockets and began following the torches. "Man, he's really trying to sell this evil scientist thing."

More walking down the lit cave path made Rubrum accidentally stumble onto something interesting: a square piece of stone that had been jutting out of the ground. He'd accidentally stepped on it, causing the stone to sink into the ground. He heard quiet clicking and clunking sounds following this, causing Rubrum to make a light humming sound and look ahead. He'd done so just in time to see the large scythe rushing towards him.

"Awoop." Lazily, he'd sidestepped the scythe as it swung past him, its point swinging up high enough to embed itself halfway in the cave's ceiling. Hands still casually tucked in his pockets, Rubrum's hidden gaze followed the shaft of the scythe to its end, which he saw connected to some sort of spring-like contraption bolted to the cave ceiling. "Guy's got traps, too? What a nerd."

The scythe hadn't been the only trap Rubrum had run into while traveling further down the cave. From pitfalls to darts that fired from the walls, all of which were easily avoided by him. Some of the traps looked so old he had to wonder if the guy he was looking for was the one to place them all, or if they'd always been in these ruins and he'd just refurbished them to keep out outsiders. Then again, he knew enough about him. A trap door that lead to a floor full of spikes wasn't exactly out of the mad scientist's purview. Bit crude for him, maybe, but it got the job done in most cases. Not in Rubrum's, fortunately enough.

After what seemed like an eternity the cave tunnel finally reached an end. A small, spherical cavern that was well-lit with artificial lighting. Various pieces of scientific machinery and instruments littered the rock room all around, making the place look more like some scientist's den than a cave. Most of this went largely ignored by Rubrum, who'd only regarded the environment with a cursory glance before he focused in on the individual on the other side of the room, his back turned to Rubrum as he examined some kind of readout on one of the machines: a white-furred echidna wearing a black cape.

"Man, finally." He should have felt glad he finally got to stop searching around the world just to find this one echidna, but Rubrum was still so irritated with the journey getting here and all the traps he'd had to avoid on the way that he felt a bit cross. He did his best to stow these feelings away as he rose his right hand out from his pocket to make a wave. "Hey, doc-"

In a show of speed that was marginally impressive by Rubrum's standards, the echidna whirled around and extended his hand towards Rubrum. A bolt of black lightning shot out from his fingers, which was dodged by Rubrum when he'd tilted his head just far enough that the bolt missed him and harmlessly impacted the cave wall behind him. He turned his head around towards the now-smoking spot on the wall, and then back around to the echidna professor who was staring straight at him.

"You blast everyone that comes and visits you?" he asked, and then stuck his thumb out behind him towards the darkened entrance he'd just come in from. "I mean, jeez, you know how many traps I had to avoid just to get here? A guy'd think you don't even want any visitors. The fire jet was a nice touch, though, not gonna lie."

Amber irises settled in black eyes regarded Rubrum with caution and confusion. The curiosity on the echidna's face was plain to see, alongside the quickly-fading hostility. His mouth containing sharpened teeth pursed into a thin line as he slowly lowered his hand that ceased emitting black sparks of energy. "I'm afraid I can't take credit for their construction," he said in an even tone. "That honor belongs to the ones that came before me."

"Really? Huh."

"Yes. Really." The neutral expression the white echidna wore was rapidly transitioning into a frown the longer he stared at Rubrum. "Who are you? Why have you come here?"

"Came for you," Rubrum easily answered, turning around towards a nearby shelf built into the cave wall. "I need a favor."

"A favor...?" the echidna repeated, watching as Rubrum stepped over to the shelf to examine the myriad of objects and artifacts settled on the shelf. "Do you even know who I am?"

There was a hum from Rubrum. "Not a lot of albino echidna in the world that go by the name Dr. Finitevus who have a reputation of almost destroying the world. Not to mention Albion, though I heard the few survivors and the echidna Enerjak teleported there from Angel Island are making something decent of the place. Good for them, I guess." His red-hooded head turned backwards to look at Finitevus. "I had a time and a half trying to find you. What are you doing poking around dusty old ruins, anyways?"

"Is it so wrong to want to explore my kind's history and culture? This ancient place was once a home for echidna, long ago," he answered, voice still cautious but now somewhat relaxed. "People being people, things didn't work out. You'd be shocked by the amount of sordid history between the species' conception and them raising that blasted island into the sky."

"I don't think I'd be overly surprised." Rubrum turned back to the collection of artifacts and ran a hand over a dusty piece. "Garbage species like yours always seems to get tripped up by life."

There was a loud scoff from Finitevus, followed by him narrowing his eyes condescendingly at Rubrum's back. "To think I expected more from a human. I was lead to believe your kind was more benevolent towards Mobians than Overlanders."

"I meant the echidna specifically when I said that," Rubrum corrected. "I mean, shit, the territorial wars, experimenting on subspecies of Mobians and irrevocably damaging their gene pools enough to regress them into mindless beasts, the messed up Guardian grooming thing the Brotherhood did, leader of Albion trying to ice Knuckles outta paranoia that one time, Neo-Walkers, Dark Legion, Enerjak, you. Your kind's entire history is a literal cavalcade of fuckups, and more often than not you end up dragging the others species into your problems because you can't get your own shit together. I'm not sayin' every Mobian in history's been squeaky clean, but goddamn, no other Mobian species has nearly the amount of issues echidna do."

"And I suppose your kind has a sterling record in comparison to ours?"

"Hm. Not nearly." Rubrum didn't turn around to meet the echidna's unflinching look. "You called me a human. Not Overlander?"

"Overlanders typically possess four fingers. You've five on your hands," he observed.

"The four-finger thing doesn't apply to all Overlanders. Mutant freaks that they are," Rubrum countered. "But," he continued, finally turned his concealed form around to Finitevus, "you're not wrong. I'm Rubrum."

"... Curious name." A small hum left the white echidna's throat as he thought the name over. His dark eyes glanced down at the floor, though they seemed puzzled even after they looked back up at his hood. "I'm unfamiliar with it."

"It's from a deader-than-dead language. Don't worry so much about it."

The half-explanation didn't do much to assuage the obvious curiosity Finitevus held. "Truly, now..." he mumbled out. "You're a long way from Station Square."

The echidna's darkened eyes widened a bit when a small laugh left the human's hooded head. "Don't think about it too much," he recommended as he approached a nearby wooden box sitting on the ground. "We've other things to discuss first."

"Oh, but you likely already know so much about me seeing as I'm evidently 'famous' due to my exploits." Grinning a bit, a sly, twisted grin that even put Rubrum off a bit, Finitevus decided to sit down on the ledge of a raised section of cave flooring so he was eye-level with a sitting Rubrum. The curiosity was on full-blown display at this point, the scientist almost looking entertained with what was happening as he continued speaking. "We've just met, and you have me at the disadvantage of only giving me a name to work with. Take some pity on me."

"You're givin' me too much credit here." Rubrum's red-covered body hunched forwards a bit on the crate he sat on as he clasped his hands together. "I don't exactly have your whole bibliography on hand." He unclasped his hands and pointed his fingers at Finitevus. "The most I know is you're an evil scientist dude that wants to destroy the world for incredibly ambiguous evil-man reasons."

"That's what those short-sighted fools in the Chaotix and all those associated with them would claim. I wouldn't expect that pack of juveniles to understand my motivations," Finitevus stated with an eye roll. "It's not complete destruction I seek. It's a reset. You said it yourself how... unfortunate echidna history has been. The miserable state of this world is a result of a history so complex and intertwined with money-grubbing fools, power-hungry imbeciles, or simple idiots of significant importance that turned the tide of history down unfortunate avenues at the expense of everyone to follow." He held a finger up to Rubrum. "One. One single individual. Dr. Robotnik, if you need an example. It only takes one person to make a mess of things for everyone else, and history is littered with hundreds more examples. Starting needless conflict and inciting endless cycles of hatred and retaliation that spirals so far out of control over such a long stretch of history that nobody can make sense of it all. My kind has suffered this. Every Mobian species. The humans, the Overlanders, all indigenous life on this planet." He deeply sighed. "The world's only in the state that it's in because the original humans decided to dissect a visiting alien diplomat, and they rained gene bombs on the planet in retaliation."

"With the benefit of hindsight, it was... admittedly a pretty lousy move on the humans' part," Rubrum conceded. "But I know what it's like to see loved ones die because of an honest mistake somebody made."

Finitevus scoffed. "There was nothing honest about any of these mistakes. Ignorant fools with too much influence. All of them. Everyone." He shook his head. "The current state of affairs is unsalvageable. I merely wish to start back from zero and usher the people of this world into a new age. One free of the poisonous mistakes of those past."

Crossing his arms, Rubrum kicked his legs forwards and leaned back on the crate. "So you think there's no hope for saving this world, so you'd rather just wipe the slate clean and try to start over?" He nodded his head at Finitevus. "'Cause you're so qualified to create a utopia on the ashes of what you would call a failed world."

One of Finitevus' eyes twitched. "This world is failed. An experiment gone terribly awry. I'm the only qualified one since I'm the only one that sees sense."

"And instead of plotting world destruction, you're here." Rubrum spread his arm around at the cave around them. "Living in a cave and playing historian."

"Perhaps I'm a fool for trying to piece together a puzzle that can't be solved because the pieces were lost to time. Who can say?" Resting his head against his fist, Finitevus sighed and glanced off to the side. "My schemes were thrown eschew due to meddling echidna and a human who I'd love to get under an operating table, but... alas. I hear he perished in a battle against Dr. Robotnik."

"He resurrected." Finitevus' head snapped to Rubrum's in surprise. "Neo-Walkers gave him the revive treatment. More out of pity than anything else, I think."

Understanding crossed the echidna's features, and his mouth thinned out a bit. "They would do that," he muttered out. "Well, perhaps that's an avenue to pursue at a later date."

"For your own health I wouldn't recommend that course of action."

The tone that sentence had been said in was icier than the otherwise nonchalant tone Rubrum had been adopting thus far. Finitevus had looked surprised at the sudden tone shift in the human he'd been talking to, and, instinctually, he felt some of his fur stand up when he saw power so condensed it was like red steam wafting off Rubrum's body with arcs of red electricity periodically arcing in the red clouds. Like a small, raging storm he'd conjured through sheer will alone.

But it wasn't his appearance, or the tone shift that caused Finitevus to go quiet. It was the power he felt flowing through the air. Raw Chaos energy so condensed it felt suffocating to the echidna, as if the pressure in the room was squeezing down on and compressing his body. He'd tried pushing out his own Chaos energy to counteract it, but the black arcs of lightning that sparked around his form did nothing to mitigate Rubrum's presence over his.

Despite all that, Finitevus managed a smirk. "Touched a nerve, have I?" he taunted out.

For a few moments Rubrum remained silent, completely motionless as his hooded face stared at Finitevus. And then he made a loud sigh, causing the red energy around him to instantly dissipate. With it left the overbearing pressure Finitevus had been subject to, causing him to inhale a breath much louder than he would have preferred. He grit his sharpened teeth as a result, though he still let the black energy retreat back into his own body.

"Sorry about that. Slips sometimes," Rubrum apologized. "Ehhh, I don't know why I'm getting so bent outta shape. Not like you'll ever make good on that threat." The passing remark caused Finitevus to visibly grow a bit irritated. "Maybe we should get to the reason I came here to begin with," Rubrum suggested.

"Yes. Perhaps we should," Finitevus agreed. "For what reason do you have for intruding into my laboratory?"

"Well, simply put, I came to tell you that you're in luck!" The sudden light tone the human adopted caused Finitevus to rear his head back in surprise. "As it happens, our goals at the moment align. I need to cause a worldwide apocalypse."

Before Finitevus could respond, Rubrum turned his right palm up towards the ceiling. A cloud of red cubes materialized and freely floated around his hand for a moment, making Finitevus squint over the strange curiosity and foreign energy he felt from the cubes, but his interest turned to complete shock when, after a red flash of light, appeared a sealed jar in Rubrum's hand. A jar containing a floating mass of black and purple shapes that he instantly recognized, even felt, at a momentary glance.

"That's...!" Finitevus cut himself off, perturbed at the wonder he heard in his own voice. Rubrum set the jar down next to him as he cleared his throat to regain his composure. "Where did you acquire the hex I used on the Master Emerald?" He demanded, blackened eyes boring straight into Rubrum's hood shadow.

"When Sorun used the Yamato to separate the hex from the Master Emerald, the hex had to go somewhere," Rubrum answered. The echidna's gaze sharpened at the use of the other human's name. "I simply collected it."

"You just... happened to be around to collect it. And happen to know precisely what occurred that day." At Rubrum's nod, Finitevus made an uneasy hum. "And what exactly do you intend to do with it?"

"Aw, that's simple. I need you to reactivate it so we can get Enerjak back."

Finitevus blinked. He blinked again, and looked down at the jar. After a third blink he looked back to Rubrum. "That's an impossible task, Rubrum," he said. "The only capable candidate for accepting Enerjak's power is Knuckles, who, as I'm sure you're well aware of, is the current Guardian to the Master Emerald. It took me months to affix that hex to the Master Emerald due to their indirect connection, and I no longer have free access to it due to recent events."

"Which is why we're gonna circumvent all that bullshit using this."

Once again Rubrum moved his right hand, this time moving it up. Chaos energy, pure and undiluted, gathered around his hand and formed a shape. In a fiery burst of Chaos energy, an object was formed in his grip. A metal claymore sword with a blade nearly as long as Rubrum himself. Finitevus found himself looking up and down the blade in wonder, pausing at the unnerving sight of the hilt stylized as a screaming skull with curved horns poking out from the eyeholes. The crossguard shaped like ribs and the metal ribcage that ran a bit down from the screaming skull and into the blade.

"That sword..." Face completely set in fascination, Finitevus watched as Rubrum spun the sword around and stabbed its notched tip into the ground, his hand still holding the metal hilt tipped with a pommel resembling a spiky crown. He noted there was another skull on the opposite side of the first, this one without horns and with its mouth closed. "It feels very much like the one Sorun wielded. Yamato, I believe you called it."

"I'm not too surprised seeing as it's its twin brother," Rubrum explained. "This is the Rebellion, the polar opposite of the Yamato. It has the ability to combine things. Though this function is... rather limited in its capacity compared to Yamato's, seeing as I have to stab whatever I want to combine." He lifted the sword up and tossed it on the ground in front of Finitevus. The echidna watched, perplexed, as the completely metal sword clattered on the tone ground in front of him. "I need you to activate and attach the hex to the sword. Do that, and I can use its power to combine Knuckles and the hex," Rubrum said. "It'll also involve me brutally stabbing a giant sword through Knuckles' chest, but he should regenerate once he becomes Enerjak again, so eh."

"Hmmm..." Humming in intrigue, Finitevus bent down to pick up the blade. He faltered a bit at feeling its weight, but managed to heft it up. He'd only been able to examine it for a few moments before a bolt of red electricity shot out from the blade and shocked the hand holding it. The echidna shouted out in pain and reflexively dropped the sword back onto the ground, making Rubrum chuckle, garnering more ire from Finitevus.

"Careful. He bites people he doesn't like," he warned.

"Tch. It appears so." The echidna's dark eyes traveled back up to Rubrum. "I would like to know where exactly you and Sorun acquired blades that radiate enough Chaos energy to rival Chaos Emeralds. I would know if such things existed."

So many questions buzzed through his mind. What the blades were, where they came from, what civilization had the technological finesse to manipulate such a vast amount of Chaos energy. What the extent of the blades' powers was, the forging process, was a Chaos Emerald involved in their construction? There must have been; the amount of energy he felt merely being near the blade said enough.

Even the human sitting across from him elicited so many question in the echidna's scientific mind. He was powerful, that much was certain. More than Finitevus would like to admit. Sorun had possessed power, too, not nearly as much as Rubrum had, but it'd still been a... worryingly surprising amount.

Alas, Rubrum wasn't intent on answering any of these. "Trade secret," he said, causing Finitevus' mood to dim even further. "Well, how about it? Can you do it?"

"..." Another look down at the blade. "Directly fusing the hex into Knuckles would undoubtedly do the trick. There's still the power concern, though. Another reason I needed to utilize the Master Emerald was so Knuckles could have access to an inexhaustible supply of Chaos energy to maintain his Enerjak form."

Rubrum waved the concern off with a literal handwave. "So I'll pin him to the Master Emerald while I'm at it and combine a big dose of Chaos energy into him. Simple."

"But why go through all this?" Finitevus questioned him, wanting to get to the heart of the matter. "I understand my own reasons. He's the means from which I must destroy the world to remake it. But what's your stake in this? Why is some stranger, a human at that, who is overflowing with so much Chaos energy desire to beckon Enerjak back into the world?"

"Why indeed? It's a fairly convoluted answer," Rubrum said. "I think I managed to puzzle out the reason myself. This part of it at least."

There was a momentary pause where Finitevus gave Rubrum an odd glare. "I don't follow," he said. "You... don't know?"

"Sometimes I have no idea why I'm doing the things I do. In this case I sorta do, since I know all the steps ahead and have a ton of context behind it all. So it's reasonable enough to figure out." Rubrum hunched forwards and clasped his hands back together. "The only thing I'm a hundred percent certain on is I have to do it all. I know what happens if I don't. It's not a very pleasant alternative - for anybody. But that's not why I'm here." He leaned back and placed his steepled hands in his lap. "The truth is this world is slated to be destroyed by a time anomaly."

The statement hung in the air between the two of them for the larger part of a whole minute. Rubrum had remained completely still through the whole time, silently watching Finitevus to gauge his reaction. The echidna, by contrast, reared his head back and widened his eyes in shock at the proclamation, even scoffing a bit while shaking his head in disbelief. But there hadn't been so much as a hint of deceit behind Rubrum's words, making a deep frown appear over the scientist's face.

"You can't be serious," he stated. "A time anomaly? Of what variety?"

"That I couldn't tell you. Don't even know what it is. Time anomaly, time singularity, big-ass time storm, I don't... it's a bad thing, and it will destroy the world, i.e. the whole Prime Zone, not just Mobius. I know how it came to be, though," he added. "It's Sonic's fault this thing exists in the first place."

"That blue irregularity?" Finitevus asked. "How does he fit into this?"

"That guy's an anomaly in of himself. For good reason, but that's a whole 'nother topic," Rubrum began. "Back in his early days of Freedom Fighting Sonic got up to a lot of things. Did crazy stuff with Power Rings and Chaos Emeralds, back when they were numerous and uncombined. Broke down dimensional barriers with his sheer speed and natural Chaos abilities alone, traveled to and from the Cosmic Interstate like he was walking down the damn street, hell, I heard he and Knuckles destroyed a whole zone when they fought once." He sighed and rolled his head up to the ceiling. "That shit's got consequences. As it is now the time anomaly is harmless, but in twenty-five years' time it's gonna be a problem. A serious problem . Fortunately in the future they catch the problem and manage to do something about it. Unfortunately they decided to use a prototype time machine Doc Eggman never got around to finishing to do it, and when Sonic went in it the dumbass cut himself out of time. Good news is it fixed the time anomaly. Bad news is Sonic nullified his existence up to the point in time he used the machine, creating an alternate timeline that supplanted the original one we currently inhabit." Rubrum took in a deep breath, and then straightened his body to directly face Finitevus. "I need to stop that."

Finitevus, who'd grown cautiously still throughout the whole explanation, slowly asked, "The time anomaly, or Sonic's meddling with time?"

"Both," he answered. "The main issue is Sorun. The alternate timeline changed history itself, rewrote everybody, every thing in this zone, to fit into the new timeline. The problem is Sorun isn't a natural denizen of Mobius Prime, so when this goes down and Sonic inadvertently creates a new timeline in twenty-five years, Sorun's existence is going to be erased. Completely. I can't let that happen. So I need to obliterate that alternate timeline and stop the time anomaly so this timeline can remain as it is indefinitely."

"He's not a natural denizen of this zone?" The tone Finitevus used to repeat this statement sounded intrigued. "I had suspicions. Nothing ever pointed the inhabitants of Station Square to be overly attuned with the forces of Chaos. I presume things are different in his zone?" he asked. "Just what was it?"

Oddly, a deep sigh left Rubrum at the question. "As near as I can tell, a cosmic mistake. I don't think that zone was ever supposed to exist. Through some cosmic fluke or fumble it does." He glanced off to the side. "Sorun's from there. He's a special breed of human. A species that naturally lack Chaos Force links, affording them the ability to manifest unique abilities with a given supply of Chaos energy at the cost of their health." Finitevus' eyes practically twinkled in interest, while Rubrum's voice grew quiet. "But something happened, and everything over there's dead now. Sorun's the last of his kind."

"That's... a pity. Truly." Finitevus cleared his throat when Rubrum's hooded head looked back at him. "But why does he matter so much?"

"He matters to me. He's my reason." Rubrum paused, and then let out a harsh sigh. "My world practically revolves around him at this point. It's my job to get him from point A, to point B, to point C, all the way to goddamn Z, and to make sure he doesn't die in the process. Well, too much, at least. Guy woulda died a hundred times over when he was a Freedom Fighter if I didn't intervene somewhere in the background. But that ain't important." He shook his hooded head. "My problem stems from the fact that getting Sorun to the next point is... kinda tricky. You see, Sorun possesses the means of fixing all this timey-wimey business."

Visible confusion on Finitevus' part. "I don't follow..."

"Look, I already laid out all the groundwork and everything, I just gotta get the dude there and it'll solve itself. I can't do it the natural way and just wait twenty-five years because he won't survive the transition into the new timeline, so I need to expedite the process. In the form of a time capsule. A time capsule inundated with infinite amounts of Chaos energy, energy that's naturally resistant to the effects of time. A capsule large enough that someone Sorun's size could be fit into it. The Master Emerald, I'm talking about the Master Emerald," Rubrum elaborated. "I get him in there, he stays frozen in there 'til twenty five-years later when Sonic fucks up and creates an alternate timeline. Shock of the transition should get the Master Emerald to spit Sorun out into the new timeline, bing-bang-boom, problem solved. Only way he's getting in there is if people connected to the Master Emerald who know how to use it, like the current Guardian and his father, put him in there. Only way they'll even consider doing that is if Sorun's on the verge of death from using the seven Chaos Emeralds again and they all happen to already be near the thing at the time. The only scenario Sorun would even consider killing himself using the Emeralds again is if a big enough threat comes along that forces his hand. Hence ... I need to artificially create a doomsday scenario using Enerjak." After finishing the last word, Rubrum deeply inhaled and then slowly exhaled. "Anyway that's it in a nutshell."

"This is lunacy," Finitevus spat out. "Insanity. Complete and utter madness. How could such a plan ever be conceived!?"

"I don't know, man, it's on the list. I just follow the list." Rubrum's shoulders sagged, and then adopted a new tone Finitevus had heard for the first time since the two met: exhaustion, which gave the white echidna pause. "This is the shit I've been dealing with for so long, and I don't... I don't know how the fuck He came up with this all. How many times He must have... it doesn't matter." He breathed out a tired sigh. "Just help me with this."

"I don't-" Finitevus began, sounding hesitant, though Rubrum cut him off quickly with a raised hand.

"You have a vested interest in this too, Finitevus," Rubrum claimed, and then lowered his hand back down. "Who do you think took over saving the world in the new timeline if Sonic wasn't there? Without him around there was nobody to contend with Shadow for strongest being on the planet, and the lack of his sunny disposition made alternate-timeline Shadow a very unchill Shadow. Same kind of Shadow that tried blowing the world up in revenge for his dead friend, if I recall," he added. "But this one didn't do that. Oh no, he just took over the whole world to spread his own brand of 'peace' along the lands. And all the bad people making the world a bad place?" Rubrum laughed out. "Oh, he ain't no Freedom Fighter that takes half-measures. King Shadow wiped the board with all the world's creeps and any government that opposed him, permanently. I'm talking public executions or shoving a Chaos Spear through people's hearts. Eggman, G.U.N., that Iron Bitch and her dominion 'cross the ocean, Mogul, Naugus, and you, my friend-!" he pointed at Finitevus, "- get killed. All of you. All so he could run a unified world under his sole regime."

"Sounds rather peaceful to me."

"Sure, if you're alright with turbo-fascism under a literally immortal being that killed his way to world power." The red-clothed human leaned back on the crate he sat on. "Listen, you're missin' the point. It's lose-lose for you. Either the time anomaly destroys you along with the rest of the world in twenty-five years or King Shadow kills alternate you in the alternate timeline. Help me with Enerjak and I can prevent all that."

Throughout their entire exchange Finitevus had grown increasingly skeptical to Rubrum's words. Passing scoffs and eyerolls, an increasingly lax form, more disinterest in his eyes. Mainly, though, disbelief. Sheer disbelief bordering on actual outrage that was slowly appearing on the echidna's face. By the time Rubrum finished speaking, he looked ready to blow up.

"I don't believe a word of this," he claimed. "It's insanity, all of it. Talks of future perils, decades into the future at that, alternate timelines, there's no scientific or even historical precedent to any of this. Do you even have any proof to these wild claims?"

Rubrum shrugged. "Other than my word? Nah."

"Then you'll have to forgive me for not trusting the word of a stranger I just met," Finitevus snidely remarked. "How could you possibly, possibly know any of this? Not even the Neo-Walkers have the kind of foresight required to predict these ridiculous claims. I'll admit you're powerful, that's plain enough to feel, but I just don't see how you could know this. So answer me: how? Do? You? Know?"

There was a sound of Rubrum heavily inhaling through his nose, followed by a deep, heavy sigh. He placed his right hand on his knee and hunched forwards, glancing down at the ground a bit before making a small, mirthless laugh, shaking his head, and looking back up. "That answer's heavy, doc," he said. "Let's just say I have a crazy amount of insight and leave it at that. The truth itself ain't pretty; it's the kind of thing that drives people insane. Already told it to one guy and robbed his will to live." Both of Rubrum's hands placed themselves on the crate, after which he pushed himself up into a standing position. "But it's whatever. Believe the crazy guy that says he knows the future, don't believe him, doesn't really matter. At the end of the day you want to bring back Enerjak just as much as I do regardless, so it's all the same to you." He nodded to the sword lying between them. "I'm leaving Rebellion with you for a bit so you can implant the hex on it. Don't make it too complicated, stick it on with celestial duct tape or whatever, I just need it to physically be on the sword when I stab Knuckles with it." A pause. "Sooo... yeah. That's it. Bye."

After saying his parting, Rubrum stood still and silently watched Finitevus in case he had any final words for Rubrum. But the echidna said nothing, instead intent on looking back and forth between the sword lying at his feet and the nearby jar with the hex floating in it. His eye ridges were creased in concentration, his face set in deep contemplation, and Rubrum shrugged figuring the conversation was over with right there. He turned to leave, but only made it a couple steps before Finitevus' voice called out to him.

"Why would you tell me such a convoluted lie like the one you just said if you knew I just wanted Enerjak?"

"I wonder...?" Rubrum mused, refraining from pointing out that Finitevus had been the one to ask his reasons to begin with. "I dunno. It's nice to vent. I don't really have many people to talk to, and out of everybody I've met since taking on this fucked up gig, you're... really the only tolerable one." His hooded head turned back to Finitevus. "Oh, 'fore I forget, how much time you need with the hex?"

"... I would think a day should suffice, perhaps less. Come back tomorrow at the same time and we'll have it sorted out." With that, Finitevus looked back down at the jar containing the hex. A wicked grin spread over his face, showing off his sharpened teeth. "We'll begin the real work right after."

"'Kay, then. Seeya." Shrugging, Rubrum shoved his hands into his pockets and turned right around to exit through the cave entrance. He couldn't hold in the sputter of amused laughter that escaped past his lips when he heard the dark chuckling of the white echidna that he was walking away from.

"I saw that evil li'l grin he had on. What a cliché guy. He must think he's still gonna have control of Enerjak with his hex. Man, he's really gonna hate what happens next." A grin of his own grew on Rubrum's face as his form disappeared into the darkness of the caves. "These suckers just never learn."

Chapter 73

A/N- Shifted some dialogue and details last chapter around a bit because I wasn't satisfied with some things. Not my smoothest performance, but oh well.

Recursion Error

Episode 73- Countdown to doomsday (it's today)

It was a very unappealing thing. That black, wriggling shape embedded onto the Rebellion's metal blade. Like an ever-shifting drawing somebody had put on his sword. Or an ugly tattoo. Wasn't permanent, at least. If everything went to plan it wouldn't even last the next hour, and after that it wasn't his problem anymore. But it was still his sword, and he didn't like cosmetic things like this marring its surface.

It was a necessary evil, though. Story of his life...

With a sigh, he lowered the sword and leaned back against the rock he was sitting against. The lush vista of Angel Island was the sight that greeted him, though he paid all the greenery and distant mountains no mind as he slung his free arm over his bent knee. Behind the rock he was sitting against was the open ceiling that lead into the chamber where the Master Emerald rested on its altar. According to his list Knuckles was due to show up here alone for some reason, so it was just a matter of waiting.

For some reason Finitevus wanted to tag along, too, which is why Rubrum saw the white-furred echidna sitting next to him under the cover of the rock when he looked to his left. Rubrum could only guess why he chose to do this, to oversee this personally, maybe, but whatever the case it made Rubrum's life easier so he paid it little mind. The Mobian seemed really excited, a grin stretched to each corner of his mouth and his hands rubbing together in a diabolical manner. Rubrum would have scoffed at the sight, but he held out in lieu of being polite. He would have preferred not to say anything at all and just wait for Knuckles, but then Finitevus decided to speak.

"I'm admittedly beginning to grow restless. The anticipation... it's palpable." He'd actually licked his lips after finishing that sentence, earning an odd, unseen look from Rubrum. "Are you sure this is the most efficient means of going about this?"

"Wanna catch Knuckles alone with this. Would rather not have his father or the Chaotix see me. Or that ant," Rubrum answered. "And anyways, he only has so many haunts on this island. Just be patient."

"Hmph. I suppose so." A sigh left Finitevus, and he began to restlessly drum his bandaged fingers along the ground. "You're certainly putting a lot of stock into this Sorun boy."

"I guess so, yeah."

"I still don't believe a single word of that story you told me back at the lab, but humor me, if only to pass the time," Finitevus requested. When Rubrum silently nodded, he continued. "You claim you're doing this with the intent to have Sorun fight Enerjak using the power of all seven Chaos Emeralds. I severely doubt even with all seven he'd stand a chance against a god."

"I already said my intent's just to get Sorun to the future alternate timeline. Everything else's secondary." There was a short pause. "But I wouldn't count Sorun out if I were you."

"Right, of course." Looking entirely unconvinced, Finitevus rolled his head to the side to look at Rubrum. "You realize I won't be sparing you in the coming purge."

A bitter laugh left Rubrum. "After all I've done to help you? I'm hurt." He glanced up at the sky. "But, eh, I'm not too worried about it."

"Is that so?"

"It is, in fact, so." He held up Rebellion. "Surprised you managed to jury-rig this hex of yours so quickly."

"Considering you and the Master Emerald are doing the bulk of the work, all I needed to do was attach it to your sword," Finitevus explained, a hint of pride found in his voice. "Honestly I only needed a few minutes with it."

"And I'm sure the rest of your time was spent trying to look at Rebellion. But I bet ya didn't glean anything from it." The frustrated, momentary scowl he caught from Finitevus said enough for Rubrum. "So you didn't actually look at the hex too closely?"

Finitevus hesitated before responding. "No," he said, a bit slowly. "What is that supposed to mean?"

"Mm, nothing." From the edges of his hearing Rubrum finally caught what he'd been listening for: distant footsteps, somewhere below them. Somebody had entered the chamber. Finitevus seemed to hear it, too, as his head cocked over his shoulder to look at the rock separating them from the chamber's open ceiling. "Look sharp, target's here," Rubrum said, transitioning into a crouch and standing up a bit to peek over the rock. Finitevus did the same.

Knuckles was there alright. Just standing there in the middle of the chamber, looking up the altar stairs and at the Master Emerald itself. As his back was to them Rubrum couldn't catch his expression, nor could he even glean what he was doing there to begin with. He seemed relaxd, though, from his body language.

"What's he even doing?" Rubrum whispered out.

"Who knows? Meditating, perhaps? I've long since ceased trying to understand how these backwater people think," Finitevus harshly whispered out. "What's your plan?"

"... Stab him?" Rubrum glanced to the side at Finitevus. "What do you mean, what's my plan? I'm gonna stab the motherfucker, it don't get more simple'n that."

"Then hurry up! Now, while we have the chance!"

"Pushy..." Rubrum skirted around the edge of the rock and stepped to the edge of the hole that lead into the Master Emerald's chamber. He took a slow, quiet breath, and then dropped into the room.

His feet silently impacted the ground upon landing, quietly enough that Knuckles didn't stir from the spot he stood at just ahead of Rubrum. The red-clothed human didn't make a single sound as he brought Rebellion to bear, hidden eyes intently focused on the echidna's back.

His grip tightened around the sword's handle. For just a moment he wavered, and the end of the sword's blade quavered a bit as a result. But then it went completely still after Rubrum shook his head. "Alright, game face."

And then, without a further thought, he sprinted ahead towards the echidna in a burst of supernatural speed, the tip of the claymore aimed out in front of him.

"AND HERE COMES THE GIANT SWORD!"

The midway point of this sentence being yelled out by Rubrum was the exact same moment the blade plunged through Knuckles' back and burst out through the red-furred Mobian's chest. Crimson blood sprayed out from both sides of the wound, while the echidna himself made a strangled, almost silent gasping sound. From the pain and shock of having a sword plunged through him or the sheer surprise, Rubrum couldn't decipher, nor could he see the echidna's reaction due to being behind him. He did see his head tilt down towards the sword impaling him, and shakily, his arms tried to reach up to grab at the sword.

Before he could even touch the blade, though, Rubrum began moving, and also held the sword low in a reversed grip as he stomped towards the altar's steps. The blade, and the echidna impaled onto it, were dragged along the ground, with Knuckles making pained whining and grunting sounds as his arms, nearly robbed of all strength and completely limp, tried to grab at the ground. Rubrum did his best to push all the noises he was making out of his head as he stepped onto the altar stairs.

"Echidna, echidna, echidna... always so much trouble..." Rubrum muttered out. He stomped up each and every step, dragging the blade along them and causing it, and the echidna attached, to bounce along the steps. Knuckles' movements were growing weaker by the second, and a wide line of blood was trailed behind them. "I don't understand it. I don't understand how things can go so wrong ..."

He stopped at the top of the altar, right in front of the Master Emerald. Rubrum just barely managed to make out his own reflection on its green surface, shaking his head at the sight while gripping the sword's handle with both hands.

"Don't take it personal." He rose the sword over his head, glad that his hood blocked the sight of the bloody echidna gasping in pain and gurgling on blood struggling on his sword. Lacking anything else to say, he thrust the sword downwards at the Emerald. The blade pierced right through the green crystal, with Rubrum pushing it enough that the blade sunk entirely into the Master Emerald all the way up to Knuckles, who was pinned in place between the gem itself and the sword's rib-like crossguard. His lower half was completely immobile, and though his arms weren't in a good position to maneuver around in any significant way, they were still moving some. And he was still making that sound. That pained gasping noise that was a few octaves short of pained crying.

Breathing out harshly and gritting his teeth at the sound, Rubrum gripped the back of Knuckles' head hard enough that he felt bone fracture under his fingers. He brought the head backwards, and then rammed it forwards right into the surface of the Master Emerald. His muzzle was completely flattened, and there was a sickening crunch! sound as his face was shattered against the Emerald accompanying a wide splash of blood where his face impacted the gem. The whimpering cries went completely silent, and Knuckles' struggling movements were reduced to mere twitches.

Soundlessly, after a second of looking at the blood-spattered Master Emerald and the broken echidna pinned to it, Rubrum took hold of the Rebellion's handle with both hands. Red lightning began arcing along the entire blade, causing the Mobian body impaled to it to begin violently convulsing. The swirling, shapeless black hex stenciled onto the blade, buried somewhere in the Master Emerald, dissolved into a gaseous substance and moved up the blade's length. The dark cloud made it to Knuckles' body, and then began to seep in and disappear through his skin and into his body.

And then, the Master Emerald began to react. Harsh bolts of green lightning arced around the massive gem in response to the red lightning around the blade. There was a loud, white flash, the result of a golden bolt of lightning beaming out from the Emerald itself and traveling all the way up and into the sky. Electric energy was flowing into Knuckles' body, enough to envelop him in a golden aura and intense enough that Rubrum was actually able to see his skeleton through his skin. This continued for only a few moments, until Rubrum felt satisfied with what he'd done. And with that, he'd pulled the blade out of the Emerald and flicked it to the side, throwing Knuckles' body right off the sword.

The lightning ended in an instant. The continuous bolt of golden lightning disappeared, and the sparks around the Master Emerald ceased. Knuckles' body bounced down the altar's steps, and then impacted onto the ground floor the altar rested on. Rubrum, bloodied sword in hand, turned to face his body, remaining completely silent at the sight of the still echidna at the bottom of the bloodied steps.

Soon enough there was a change. Golden bolts of lightning began to randomly shoot off from his body. His wounds, both the gaping wound in his torso and his flattened, caved-in face, began to slowly close and regenerate. His movements were becoming less twitchy and more articulated as golden pieces of armor and blue cloth slowly began to appear over his form. By that point, Rubrum had seen enough. So he'd leapt upwards, right through the top of the chamber and back onto the ledge he'd dropped down from to begin with.

His work was done. Enerjak was coming back.

"Well, it's Sorun's problem now," Rubrum thought to himself as he began walking away. He passed Finitevus along the way, choosing to stop when he heard the made chuckles of the white echidna next to him. "Right. Him. One more detail."

"You did it. You actually managed to do it," Finitevus said, somewhat in awe as he looked past the rock he was huddled behind. "I can feel Enerjak's energy gathering from here alone!"

Rubrum looked behind his shoulder. He saw bolts of golden lightning arcing out from the Master Emerald's chamber. The skies themselves began to darken as black storm clouds rapidly began to gather above them, blocking out the sun.

"Yep," Rubrum agreed in a bland tone, dispelling Rebellion and placing his hands in his pockets. He turned around to leave, took a single step, and then stopped again. "Oh, almost forgot to mention one thing. I modified your hex a bit."

The intense, manic jubilation that was on Finitevus' face all but instantly melted away when he heard that sentence leave Rubrum. In it's place was shocked surprise and quickly growing anger, shown by the intensely heavy scowl that grew on his features. "What?" he hissed out, turning his head to Rubrum's back. "What did you just say?"

"I modified your hex," he repeated, turning to look at the echidna. "Before I gave it to you, I changed it."

"You did WHAT!?" he snarled out, rising to his feet. "You had no right!"

Rubrum shrugged. "Mm, sure, I mean, I guess, but..." he trailed off, voice laconic and lacking all energy as he looked to the side. "Well, what did you expect? I made it clear I wasn't doing this for you. 'S your fault for getting so excited you didn't even check the damn thing."

It wasn't his fault the scientist had been so short-sighted when a clear path to his goal was given to him on a silver platter. The fact Rubrum had been banking on that didn't even factor into it. And he didn't feel all that guilty for playing him.

"What have you done!?" Finitevus rushed forwards and grabbed Rubrum's red cloak, and then began to intensely shake him. Rubrum didn't react in the slightest. "You fool, what did you do!?"

"I separated out the part of the hex that let you control Enerjak," Rubrum explained in a simple tone, causing Finitevus to freeze completely. "He has free will now."

The black eyes Finitevus had widened dramatically, and the yellow irises shrunk down to a quarter of their size. "You've done what?" he whispered out, so in shock his hands fell away from Rubrum's clothes. "That's... you utter imbecile..." He stumbled back a bit, nearly shaking as he looked down at the ground. "He'll destroy everything. Without my guidance that mad thing will bring this whole world to ruin!" His head snapped up to Rubrum's hood, outraged and fearful. "Don't you realize there will be absolutely nothing left to rebuild in his wake if he's allowed free!?"

"Kind of the idea." The statement had been neutral, casual, even, when Rubrum said it. It had the effect of stunning Finitevus on the spot, as even he couldn't comprehend how the being in front of him was treating total world destruction so lightly. "Better go get Sorun. The Yamato is your only hope of killing that thing. Oh, speaking of which."

Before Finitevus could get another word in edgewise, Rubrum's right hand shot out of his pocket and went straight for his throat. The scientist had seen the incoming hand, just barely, but had been unable to do anything before the hand clamped around his throat. He gagged out and flailed at the hand holding him as he was lifted up off the ground, his feet unconsciously kicking away as the human held him up.

"Sorry, but I gotta take your memories of me out. Sorun literally can't do this without you, but I can't have you go and tell him there's some guy walking around with the Rebellion. A bit too early for that stunning revelation," Rubrum icily stated. "I never do this and just stay out of sight since people getting random bouts of amnesia would be hella suspicious, and I have zero practice doing this. Was always paranoid I'd give someone brain damage or something if I tried." He unpocketed his left hand, and a panicked, struggling Finitevus could only watch as red energy gathered around it. "But this one's on the list, so I'll make an exception. I'll try not to mess around with your head too much, but, uh... I'm new at this, so sorry in advance if I wipe out any childhood memories or something like that."

The overhead sounds of yellow lightning bolts striking a darkening sky was just loud enough to drown out Finitevus' subsequent screaming.

Chapter 74

Recursion Error

Episode 74- The world just got a lot emptier

The sky was wrong.

For two days it'd been like this: perpetual overcast. Heavy overcast. Dark storm clouds that completely blanketed the sky, like there was about to be some terrible, torrential downpour. But the rain never came. The sky just remained darkened by all the clouds.

It was eerie. Unnatural, even, and Sorun could tell most of the citizens in New Mobotropolis felt the same way. He oft heard whisperers about growing concerns regarding the storm clouds as he walked around the city, and in all honesty, he shared those concerns. It wasn't even snowing anymore because of the clouds, or raining for that matter, either.

Clearly something was wrong. Nobody knew what, though, but Sorun knew that the Freedom Fighters had endeavored to get down to the bottom of... whatever was happening. Whether it be some weird, new scheme from Dr. Robotnik or something else entirely.

But, that was their problem. Sorun wasn't involved in that life anymore and had his own to live, but even so, it didn't stop him from stressing about the clouds for no other reason than he kept getting eerie feelings whenever he looked up. It unnerved him, that dark sky. Like something horrible was set to happen but wasn't happening yet. A dread-filled anticipation that weighed heavy not just on him, but everybody else in town.

He almost wished something did happen just so that the feeling would go away.

Where he was now was, simply put, walking around the city to help clear his head and take his mind off of things. No work today; evidently Honey wasn't even immune to the dreary atmosphere that had befell the city, and for the time being the shop was closed. That left Sorun with more free time than he knew what to do with, so he'd taken to walking around to try and take his mind off things.

It wasn't working.

"If it was just some weird weather thing that happens sometimes that'd be one thing, but everyone else is freaked out, too," he muttered out to the Chao floating next to his head. "There's just... I dunno, something wrong. Can't put my finger on what, though. It's weird."

"Chao." Virgil nodded his horned head in agreement. Even Chao and some of the other animals were being affected by this strange storm that had overtaken the sky. Hell, Sorun was pretty sure he'd heard Sonic's pet dog barking and freaking out when he'd walked by his family's home at one point. He knew from Earth customs that animals reacting like that were a bad sign, which had him on edge. Even Virgil had been a bit stiff as well, looking just as guarded as Sorun felt. Eyes narrowed and shoulders hunched, so tense that he was liable to snap.

Sorun's lips thinned. He didn't like any of this. He didn't like this feeling, nor not knowing what any of this meant.

A heavy breeze blew past him, blowing back the three coattails on his blue coat as he let a low breath out. "I wonder how far it goes out," he said, looking up at the sky again. "This thing stretches out to the horizon in every direction. That must mean it's pretty big, right?"

Virgil nodded. "Chao."

"Yeah, but it can't be that big, though. Can it?" When he looked down at his pet Chao, he caught him shaking his head. "Yeah, I don't know, either," he admitted as the two continued moving forwards.

"Guess we'll just have to wait for Sonic and the rest to sort it out. Whatever it is."

They were sure taking their time to fix the problem, though. They'd been gone for around ten hours.

Up ahead he saw a curious sight. A small rabbit child and her own, unevolved pet Chao staring up at the sky. Even from here he could see the looks of discontent on their faces, and honestly, he couldn't blame them. It also made Sorun feel a bit bad, knowing even the children were being off put by whatever this storm was. Part of him wanted to do something to help, but he didn't know what to do. He was fairly certain nobody did. He could still at least try talking with her.

"Hey, Cream," Sorun softly greeted, he and Virgil stopping right behind the child. She and Cheese turned around to look at them, and while it seemed the sight of the two of them improved their mood a bit, it was a marginal shift at best. "What are you two doing?"

"Oh, hello Mr. Sorun. Hello, Virgil." Despite the polite demeanor the young Mobian held Sorun still found himself sighing a bit and darting his eyes away from her. Made him feel old whenever she put the mister part in front of his name. "We were out playing, but... well, we don't... we don't really feel like playing at the moment..."

"'Cause of the sky, right?" he guessed. When she nodded, he made another sigh and looked at her. "Yeah, it's... strange, I know. I think everybody's kind of unnerved by it."

"Is Mr. Sonic and the rest of the Freedom Fighters doing something about it?"

Sorun scratched the back of his head. "Well, from what I overheard from Nicole they picked up some really weird energy readings of some kind from Angel Island, so they went to investi..." He trailed off when he saw Cream looking a little lost, so he reiterated with,

"They... noticed something was weird so they all went to check it out. That was a while ago, though."

"Oh, I see..." Her ears lowered against her head a bit. "What does it mean that they're taking so long?"

"Probably nothing. The island moves around, well, the whole world, so they could be anywhere right now." Left unsaid was that Sorun knew how fast the Freedom Fighter Special went, and regardless of how far away the island was this wasn't something that should be taking ten hours. But then again, there was always something up with that island. It was debatable if this was even related to the darkened sky.

He ended up thinking back to Nicole. She hadn't told Sorun much about what was going on, and she seemed to be in the dark just as much as everyone else, but she'd noted that the weather phenomenon was extremely odd, and that her instruments weren't working properly in identifying it. That went a long way towards proving whatever this storm was wasn't natural, and he could tell it worried her somewhat. Worried him too, really, as it meant there was something potentially bad going on. And the fact she was worried wasn't helping his mood any.

"Mr. Sorun?" Cream's voice brought Sorun back to reality, causing him to look back down at the rabbit. "You stopped talking for a bit."

"Oh. Er, sorry. I was thinking about somebody." He began to rapidly scratch the back of his head while glancing away. "Hey, maybe you and Cheese should head on home back to your mother. Not that, uh, there's anything dangerous going on or anything," he added as to not make the child scared. "I just, uh... your mother might be worried about you two. You should go home."

Before anything else could be said, a peculiar sound interrupted the conversation: a strange, warbling sound. One that was somewhat familiar to Sorun's ears. Both he, the small Mobian, and the two Chao turned towards the source, the latter three opening their eyes wide at what looked like a large, golden ring facing the ground hovering in the air in front of them, while Sorun had narrowed his eyes at the familiar ring.

He had half a mind to walk right up to the thing before somebody fell through it and onto the ground. And unfortunately for Sorun, it was a form he recognized. A stark-white echidna wrapped in white bandages, a black cape, and that strange golden symbol on his forehead. He was covered in scrapes and cuts and a few other small wounds on his person, and seemed to be hissing out in pain while trying and failing to stand up.

"Oh, how awful!" Cream exclaimed, holding her hands to her mouth is shock. "That man looks hurt! We need to help him!"

Sorun had the opposite thought. He wanted to stomp the echidna's head in. Cream's presence made Sorun hesitate, but he still felt his boot anxiously twist on the artificial concrete he stood on.

While Sorun mentally debated with himself if he should murder in front of a child, something happened. A great wall of white-gold light appeared without warning on the horizon. A wall so tall it breached the clouds and so wide Sorun couldn't see where it began and ended. He'd had to squint it was so blinding, and because of that and its sheer size he wasn't able to see that the wall was coming closer and closer to the city.

The wall of light closing in on them had been what had caused Finitevus' dark eyes to snap wide open. His head snapped right up, after which his head spun towards the incoming wall of light so fast it nearly twisted off his shoulders. He gasped, loudly and fearfully, and then turned his head towards the group of four staring at the wall. Specifically at Sorun.

"Get down, you fool!" Before Sorun could react to the voice he was pushed down by the very speaker. Finitevus had practically tackled Sorun to the ground and, while straddling the fallen human's form, lifted his hand up. Bolts of black lightning poured out from the center of his palm and surrounded the two of them, trapping them in a dome made of the black energy. The two Chao and Cream looked at the two of them in shock, but before anybody could do anything the wall of light washed over the entire city.

Sorun was forced to close his eyes fully, groaning out a bit at the intensity of the light hitting him. Finitevus was in a similar state, making grunts of exertion while golden cracks appeared in the invisible spaces between the black lightning making up the dome surrounding them. In just a few seconds, however, the wall passed them through to the other side of the city, and then passed the city completely as it moved on to the rest of the land. The dome dissipated immediately after, with a seemingly exhausted Finitevus sliding right off of Sorun and falling back onto the ground. Sorun himself sat right up, panting heavily and looking around wildly until his eyes fell on the echidna's form. He almost sprung forwards right there in an attempt to try and choke the life out of him in fear of Cream's safety.

But then something halted him. A lot of somethings. There were... things, floating up and out of the city. Glowing spheres, about the size of sports balls. Glowing intensely, seemingly made of pure energy and ranging from a wide variety of colors of every shade and type. Hundreds of the things lifting up from all around the city and into the sky.

"W-what the... what is this...?" More light at the corner of his eyes drew Sorun's attention to the side. He felt his throat seize up when he saw Cream, lying face-down on the ground and completely motionless. Another glowing sphere, a tannish-brownish colored one, was floating above her body and rapidly ascending to the sky like the rest, though Sorun paid this no mind as he scrambled towards the child. "Hey, hey Cream!"

Fear and panic overtook him as he knelt by the rabbit's form. She hadn't moved a bit in response to his voice. She wasn't moving at all. His unthinking reaction had been to grab her by the shoulders to try and flip her onto her back to try and assess her better, but he hadn't been able to do it. He'd only gotten halfway before he saw her face.

In a word, she looked horrifying. Face frozen in a gaunt expression, with her mouth lolling open due to gravity in something that looked like a silent scream. And her eyes- they were purely white, no pupils or irises in sight. Completely hollow, like she was some kind of husk. Or dead.

"What the fuck !?" Sorun screamed, dropping the child's face back onto the ground and jumping back in shock. His breathing began to become heavier when he looked around and saw their Chao on the ground. Both Cheese and Virgil had the same hollow expressions and white eyes Cream had. All three were completely unmoving, not even breathing.

A cough by his side made Sorun's head whip right towards the source. He saw Finitevus, kneeling on all fours while clutching a hand to his forehead. Immediately the confused, frightened emotions he was feeling were converted into blind anger, and without even thinking he'd bolted back to his feet and ran right over to the echidna, only to then kick him in the stomach.

"What have you done!?" Sorun screamed out at him. Finitevus gasped out in pain and fell onto his side from the kick, but Sorun didn't relent and kicked him again. "What the FUCK DID YOU DO!?"

By around the third kick Sorun heard a new noise: the soft thumping of something dropping to the ground. After the fourth kick to the echidna, he turned around to see what the noise came from, and then immediately froze when he saw it. Something had dropped in from the ring-shaped portal Finitevus had come through. What it was, though, Sorun didn't have the faintest clue.

It was an outline. An outline of something . A mass of golden threads of energy arranged into the vague shape of some androgynous, bipedal figure. Completely featureless and half-made of gaps due to being made of the aforementioned golden energy threads, like he was watching a walking nervous system and nothing else. The one exception he saw was something in what Sorun saw as its chest: one of those energy spheres he'd seen fly into the sky before, a purple one.

"What the hell is actually going on...?" Sorun thought to himself, too stunned by the sight to form words. He wasn't able to think any further before the golden thing began shambling towards him, like some thoughtless drunk. It'd only gotten a few steps in before a bolt of black lightning shot past Sorun and impacted it. A distorted screeching sound came from its head that looked little more than a tangle of gold yarn, after which it was thrown back.

Rapidly blinking, Sorun turned his head to the side. He caught Finitevus standing next to him, hand outstretched towards the golden thing. Panting heavily, his eyes turned towards Sorun. "If you'd stop attacking me for a moment, I'd say I've come to help," he managed to mutter out.

"I severely fucking doubt it." Distorted, warbling sounds came from the golden tangle thing as it began to stand up. Finitevus blasted it with black lightning again, and though it went down again it didn't seem to become any less active. "Hell is that thing?"

"Talk later," Finitevus replied. "Your sword. Use it. My own powers can't affect it."

"Don't have it."

Eyes widening, Finitevus snapped his head to Sorun. "What do you mean you don't have it!?" he nearly screamed out.

"Jesus, how out of the loop are you?" As Sorun stood there watching the golden thing amble back up, a split-second decision ran through his mind. One that, had he more time to consider it, he would never have made with a rational mind. But the sight of a lifeless child near him and whatever this dangerous-looking thing was overwrote these thoughts, causing him to speak without thinking. "There's a vault somewhere in the castle at the center of the city. There's a Chaos Emerald inside of it. I need that."

"Are you quite serious!?" Finitevus snapped. "You want me to rummage around a castle while-?"

"You have any better options!?" Sorun snapped back, clear anger and panic in his tone.

"Gch..." Gritting his teeth, Finitevus outstretched his hand. The portal-shaped ring he'd dropped in from shrunk closed, and then disappeared entirely. With that done, he'd reached into his cape and pulled out another golden ring. "I'll return with the Emerald, then. Stall it until then."

"Stall it? What do you mean stall it? I can't stall-" Sorun's words were cut off when Finitevus threw the ring in front of him. It hovered in the air and expanded into a larger portal, from which a swirling mass of green energy took up residence inside the ring's hollow. Without another word Finitevus dived right into the ring, after which it closed and disappeared behind him.

That was all the time Sorun had to take it all in before the golden thing began ambling towards him once more. The human remained rooted to the spot, conflicting thoughts and instincts flying through his system as he tried to make sense of just what was happening while perceiving the threat in front of him. His legs twitched with the desire to run away while the rest of him twitched as he tried to figure out what to do.

Alas, he'd been too slow, as before Sorun could come to a final decision the monster was upon him. So, right before it rose up a vaguely hand-looking shape to swipe at him, he did what his body naturally told him to do: he shoved it.

It... was surprisingly effective.

The golden thread monster fell down. Simple as that. Sorun had blinked down at it in bewilderment, slightly in awe that it even worked, but then it had risen up to its feet and charged at the human again. Sorun, feeling a bit more confident, reached up and grabbed the back of its head right before its outstretched arms managed to grab him. He stepped to the side while shoving it away at the same time by pushing its head away, causing it to stumble past him before falling down due to the added forwards momentum.

Unabated, the glowing monster rose up and charged Sorun again. And like before, he'd sidestepped it and shoved it away using the exact same move. It worked just the same as before.

"Christ, it's like shoving zombies away in 'Dying Light'. It just doesn't learn and you can do it forever." Indeed, that's exactly what Sorun was doing. And now that he'd calmed down somewhat due to not feeling so threatened by the thing, he realized that the threatening energy zombie was, by some margin, a bit slow. Slow and dumb enough that Sorun was able to keep it at bay by simply shoving it over and over.

He'd be laughing if it weren't for the seemingly lifeless child and Chao nearby.

After what was probably minutes of what basically amounted to Sorun bullying a magic-looking zombie, another ring-based portal opened up. Sorun turned to look at it, spotting Finitevus walking out just as the portal disappeared behind it. He saw in his right hand was sitting the blue Chaos Emerald that'd been kept away from Sorun for so long. He'd slumped his shoulders at the sight, fully expecting the echidna to proceed to do something nefarious with the object while Sorun stood by and watched.

This was mainly why Sorun was so astonished when Finitevus tossed the Emerald towards him. He was so shocked he nearly dropped the gem when his hands shot up to reflexively catch it. Barely even a second after he made contact the gem shifted into the Yamato, with Sorun becoming instantly relaxed at feeling the familiar weight settle in his hands.

"Kill it, but do not harm the sphere in its center," Finitevus warned as Sorun stared down at the sheathed katana in his hands. "You'll regret it if you do."

"Um... sure..." He looked up from the sword and at the golden thread monster. It was just now stumbling back to its feet, turning to Sorun and getting ready to charge again. Blinking once, he pulled Yamato from its sheath, blue energy roiling over its edge. A blue line appeared on the monster's waist after he swung, fading away after a moment to reveal a clean cut rending the monster completely in half.

There was a scream from it. A loud, modulating scream that sounded less like a person and more like a computer dying. Sorun winced at the sound, watching as the entire thing exploded in a small shower of gold light. What was left in the aftermath was the purple, spherical object which proceeded to float up into the air, just like all the other ones had done.

"..." Sorun watched the sphere travel up into the sky, and looked down at Finitevus, who'd watched along with Sorun. "You wanna tell me what that was?" he asked.

"Namely put, a soul," Finitevus lamely provided. "Specifically I believe that one belonged to the chameleon companion Knuckles carried around with him."

"You mean Espio? What? What ?" Shocked, Sorun looked back up at the sphere. It'd traveled so far up that it was already almost out of sight. "That was his soul!?"

"I'm not entirely certain, but given the evidence it's a reasonable enough presump-" The echidna was cut off when the tip of the Yamato was pointed at his throat. "Perhaps now would not be the best time for scientific conjuncture," he said, raising his hands up.

"You don't say." The reply from Sorun was dry and hollow. The raw panic he'd felt from earlier was beginning to settle and be replaced by cold anger on top of all the confusion he felt, and it was only his desire for answers that stopped him from impaling the echidna right there. "If you don't start talking right now you're going up there with him."

"I really don't think threats are the way to go about th-"

"There is a dead child five fucking feet away from us." The sword was pressed deep enough to Finitevus' throat that a drop of blood began to roll down his throat. Sorun's own facial features became extremely strained as the hand gripping his sword began to shake. "If you make one more goddamn joke or scientific observation in the face of that then I don't care what you have to say, you die regardless."

Finitevus' features flattened, but even so his eyes became wary. "She isn't dead. At least not all the way."

Sorun exhaled loudly through his nose. He examined the echidna's face for a few moment and, not detecting any hint of a lie, lowered the sword by a centimeter. "Speak."

"I would if you would quit threatening me and demanding I explain everything."

"Sorun!"

Had that panicked voice come a second later, Sorun didn't know if he would have actually plunged his sword into Finitevus' throat right there or not. He certainly felt like he would have, but hearing Nicole's voice made him drop the sword away from and nearly forget about the echidna as he turned to the side. She'd appeared right besides them, looking more distressed than Sorun had ever seen her before. Even seeing her in the aftermath of the Knothole bombing paled in comparison to the frightened, mortified look on her face.

"Uh..." Sorun's arms dropped limply at his sides, with the Yamato's tip scraping against the ground. He didn't know what he was supposed to say to her here, with a... he didn't even know what to call it, a huskified child and a pair of Chao near him with Sorun himself having pointing a sword at an evil echidna. "Nicole, I don't know- I-" He looked at Cream's body. "I don't know, she-"

"Sorun, it's everyone."

He felt his mouth go dry, and then turned to face Nicole again. She looked so distressed she couldn't even meet his gaze, though what he could see looked almost grief-stricken. Particularly her eyes, wide and horrified. "W-what?" Sorun stammered out, hardly believing what he just heard.

"The entire city," she quietly clarified. "Everyone- everybody just became lifeless like that in an instant, and I can't figure out... Sorun, what is happening ?"

She looked at him with a sad expression he'd seldom ever seen on Nicole's face, one that was silently pleading for help, but Sorun didn't have the words. He hadn't even known the entire city was in the same state Cream and the two Chao were seemingly in, and now he was reeling from the information. Too much at once and too many implications behind it that made Sorun sick and stumble on his feet. He almost collapsed right there and then from the news.

Everybody in the whole city was like the other three? Every single person except for Sorun himself, Nicole, and Finitevus? Everyone?

"I, I don't, what, I-I..."

"Perhaps," came the smooth, masculine voice from behind Sorun, causing him to whirl back around at Finitevus as he began speaking, "we should consider getting the young one somewhere to examine her proper. And then we can talk about the current situation and what to do about it."

While Sorun was stuck staring dumbly at the echidna, hand tightly gripping the handle of his sword, Nicole, after some visible hesitation, made a small nod. "I'll... I'll take Cream to the hospital," she offered, stepping over to the rabbit's body and bending down to pick her up. "I'm familiar with all the equipment there, so I'll examine her."

Sorun shot her a surprised look. "You're familiar with hospital equipment?"

Having scooped up the child's body in her arms, Nicole stood back up only to give Sorun a flat expression. "Sorun, I made all the hospital equipment."

"Oh, right..." Despite everything, Sorun managed a small, embarrassed grin that was microscopic in size. So small it was imperceptible. But it was a tiny moment of levity in a quickly-worsening situation that he was extremely grateful for. "Yeah, go. We'll catch up."

Nicole nodded, and without another word she and the rabbit she was carrying disappeared via teleport. Sorun stared after the spot they'd left in, and then immediately faced back towards Finitevus, who seemed neutral towards the whole exchange. The invisible grin was replaced by an intense frown as Sorun stared at the echidna, who met his gaze with an unflinching look. After a few seconds, Sorun nodded his head in the direction of the hospital.

"Alright, come on. Let's go," he said, turning around to leave.

"Glady." Finitevus fell in behind Sorun and began walking in the same direction as him. "You know, it was hard to notice past all your stuttering, but I can't help but point out that you weren't nearly as vulgar with the construct as you are with me."

"I don't swear around people I like," Sorun said.

"Oh? And after all I've done to help, I don't warrant even an inkling of trust? Is that what you mean to say?"

Sorun inhaled deeply, hands shaking as he resisted the urge to stab Finitevus with his katana. It was an urge he just barely managed to reign in. "Talking like a shifty motherfucker the way you do ain't really helpin' your case," he said, willing himself to place the sword in the scabbard he carried in his left hand. "And trust and liking are two entirely separate things. Figured someone with your supposed oh-mighty intellect would know that already."

"I never boast of my intelligence over oth-" When Sorun's head turned around to look at Finitevus, he cut himself off with a small chuckle at the incredulous stare Sorun shot him. "Fair enough, guilty as charged," he admitted. "Considering you tried to kill me in the past I would say I'm extending a generous amount of trust to you."

"That'd be way more noble of you if you didn't try killing me, too. And talked about dissecting me. And used a crazy god to possess my friend in a poor attempt at taking over the world."

"You shot swords at me mid-sentence."

An action Sorun still didn't regret trying. "... Mf, touché." He turned back forwards. "How about we go to the hospital to discuss what's going on and go from there. That work for you, Fin?"

There was a disgruntled sigh from behind him. "I'd be more satisfied if you used my name correctly."

"Maybe I will if I start actually respecting you." And if Sorun remembered how to actually say his name properly, which he didn't, but seeing as he doubted they'd ever come to any kind of amicable relationship he doubted there was a need to stress about that.

Frankly speaking, Sorun didn't trust him at all, period. But he seemed to be the only person that knew what was happening, and, asides from Nicole, was the only person around at all. So he'd keep him at sword's length for now, hear his words, decide how much of them to believe and go from there. Worst case Nicole would be nearby in case something happened, and between her near-omniscience and near-omnipotence while in the city and his Yamato he doubted Finitevus posed too much of a threat.

Problems for later, though. Right now he had to figure out what seemed to suck the life out of the whole city.

They'd situated themselves in one of the upper levels of the hospital. At the end of a narrow hallway, sitting in chairs facing each other with a windowed wall at Sorun's left side. He'd looked through it periodically to look out into the town, wincing at all the bodies he saw in the streets. Bodies that, if he didn't know any better, were all dead. Hell, maybe they were dead. He didn't know precisely what the deal was yet with any of this.

And then he'd look away from the window and ahead at Finitevus. He'd availed himself to some of the medical supplies the hospital had to patch up the wounds he'd suffered, but beyond that Sorun had an opportunity to get a good look at the guy's face. He looked... tired wasn't the right word. Defeated, maybe. He tried acting it off but there was a noticeable lack of energy in some of his movements that Sorun caught. Not hard to recognize when he'd been the same way himself more times than he cared to mention.

Through it all, though, Finitevus had given Sorun the rundown on what was happening. And with every sentence that passed he found it harder and harder keeping the sword he carried sheathed.

"Hahhh... Alright. Lemme get this straight." Sorun had began rubbing at his forehead in an unsuccessful attempt at relieving his stress while the white echidna watched on. "Your dumb ass tried bringing back Enerjak. Again. But you screwed up and now he's loose without your control."

"It was hardly my fault," the scientist denied, crossing his arms and turning his nose up. "I'd... enlisted the help of someone. A... a man. A man that dressed in red. He helped me usher Enerjak back into the world through the Guardian." An intense scowl marred his face as his head lowered. "But he betrayed me. Tampered with the hex I used, made it so I couldn't exert control over Enerjak. Now he's free to run wild and do as he pleases using his omnipotent abilities and I'm powerless to stop it."

"A man in red..." Sorun mumbled out. "Just like the one Shadow talked about. The one that hurt Rouge and somehow knew about my condition. The same one?" It had to be. There couldn't be that many mysterious, enigmatic people that dressed up in red. Even on Mobius. "What was his name?" Sorun asked. "What did he look like? Did you at least catch his species?"

"I... don't remember."

Disbelief immediately flashed over Sorun's face. "You don't remember?" he echoed. "What kind of shit scientist are you that you don't remember important details like that?"

Finitevus grit his teeth at that remark, seemingly incensed by the human's words. "He took my memories," he hissed out. "Of him. Specifically of him. I don't know why, but there were... there were certain details he didn't want... why didn't he want...?" He sighed out and rose a hand up to his forehead, while Sorun had calmed down at the sight. "I only remember he helped me with the hex and then tampered with it behind my back. He took enough memories so that I remember he was there and what he did, but a majority of the words we shared and the details escape me. I can't even recall how he tampered with my hex. It shouldn't have been possible."

"Why would he do that...?" Sorun wondered, mostly to himself. If he had that ability, why not use it on Rouge? Why go through so much effort to keep his existence hidden if he allowed the knowledge he existed to be out? Were there limits to the ability? Or was it intentional? Who even was he?

"Someone who wants to wreck the world, probably. Except... according to Rouge, he gave us that last Emerald. Did he just want to kill me? But if he had it why wait so late to give it to me? Is there some other angle here? Something I'm not seeing? How'd he even know about me to begin with...?" Sorun sighed and rubbed at his eyes. "I don't know. Does it even matter? We have more important things to worry about."

Mysterious man in red could wait. Mad golden god was the current problem. One Sorun had severe fears and doubts over given their last encounter.

"Fine, so... red guy double-crosses you, and Enerjak is back but not under your control," Sorun summarized. "What happened then?"

"I fled. Clearly," Finitevus scoffed out. "I highly doubted Enerjak would have taken kindly to my attempts to control him in the past. I wanted to take measures in eliminating him due to the threat he poses against the world," he explained. "I was aware his father had a weapon capable of defeating him at the cost of the host's life. I sought him out for aid, but... it seemed the weapon had been sabotaged. The red man's interference, perhaps. It was a moot point anyways, as Enerjak... caught up with his host's father and small companion, as it were, along with the Chaotix team." He made an unsettled hum. "It wasn't a long fight. I can't even say it was a fight. He'd... simply used his power to extract those glowing spheres from their bodies, and they lifelessly fell to the ground right after."

"You... said those were souls," Sorun slowly said, causing Finitevus to nod. "What the hell, he can just do that?"

"He's quite literally omnipotent. You've seen his feats in the past," the scientist reminded him, causing Sorun to nod. "The fact he has free access to the Master Emerald, thereby an unlimited source of energy, doesn't help matters. Chaos energy, after all, is-"

"Energy shaped by the heart, yadda yadda, heard the speech," Sorun muttered. "So the sky's all him?"

"Whether it's a natural effect of all the Chaos energy he's passively emitting into the atmosphere or his will is unclear to me, but yes," Finitevus confirmed. "Many interested parties came to Angel Island to intercept the energy his mere existence is exuding, all with predictable outcomes. That black-and-red hybrid hedgehog I've heard about and his Overlander military consorts, scouts from Dr. Robotnik in the form of the Dark Legion members that foolishly joined him, even your own Freedom Fighters... as you can imagine, they all swiftly met the same fate as the Chaotix. Not a one managed to evade him."

Sorun was silent at that. He'd figured that was the most likely outcome of what happened, but he didn't want to believe it. Didn't want to believe that all of his friends had their souls sucked out of them and they were all little more than lifeless husks now, and who knew what Enerjak did with the bodies, let alone what was going on with the souls. He felt like throwing up out of fear and worry alone for them. He ended up just slumping forwards while cradling his head in his hand.

"What the actual fuck..." he thought to himself. "Everybody's... everyone's gone? Just like that? What am I... what's gonna happen now? Guys..." He breathed out a shaky sigh and sat up in his seat, face gaunt and nearly as lifeless as the husks outside. Finitevus had the decency not to comment. "Fuck. Fuck, man, I... goddammit." He ran a hand over his haggard face. "Alright, so what happened with you?"

"I spent a long time using my Warp Rings just evading him as I searched for a solution. He... created those strange constructs you saw. Raw Chaos energy weaved into forms and guided by the souls he placed in them," he explained. "I gave up and came here. You saw an injured person in need of help and immediately began kicking him despite the fact he saved you from the fate that befell everyone else. The rest you know."

"Right, that..." Awkwardly rubbing the back of his neck, Sorun turned his head to the side. "Thanks, by the way," he mumbled. "For warning me about the core. I would have went for it if you hadn't said anything, and... I figured if I used Yamato to destroy that it would have killed Espio if that soul ball really was his."

"Hh..." Finitevus dipped his eyes downwards. "I merely figured you'd be less inclined to help if I let you murder one of your friends. Don't go forgiving me yet."

"We're a long fucking way from forgiveness seeing as this is all mostly your fault," Sorun snapped, turning back to him. "Why are you even here? What do you want?"

"My control over Enerjak was what kept his... tendencies in check," Finitevus said, not flinching at the glare Sorun sent him. "You see the results of an unchained Enerjak. I can't say much towards his motives - I simply don't know - but I see the results. You may find this hard to believe, but a world of soulless husks is a far cry from the world I envisioned. The problem needs to be rectified." He pointed downwards, to Sorun's left side. " That is the only thing in the world that can rectify the situation."

Sorun glanced down at his left hand. He immediately understood what the echidna was referring to when he saw the Yamato, and then let out a dry chuckle. "You want my sword," he said. "You need the Yamato to deal with Enerjak."

"It has a proven history of being effective against him," Finitevus coolly replied. "Unless you know of some other artifact we can use to solve this problem?"

"... Not one as good as this, no," Sorun admitted. "So-"

He was interrupted when Nicole teleported into the space between the two of them. Finitevus had jumped up a bit, not expecting the sudden appearance of the lynx. Sorun hadn't outwardly reacted at all, though he did feel his heavily-beating heart become a bit more at ease at seeing her, letting him relax just the barest amount.

"I've... finished my examination of Cream, you two," she said. "Please follow me."

Wordlessly, they obeyed and stood up to follow her as she lead them down further into the hospital. They were lead into a room separated by a pane of glass. On the other side Sorun saw Cream lying on a medical bed. Still lifeless, still possessing those horrible white eyes. He felt sick just looking at her, and sicker knowing everybody else was the same way. Sally, Antoine and Bunnie, Shadow, the whole city, everyone . There was so much worry in him he could barely stand.

"As far as I can tell she's alive," Nicole said, bringing a smidgeon of hope into Sorun, "but there's no brain activity whatsoever. Even her vitals are... odd," she informed them. "They're not reading her as dead, but... they're not active, either. Medically it doesn't make any sense at all. It's as if she's in some form of stasis, but the fact there's zero activity whatsoever-"

"Logic often flounders about a bit in the face of Chaos energy. It's a tricky science." Both Nicole and Sorun turned to the side, where they saw Finitevus with his arms crossed leaning back against a nearby medical cabinet. "I'm familiar with this affliction. It's ancient echidna magic. Forbidden arts, mainly due to how easy it is to fumble. As I said, tricky business, by evidently for Enerjak it's mere child's play." He faced towards Cream. "In order for him to keep the souls he extracts, the body needs to be kept alive- preserved by Chaos energy. If the body dies, then the soul is released into the beyond, and not even he can do anything to stop that. So the souls are tangentially linked to the vessels despite being partially separated."

"That would explain how the body continues to live despite cessation of all metabolic processes..." Nicole said. "If that's the case, then I doubt we need to worry about the bodies, erm... expiring, if they're being kept preserved."

Finitevus nodded. "Precisely my thoughts," he agreed. "Enerjak's energy is most likely even keeping them safe from exposure as well; even he would be hard-pressed to take care of billions of bodies. Simpler to have them remain where they are and ensure they remain intact."

"Wait, billions?" Sorun turned back to Finitevus. "You mean that wave-"

"Angel Island is nowhere even close to here. In fact, it's on the other side of the world currently," he informed them, making Sorun pale and Nicole blanch. "I have little doubt Enerjak has extracted the soul of every single living being on this entire planet. He certainly has the capability to do so. The only exceptions would be us three: Sorun and I due to me being in a position to take preventative measures to save us, and you, I imagine, due to being an artificial creation." He looked closer at Nicole, and then leaned forwards. "You truly are quite fascinating, by the way. No soul, but so lifelike. And despite being artificial, I... sense just the barest hint of Chaos energy from you. Whoever created you certainly took some creative liberties, hm...?"

"Hey, hey, how about we stay on topic?" Sorun had seen the way Nicole had reacted to the way Finitevus was almost leering at her, that slightly disturbed look that made her take a step back, and he reflexively felt his hand tighten around Yamato as a result. "So the whole world?" he asked when Finitevus looked back at him. "The whole world's like this? It's just us three?"

"Apparently," he confirmed.

"Well then..." Sorun sighed out and rubbed at his forehead again. In terms of bad news, he was barely even able to imagine the scope of what he just heard. It gave him a headache trying and he did his best to forget the information as he asked, "Are they aware? The souls, are they... do all the people even know what's going on?"

Finitevus hummed. Sorun and Nicole had both given him hopeful looks as he turned towards Cream to briefly glance over the body. "It's extremely doubtful," he said. "Considering that... 'drone' Enerjak created could do little more than stumble about like some inebriated fool and attack in a very instinctual matter despite being driven by stolen souls, I can't see it. And I would know since I had to dodge fifty of those things up on the island." He looked back at the pair. "It might have to do with the fact that the souls and the bodies are not entirely separated. Not alive, not dead, in this in-between state purely so Enerjak can do with the souls as he pleases. I imagine from their perspective it's much like being asleep. Personality quirks and habits of the such that have been imprinted in their very being over a lifetime, yes, but those are mere echoes in the souls. For all intents and purposes it appears the actual people are not with us."

"Alright, great, don't have to worry about a whole planet full of traumatized people that got their souls ripped out," Sorun thought. Small mercy, but it was something. "But we can save them, right?" he pressed. "If we got all the souls back from Enerjak and just put them back in the bodies? That fixes it, doesn't it?"

"In theory, I suppose."

Once he heard that, Sorun whirled right around and began to briskly walk out of the examination room. His right hand began reaching for the katana's handle as his eyes narrowed forwards, though he'd only made it a few steps into the hallway before a voice stopped him.

"And where do you think you're going, hmm?" Finitevus drawled out, sounding almost bored.

"To get everyone's souls back. Where else?" Sorun answered, refusing to turn around.

He heard a scoff behind him. "You'll lose," the echidna replied in a flat voice. "I don't care how strong that sword is. That alone is not enough."

"I only need one hit," Sorun argued, sounding frustrated. His left grip on the sword began to grow so tight his knuckles turned white and his teeth began to grind together. "I just need one hit with Yamato to separate Knuckles and Enerjak, and then-"

"And you really think you'll get that hit?" Finitevus countered. "You've fought him before. He knows exactly what you and that sword can do. He's a god with omnipotent abilities that can wipe you away with a mere glance, so if you truly think you're going to be able to march right on up to Angel Island and get a clean win with nothing but that gimmicky sword-"

"Well, what else am I supposed to do!?" Sorun shouted out, turning right back around towards the room. Nicole, who'd mainly been standing off to the side and kept quiet, flinched back at Sorun's raised voice and retreated to the nearby wall, while Finitevus remained undeterred even as Sorun stomped back into the room. "We're the only three people left in the world! You're not gonna do anything, she can't do anything-" he nodded to Nicole, "- since she's constrained to the city, I'm the one with the magic sword so I'm going!"

"... So your plan?" Finitevus asked. "I trust with such enthusiasm you do have one, yes?"

The amount of pressure being exerted from Sorun biting down on his own teeth was enough that they threatened to crack. His knuckles began popping from how hardly he was squeezing the sword. There was physical pain in both his mouth and hand from this, but despite that Sorun wasn't able to stop due to the sheer amount of rage and grief he felt over knowing the whole world was just like the seemingly lifeless rabbit child he was looking at. He couldn't bear it. It was too much, and he wanted to fix it. Fix everyone and make sure Enerjak could never do something like this again.

He wanted so badly just to get everyone back, but deep inside he knew Finitevus was right. He couldn't fight a god with just Yamato. The katana was needed, but on its own it wasn't enough. As much as he hated the thought, he knew the echidna was right. He'd die within a second if he tried fighting Enerjak as-is. But there was such an intense need Sorun felt to fix this and bring everybody back that he was so tempted to ignore the danger and go fight him regardless.

"I... I don't want to lose another world..."

"Sorun..." Nicole's voice managed to bring Sorun back down to earth. He'd automatically relaxed his grip on the sword upon hearing her and instantly turned towards the lynx, who was giving him a concerned look. "I... I think it would be best if we stepped back and took some time to examine the situation properly."

"N-Nicole, come on, you can't be serious..."

"I know it sounds cruel, but technically speaking there's no real danger of us taking our time with this," she explained in a calm voice. "I know you want to save everyone. I do, too. But running off without even so much as a plan isn't going to help anybody."

"Spoken like a true machine." This remark had earned Finitevus glares from both Sorun and Nicole. He ignored them both and idly glanced out the one window in the examination room. "In other news, we've other issues at the moment. Case in point..."

He nodded his head towards the window. Sorun, who by now had managed to almost fully relax his grip and jaw, stepped out towards the window to see what the echidna was referring to. He understood immediately when he looked outside: there were more of those golden, thread-like beings with the souls in their centers stalking around the city. Sorun managed to count dozens of the things from a cursory glance alone. They weren't going directly towards the hospital, fortunately enough. It looked more like they were just stumbling around randomly, as if they were looking for something.

"More of those drones. Sent here looking for me most likely," Finitevus said. "I'd advise against attacking them. It'll just draw more attention here and risk the souls inhabiting them, or worse, Enerjak himself. Better to evade them entirely and let them think the city's empty to buy us some breathing room."

The hand slowly moving towards Yamato's handle relaxed and fell back to Sorun's side. He'd been meaning to go out there and cut them all down, but Finitevus' logic managed to convince him and stay his hand. He still didn't like the idea of hiding out in a hospital, though. Too macabre, and the other huskified bodies lying around the building didn't make him feel easier. He'd had to step over Dr. Quack's body and a dozen patients just to get to this floor.

"I can take us somewhere safer." As if she were reading his mind, Nicole had spoken up and said something that gained the attention of the other two. "I had figured it wouldn't be safe for any of us to be out in the open, so I've been instructing the city's nanites to construct a new structure in the meantime. It just now finished construction," she informed them.

"Nan... what now?" Finitevus blinked and looked over to Sorun for help. "Do you know what she's talking about?"

"Yeah."

"... Are you going to illuminate to me what that is?"

"You're a smart guy. You can figure it out on your own."

"You two, please," Nicole sighed out in a pleading voice. "I made a shelter underground that should be safe for us to inhabit for the time being. I even went through the trouble of relocating myself to a backup server there, just in case. We should be fine to transport there now." She gave them both pointed looks. "So once again I would ask that you please stop bickering when we all need to cooperate with one another."

Sorun and Finitevus glanced at each other. Both scoffed and turned their eyes away from the other, with Finitevus muttering, "It truly is the end of days when a machine is the one speaking the most sense."

"We're gonna get along great, Finton, I can just tell."

"..." The echidna's dark eyes darted towards Sorun. He grit his teeth and growled a bit under his breath, and then looked back at Nicole. "Just take us to this bunker already."

Without another word, the three of them were engulfed in a flash of green light. The disorientation of the light combined with the momentary feeling of weightlessness had only affected Sorun for less than a second before he immediately felt he was in a different place once the light faded and his feet was back on the ground. Darker lighting, slightly colder, the lack of the clean disinfectant smell of the hospital.

When he looked around, he saw that Finitevus hadn't been too far off when he called this place a bunker. A rather spacious one with low lighting: a central room empty save for some chairs and a few pieces of furniture. A small kitchen off the ways. A room a bit further in that was empty except for a large, circular device in the ground that had a glowing green, grid-like pattern on top of it. A few more doors here and there that obviously went to various rooms.

As far as impromptu bunkers went it was an extremely impressive one, but by now Sorun stopped being fazed by the things Nicole could do with the nanites. What was a single bunker when she'd constructed the entire city in under a half an hour once she'd gotten the plans together, really?

"So this is to be our little base of operations, hm?" Finitevus mused. He hummed and took a quick glance around, and though he tried to hide it Sorun saw there was a small glint of surprise in his eyes. "It's... admittedly well above adequate. Yes, I think this will do us very nicely."

Any other time Sorun would have imagined Nicole would have put on a bashful smile mixed with a bit of pride. He was saddened to see there wasn't even a hint of joy on her face. A given, considering everything happening, but to see her look so dour only went to sour his own mood even further.

"It wasn't much effort on my part," she blankly replied. "We should be able to monitor the situation above from here. And, hopefully, figure out what to do."

Sorun breathed heavily through his nose. It was a start in a hopeless situation, he supposed. "So," he said, turning around to the two, "where do we start first?"

Chapter 75

Recursion Error

Episode 75- Suicide speedrun

It had been a few days into what Sorun had called, lacking any better way of labeling the situation, the Soul Apocalypse. A really dumb name he hoped to never verbally utter.

All that time had been consolidated in the underground shelter Nicole had built. Those golden thread things, the drones as Finitevus called them, stopped appearing in the city after the first day, likely having moved on, but the three of them had all elected to stay in the shelter regardless for safety's sake. Safety or not, though, the experience of living here was hell.

He hadn't been able to sleep much. Almost not at all. Between the knowledge of what was happening and his intense worry for everybody, how could he? It was the only thing he could think of. He couldn't get Cream's lifeless, ghoulish expression out of his mind and he couldn't help putting that same expression on all his friends knowing they were all the same way, and all it did was make Sorun feel worse. Helpless. Weak. Powerless.

The other two inhabitants with him weren't helping matters much. They'd all come together to fill each other in on details to try and pool all their information together and come up with an answer for fixing this, but the longer this went on the more Sorun thought it was all for naught. Nearly every single day he heard Nicole and Finitevus arguing about something or other; they were spitballing possible solutions and they couldn't agree on anything. Or come up with anything viable.

He could still here them arguing all the way from here. In that room with the weird green dias thing, some thing used for monitoring the city, Sorun couldn't retain the information when Nicole briefly explained what it was. And meanwhile all he could do was sit down in a chair in the next room while blankly staring down at the floor.

"Why did it turn out like this? I thought things would finally be different. I'd be done with the fighting. With the worrying. I just wanted to live in peace again." He slumped so far in the chair Sorun's body threatened to tumble right out of it. "I just wanted a peaceful life for me and everyone else. That's all I wanted. But something like this always happens. Why did I think things would finally be different? Just because it was all starting to finally work out for me?

"Why did I bother coming back to life when it was only going to go this way...?"

The nearby shouting ceased. He saw Finitevus stomp out of the room in a huff, leaving Nicole alone in there to continue monitoring an empty city. He stopped in front of Sorun, and when he glanced up at his face he saw he was looking about as bad as Sorun felt. Impressive, really, considering the last time Sorun felt this bad he was on the verge of dying.

"I'm going to the lab if you want to assist me further in my studies." That was all the albino echidna offered him before turning around and walking towards a nearby door. He'd opened the door and walked through it, not even bothering to close the door behind him. Sorun stared after the door for a bit, and then looked over at Nicole, still focusing on the green dias. He wanted to talk with her, but quite honestly he didn't have anything to say to her and didn't want to disturb her. So Sorun sighed, left the chair, and then walked over towards the door Finitevus had entered.

In what anybody else would see as a very questionable choice Sorun decided to let Finitevus run some experiments on him.

The Mobian had seemed surprised that Sorun even agreed to it when he'd brought it up. Nicole had been vehemently against it - she'd built Finitevus a small lab to help them fix the problem afflicting the world, not prod at Sorun - but, either not to incur her anger any further or maybe just to give Sorun a break since he was consensually agreeing to be experimented on, he promised to only perform non-invasive examinations and do some bloodwork. And, in fairness to him, he hadn't broken that promise. It creeped Sorun out how giddy he was over having the opportunity to examine him like a lab rat, but he kept his word and maintained the boundaries. A point to his integrity, Sorun supposed. Surprisingly there was some in there.

Sorun himself wasn't so sure why he'd agreed to let Finitevus run his experiments. He hadn't thought on it at all and just automatically agreed to it. Maybe to have something to do to pass the time and take his mind off things, because it wasn't like Sorun had anything better to do than think, or maybe he was curious about what the echidna would find regarding his unique biology by this world's standards. He didn't know. He just said yes. He knew Nicole wasn't at all comfortable with it, and he was all but certain she had a camera in that room somewhere monitoring them just in case, but since Finitevus kept to his word she didn't do anything to stop it. Then again, maybe he only kept his word because he knew there was no of getting out of it if he was caught lying. Not like he could afford to lose his only allies in the world.

Sorun didn't know. Sorun didn't care. He didn't care about much at the moment.

The echidna himself mystified Sorun to no end. He'd hated him at first- genuinely hated him. Hated him for everything he'd done and being responsible for Enerjak. Fantasized about sticking Yamato in his throat while he slept at night, almost did at one point. But spending some days in close proximity to Finitevus gave Sorun some perspective. They were in the same boat, essentially. And he had his own reasons, sure, but in a way he was trying to fix this terrible mistake he made. For better or worse the three of them were in this together whether they liked it or not, so Sorun tried looking past everything he disliked about Finitevus - admittedly a long list - and tried looking at the man himself.

He was... charming, in some way. Oddly very respectful and polite despite having a history of being a lying snake and a maniac. Sorun had noticed he'd become much more amicable towards the human when he volunteered to testing, so maybe that'd went towards getting on his good side. But they'd spent some time alone together, in silence mostly with some small talk here and there, but through all that Sorun came to the startling realization that Finitevus was actually pleasant to be around. Considering who he was it seemed bizarre, but in a strange turn Sorun found he didn't all that much mind the echidna's company.

That's what confused him so much. How somebody so tolerable could do so many terrible things. Why had he facilitated Albion's destruction? What was his fixation on Enerjak? Why did he desire world destruction so much? Now that Sorun had gotten to know him somewhat he couldn't see any of these qualities in him. So he couldn't figure out what would drive Finitevus to these lengths.

There had to be some good in there, somewhere. There couldn't not be. He only showed shreds of remorse for what he'd done, but shreds or not it was still remorse. Even if Finitevus tried hiding it.

"Why are you so fascinated with me, doctor?" This was the first question Sorun decided to ask to start his line of questioning. He was sitting on an examination table while Finitevus was sitting nearby in front of a microscope, looking at more of Sorun's blood. There must have been something interesting in his blood, because it almost seemed like he couldn't tear himself away from it.

With his back to him, Finitevus said, "You're interesting. The entire concept of your zone is interesting." He lifted his eyes away from the microscope and turned to Sorun. "You shouldn't exist. That whole zone shouldn't. And yet, somehow, it does. Chaos energy is the source of all life, of everything . Not just living creatures, but materials as well. Matter itself, energy, it all leads back to Chaos energy." He pointed at Sorun. "But you have none. No link, no inherent Chaos energy stores of your own. The fact you're able to manipulate the energies with such finesse is more a side-effect of this phenomenon than anything else, though I've yet to crack exactly why this is." He turned back to the microscope. "But, as you know, this comes at the caveat that your species' biology never adapted to Chaos energy due to your lack of exposure."

"Then I die, been there," Sorun muttered. Not really any grand revelations in that statement; he'd know this already. "No theories on why my zone exists? I've heard it isn't even connected to the... what did Tails call it, the-the something highway? I still don't know what that is." He shook his head. "He said it's not even connected to that. That it's... really far away from the rest of the multiverse."

"I'm not so surprised. You'd have to be separated from the rest of the multiverse to escape the Chaos Force's influence, but I still don't know how your zone came to be. The formations of zones in general is unknown, so it's anybody's guess. A far-flung piece of debris made at the beginning of creation that developed into its own universe, perhaps. An accident. With so little evidence all I could offer is conjecture." He fiddled with a knob on the microscope. "Your biology is rather unique, as well. I've seldom had a chance to examine Overlanders and the Station Square humans, but you're nothing like them."

"Really?" Sorun drawled out. "Wouldn't have figured. The Overlanders 'cause of the gene bomb's tampering, I could guess, but the Station Square guys? I figured it was because we were separated by thousands of years of evolution. And the fact I'm from another universe."

"Contributing factors, yes. That and they're all inbred."

Sorun paused. "Inbred?" he repeated. "What do you mean?"

Finitevus sighed. "Generally speaking you need a population size of around five-hundred subjects to maintain a diverse enough gene pool to maintain a species in perpetuity. That city was made when a human airship crashed into a mountain and the passengers decided to expand a city inside of said mountain using the plane's technology. How many humans do you think were in that plane at the time?" A dawning expression crossed Sorun's expression, while Finitevus continued looking in the microscope. "I'd wager there were two-hundred and fifty humans at the least to four-hundred at most," he continued. "Just enough that they've eked it out this far, but on a genetic level they're all damaged to varying degrees. Mingling with the Overlanders may fix that in time, but I'm not a geneticist. I don't know for sure."

"Figures. They did look... slightly off when I saw them," Sorun quietly admitted. "Thought it was just the evolution thing, but... man." He looked to the side. "I dunno, back then I figured I could connect to people of my own kind, but I never felt anything with the Station Square people. I felt even less with the Overlanders. The gene bombs made them evolve weirdly." He made a soured face. "The weird anime hair some of them had was one thing, but some of them only had four fingers."

"Devolution."

"Hm?" Making a curious sound, Sorun leaned a bit forwards on the table towards Finitevus. "What do you mean?"

"The gene bombs were meant to render all organic life on this planet down to their base components. This was true for everything except the lucky humans that escaped that fate but were still exposed to its effects. Because the Xorda's technology utilized Chaos energy life survived and gave birth to Mobians, but the fact remains those bombs aren't meant to evolve life. They devolve life." He made a scoff. "The genetic mutations and degradation that gave birth to Overlanders is arguably worse than the inbreeding of the Station Square inhabitants."

"A devolution of the human species, huh...?" Well, it was new information. Knowing they were what humans would look like if they evolved backwards made Sorun feel a bit of sympathy and sadness towards them. Maybe even a bit sideways given the mutations caused from the bombs. It just sounded unfortunate to him. "Is that why they always kept fighting Mobians?" he asked. "I haven't really interacted with many."

"Hard to say. They're certainly more aggressive than normal humans, at least from a purely statistical view. I've heard Station Square has been quite accommodating of Mobian culture, whereas relations between Mobians and Overlanders are still significantly strained. On the other hand, the mutations were certainly beneficial: from an objective standpoint my observations have proven Overlanders have a superior physical ability to humans, and rarer subjects greater intelligence. You only need to look at Dr. Robotnik for that. But there's many things that are affected by their damaged DNA and the mutations. Some benign, like the diverse hair pigmentations normal humans lack and their number of digits, more inhibiting factors like metabolism or height, things of that nature."

"Yeah, Snively always was pretty short. Shorter than me, even, which was... kinda weird, really," Sorun admitted. And empowering, in a way.

Finitevus hummed. "That's nothing to say of how they were mentally affected." He paused. "I'm not quite sure if it's a result of the gene bombs' meddling or just a natural progression of culture. Take Mobians. You've lived among them for some time. They're... caring ." The echidna clenched his teeth and shook his head. "Nonviolent, generous, overly protective. Not incapable of violence, as you've clearly seen, but it's just not in their nature. Adaptability and survival instincts are the only reason violence even exists in the world of Mobians and how they managed to survive wars with the Overlanders." He turned a knob on the microscope again. "But with Overlanders, it's almost the complete opposite. Like the genetic tampering the gene bombs afflicted on them heightened the worst in humanity. Aggression and a desire for conflict. I haven't seen much, if any, pieces of human history in my travels, so perhaps you could enlighten me seeing as you're the only 'pure' human in this world? You're more an expert on human nature than I am, after all."

Sorun bit his lower lip in response. He turned away from the echidna, thinking long and hard about his words before he spoke. "Humanity's a mixed bag full of the best and worst. In my world we did amazing things, and we also did... well, unspeakable things," he said. "There are things in human history I've refrained from ever mentioning to everybody here because those concepts and ideas simply don't exist in this world. Or if they did the gene bombs wiped them out. I don't want to seed any ideas to anyone so I keep it all to myself. I know things that would probably give a Mobian a nervous breakdown by simply speaking it."

He'd be hard-pressed to be so knowledgeable of so many forms of fiction and media without having seen the worst in humanity. Or human history, for that matter. He'd be damned if he ever mentioned even a fraction of 'Berserk' to anybody here, art that it was besides. Real-world examples like the Holocaust, Unit 731 and third-world countries strapping explosives to children to throw at the enemy would be taken to his grave if he could help it. Countless horrible example he knew about just from sitting in a history classroom or browsing the internet.

Some things were just better left unsaid. In a world where these concepts didn't exist, he didn't need to say them and risk making a reality of them. More than that he didn't want to hurt anybody by mentioning these things. And for all the bad, there was an equal if not greater amount of good in humanity he could always say to keep curious questions satiated. Enough that he never even had to think about mentioning the bad.

They didn't need to know. None of that was for Mobian ears.

"But still, I don't want to believe Overlanders are automatically bad just because of a bunch of bad mutations," Sorun said. "It... does upset me, what happened to them. They're not humans anymore, simple as that. Nothing but offshoots. Even so you can't say a whole species is bad just because of, I don't even know, genetic mental disposition or whatever you want to call it. There's no way." He waved a hand. "Plus I've heard of good Overlanders that cooperated with Mobians. That, uh... what was his name, Nate Morgan. Yeah. I heard everyone liked him. And this one girl I heard about, Hope-something. Heard she lived in Knothole for a bit before going over to G.U.N. and everybody seemed to have a high opinion of her."

"That's a product of free will, Sorun. Sapient beings aren't so set in personality they rigidly conform to baser instincts and inclinations. Influenced, perhaps, but not forced," Finitevus argued. "You think every single Mobian is so frustratingly altruistic?"

"Considering echidna exist? Nah."

A low sigh from Finitevus. "Besides echidna," he muttered out. "History is rife with many abhorrent Mobians. I'm sure you've met a few yourself."

The image of a band of jackals, one specific one with mismatched eyes, came to Sorun's mind. "I've met a few, yeah," he admitted. "They're not all great. Most are, though."

"Most in the Republic. You've not travelled much outside of the continent," Finitevus reminded him. "But, these are all outliers. The fact is there's a noticeable pattern in Overlander and Mobian behavior. Whether it's a result of morphological changes induced by the gene bombs or simply the development of culture is a question that lacks enough concrete evidence to substantiate."

"I'm... just not so sure," Sorun hesitantly stated. He didn't like basing behavior off of raw data alone. Just sounded wrong to him. Then again... few exceptions aside, he couldn't deny most Mobians he met were so overly friendly, to an almost startling degree. And he didn't hear many good things about Overlanders. With all that he just didn't know what to think on the matter. "What about you, F? Why aren't you a goody-goody Mobian like everyone else?" he asked in an effort of shifting the conversation.

Finitevus didn't respond at first. He simply moved away from the microscope, and then spun his chair around to face Sorun. He looked at the human for a long few moments before speaking. "I used to be normal," he said. "And then Knuckles happened."

"Oh, come on," Sorun sighed out, "what did he do?"

"I studied him. Back when the Guardian had so much power he was compared to a living Chaos Emerald. I was a scientist in Albion, you see. The ruler there commissioned many of my experiments in response to Knuckles' presence when he briefly visited. She wouldn't admit it, but she feared him. What he was capable of. His potential." Black sparks of electricity flew around his fingers. "To make a long story short, there was an accident from one of my machines. I was changed into this pale form you see before you, and my mind had... opened, as it were. I was given a new perspective and found the way of things is wrong. I sought to correct it."

"By blowing up Albion? By trying to end the world?" Sorun scoffed out, expression incredulous. "Are you serious?"

Finitevus' features thinned. "I can hardly be held accountable for what happened to m-"

"No, uh-uh, we're not going there." Actual anger flared over Sorun's features, and his posture had gone rigid. "So your experiment blew up in your face - literally - and you became this. That's not an excuse. I refuse to believe you got the white fur and black lightning powers and automatically became evil like evil is some kind of tangible substance you can just inject into somebody."

"You wouldn't know," Finitevus denied with a hint of annoyance in his voice. "You weren't afflicted like I was."

"But really, man? Even so, you went this far? You didn't have a friend or family or anything like that on Albion?"

"... I've a tainted soul, Sorun." There wasn't any emotion in Finitevus' voice when he said this. He'd said it with the same attitude as if talking about the weather, making Sorun blink in surprise. "Call it what you want. I don't regret my actions. They were my choices to make, and I made them." He turned his head to the side. "Why does it matter?"

"Just tryin' to figure you out. We don't really have much else to talk about down here," Sorun said. "You wanna believe you got corrupted by evil black energy, then sure, go for it. Blame it for your mistakes." He turned the opposite direction Finitevus turned in. "Power doesn't harm people. Tempt people, bring out the worst in them, maybe, but what it brings out is something that was always there. You got a bit of power that let you do things you couldn't do before and ran with it."

A low, breathy noise left Finitevus. His darkened eyes darted to Sorun, after which he tsked and looked back away. He'd made an expression Sorun couldn't place. "Maybe so. Maybe all those echidna on Albion who labeled me a corrupted abomination were simply looking for an easy answer to what I was. Not that I was a visionary, but just another threat that needed to be removed. Like Knuckles was." He glanced back at Sorun. "You're rather insightful for one without a soul."

"..." Sorun gave Finitevus an odd look. He'd played it off as a weird joke at first, but when he saw Finitevus giving him a genuine stare, he realized he was being serious. Confusion and denial set into Sorun, and when he thought on that statement only more confusion settled in him. "What do you mean I don't have a soul?"

Finitevus didn't say anything. Instead, he stood up out of the chair and walked to Sorun. Black energy arced over his fingers as he held his hand just over Sorun's chest, his yellow irises looking down and scrutinizing some invisible thing Sorun couldn't see. After a few moments, the lightning ceased and he lowered his bandaged hand to his side.

"It's as I say. You've no soul," he said, looking back up at a shocked Sorun. "You're like that machine out there. Nicole. Just a machine made of meat."

"And just how do you figure that?" Sorun demanded. "How could I not have a soul? I walked around as a ghost once when I died. I had the whole out of body experience. Sounds pretty soulful to me." It didn't make any sense. Of course he had a soul. He had to if he'd been a ghost one time, right? Wasn't that how it worked?

A contemplative hum from Finitevus. "Well... saying you don't have a soul is a bit inaccurate," he amended. "You have something there. Some spark of life that drives you. But it's so tiny and insignificant it could hardly be called a soul." He looked down in thought, even going as far as to grab his chin. "It's honestly no surprise you don't have a Chaos Force link with such a weak thing. It couldn't possibly sustain a link. I doubt it could even survive outside your body, unlike anything else whose spirit would be kept intact through their Chaos Force link." He made another, more contemplative hum. Deeper and more drawn out. "Perhaps that's it. Your entire species must possess atrophied souls due to your lack of Chaos Force links to strengthen them. All that's left is this... small, flickering thing I see inside you."

"But that's..." Sorun's mind began whirling. Calmed down a bit knowing there was "something" in there and he wasn't completely empty, but still reeling a bit from the information. "I was still aware when I died. I was a ghost, I-!"

"Your body still possessed the Chaos Emeralds, did it not?" Finitevus interrupted, silencing Sorun. "Your spirit form even retained the abilities. Your kind can form artificial links to the Chaos Force by using an external supply of Chaos energy. It's not unreasonable to think that absorbing those seven Emeralds turned your spark of life into something resembling a true soul. A pseudo-soul in the same vein of thought as your pseudo-link. This same phenomenon is likely what allowed you to exist as a spirit tangentially connected to your Chaos-infused body post-mortem." He made a thoughtful hum. "It's not too dissimilar to what Enerjak has done to everyone, now that I think of it."

"But I wasn't... oh. The regeneration." Something clicked inside of Sorun as he realized an important detail. "One of my abilities back then granted me a regenerative body. Even after dying it kept me intact. I heard everybody was freaking out about my body not decaying."

"The regeneration must have preserved it," Finitevus agreed with a nod. A small, amused laugh left him. "You're... rather fortunate so many unlikely circumstances all happened at once to produce this result."

"Lucky. Right." Sorun's thoughts turned back to the void he'd wound up in after dying. He'd only been able to leave that place because of the Yamato. Because he'd still had his powers then. Would he have even wound up there if he didn't have any of the Emeralds when he died? "None of this makes any sense. How could any of this be possible?"

" Anything is possible with Chaos energy," Finitevus said in a serious tone. "Even the AI has a spark like you do. Whether it's from her very unique construction or constant contact with Chaos energy. A third factor I'm unaware of. A combination of factors. I'm unsure. I just know she has one."

"Good for her..." He wasn't sure how to take the fact he didn't have soul like everyone else. Or that he did have a soul, just not a "soul" soul. What the distinction even was outside of him not having a Chaos Force link, or if there were any other distinctions. "You know how many religions and philosophies humans spent centuries on Earth pondering that you're shattering right now?"

Dryly chuckling, Finitevus walked to the side a bit and hopped up on the examination table to sit besides Sorun. "Me and convention were never on friendly terms," he said. "So what will you do, now that you know?"

"I dunno. Does it even matter? Not like it changes anything." He made it this far just fine, after all. All of humanity did. "End of the day it's not much more than an interesting factoid for all it's worth."

"I'm glad you see it like that. Maybe you'll stop questioning why I make the decisions I do."

Sorun frowned a bit. "You're still on that? It was that upsetting?" He turned his head at Finitevus. "How does that even- I don't- you know what, fine."

He turned to his other side, and then looked down at the glowing object resting right next to him. He grabbed the blue Chaos Emerald, watching as it turned into the Yamato, and then smoothly drew the sword out from the sheath. He cut a cross into the air, after which a portal was opened in front of them. Finitevus didn't say a single word through the entire process, merely observing in fascination.

"Take a walk with me, Fimvim," Sorun said, sliding off the table and gesturing towards the portal.

Finitevus eyed the portal with some suspicion. "Why?" he questioned.

"Just wanna talk. That's all."

"We were talking just fine here. I don't see why we need to go somewhere else."

"Look, I've been cooped up in this bunker for days, I just wanted to get some air, alright?" Sorun snapped. "Nicole said she hasn't seen any of the drones for a while, and a few minutes outside ain't gonna kill our cover. Just come on."

"... A few minutes," he agreed with some reluctance. He hopped off the table and began walking towards the portal. "No more than that. We come back right after."

"Sure, sure." Eyes still on the echidna's back, Sorun followed Finitevus in through the portal he made. Not even a few steps in and the portal closed behind the pair, leaving the small lab they'd just left completely empty.

Close enough to the border of New Mobotropolis that the wall surrounding the city was easily within sight, a portal opened. From this portal, near a small pile of rocks in an area heavily-populated by trees, emerged an odd-colored echidna and a human in a blue coat carrying a sword, which he used to close the blue portal they'd just walked out of. The sword was slowly sheathed back into its scabbard as the black-haired human turned to look at the echida, who was giving him an inpatient stare.

"Why here of all places?" Finitevus asked him. "I would have thought you'd just take us above the bunker. Why outside the city?"

"Didn't want Nicole listening in on us."

The answer brought some surprise to Finitevus' face. "Truly?" he quietly remarked. "For what purpose?"

"We'll get there," Sorun promised him. Sword still clutched in his left hand, he leaned his back against the gathering of rocks and crossed his arms. "Before that, I need to know. I've been trying to get a read on you these past few days, and I can't figure you out. From everything I've seen you're a normal-enough guy. Maybe a bit more into the... grittier aspects of science than what's mentally healthy, but we all have our quirks." He looked straight into Finitevus' darkened eyes. "So I want to know. Why'd you do it? Why'd you bring back Enerjak? What do you have against the world so bad you want it gone?"

"I told you why. Back when we first met," Finitevus replied in a plain tone. "Do you not remember?"

Sorun looked down in thought. "You said the world was too corrupt. That it was so far gone it was better to just destroy it all and start over."

"They say the point of history is to learn from past mistakes so the future may not repeat it. Being a bit of a historian myself it's a saying I take to heart," Finitevus told him. "Do you know how many mistakes in the past have been repeated, time and time again? Even if I were to just narrow it down to my own people's history, do you realize how many examples exist?"

A loud scoff came from Sorun. "You couldn't pay me to try and understand your people's history it's so complicated."

"That's my point exactly. Generations of Guardians passing on the mantle to their children in some twisted dynasty to fight the Dark Legion and their twisted infatuation with technology and cybernetic enhancements. Conflicting ideals on how to lead the species forwards and how to treat the other Mobian races and other useless dreck. Over and over, with a history so convoluted and winding you couldn't track down where it all began and why it got so out of hand if you tried. The world's full of these examples, the humans, the Overlanders, the Mobians, everyone." Finitevus began pacing, and Sorun found himself blinking in surprise when he saw genuine frustration cross the echidna's face. "From Robotnik's coup to the Xorda irreversibly changing this world to the Ixis wizards of old to the Great War between the Mobians and Overlanders." He stopped and whipped his head harshly towards Sorun. "Do you want to know how that even began?"

Sorun shrugged. "Sure." Nobody'd ever told him, now that he thought about it. It'd be nice knowing what started a full-blown war between species.

"The first contact initiated between the two species was between the prince of the now-former Kingdom of Acorn and an Overlander boy who met by chance in a forest, many generations ago. The Overlander had a gun and the two idiots were playing around with it." Finitevus' features wrinkled in anger. "It was all fun and games until the Overlander boy tried shooting a bird Mobini, and that witless Mobian threw himself into the line of fire to save it."

"Oh, you're fucking kidding." Sorun slapped his own face in disbelief, barely repressing a loud sigh. "A race war happened because of a disregard for gun safety ...?"

"Not directly. More a spark than anything," Finitevus said with a sigh. "It permanently strained relationships, to be sure. Generations of mistrust and small skirmishes lead to the Great War. It was an event so impactful the kingdom had made anti-gun laws to make sure there was never a repeat of the incident. Last I heard, however, was that it was dropped in favor of the conflict with Robotnik."

"Sally was always skittish around guns for some reason..." Sorun added. "I remember asking and she just said it was because the Overlanders used them so much. Guess that was technically the truth, but still... eh, then again, we hadn't known each other that long. Guess it kinda makes sense she wouldn't want to talk about an ancestor of hers getting blasted over something stupid like that." Blowing air past his lips, Sorun shook his head. He felt like kicking something over what he heard, and the worst part was he completely believed it. He'd heard of kids doing things even stupider than that. Kids playing with guns wasn't even that uncommon where he was from. Even still... "That's... that's just-"

"Moronic?" Finitevus finished, causing Sorun to nod. "It is, and almost nobody cares enough to remember the reason why the two races mistrust each other so greatly. They just remember they're supposed to because of all the conflicts, or because they're different, and time has done nothing to help matters. Should I even mention the bloodthirsty Mobians who held high positions in the kingdom who executed captured Overlander scouts to initiate the Great War? So much life was lost because some muscle-bound fool decided to kill off POWs." Finitevus shuffled over to Sorun's position and sat his back against the rock Sorun was leaning against. "The world's full of countless examples like this," he muttered. "Too many to count. Too much time between too many examples to recount. It all repeats, over and over, like a never-ending cycle that causes everyone nothing but misery and suffering." He looked ahead towards the city, and then up at the darkened sky. "I just wanted to put an end to it all. Bring it back to zero and make a fresh start without all the complexities."

"I see." Humming, Sorun looked up into the sky along with Finitevus. "You wanted to be Senator Armstrong."

"..." Finitevus blinked once. An expression of complete and utter confusion crossed his features, and after making an unsettled sound he looked down and at Sorun's face. "Excuse me? Who?"

"He was a character in a video game back home I really liked," Sorun elaborated, only furthering the echidna's confusion. "I'll tell you about him, if you like."

Looking back out to the city, Finitevus sighed, threw his hand up briefly, and looked back to Sorun. "You already have us out here. May as well."

"Alright, cool. Bear in mind this story comes from a world of fiction, but its messages for the most part are rooted in reality so don't worry about it." The human cleared his throat. "Our story takes place on the planet Earth. Home to lots and lots of countries with varying amounts of influential power. Imagine here, but all the land and territories were conquered by organized governments.

"As you can imagine, at one point all these countries had armies. Due to certain events that involved an Illuminati of rogue AIs and clones, it's not important to the story don't think too hard on it-" Finitevus made an awkward, puzzled noise while Sorun continued, "- countries didn't have much in the way of armies anymore. They'd all been outsourced to PMCs. Private military corporations."

"I'm... not familiar with the term," Finitevus admitted. He'd bowed his head a bit to concentrate on listening to the story, though had looked to Sorun in question at hearing the term.

Sorun made a clicking sound with his tongue. "Yeah, I guess the concept of corporations doesn't really exist in this world," he realized. "They were... businesses, essentially. Massive businesses with more capital and influence than some countries. They had their employees like all other businesses, only these employees were soldiers who fought and killed. But they had normal employees, too: marketers and PR people and R&D researchers and the such. It was still a business; they had advertisements and the like, sponsorship deals, anything you'd see in a normal business. Just, you know, with murder attached. Instead of using their own armies countries would simply hire these corporations to fight their wars for them. But, well... these wars weren't exactly 'wars', per se. Both the corporations and the countries that hired them all manipulated the flow of warfare, its intensity and frequency, so all the conflict could last indefinitely. The only people that really suffered were the soldiers, their families, and villagers who had their homes blown up in all the conflicts. For everybody else, from the people behind it all to the ordinary citizens just living their lives in the countries not ravaged by war, it was all about profiting off the war economy."

"I don't understand," Finitevus said. "How could war be profitable?"

"... Well, this part takes its roots in reality in my world. From what I've seen it's not a concept that exists here," Sorun began. "A movie I watched once summarized the concept to buying bandages and bullets. Imagine everything you need to fight a war: medical supplies, food, weapons, ammunition, vehicles, spare parts, every conceivable resource you need to outfit an army. In this case, PMC. The PMCs need to buy all these 'bandages and bullets' from somewhere. So they buy them in bulk from the industrial sector of whatever country they're based in. Those companies profit from the war due to the demand for the goods they supply being heightened by the war, and all those funds get funneled back into the general economy of that country. More jobs are created to meet the demand. More money's being made and spent on products and taxes. The economy grows and the country becomes stronger because the PMCs are fighting a war somewhere. And then those funds get poured right back into hiring more PMCs, which eventually generates even more money. The war economy," he explained. "On the other side of the coin is the technology. Technology develops fastest in times of war, and with all the countries in the world of this story depending on the global war economy new technology was always being developed to maintain having technological edges in the field. These same technologies get leaked to the public sector for various things, automobile industry, entertainment, medical, whatever, it's all more sources of revenue while improving quality of life. This went so far that the PMCs in this story had soldiers with full-blown cybernetic bodies, mechs, ID-locked guns, the works. They were all more advanced than any country's actual military forces."

"And people just went along with it? Joined these PMCs knowing they were fueling a war economy?"

"Well, it's not like they advertised all the fighting was nonsense, but even if they did nobody would have cared. The benefits were too great. Lost an arm or a leg and can't afford a cybernetic prosthetic? Sign up with us, we'll outfit you with cybernetic replacements way better than your meat limbs and after five years or x-amount of missions of service we'll let you keep your new limbs. Need money to move your family out of a war-torn country into a nice one not caught up in all the violence? Sign up with a PMC. There were always people desperate enough for one such thing or another, and considering PMC technology was more advanced than military technology it was actually considered safer joining up with a PMC than the army, and with more fringe benefits to boot. Not really any wonder militaries were so weakened when average people had more incentive to join PMCs since they provided what they needed in exchange for service. Patriotism falls short when you need to feed your daughter and can't work because you only have one arm or a terminal illness cybernetics could fix. The catch... is that the war economy and all this conflict and violence creates more desperate people eager to sign up for PMCs. So they always have more bodies to commit to more war to grow the war economy." Sorun glanced at Finitevus. "Like you said, it's a cycle.

"In walks the hero of our story, Senator Steven Armstrong, who sees his great country of America weakened by its dependence of the war economy. Apparently a permanent war economy isn't the most sustainable thing- good for short term, bad long term, and because of that it was causing a gridlock on the private economy. War's expensive, go figure. America was in a recession, a dead end, and meanwhile the war economy was still killing untold numbers of soldiers and civilians all for profiting a failing system. But they can't get off the war economy; it's hurting them at this point, but at the same time they're too dependent on the system to stop. So he sees the state of everything, the war economy, people blindly killing for a paycheck instead of killing for what they believed in, how the system supported this, how the individual citizen had no voice anymore and had become a part of a collective consciousness of thoughtless worker drones, and goes, 'This isn't okay. We shouldn't be doing this.' He endeavors to change the status quo by exploiting the war economy to become president of what was one of the most influential countries in the world, all so, once he amassed all that power, he could nuke the entire system from the inside-out and destroy the war economy itself to cease all dependence on it. His plan for accomplishing this was very reasonable in that he was going to harvest thousands of Mexican street orphans for their brains, put them in VR training to turn them into child soldiers, and then put their brains in cyborg bodies provided by the PMC he happened to be the head of so he had bodies ready to fight after inciting a war between America and another country called Pakistan so he could leech public support and votes off using the sudden boom in the war economy he artificially created."

Thus far Finitevus had been following Sorun's story with enough understanding. Slowly, though, his face was growing more and more exhausted and disbelieving the longer the story went on. "I'm convinced your brain is damaged."

"Hey, I didn't write the story," Sorun defended with an eye-roll. "Look, what I'm trying to say is that you're both the same. Armstrong saw a system that profited off what was essentially a human meat grinder by perpetuating forever-war, a system that lead the country into a recession, so he wanted to stop it. You saw a world stuck in a cycle of hatred and violence because this world's history is genuinely so confusing nobody can make sense of it so they can only look at the short-term past without learning anything, thereby repeating past mistakes. You wanted to change that." Sorun made a small sigh. "And you both were too extreme about it. Armstrong wanted to use orphans as child soldiers and create a completely anarchist society out of America using Darwinian ideals to purge the weak so the strong could have a future of freedom. You wanted to use an ancient echidna god to kill off most the world to 'wipe the slate clean and burn it all down.' I'm quoting Armstrong on that." He affixed Finitevus with a serious stare. "These are both very naughty things you shouldn't do."

"And why is that?" Finitevus snapped out. "Why does it matter how 'bad' something is if it ultimately creates good?"

"Because it undermines the whole fucking point!" Sorun yelled out. "You're gonna kill people to save people? Okay, sure, but why do the lives of the people that died matter less than the ones that live? Because there's more? Killing millions is alright if it saves billions? Why are those billions any better than the millions?" He made a loud scoff. "Lives are priceless. You can't value them, can't quantify them. I just don't see the point in killing so many people to save people."

"Maybe in the case of your insane senator. But I'm different," Finitevus claimed. "I wanted to make a future that would last for the whole planet. What's the current world population compared to a world that will last indefinitely?"

Annoyance and frustration flashed over Sorun's face. "Aright, let's humor it," he offered. "Let's pretend you did it. You won. Your plan with Enerjak went off without the hitch and you're the leader of a world wiped clean of history. You lead the surviving population into a utopia and die with a smile knowing all is right with the world now. BAM!" He loudly clapped Yamato's scabbard, startling Finitevus some. "Hundred years pass. Some guy in power screws it up. He gets too greedy and becomes corrupt, or he's some psychopath looking to wreck the system and is in a position to do so, or maybe it's just a guy trying to do his best but it's just not good enough so he makes some bad decisions. Something bad happens and things spiral out of control. These eventually generate circumstances that create more individuals that'll unsettle the world more and more, and eventually guess what, F, we're back at square one." Sorun tapped the side of his head. "It's the Chaos Effect, F. Doesn't matter how good a job you do making world peace, doesn't even matter if you pull it off. Hundred years from then, two-hundred, maybe more, maybe less, someone somewhere is gonna screw it up, and then more people screw it up. And then people bring it back, everything's fine, and then it's on and off over and over and over, and that convoluted history you're trying to erase? It'll come crawling right back." He sighed and shook his head. "Might as well call it Chaos Theory, too. It's why I can't be bothered doing things to help most of the time. I mean worldwide threats like Enerjak that threaten literally everyone? Yeah, that's one thing. Eggman? Sure, he's gotta go. Anything below that is just... I don't know. It all goes down to what you care about and what position you're in to do anything. I retired from Freedom Fighting for a lot of reasons, that among them." He glanced down at Yamato. "Well, tried to," he whispered.

Finitevus didn't respond to him. When Sorun glanced back over at him, he saw the echidna looking down. Seemingly deep in thought from the way his eye ridges were so creased, and Sorun could have swore he heard him muttering to himself. Looks of denial and reluctant realization flashed over his face too quick for Sorun to catch, like he was going through too many thoughts to keep up with. Eventually, he'd let out a long, drawn out sigh and hung his head so low his dreadlocks covered his face. Sorun was getting ready to ask if he was alright until he spoke again.

"And what do you think is going to happen to this world when it's already on a collision course? Hm, Sorun?" Finitevus mumbled out. "What happens then?"

"That's the nihilistic doomer in you talking," Sorun said, causing Finitevus to raise his head up a bit to look at him. "Yeah, when maniacs like you go around resurrecting evil gods or Eggman starts shit with his robots or some other wacko in the world does something it goes bad. But, eh... I dunno." He looked towards the city. "I've been around these guys for a while now, and they always seem to find a way to bring it back. Gives me, I don't know, hope?" He shrugged. "Honestly, when you look back on everything that's happened in this world and where they ended up before this Enerjak thing it's pretty amazing. I really do think they can make something of the world. And if not, well... nothing beautiful lasts. Wouldn't be beautiful otherwise."

A mirthless, bitter chuckle left Finitevus. "Makes no sense."

"Take it for whatever you want. 'S just my opinion. But just because things are bad doesn't mean you have to give up and wipe it all out to start over." Sorun looked at Finitevus. "That's what you did, isn't it? Give up on this world and try to make something new?" After a few seconds of silence, he continued. "I decided to give this world a chance. That means a lot seeing as I'm not even from here. For all the good, and the bad, and there's a lot of it on either side... I think it's worth giving it a chance. So stop trying to be a dumbass."

"As eloquent as ever," Finitevus snidely replied. He sat up to his full height and faced Sorun so their eyes met. "You really think I should stop and give this rotten world a chance? Because, what, it's pointless to do otherwise?"

"Well, if you want a pragmatic reason, people like me or the Freedom Fighters or whoever else will keep beating your ass in if you keep trying. But yeah. Basically."

Finitevus rolled his eyes, but otherwise said nothing. His lips thinned in concentration as more deep thought ran through his mind. Finally, he asked, "Can we get to the reason why you brought us out here?"

"Right to the point, huh?" He'd honestly hoped to put it off longer, but Sorun supposed there was no getting around it. So, with a sigh, he looked back up at the darkened sky. He'd tried to speak out, but the first time he tried his words got caught up in his throat, so he had to wait a full minute to gather up his nerves. Once he did, he finally spoke again. "I'm thinking about killing myself."

The echidna sitting next to him looked confused at first, like he assumed he'd heard wrong. He soon realized he hadn't, after which his black eyed widened a dramatic enough amount his yellow irises were barely seen in them. He seemed to silently stammer before he found his voice. "I-I... hadn't thought you'd seen the situation as so hopeless."

Sorun looked back down at Finitevus and gave him an annoyed glare. "Not in that way, dammit," he mumbled. "Look, I've been thinking about what you said. About me not being strong enough to take on Enerjak." He rose Yamato up. "This is the only thing we got that can stop him and free everyone. I'm the only one that can use it, but I don't have the power to get close. I can get that power through the Emeralds, but, well... my ability to 'borrow' their power without me absorbing them fully requires me to maintain contact with them. I can hold one as Yamato and I got enough room in my torso for one more- yeah, I surgically inserted one into myself once, deal with it," Sorun snapped at seeing the perturbed expression Finitevus grew.

"You're... not one to take half-measures, it seems," he commented in a blank voice.

"Clearly not," Sorun dryly remarked. "Anyways, that's a max of two I can carry in. Three if I one-hand Yamato and one-hand an Emerald. Even then I'm running the risk of dropping the Yamato or the gem, and then I lose that power. Doesn't help they barely fit in my hand and have a slippery, glossy surface." He shook his head. "Nah, just doesn't work. It's too risky, especially going up against that guy. I can't risk losing powers just 'cause I had an item taken away from me. I can't just divide my focus between fighting an omnipotent god and holding onto shit in the middle of the fight. So I need to absorb them," he said, his voice growing quieter. "So I've been doing risk assessment, you know, trying to gauge the minimum amount of powers I would need to feasibly pull this off while leaving me with as much life as possible. Ideally I'd just absorb Yamato and only lose twelve years, but the sword alone ain't gonna be enough. In another world where I never used Quicksilver against him and I could have just ended it with Yamato and a surprise timestop, maybe I could have gone at it with just two. But he's seen that trick before, so... yeah."

Slowly, Finitevus nodded. "Makes enough sense. So what conclusion did you come to?" he asked.

"Yeah, well, that's the thing. The more Emeralds I absorb, the greater the chance I have at winning but the less life I get left with. And, to make it worse, I got the whole world riding on all this. My friends, the whole town over there, rest of the world, everyone." Sorun's shoulders slumped a bit and he made a sigh. "I can't gamble with lives. Don't wanna. Not theirs. So I'm cashing out and going all in. With all seven I'd have the greatest possible shot at succeeding, but..."

"But you'd die right after," Finitevus finished, understanding forming on his face. "It's certainly the safest route possible. Are you sure you want to do it this way?"

"Hell no, I don't. But their lives are more important than mine. So I'm going in with everything," Sorun affirmed. "I can't tell Nicole this. She'll fight against me on this. Might even try and stop me. But I can't gather all seven Chaos Emeralds alone."

"So you need my help."

"I... need your help, Finite-bus. Yeah."

A stiff breeze blew in between the two. Finitevus looked owlishly at Sorun at the mispronunciation, and then slowly narrowed his eyes at him. "You're not saying my name wrong to annoy me, are you? You genuinely don't know how to pronounce it."

Sorun didn't even try hiding it and remained stone-faced. "In my defense I have literally never heard your name before and am fairly certain you made it up."

"I did not!" he hissed out in denial. "It's Finitevus! Fin-it-evus!"

"... You see, that sounds made up."

"Gah, why do I bother!?" Growling out in anger Finitevus shot up to his feet and walked a few steps away from the rocks they sat against. "I don't even know why I should bother helping some dullard who doesn't even have the decency to remember someone's name."

"... 'Cause the world's fucked if you don't?" Sorun tried as he stood up after Finitevus. "And hey, come on, dullard? I know I'm not the brightest guy and can't do math, but seriously?"

Finitevus crossed his bandaged arms and turned away in a huff. "Just because you're able to recite mind-boggling, insane stories from your world doesn't make you a genius. Mad, maybe. Suicidal most definitely with this plan of yours." He glanced over his shoulder at Sorun, his eye staring at him and half-lidded. "You're... admittedly rather thought-provoking with your words, however. I'm surprised you're so capable."

"Arguing video game stories and the philosophies behind them is, like, one of the only things in this world that I'm actually good at. Nobody ever wants to talk about that stuff with me, though. Well, 'cept Nicole. I told her about the factions in 'New Vegas' and we had a whole five-hour argument about which faction was the best one. I still can't believe she's a Mr. House supporter. The Independent route is obviously way better."

The microscopic amount of respect Finitevus held in his eye fell away along with his arms. After which, a frown formed on his mouth. "You had a lot of free time back on your world, didn't you?"

"Man, gimme a break." Sorun moved to stand besides Finitevus, with the both of them looking out towards the city. "As grim and macabre as it sounds, I really do need your help committing suicide here. So are you in or not?"

"To paraphrase you, the world is doomed if I don't," Finitevus admitted. "I have to say, though. Not many would be willing to throw their lives away like you."

"Well, it's not like I haven't been here before." Sorun placed his free hand inside his pocket while absentmindedly turning Yamato over and over with his left. "I never told anyone this 'cause I didn't want anyone to worry even more than they already were, but after I found out Earth was gone I didn't... really want to live anymore. Didn't care about anything, didn't see a point anymore. But, ah... those friends of mine are so stubborn. They managed to bring me back and, after a while, I really thought I could live a peaceful life here." He held Yamato up to look at it. "But things like this keep happening, so I guess that was nothing but a pipe dream. And I owe them all more than I could ever pay back anyways. May as well pay it back with my own life."

Finitevus hummed, but otherwise said nothing at first. The two continued looking at the city before the echidna spoke up with, "Do you perchance have any idea of how we're to gather the other six Emeralds?"

"Not really, no," Sorun said. "That's kind of bad seeing as the whole plan hinges on them, huh?"

There was a groan besides him. "You're hopeless without me," Finitevus said with a shake of his head. "If only there was someone you knew with a vastly superior intellect who may actually have a solution to our predicament."

Hearing the smugness in his voice, Sorun rolled his eyes and said, "Just spill."

"What do you know of A.D.A.M.?"

"Him?" Sorun looked down in thought for a moment as he searched through his memories. "Yeah, uhhh... evil AI guy Eggman created, went rogue. Was responsible for creating the nanite city to begin with if I recall. Don't know much more than that other than something happened and he died when Sonic stopped him." He pursed his lips. "I vaguely remember something about a turtle, but I don't remember."

"Irrelevant," Finitevus said with a hand wave. "He was responsible for fusing all of the universe's Chaos Emeralds together into the seven that now exist today."

"... Oh, yeah, I think I heard that," Sorun realized. "He used some kind of tower thing, didn't he?"

"Yes. I'm unsure of its exact construction, but he'd built a device that somehow managed to reach across every corner of the universe to gather hundreds of thousands of Chaos Emeralds, every single one in existence, to fuse them all." They both glanced at each other, with Sorun blinking at the small smirk growing on Finitevus' mouth. "Those designs are more than likely still within the city's database, seeing as it was constructed from nanites to begin with."

"What does that- oh, I getcha," Sorun realized with widening eyes. "You wanna build that tower again to... magnetize all the Emeralds in the world to one specific spot."

Finitevus nodded. "Essentially," he said. "Scouring the entire globe while dodging Enerjak just isn't feasible for us. This is simpler and will take far less time."

Sorun found himself agreeing with Finitevus. It'd surely take a hell of a lot longer looking for the things one at a time. If they had a way of bringing them all together at once, that'd save them a world's worth of time. Less risk, too, with Enerjak out there. Sorun certainly couldn't think of a better idea.

"The only problem," Finitevus continued, "is convincing that AI of yours to fork over the plans so we can build it." He gave Sorun a questioning look. "Do you think she will?"

Sorun winced. "If she finds out I'm trying to kill myself here? Probably not," he said. "But... she knows I can use them without absorbing them." He paused for a few seconds to think. "I'll spin something up," he decided. "Omit some truths, all that. I don't like it, but we need that tower and she's the only one that can give it to us."

He didn't like lying to Nicole. Not one bit. He'd told himself he was done with lying the first time around with the Emeralds. By now his only hope was that she'd forgive him down the line since this was for the entire world, but... well, he wasn't too sure if that would pan out.

Good thing by then he'd be too dead to find out.

"Well. It's a plan, then." Finitevus, looking pleased and even a bit surprised at Sorun, nodded at him and turned around. "Well, then. Let's be off back to the bunker. We've work to do."

"Mhm." While Finitevus had walked off, Sorun stayed put where he was, brows creased in thought. After a few moments of thought he turned around, calling out, "Hey, F."

Finitevus, who was holding an inactive Warp Ring, stopped just before he tossed it to look at Sorun. "Yes?"

"You know, I've put a lot of thought into it. I'm not gonna lie to you. I don't know if I'll be able to beat Enerjak even with all seven Emeralds." Slowly, Finitevus pocketed the small, golden ring and stared towards Sorun in silence, prompting the human to continue. "I mean, you said it yourself. Guy's omnipotent. He killed off the whole world with a single thought. After seeing that I'm just not confident the seven Emeralds alone are gonna cut it." He turned around to face the city once more. "I need more power."

The powers granted to him by the seven Chaos Emeralds were fantastic, there was no denying that. They weren't on the same level as a literal god, though. Not even close. Wasn't like he could even surprise him since Enerjak likely had all of Knuckles' memories, who knew of Sorun's powers. Wings that could punch people and a superior body fell short of a guy with enough power to disintegrate things by simply looking at them.

It wasn't enough. He needed more. Something to tip him over the edge to give him a good shot at taking Enerjak out once and for all.

"Hmm..." Making a contemplative hum, Finitevus asked, "I suppose I see the logic in that. Did you have something in mind?"

"... One thing, yeah. An idea. Rotor told me about something once and I wanna try it out," Sorun said. "First, let me ask you something. That vault you found the Chaos Emerald in... I know the Republic keeps an emergency stockpile Power Rings from the Lake of Rings there in case something ever happened to the power. Did you happen to see them?"

"As it happened, yes," Finitevus confirmed. "There were a number of them there. Why?"

"Some point down the line I need you to grab some for me."

"If you think it will help, then certainly. How many did you need exactly?"

"Oh... I think fifty will be enough to get the job done."

Chapter 76

Recursion Error

Episode 76- Retirement from evil

It was a strange thing, planning to die for the second time. Oddly enough it didn't feel like the first time to Sorun. That first time that had been a crash course of grief and anxiety that slowly burned into grim acceptance that he did everything in his power to ignore. The same thing that had kept him up at night and had given him so much stress he was surprised his hair didn't turn white before getting Devil's Body during the mission with Shadow.

But now, he didn't know. He didn't feel much of anything. Or more accurately it felt like he'd moved right onto acceptance the second time around now that he'd come to terms he'd have to go through with dying again. He wasn't too sure on how it worked. To be sure it still saddened him to hell and back, and there weren't many opportunities for distractions seeing as he was spending days cramped inside of this bunker with two other people.

Well, it wasn't like there was anything he could do about it. Except maybe make sure he actually took the person he was aiming to kill with him this time. He already had a few ideas on how he could go about that.

Holding in a sigh, Sorun looked ahead at the lynx that was staring down into the green dias in front of her. He honestly didn't know what she was trying to glean off of it. And for as bad as he felt over this whole thing, he felt worse for Nicole's sake since she was going through the same thing, sans planning on dying. But that was his problem. And she didn't deserve to be going through this.

She didn't even notice him approach and stop right next to her, with his own body leaning over the green-surfaced piece of machinery from besides her. She finally did take notice when Sorun nudged her shoulder a bit, causing Nicole to start in surprise and glance over at him.

"You've really been staring at this map-thing intently for a while now," Sorun pointed out to her. "You wouldn't have happened to found the solution to this little predicament in here, have you?"

If Nicole was amused by any amount at the remark, she didn't show it at all. "I've been monitoring the entire city to ensure more of those... creatures Enerjak fabricated don't enter. Fortunately, it seems they've moved on. We'll have to assume they think the city is empty," she said. "Beyond that I've been monitoring everybody. Our prediction-"

"Finitevus' prediction," Sorun corrected.

Nicole frowned a bit. "... His prediction, yes, that their bodies are being preserved holds merit." She paused and looked down at the green dias. "You've spent quite an amount of time with him."

Sorun looked down into the green screen along with her. Images and words spread about in the grid-like surface that meant nothing to him filled his vision. "You sound surprised."

"I am surprised. It's his fault this is happening, Sorun. His actions caused all this, and you... you're letting him poke and prod you like some lab animal." She sounded upset and confused at the same time. Sorun figured it was fair enough, given everything that was happening.

"... I mean, it's not nearly as bad as you're making it sound," Sorun defended. "It's just some light examinations. That's all. I was just curious about some things about myself. Besides, you're there to make sure he doesn't do anything drastic. Don't pretend you're not spying on us all the time in that examination room."

"I'm almost certain that fact alone is why he kept his word not to do anything too invasive to you." Not even bothering to deny it, Nicole looked back up to Sorun with confusion written over her face. "But it goes beyond that. You're cordial with him."

"You're mad at me for being polite...?" Sorun incredulously stated, flipping his hand up in disbelief. "What does that even mean?"

"I'm not mad at you being polite, I'm just baffled by it. You're arguably more polite with him than you ever were with Sonic."

She had a point there. "... Yeah, but come on, I'm almost never polite with Sonic." When Nicole didn't respond Sorun let out a sigh and rubbed at his face. "What do you want from me, Nicole? It's not like I've forgiven the guy or anything like that, 'cause you're right, this is all his fault. But we kind of need him to fix all this and I didn't see how getting on his case about it would make things any better. Plus, he's... well, believe it or not he's a pretty good conversationalist. Bit confused about things, but his heart's in... well I wouldn't say the right place, but I'm pretty sure he has one, I think." He shot Nicole and accusing stare. "And you haven't exactly been the biggest conversationalist this last week."

At first Sorun thought he'd gone a bit far and caused Nicole to become offended at him over his words. But then a few seconds had passed and he realized he'd stunned her into silence, after which he realized she looked more hurt than offended. He'd made to speak up and apologize, but Nicole had already started speaking before he had the chance.

"Sorun, I'm sorry, but I didn't find it an appropriate time to talk with everything going on."

The human gave her an odd look. "N... Nicole, all our friends had their souls ripped out of them. There's never been a more appropriate time to talk." He knew he was going stir crazy from all of this, so seeing as Nicole had been so focused on this he couldn't imagine how well she was holding up. Not good, Sorun would wager.

He didn't think anybody would hold up well in this situation, and if they were, they were a psychopath of some type. Not even Finitevus was weathering this without a care, as well as he did hiding it.

"... Maybe you're right," Nicole quietly admitted. She folded her hands on the dias and looked down, not at the screen but to just avoid Sorun's eyes. "It's just horrible. All of this. Nobody deserves this, and I can't help but keep thinking about everybody. I keep trying to figure out how it is we're supposed to save them all, but no matter what I try I just can't envision us doing anything to help." She looked up to his eyes, and it hurt Sorun somewhere inside when he saw that hopeless, distraught expression on her face. "What are we supposed to do if we're not able to save everyone, Sorun?"

She tried to keep her voice even, and for all Sorun knew she was doing it for his sake, but even he could tell she was, at some level, terrified. Hell, he was, too, but the cold acceptance that once again he was winding up in the grave somehow helped to hide that. More... natural than Nicole trying to suppress it, maybe. Sorun wasn't so sure. He was sure that he didn't like seeing Nicole like this, and figured, if nothing else, he could try and put her at ease with the little assurance he could provide.

"We're going to save them," he promised her. There's wasn't much power behind the statement, nor a lack thereof. It was like he was stating a simple fact more than anything, like he knew for certain they would save everyone's souls, which gave Nicole pause. "It's not a matter of if. We will."

Nicole shook her head. "You don't know-"

"Nicole." He grabbed Nicole's shoulders so she was forced to look at Sorun's face. "We're gonna save 'em, alright? I promise."

A dangerous thing, promising something like that. For sure. Maybe even foolish. But Sorun didn't care so much, as it did seem to visibly calm Nicole down some, which was really all Sorun was aiming for. "I wish I could share your confidence, Sorun. I just hope it's well-placed." She reached up to remove Sorun's hands from her shoulders, with her own hands lingering over his for a long moment before slowly grasping them to move them off.

"Well, it's not like we're working with nothing here. We got that whole thing with the tower going, yeah?" Sorun asked her.

"Yes. The tower." Nicole looked a bit unsettled at the mention of it. "I understand the desire to want to keep the Chaos Emeralds out from Enerjak's reach, Sorun, but I struggle to see what you plan to do with them. And I honestly can't see how they could give him more of an advantage than he already has..."

"I don't have any plans for them," Sorun lied. "I just feel like we should have them around just in case we do come up with a plan or we need them in an emergency." He leaned his lower back against the metal dias while kicking his feet out. "Besides, they can't hurt me anymore, remember? There's no risk keeping them around just in case."

That was the whole basis when he'd convinced her to give Finitevus the plans for the tower used to attract all the Chaos Emeralds. Excuses like "we might need them" and "just in case" and other half-truths Sorun cooked up under the pretense that it was something they could do that could be construed as progress as opposed to doing nothing. In defense for Sorun it actually was doing something, even if he weren't planning on killing himself with them. Which was probably the only reason Nicole decided to go ahead with it.

She'd been reluctant with the idea, though. Extremely so. Nicole hadn't given a reason for why she was so reluctant, but in the end she'd still given them on the basis it was doing something productive. So Sorun didn't know, maybe she just wasn't too thrilled with the idea of giving Finitevus the plans for that kind of thing. Sorun was pretty sure she just didn't like him.

"I... just struggle to see why you want all of them together..." Nicole slowly stated, looking at Sorun past her bangs of black hair.

Sorun shrugged. "Just in case we need them is all. Besides, the less power Enerjak has the better. He's already got the Master Emerald."

"I realize this, but-"

"And I suppose you have a better idea?"

That hadn't been Sorun's voice. From how quickly Nicole's demeanor shifted to a hostile and perturbed one Sorun didn't even need to be familiar with the voice to know it was Finitevus'. They'd both turned towards the entrance of the room to see the albino echidna enter, steeping over to the dias to lean over it besides Nicole, opposite of the side Sorun was on.

"Hello, Finitevus." Sorun found himself wincing and turning away from the two. He couldn't think of a time where Nicole had ever given a more icy-sounding greeting to anybody, ever. "No, as a matter of fact I do not at present possess any viable plans for furthering our goals outside of acquiring the remaining six Chaos Emeralds. Which I recall correctly is the exact same amount you possess."

There was a barely-suppressed scoff from Finitevus that Sorun managed to catch. "I do have some, you just refuse to see them through."

"Proposing that I use my nanites to construct an atomic bomb to plant on Angel Island is not a solution."

"I fail to see how." Finitevus thrust his hand forwards. "You make the bomb, and then either Sorun or I deposit it on the island using a portal. None of us would be harmed in the detonation."

"Nobody except the bodies of all our friends who still remain on the island," Nicole coldly responded.

" And Enerjak's host," he reminded her. "You have to remember that, without a host, he cannot exist in this world."

Sorun didn't so much as make a sound in response, though he did walk away from the pair to lean against the nearest wall. As much as he loved the irony behind the idea of killing a functional god with an atom bomb, he had to agree with Nicole in that it would kill their friends, assuming their bodies were even still on the island. Which they had to. He wasn't okay with sacrificing their lives to save the world.

"I am not going to put anyone's lives in jeopardy," Nicole said in a tone that left little room for argument, "and I will not weaponize the nanites under any circumstance."

She'd turned to face Finitevus directly. If he was intimidated at all by the glare she was surely giving him that Sorun couldn't see from this angle, he didn't show it. In fact, he looked completely nonplussed.

"Why not?" he asked in a tired voice. "Machines capable of quite possibly any function imaginable, and instead of choosing to do anything substantial with them you insist on letting them go to waste-
"

"I hardly see how using my nanites to provide a home for everybody constitutes as a waste-"

"Yes, I'm sure all those soulless husks up above are quite grateful to you for using those precious machines to provide shelter for them instead of using them to help regain their souls back."

When Sorun saw Nicole's hands began to clench, he chose that moment to step in. "May I remind you that you are responsible-!" Nicole had began before Sorun intervened.

"Hey, guys, remember the part where we're supposed to be working together?" He'd poked his body in-between the pair of them by leaning in, though he'd chosen to face Finitevus while giving him a very pointed glare. "And quit antagonizing her, man, seriously."

"I'm merely stating facts." When Sorun's glare didn't waver, he rolled his eyes and held his hands up. "Fine, have it your way."

Satisfied, Sorun turned the other way towards Nicole. And then immediately began regretting it when he saw her practically fuming in Finitevus' direction. Sorun's knee-jerk reaction was to avoid that entirely and turn back to Finitevus, asking, "So how's the tower going?"

Seemingly eager to begin talking about something to be productive, the white-furred echidna began speaking on the subject. "I went over the designs and the science behind how it works. From all appearances it seems completely sound, and we know from practice it works. It shouldn't be too difficult at all to simply construct the machine and flip the 'on' switch." He made a unsettled hum. "I'm worried about the power requirements, though. Now that I've seen its inner workings it shouldn't be difficult at all to reconfigure its settings so it doesn't strain itself reaching out across the entire known universe in search of Emeralds. But even if we shrink its search radius to a point that it's solely relegated to planet Mobius we're still factoring in more power than we could possibly provide."

"Couldn't we just use the Chaos Emerald we already have?" Sorun asked.

Finitevus sent Sorun a flat look. "The same Emerald that will be attracted along with the rest of them, thereby removing its utility as a power source?"

"..." It did sound like a silly suggestion when put like that. "What if we used the same power source A.D.A.M. used back then?"

"The power source last time around was live Mobians powered in Super forms. Even if your moral code allowed for that we aren't exactly flush with warm bodies at the moment."

He decided to quit while he was ahead. "Nicole, your thoughts," Sorun said, a bit too quickly for his liking.

The anger on the lynx's face fortunately subsided a bit. "It's okay, Sorun, you're doing your best," she assured him, even offering a small smile at his expense. It'd disappeared completely when she looked back to Finitevus. "Is there any way to mitigate the power consumption?"

Finitevus shook his head. "Not from what I could see," he said. "If we had some way of pinpointing the Chaos Emeralds' position, then maybe . If we had such a method, however, we would hardly require this tower to begin with in the first place."

Sorun's head popped up. He blinked once upon realizing something, and then turned to address Finitevus who had noticed Sorun's reaction. "Okay, hypothetically speaking, say there was somewhere in the world a kind of radar device that could detect Chaos Emeralds. Would that help?"

"I'm assuming this isn't as hypothetical as you're making it out to be," Finitevus said. "If so the answer is yes, that would be considerably helpful in limiting the tower's power draw."

"It... may not be hypothetical."

Finitevus sighed and rubbed at his nose. "Goodness' sake, Sorun, which is it?"

"Don't take that tone with him." Sorun felt a pair of hands grab his shoulders from behind and pull him away from Finitevus, closer to where Nicole was. He'd blinked in surprise at the action and didn't make a single move as Nicole continued speaking. "But Sorun, I think I know what you're referring to. Whatever did you do with that device that Tails made for you?"

"Chucked it." Shrugging her hands off his shoulders, Sorun made to move towards the room's exit. "Dunno where it is, but I know where to go to go get it." He looked back at Nicole. "Ya know?"

"I... know?" She tilted her head and gave him an odd look, not looking at all like she knew.

Sorun turned to Finitevus. "She knows," he assured him, adding in no small part to the confusion on the echidna's face. "Flint 'n' Paste, need your help with this. C'mon." He exited the room before he could get a response from either of the other two, leaving both of them staring out after him as he departed. It was barely after Sorun left that Finitevus shook his head and looked back to the lynx, though he couldn't not find the words to articulate his thoughts. Nicole was in a similar stupor, and when it became obvious neither had words Finitevus loudly sighed out in frustration and trudged out of the room after Sorun.

Knothole ruins

"Ah... what a shit place full of shit memories."

As far as the ruins of a town that was bombed out went, it was about what Sorun expected to see. Nothing but a giant, ashen field of burnt tree stumps and destroyed, unrecognizable houses further damaged by the elements and time. Half-covered in snow, too, which made it all the more apocalyptic-looking. Considering what happened here it wasn't that far off the mark.

If Sorun could have things his way he'd never come back to this place ever again for all the bad memories he had here, but they needed the Chaos Emerald locator radar thing Tails made for him once. And as far as Sorun remembered the last he saw of it he'd thrown it... somewhere in there. He didn't remember where exactly. But they needed it, and Finitevus was an extra set of hands. So here the two of them were, on a mission to dig through burnt, old ruins to find a piece of technology that, for all they knew, probably didn't even work because it'd been sitting out in the rain for months.

Surprisingly Sorun had worked with less in life.

"No fond memories of Knothole?" Finitevus, who stood besides Sorun as they looked out into the ruins, remarked. "I would have thought you'd be as fond of this place as New Mobotropolis."

"Don't get me wrong, Knothole had its charm and all, but, eh... Nicole's city has a lot more going for it," Sorun said. "And this place was where I first showed up in this world, right after the old HQ." His demeanor flattened. "A kid threw a rock at my face."

Finitevus' eyes widened a bit in surprise, and he glanced over at Sorun. "That's surprising to hear."

"Yeah, and he even called me a human. I don't know if he was just confused about the difference between humans and Overlanders or what, never bothered following up on that, but he sent me an apology card later on so it's whatever. Everybody over in the Republic is cool with me." He cleared his throat and gestured out to the destroyed Knothole. "Anyways, uh... yeah, here we are."

"Yes. So we are." Finitevus faced back out towards the ruins. "So let me get this straight. You, at one point in time, possessed a piece of technology capable of locating Chaos Emeralds. An incredibly valuable piece of technology that is capable of locating objects of undefinable power, making it quite possibly one of the most important devices on the planet. And instead of keeping it safeguarded somewhere you threw it away."

Sorun took in a deep inhale, feeling a mixture of sheepishness and frustration. At both himself and the echidna besides him who sounded very ridiculing at the moment. "The town just got bombed out and everybody got kidnapped. I was a little bit more worried about everybody's safety than a stupid radar."

"But you truly had to throw it ?"

"I had a sword in one hand, Nicole's handheld in another, cut me some slack, man, my hands were full at the time and I didn't feel like going into a possible fight carrying a bunch of junk."

"... You really have a thing against holding things while fighting, don't you?"

Sorun made a low sigh and lowered his head. "Just... come on," he said, walking further into the ruins with Finitevus following closely behind. "I threw it around here somewhere, so just, I dunno, start digging around for it. It's a little metal box thing with a screen."

"Why, with such a detailed description I have no doubt we'll find it in no time."

Eyes narrowing, Sorun glanced over his shoulder at Finitevus, who'd already crouched down and began sifting through pieces of rubble and snow. "Yeah..." he muttered out, turning his back to the echidna. He looked down at the blue gem he held in his hand, and after a moment's concentration a pair of blue, spectral winged arms appeared over his back. They reached forwards and began tossing away more debris as Sorun began looking around in the snow-covered, ashen ground.

The two of them had been at it like this for a solid twenty minutes, shifting around pieces of burnt detritus in search of the radar. So far, no such luck. Nothing but more and more reminders of what this place once was to Sorun that quickly sent his mood into a downturned spiral the longer he was here. Knowing everybody who once lived here were all well and fine helped mitigate his feelings, but knowing these bombed-out homes were once, well, homes still set him on edge. He'd lived in one of these homes for a time.

After a while the silence started to get to Sorun. Maybe it was just him being uncomfortable about being here, but he couldn't take it for much longer. His frustration showed in how the Bringer Claws were inadvertently clawing at the ground and leaving deep grooves when he tried moving things away in search of the radar, and by now he was hoping for anything to take his mind off things. Fortunately, he did have one question to get the ball rolling that he could ask.

"Hey, I wanted to know. Who is Enerjak, anyways?" Sorun asked as he tossed away what was either once upon a time a wall or someone's door. Hard to tell from how warped, burnt, and rotted the wood was. "I know he's a god and all, but where'd he come from? Why does he need a host to exist here? Exactly who is he?"

"That would require a very in-depth lesson on echidna history," Finitevus replied, followed by the sound of him tossing something heavy away.

Sorun visibly recoiled. "The condensed version, if you would," he politely requested.

"He was brought about in an event that happened quite some time ago. Long enough that history forgot it, at any rate. Even Albion's archives were incomplete on the subject; I had to go searching through many ancient ruins just to get a concise picture," the echidna began. "Most of this is conjecture from fragmented legends I had to piece together. He was a scientist. Both he and his wife Aurora-La from what I know. They studied Chaos energy and the Chaos Force, and something happened between them and the Ancient Walkers that caused them to ascend into the Chaos Force." When he looked over at Sorun, he saw the human stiffen up completely. The Bringer Claws, on the other hand, had reflexively closed around pieces of debris with enough force to crush them into dust. "I assume from what I heard about you and the Neo-Walkers you know of Aurora-La."

"We've met. She just goes by Aurora these days," Sorun confirmed. "Tch. Figures that's her grand origin scheme for how she became some mystic sky echidna. Uplifted by more magic sky people." How glamorous of a story for her, considering barely anybody on this planet had those. Sorun barely wondered anymore why her ego was so self-centered if that was how she came to be.

"I take it from your tone you're not too fond of her."

"I kicked her teeth in."

A short, amused huff left Finitevus. "Well, I've never met her in person, so I couldn't say much about her personality."

"Oh, I can. She manipulated me and put me in a situation where I was destined to die. I had to beat her within an inch of her life until she got the idea through her head that she owed me a second life since she all but took my first." Left unsaid was how Sorun had been a willing participant through the end of it, but the fact remained there was a principle to consider. She'd still done what she'd done on him for all the wrong reasons, regardless of what Sorun's thoughts on it were. He wasn't losing sleep over what he did. She'd grown the teeth back, anyways. "I remember her making me promise not to ever use a Chaos Emerald to get Yamato back," he continued. "Chaos-sensitive people are real nervous around it for some reason."

"It is... unusually powerful. I get tingles merely being around it," Finitevus informed him. He glanced towards Sorun and made a small hum. "I can't help but notice you still manifest the sword despite that promise. Why is that?"

"'Cause fuck her, that's why. I don't care what she thinks." It felt like every time he held or used Yamato it was a big middle finger up to the sky at Aurora, which made it all the better for Sorun every time he got to hold it. Petty revenge, maybe, but as far as he was concerned it was a statement. Something that said "I can do whatever I want and you can't do anything to stop me". And Sorun felt a small bit of victory every time he got to make that statement. Knowing she was probably steaming up there in her golden clouds every time he made the sword made it all the better. "How about Enerjak?" Sorun pressed.

There was a pause as Finitevus thought his answer through. "For whatever reason he didn't take to the process of becoming ascended as well as Aurora," he answered. "He wound up in the sorry state you know him as. A corrupted spirit. So malevolent the Ancient Walkers fragmented his spirit and banished him to the Chaos Force. I suspect him needing an echidna host is due to the fact he was himself an echidna before undergoing his transformation."

"And he needs special echidna to possess, right?" Sorun asked. "Because he keeps going for Knuckles every time he pulls this. I know he's special 'cause his dad did some stuff to him that made him more powerful than normal echidna."

"You'd be correct, yes," Finitevus confirmed. "I suspect any normal echidna would probably be disintegrated from the sheer power brought on by Enerjak's possession, such is the strength of his Chaos Force link. It would take one with an abnormally strong link of their own to house him in their body. Fortunately the Guardian's father didn't have many qualms on experimenting on his own kin." He made a small grunt. "There were other potential candidates, but Knuckles was always the more viable one due to his unique makeup."

Sorun rolled his eyes. "Yeah, 'cause this is a real fortunate position we're in," he muttered out. He tossed a large piece of debris away, but much to his dismay he didn't see the radar when he searched around the ground. "He's not even aware, is he? When I talked to him that one time he thought he was Knuckles. Did going through what he did shred his personality so much he can't even differentiate between himself and his hosts?"

"I don't think his memories survived the process. At least, not completely. He's... more an influencing force," Finitevus explained. "Bits and pieces of personality that infect the host's psyche, warping and altering them. Inhibitions are lost as their wills and desires blends with whatever remains of Enerjak's; they essentially become a gestalt consciousness. And seeing the results of his work I somewhat doubt he was an upstanding member of my species."

"Well, he married Aurora. I'm pretty sure that automatically qualifies him as an awful person," Sorun reasoned. The fact anybody would marry that thing somewhat repulsed him. But, if nothing else, it was another reason to kill Enerjak - another middle finger to Aurora. Killing something that used to be her husband. One last act of spite before he died for real this time. "Ah, but what if she considers it a mercy killing? Since he's not really what he used to be and he's stuck as a weird spirit thing?" Sorun thought as he scratched his chin. "Guess I'd actually be doing her a favor then... Well, I'm still killing Enerjak regardless, so I guess it don't matter that much."

"It's my turn to ask something." The sudden shift caused Sorun to lift his head up in surprise. He was caught off-guard by the statement, enough that he turned around to see Finitevus looking at him from the corner of his eyes behind those crooked spectacles of his as he tossed more debris away in search of the radar. "What exactly is the function of that sword?" he asked him. "Is it truly just to separate things?"

Not seeing the harm in indulging him, Sorun answered with, "It's more the concept of separation itself. The idea of it." Sorun tossed away a blown-apart folding chair, wincing a bit when he realized that it was likely one of the chairs they'd used at Antoine and Bunnie's wedding. The wedding he'd missed. The wedding that was ruined when Knothole got blown up. "Why do you ask?"

"Just curious. I just struggle to grasp how the idea of separation gives the sword the ability to create portals."

"It's... complicated," Sorun said. "If I had a piece of paper it'd be easier to explain. It's basically bridging point A and point B together by folding space so they overlap and then using Yamato to cut open the two points. By doing this two locations regardless of distance are joined together, thus negating the space between them."

"I see," Finitevus hummed out, sounding just as interested as when Sorun first let him draw some blood out to examine. Sorun remembered him looking so excited he looked like he could have started drooling at any moment, though for both their sakes he'd kept himself in check. "It's very similar to how my Warp Rings function, though they're a bit more elegant in their design in that they don't require brute-forcing their way through space-time to connect two points of space."

"Oh, yeah. Right. You use those weird ring things to get around." The Warp Rings, as Finitevus called them. Let him make portals to wherever he wanted from what Sorun saw. The little rings that were remarkably similar to Power Rings in their appearance. "Eh, well, I don't care how inelegant Yamato's method of making portals is as long as it works."

"I suppose," he said, though from his tone Sorun didn't think Finitevus agreed all that much. He sounded almost judging, actually. Like he was sneering at something inferior. "How did you solve the problem of positioning the portals? I remember encountering some difficulty with that with my own Warp Rings."

Sorun pursed his lips in thought. "I don't know, I mean... they just kind of go wherever I want them to go. I think of a place and it just makes the portal." He threw an overly large burnt piece of wood over his shoulder before continuing. "Only works for places I've been, though. Need the coordinates to make a portal to somewhere I've never been."

Finitevus made an "ah" of comprehension. "That must be rather bothersome, then. Remembering all those numbers."

"Nah, don't need to remember them," Sorun corrected with a shake of his head. "Just need to see them."

"That's..." Pausing, Finitevus glanced over his shoulder and at Sorun. "Truly?"

"Yeah, I don't know how it works. Maybe it pulls it from my subconscious or something, who knows?" Sorun shrugged. Some part of him always did find it somewhat strange, but he wasn't in the habit of asking the exact scientific workings of magic swords. It was a gift he didn't need to look too far into. "If it works I don't question it."

"Hmph." Satisfied, Finitevus returned to his own sifting. "I'm surprised you were able to even come up with such a thing."

Well, technically he hadn't since Yamato making portals came straight from the games Sorun took it from, but to be fair he'd still had to put the legwork in to figure out the mechanics behind it. "Well, I did have to check out a quantum physics book," he said.

Finitevus paused. He stood up straight, dropping a piece of debris in something akin to shock as he turned to fully face Sorun. The human, on the other hand, had gone back to digging through the rubble with his Bringer Claws. "You comprehend quantum physics?" he incredulously stated.

Sorun snorted. "Pfft. No," he denied. "Just the part that lets me make portals. Took me forever just to find that part of the book and I quit reading after that." Even then most of the logic came out from a movie he'd seen that used a visual aid, the same one he'd given Sonic and Sally when he demonstrated it.

Shaking his head, Finitevus turned back around and crouched down to grab at more debris. "You surprise me more every day, human," he said aloud. "Here I took you for an unacademic dullard who'd never cracked a book open in their life."

"Aw, that's not being fair. I can be smart when I'm motivated enough," Sorun said. "I'm just not usually very motivated. Like, almost never. It's easier to just leave the heavy thinking for other people."

"With how much work pertaining to this tower you've foisted onto me I can see that," Finitevus remarked. Sorun had made a scoff in response but otherwise didn't comment on the jab. "You know, with somebody with as much potential in manipulating the forces of Chaos as you possess you could benefit at least trying to understand the sciences. I saw the way your face glazed over in a lack of comprehension when the AI first gave us those tower plans."

Sorun bit his tongue at the scathing remark that threatened to escape his mouth. To call what he saw "plans" would have been a great oversimplification. Everything on those blueprints from the designs to the technical jargon had meant absolutely nothing to him, and he'd been more than happy to let Finitevus examine them on his own. His pride certainly had taken a hit on that, something Finitevus saw fit to capitalize on.

"Sorun, I am being serious," Finitevus said. "I know you don't have a link of your own, but because of that the amount of fidelity you have with Chaos energies is far above anything else I've ever seen. You're wasting your talents remaining in ignorance."

"Yeah, well, I don't exactly have much time left to study up now, do I?"

Finitevus didn't have a response for this. The words had left Sorun's mouth a bit more colder than the scientist was accustomed to, and the meaning behind them hadn't been lost on him, either. He'd sighed under his breath and refrained from continuing that avenue of thought, choosing instead to backtrack a bit.

"Still, I genuinely do think you have potential. What were you even doing before all this happened?"

"I worked as a postage boy for this crazy cat lady I worked for," Sorun honestly answered. "Had a cool hat and everything."

"And you don't think such a thing was beneath you?"

"Not really," the dark-haired human quickly answered. "What do you want from me? I'm not a scholar. I played video games for a majority of my life. I was content with what I had and didn't want to go any further than that," he explained. "Not everybody wants to push their mental limits. Living here, with that job, with all my friends and everything I had was enough. Told you once that all I wanted was a simple life like that." He made a tsking sound. "'Sides, with as many dumb decisions you've made I'm pretty sure your intelligence averages out to the same level I'm on, so what's it matter?"

Finitevus' face wrinkled in offense. "I have a PhD."

"And I graduated from middle school. What's your point?"

There was an extremely sharp inhale from Finitevus as he stood up straight. A piece of wood was clenched in his hands and, out of frustration, his bandaged fingers began to involuntarily squeeze it so hard it splintered under his grasp. After a few seconds he took a calming breath, relaxing his hold and causing some of the red that appeared on his face in anger to fade. "Let it go, it's not worth it, he's dying soon anyways," he muttered under his breath.

"What was that?" Sorun called out from behind him.

"I asked if you found it yet!" Finitevus shouted back, dropping the splintered piece of wood. "In case it wasn't obvious I'm not too keen on spending all day and night digging through ruins."

"And here I thought that was all you did in your spare time. Oh, hello..."

It was finally when Sorun had moved a particularly large burnt board of wood that he found it. The same small, metal box Tails had given him all that time ago. Half-submerged in the soil and what little ash remained from the bombing day that hadn't been washed away by the elements yet. He bent down and dragged it out from the ground, and then used his Bringer Claw to wipe off any excess soil and ash as he examined it.

Structurally speaking it seemed intact for the most part. He fiddled around with the switch on its side and found, much to his surprise, it actually did turn on, though the images on the display were significantly more dim than he remembered them being and they were flickering on and off. He frowned at the sight, and then turned around towards Finitevus.

"Hey, F!" he called out. "I found it!"

"About time." Finitevus abandoned the debris he'd been holding at the time and met with Sorun as the two walked towards each other.

Automatically Sorun had tossed the device to the echidna, who'd deftly caught it and began examining it while making a sound of interest. "It's slightly damaged. Nothing I won't be able to fix back at base provided Nicole makes me the proper tools," he said. His lips thinned. "The range of this radar is much shorter than I imagined it'd be from your description."

Sorun flinched. He'd nearly forgotten the range hadn't been the best on that thing. Not terrible by any means, but still. "Yeah, it's only around a thousand-mile radius," he said. "That's not gonna be a problem, is it?"

"Hmmm... maybe not," Finitevus denied with a shake of his head. "The fact it's still somewhat functional after all this time and that it actually works if that blip I'm seeing in your hand says anything is a testament to the craftsmanship. You said that fox boy constructed this? The one with two tails?"

"Miles, yeah."

"Hmph. He's not half-bad," Finitevus admitted. The casual appraisal had been enough to catch Sorun off-guard, and he nearly commented on it until he began speaking further. "The fact the range is so limited shows a clear lack of understanding when it comes to Chaos energies, but I can't fault a child not even into his teens for such shoddy workmanship. Honestly, it's a miracle he got the thing working at all."

"Yeah, there it is," Sorun internally sighed while rubbing at his forehead. "So we're good?"

The white echidna nodded. "After some repair work, a few tune-ups and upgrades, it should be as simple as integrating it into the tower's construction. The modification itself should take short work, and with how fast those nanites work the tower itself should be constructed before the day is out tomorrow." He looked up at Sorun. "If all goes well we should be finished before three days have passed. Perhaps even sooner. You'll have to go once we gain all seven Emeralds; I doubt Enerjak will sit idly by if all seven Chaos Emeralds are suddenly gathered in one place."

"I... I figured as much, yeah." The news was a bit of a blow to Sorun - that it was coming that soon. He'd expected as much, but even already having died once didn't do much to prepare him for dying in less than a week now. It'd certainly brought his mood down to a level it hadn't been at in a while. A level Sorun never figured he'd feel again, and yet here he was.

It seemed that Finitevus picked up on the sudden mood Sorun was in, as his expression fell slightly and he'd made a small grimace as he turned his head to the side. "I... wanted you to know that I've been thinking a lot about everything you've said to me," he said, making Sorun give him a curious look. "How this universe and everything in it is chaotic and how making something perfect in it is an effort in futility."

"That's... not exactly what I was going for, but sure, I guess that's sorta right," Sorun said. "Where's this going?"

"The truth is, Sorun, you confound me. When I first saw you I'd figured you for another thoughtless do-gooder like the Chaotix and the Freedom Fighters and all the rest who just happened to have enough power to make an actual difference. But over the course of this entire ordeal we've spoken at length, and... well, quite honestly you're the furthest thing from a do-gooder. You're nothing like them," he said. "Too pragmatic, too open-minded, too much of a thinker in areas most of the people you live around would never dare to delve into. I see so much potential in you, and you waste it doing nothing while withering away at domestic life. I was honestly frustrated knowing you chose to do nothing and just let those Freedom Fighters do everything, but... perhaps, in spite of all that, you're right."

The echidna took a few steps forwards and looked up from the device in his hands and out towards the horizon. Sorun, keeping quiet and rooted to the spot, followed his back with his eyes as the echidna stopped and continued speaking out.

"I've come to realize how much time I've wasted in pursuit of impossible goals. Reshaping the world into a new and perfect order is an act of futility in the grand scheme of things, when centuries after the fact events far outside of my control will just bring everything I tried to help the world escape from come back to reality. As we've both said, it's... cycles. Chaos Theory. Ironic that one who studies Chaos such as myself was blind to that truth." Finitevus made a rueful laugh while readjusting his glasses. "I facilitated the destruction of Albion and was indirectly responsible for the deaths of most of the citizens there I'd spent my entire life growing up around for what? Revenge for them ousting me as some tragic freak born from an accident? As the first step in some inane plan to reshape the world? I experimented on and banished members of the Brotherhood of Guardians to an empty zone to die in isolation just to further my own ends, even after they gave me their trust. What good have all my machinations with Enerjak truly done?"

"Hmph." Sorun glanced over the echidna's shoulder and at the same horizon he was staring at. "I'm glad it took the whole world's population losing their souls to get you to see sense."

"I'm not blind to the mistakes I've made, Sorun. I was wrong. I'm not nearly prideful enough not to admit it." He turned around towards Sorun, his darkened eyes meeting with Sorun's own. To the pale human's surprise, a forlorn expression had overtaken Finitevus' features. "Perhaps you were right about my newfound powers being an outlet for frustrations and desires I'd always harbored, and I'd just accepted the flimsy excuse of 'corruption' everyone on Albion labeled me with out of nothing more than convenience, perhaps even denial. I want to correct my mistakes and live the way you do."

"You're choosing the most horrible role model possible to base life decisions on," Sorun said in a flat tone. "For real. There are so many better examples. Why me of all people?"

He was self-aware enough to know he was a lazy bastard. Anti-social to the point he was polite with people but didn't really go out of his way to be nice to random strangers since he was always too nervous and shy, and he was barely any better with his friends. Fairly selfish, too. In Sorun's own opinion he was a terrible person who was always amazed people chose to remain friends with him, so he couldn't comprehend why somebody would want to be like him.

"I don't exactly have many options. Most everybody treats me with distrust."

"Because you have straight-up betrayed almost everyone who has ever trusted you," Sorun pointed out, remembering the first Enerjak incident and what Knuckles' father, Locke, had said about him.

"... This is true, yes," the doctor admitted. "I was practically floored when you volunteered for me to run tests on you. I'd hardly been serious and figured I'd lose nothing by asking even though you were likely to say no. But you defied all belief, we learned of each other, and... I grew to understand that you live the way you do even though you're capable of so much, all because it's simply what you wanted." He made a sigh, removed one of his hands from the device he held, and looked down at his bandaged palm. "Without all these lofty goals of world destruction I've abandoned, what's left for me? A disgraced doctor nobody trusts? What should I do? What do I want?" Black bolts of electricity arced over his fingers. "Digging through the world's past had always been little more than a hobby of mine to pursue on my off-time, but... now I'm not so sure. Ever since I became this it was all I ever truly enjoyed doing. Even if it's a waste of my abilities, it's my choice and my life, is it not? I can do whatever I want. So why not just live however I see fit? And perhaps one day when I've tired of playing the archeologist I can pursue my past scientific interests." He looked back up at Sorun. "It just seems... simpler. Easier. That's why you live the way you do, is it not?"

Sorun quickly exhaled and gave Finitevus a shrug. "Hell if I know, man. If you want my two cents I think you're reaching way too far to understand a guy who's just lazy and doesn't wanna risk his life doing stupid stuff, but hey, if it works for you."

"Maybe I am looking too far into it," Finitevus admitted. "It doesn't matter. I've made up my mind. No more worrying about the entire world or things outside of my control. I think, once this is all over, I want to try my hand at living for myself for a change."

"Well... good for you, I suppose." Sorun pocketed his right hand, with the left one still holding the blue Chaos Emerald. It'd shifted into the Yamato as the Bringer Claws disappeared from his shoulders and back. "Long as you stop experimenting on people and sending people to pocket dimensions to die." There was a pause. "The fuck, you actually did that?"

"Yes, I did." Based on his tone Finitevus didn't sound too particularly sorry over it. "But that's another thing I've learned from you. Hurting others just isn't worth it when it brings so much unwanted attention towards me. I've made more enemies for life with all I've done than I'm comfortable with. Honestly, it's more trouble than it's worth."

"True enough," Sorun sighed out. Maybe he should have been more disturbed hearing about what he'd done to the Brotherhood, especially considering they were all relatives of Knuckles', but thinking on it Sorun didn't know them at all, whereas he knew Finitevus. He couldn't find it in himself to feel anything towards them and decided to just nod at Finitevus. "So that's it? No more of the evil schemes, nothing? Just a life of screwing around and doing whatever?"

"If we're successful and I have the opportunity. We'll just have to see." A brief gust of wind blew between the two of them. "Where does that leave us, Sorun?" Finitevus asked him, giving the human a serious look. "What are we to each other?"

At hearing that, Sorun took in a deep breath and tilted his head up to the sky. He thought long and hard on the question, and then tilted his head down at Finitevus to meet his gaze. "I won't lie to you, doctor. I genuinely considered stabbing you in the back and killing you once you finished helping us with all this." The revelation didn't bring any surprise to the echidna's face, though Sorun did notice his grip on the device had tightened somewhat. "I just figured you were another maniac like Eggman running around that was too dangerous to live. With all that's happened I didn't wanna leave the world with one more dangerous psycho in it and figured I'd take you out before I went to make sure this never happened again. Beyond that you technically killed me since you started all this, so... yeah, fuck you." He left out a heavy breath, removed his hand from his pocket, and then looked down at his feet as he rubbed the back of his head. "Ah, but... I just don't have it in me anymore. With everything you've said, I just don't feel like killing you would actually solve anything. Just don't see the point. Call me a fool for trusting you; I don't much care. We may not be friends, but we still got to know each other. I think that counts for something ." He shook his head. "I'm not sure. I just don't feel like killing you. I'd even go as far as to say I... didn't mind being around you that much." He looked up at Finitevus' eyes, with Sorun's own glare hardening. "This isn't forgiveness, just to be clear. But at the end of the day you and I both know you don't give a damn about my opinion in that matter. So I guess you'll have to figure out how to forgive yourself."

"... It matters more than you'd think." Sorun blinked in surprise when he heard Finitevus say that, followed by the echidna turning back around towards the horizon. "Considering you're the only person in the world who will talk to me normally."

Sorun didn't have any words for that. He just sighed instead, and then walked forwards so that he was now standing at the echidna's side. What was probably whole minutes passed as they silently stared out towards the distance, each one thinking on the other's words. Sorun himself didn't know what was going on in the echidna's thoughts, but he knew his own opinions on him were conflicted.

All things considered, he'd killed Sorun. It was his fault Enerjak had done what he'd done because he'd been the one to summon him.

Indirectly responsible, maybe, but the fault still lied with him. By all rights Sorun should have hated him, but all said and done, he didn't. He couldn't find it in himself to sympathize with all the doctor's victims, because at the end of the day he just didn't care. Sorun wasn't so sure why. Because he hadn't known them? Because Finitevus was willingly acknowledging he'd done wrong and would stop? Because they both knew each other now and had some kind of bond? He didn't know.

Maybe it was because, deep down, Sorun really didn't want to kill Finitevus. Didn't want to add anymore pain in the world and actually did believe Finitevus' words promising self change. He didn't even know if it was the right thing to do, letting him walk away without any consequences, but then again maybe living with all he'd done was punishment enough. If he even cared. Either way Sorun wasn't in a place to say. And at the end of the day, he didn't much care.

"... We should be getting back, shouldn't we?" Finitevus voiced. Dragged from his thoughts, Sorun looked tot he side at the echidna, spotting his yellow irises looking right at him. "We've work to finish, after all."

"Yeah." Yamato was already pulled from its scabbard in preparation to cut a cross in front of them. "Yeah, I know."

As the portal was formed in front of them, a small, almost inaudible snort left Finitevus. "You were truly going to kill me?"

"Single long-distance cut to remove your head while your back was turned was the plan," Sorun said in a quiet, honest voice. "Woulda been quick. Not really one to prolong suffering."

"Hm." Closing his eyes, Finitevus began stepping towards the portal. "Betrayal doesn't feel very pleasant from this end," he said. Sorun began following closely behind him.

"No, I imagine it doesn't."

A/N- I liken the way Sorun's kind of cool with Finitevus despite all the diabolical stuff he did to people to be like the way Gon from HXH is friends with genuine serial murderers who he knows have killed people but doesn't really care because said killers helped him out some so he likes them. I'm not even talking about Killua, I'm talking about people like the hair-eating guy they met during the Greed Island arc. Dude was an actual psychopath that tried killing Gon and at the end it was all smiles and waves because he helped out with their training.

There's something not right with Gon.

Chapter 77

Recursion Error

Episode 77- Go for gold

When it was all said and done the act of constructing the tower meant to be used to attract all the Chaos Emeralds in the world to bring them all into one spot had gone without a hitch. It'd been constructed right in the middle of New Mobotropolis without interruption, and it had even been activated without a single issue whatsoever.

It hadn't even been that impressive of a showing, either. It'd been the exact opposite of what Sorun saw whenever he saw the seven Emeralds fly off into the distance whenever they were used. They'd simply flew in from the horizon from varying directions, gathered around and floated in a circle around the tip of the tower, and when it had been shut off all seven gems simply fell down to the ground without any fanfare whatsoever. Sorun was pretty sure it hadn't even taken five minutes, not that he'd been bothered to count.

Sorun couldn't even remember the last time something went so perfectly right.

What was supposed to happen then was that they were to store the seven Emeralds away for that hypothetical "in case we need them" scenario they'd kept talking back and forth about. By a stroke of luck Nicole had trusted Sorun with that process, and his method for doing that had just been to give the Emeralds to Finitevus. And as Sorun stood there in the makeshift lab made for Finitevus in the underground bunker, hands crossed with his back leaning against the examination table, he was wondering what was taking the albino echidna so long to complete that other task he'd asked him to perform.

Just when he was wondering that, the telltale opening of a portal made from a Warp Ring opened up in the lab. Finitevus walked straight through, the portal shrinking into nonexistence behind him as he stopped in front of Sorun. Shortly after stopping he'd thrown a backpack towards the human, who'd caught it with one hand and then proceeded to look down through its opening.

Inside Sorun saw seven shining, glowing jewels of various colors and fifty rings shining a golden luster, all piled into the backpack. Enough rings and gems that the backpack itself was practically bulging and threatening to split apart at the seams, but thankfully, it remained intact. Sorun nodded at the sight, breathing out a quiet breath, and then looked up to Finitevus.

"You got these pretty quick," he complimented. "Not bad for an old guy."

"'Old'?" Finitevus repeated, sounding affronted. "I'm not even in my mid-thirties yet."

"Yeah. Old."

Whether or not Finitevus took that for Sorun kidding around or if he was being genuine wasn't made clear from the way he raised an eye ridge at Sorun while giving him an annoyed look. "You're either blind or terrible at insults. I happen to look rather young for my age. Do I truly look that old to you?"

"I... can't really tell with Mobians," Sorun admitted after a long moment under Finitevus' scrutiny. "I think it's the fur. Hides the age. I'm not so sure, though." He often made that mistake a lot, confusing some Mobians for being much older or younger than they actually were. Wasn't his fault; unless they had white hair it was almost impossible for him to tell. And in cased like Finitevus who had naturally white fur it made it all the more difficult.

It had to be the fur. That was the only explanation, because he never had this problem with humans. Either that or Mobians just aged really well, and at this point he wouldn't be surprised about either explanation.

Finitevus seemed much less concerned with Sorun's lack of comprehending Mobian age, discarding the matter entirely with a shake of his head. "Moving on, I acquired your fifty Power Rings, as requested," he said, gesturing to the dark olive-colored backpack Sorun held in his hand. "I admit I'm quite confused on why you wanted them, though. The seven Chaos Emeralds are obvious enough for the powers they give you, but why the rings?"

"As I said, I need an edge against Enerjak. Just gonna get myself killed if I try going against him with only the seven Emeralds," Sorun muttered, his gaze turning back down into the backpack. "I was told through a friend of mine once that Sonic had this Super form. In fact, you mentioned something like this once."

"Yes, when A.D.A.M. originally used the... wait." Behind his spectacles, Finitevus narrowed his eyes at Sorun. "You can't possibly be meaning to-"

"Seven Emeralds and fifty rings. That's the formula," Sorun interrupted. "That's what Rotor told me Sonic needed to turn into Super Sonic. I'm gonna do the same thing."

It was the only method he could think of when he kept wondering to himself what he could do to gain more power. No matter what he tried thinking of, he couldn't find an answer. The Emeralds were the only way he'd ever gotten any kind of power, but somewhere deep inside he knew it wasn't enough. Whether it be fear of Enerjak or lack of self-confidence, he just didn't feel the seven powers he'd gotten from them would be enough.

A Super form, on the other hand, might be enough. He wasn't certain if it would be, if it would even work or what powers he'd get if he managed to pull it off, but it was something. More power, which he sorely needed at the moment. It'd no doubt be a host a fair amount of unpredictability that Sorun was have to adapt to on the fly, something he wasn't very keen on doing while fighting a literal god, but desperate times called for stupid decisions in his experience.

Finitevus didn't seem very convinced by Sorun's logic. "Sorun, not just any Mobian can attain an ascended form by channeling so much Chaos energy from an outside source. Most would die trying," he explained in a grave voice. "Sonic is-"

"Sonic is special? He always is," Sorun bitterly stated, sharply turning his head to the side. "Sonic this, Sonic that, he always gets to be so special when it comes to Chaos energy and his powers." Heavy resentment dripped into his tone. "Well, if he can do it, then so can I. You said it yourself I have perfect control over Chaos energy."

"You do not have perfect control," Finitevus denied. "If you did, you could create whatever powers you wish from the Emeralds. I said you had a higher amount of fidelity manipulating the energies than anybody else, but perfect it is not." He shook his head. "Beyond that you can do all that because you have no link ! I've seen that blue hedgehog, albeit at a distance; his Chaos link is among the strongest of all Mobians. That's the only reason he's one of the few individuals alive who can handle going into that form!" He gestured to the backpack. "We already know your lack of a link makes it so absorbing Chaos energy harms you. If you attempt to ascend into that for you could very well-"

"Die?" Sorun asked, immediately silencing Finitevus. "That's already going to happen when I absorb the seven Emeralds. It can't do any more damage. Shorten what little time I'll have left, maybe, but that's it."

"... You don't even know if it will work. Or what it will do to you," Finitevus weakly argued, dropping his hand. "But," he continued with a resigned sigh, "I... I suppose you don't have much choice in the matter. And you're dead-set on this already, aren't you?"

"I told you I was going all-in." Sorun reached down and zipped the top of the backpack closed. He slung one of the straps over his shoulder, and then pushed off the examination table and turned to directly face Finitevus. "This is the end for me," he said to him. "After today I'm gone."

The mood in the entire room had grown somber. Sorun's overall posture had gone slack, his head bowed down with his face uncharacteristically blank. Finitevus had gone still at the sight, face tight and breathing out while darting his eyes away from Sorun's, which were still looking right at him.

"Where will you go?" Sorun asked him. "Once this is over?"

"There were still some ancient echidna ruins I'd been examining before this mess began, back in Downunda. I think I'll return back to there," Finitevus answered. Sorun vaguely recalled that continent, the one that used to be Australia. He still struggled not to reflexively sneer at its new name whenever he heard it. "That's assuming you're successful. I'll give it twenty-four hours after I leave. If everyone's souls haven't been returned by then I'll... assume you failed in stopping Enerjak. If that's the case... I'm not so sure," he sighed out. "I may just use a Warp Ring to transport myself to a different zone entirely to escape all this."

"... You can do that?" Sorun asked, the surprise in his voice masking his solemn mood. "Go to whole other universes?"

"It's not something I want to do. I belong to this zone, after all, but if you fail then it won't matter. But yes, I know how to use the Warp Rings to traverse to other zones." A bit of surprise flashed over the echidna's features. "I'm somewhat shocked you didn't know of this. I had assumed you just knew since the portals your Yamato creates runs on mostly the same principle."

"That so...?" Sorun's eyes traveled down to the backpack strap slung over his shoulder. "Travel to other zones, huh? Well, if there was another time, then maybe." He looked back at Finitevus. "So that's your plan? Hope I win and pick back up where you left off, bug out if I lose?"

"Essentially," he confirmed with a small nod. "You don't sound so approving."

"It's unnecessary to make those precautions. I am winning this fight," Sorun claimed. "That bastard'll keep everyone's souls hostage forever if I don't win them back. I will not let that future come to pass, no matter what happens. I refuse." Sorun looked over his shoulder. "Not to mention me losing would mean Nicole would have to suffer being alone in this world. It's not happening. None of it."

He wouldn't have it. No matter what happened. Every single thought inside of Sorun's head kept screaming at him to ensure that, no matter what, he'd die knowing Enerjak would never, ever be a threat to anybody ever again and he'd rescue everyone's souls so this world didn't become a graveyard full of husks. By now it was the only thing he could reasonably focus on, and the longer he stood there with the solution strapped on his back the more restless he got. It was a feeling so urgent it had even overridden the knowledge he'd die doing this in his mind.

So no. Losing wasn't an option. It felt like he'd never find peace even if he died if he failed doing this.

"And how exactly do you plan on putting Enerjak down for good?" Finitevus questioned him. "In case you've forgotten, he's a nigh-immortal spirit even without a host to sustain him in the corporeal realm."

"I have an idea about that. Should work. In theory," Sorun said.

"In theory ?" Finitevus' tone was incredulous.

"It's a solid theory with a proven foundation," the human defended. "I already know Yamato can wound his true, spiritual form or whatever you want to call it. I just need to get creative is all." He turned towards the lab's exit, one hand resting on the strap over his shoulder. He let out a short breath, and then looked over his shoulder and at Finitevus. "Just get out of here," Sorun said. "... Maybe never come back to this city, 'cause Nicole might... yeah, just don't come back."

Finitevus opened his mouth to respond to that, but then closed it. He watched as Sorun approached the door leading out of the room, shook his head, and then turned around. "Sorun," he called out, almost quiet enough the teen hadn't heard him. He still had, though, and stopped just short of the door. "I'm sorry."

"..." Sorun's head dipped down towards his feet. "... Word of advice. Stay away from that red guy," he said. "Never did figure out who he was, but you should know I've heard of him from someone else. He knew things about me nobody should have known." He reached out and took hold of the doorknob. "Don't know what it all means, but the guy's bad news. Just thought you should know."

"After what he did I hardly need for you to tell me that." Finitevus had transitioned to looking at a Warp Ring held between his fingers. He'd yet to throw and activate it, simply thumbing at it as he hesitated before speaking. "I meant it when I said I'm sor-"

"Just... just go, Finitevus."

Finitevus clamped his mouth shut. He glanced over his shoulder to look at Sorun's back one more time, and then sighed out loud and threw the Warp Ring in front of him. It hovered in the air and grew into a swirling portal that he stepped through without any hesitation.

Sorun had heard the portal close behind him, with the human himself not making a single sound as he turned the doorknob and opened the door. He felt in part maybe he should have given some goodbye, but a large majority of him just wasn't in the mood for it. Words would have probably been wasted on him, anyways.

The fact he'd said sorry had given Sorun a bit of pause, however. Were circumstances different he may have pondered the meaning behind those words, but now wasn't the time. It hadn't even been a full hour since all the seven Chaos Emeralds were gathered in one spot, and Sorun didn't want to risk all that attention bringing Enerjak to the city and having something happen to it. So he had to leave now, before he had any second thoughts and before something could happen to ruin it all.

In all honesty he should have just formed a portal to Angel Island using Yamato in the lab the moment Finitevus left, but for some reason his feet had automatically walked him out and into the bunker's central room. There was an urge Sorun acknowledged in the back of his mind for wanting to see Nicole one last time before he left, and despite the urgency he'd felt he'd still allowed his feet to walk him out of the lab. When he'd reached the center room, though, he wasn't able to spot her despite looking around. Not in there or the nearby kitchen or even in the room with the green dias.

Better for that, maybe. He wasn't even sure if he could handle seeing her one more time or how he would explain why he had a backpack full of Chaos Emeralds and was leaving. With her he would have preferred a proper goodbye, but he wasn't too keen on waiting around. So, upon seeing no sign of Nicole, he reached behind him, unzipped the backpack, and rooted around inside of it until he felt a Chaos Emerald. He pulled it out, scoffing under his breath when he discovered he pulled the blue one out, and then tossed it up into the air.

"We just can't seem to separate from one another," he half-amusedly thought. He caught the Emerald, with the gem bursting in a shower of blue particles and reshaping into the Yamato in the same instant his hand made contact. He swiftly pulled the sword out from its scabbard and cut a cross into the air, which quickly folded inwards to form a portal. He'd made the move to re-sheath the sword, but a voice from behind him had halted Sorun's movements before the tip of the blade even reached the scabbard's opening.

"Sorun."

There was a moment where Sorun had completely frozen when he heard that voice behind him. Trepidation and fear and dread and a sense of longing all crashing together at once that completely locked his muscles in place. Uncertainty that plagued his mind as he wondered what to do. Once the moment passed he let out a shallow breath while letting his right arm go limp with the sword still held in it. He'd taken a deep breath to prepare himself, and then turned around so he could fully face the speaker.

He'd almost been deceived at first that, just maybe, there was a possibility that Nicole was none the wiser about what was going on. She'd been standing behind Sorun in her normal, relaxed pose with her hands folded over her lap, seemingly completely at ease, so he'd assumed that all was well. But then he'd looked up at her face and realized no, not all was well. Not the sad expression her mouth was in. Not the way her green eyes, so sharp and critical, was looking between him, the sword, the backpack, and the portal.

"Hello, Nicole," Sorun greeted. His voice was quiet and betrayed almost no emotion. He found it surprisingly easy to keep calm, whether it be from the person standing in front of him or knowing how the day would end. "It's a nice day, isn't it?"

"Sorun, what is this?"

"Then again," he continued, "I suppose there hasn't been a single nice day since Enerjak came back. What with the clouds and all."

" Sorun , what do you think you are doing?"

The impatient tone Nicole had taken didn't even make Sorun flinch. "What does it look like, Nicole?" he asked her. "You're the smartest person I know. You can figure it out."

"I think I 'figured it out' the moment I noticed all the Chaos Emeralds were missing. You didn't even wait a day." Her eyes darted away from Sorun, towards the open door leading to the empty lab. "Where did Dr. Finitevus go?"

"Left to go do his own thing," Sorun answered. "This whole thing is pretty much done, so I can't really blame the guy for bugging out now."

"Over," Nicole repeated, quietly and under her breath. Her head slowly turned back towards Sorun, and after taking one look at the backpack he wore she looked right into Sorun's eyes. "Sorun, no. No, you can't-"

"If you give me one," Sorun interrupted, making Nicole pause, "just one single, viable plan we could use to save everybody and stop Enerjak, even if it has the slimmest of margins of succeeding, I will close this portal right now and give you back the Chaos Emeralds. But if you can't even give me that, Nicole, then I don't see what other choice I have."

"Choice?" The calm, even expression Nicole had been wearing thus far began to waver. The sad downturn her mouth was in began breaking down further as she took a step towards Sorun. "You can't speak like- Sorun, of course you have a choice!" she loudly argued. "There's nothing forcing you-!"

"I've already lost one world."

That single sentence had made Nicole pause mid-step. Her eyes had widened and her ears slowly began to lower down and fold against her head, while Sorun's head dropped so he didn't have to look at her eyes.

"It still hurts, knowing everything there is gone. Billions of people, gone. Thousands of years of culture and history, gone. Everyone there I knew, my entire life, everything I ever surrounded myself with, gone. It's like such a large part of me died along with that world when I found out, and for such a long time I didn't even know if it was worth living anymore." His grip on the Yamato loosened enough that its tip scraped against the floor. "All I had left was this world, and at the beginning of all this, when I first came here, I hated everything. I hated all the people. The world itself. How... how normal logic just doesn't exist here, how alien everything was. I didn't feel like I belonged. I was more worried about making it back and leaving all this behind even if it meant everyone died in the process." His grip on the sword tightened, and he rose it up so Sorun could examine his reflection on the flat side of the blade. He made a morose sound at the sight. "Whether it be from my arm getting twisted so much it practically flew off or just me changing my mind, I... decided differently. I was such a broken mess after we found out about Earth, but everybody... everybody kept helping me. Things got better, I... I started to like living here. It finally felt like I had a place here. Then all this happened."

To call the life he'd been beginning to make here a replacement for the one on Earth would not only be a disservice to him, it would be completely inaccurate. Wrong. Nothing on Mobius would ever replace what he'd had on Earth. Even still, he'd grown to appreciate things more and more, even if everything was different. Living a cozy life here had been nice. The friends had been nice. The community was more decent that he could have ever hoped for.

No. Not a replacement. Life here was just a necessary alternative with the death of the original. But still an acceptable one, if only because the people here he'd surrounded himself with made it such an appealing life for Sorun to live. They made it worth it. But without them, he was back to having nothing. Because of Enerjak he had nothing, all over again.

Sorun looked behind his shoulder, towards the portal that was behind his back. He lowered the sword back down, softly exhaling at the same time while looking back at Nicole.

"I don't want to lose another home," he told her. "I can't do it again. Just can't. So I'm going."

"... You'll die." Nicole had spoken so quietly Sorun had barely even heard her. Her ears were completely flattened against her head, which was bowed down far enough that her hair was concealing her features. "If you take in all that power you will die again."

Sorun turned and took a single step towards the portal. "Doesn't matter-"

"Do not say your life does not matter!"

In the next moment Nicole was right in front of Sorun, grasping his right forearm and halting his movement. It'd been so fast he wasn't even sure if she'd ran or had just teleported right in front of him. He'd wanted to respond, but then he'd seen her face. The way her ears had gone from being against her head to being flared out behind it, like she was incredibly upset. Her expression was anguished enough that her teeth and fangs were visible to Sorun, and it was clear to see how glossy her eyes were.

"Why do you talk about yourself like you don't matter!?" Nicole yelled, her voice full of hurt. "We all helped you because we care about you! You're not... you're not something that can just be discarded! Do you really think nobody would care if you died again!? Do you think I wouldn't !?"

"..." Sorun didn't know what to say to her. All he could do was look at her with a sad, bordering-on-apathetic stare. Whether it was from that silent stare or her own rant, Nicole's own expression became somewhat subdued as her eyes slowly dropped ahead. And then, before Sorun could do anything else, she'd pulled on the arm hard enough that their bodies were pressed together.

"Don't do it, Sorun. Please don't do it..." Her voice had gone as shaky as her body as she slowly wrapped her trembling arms around him. "I don't want you to die again. Please, just don't."

"I..." Sorun began, hesitating as his mind raced on making a decision on what to do. "I don't know how else we're supposed to-"

"We'll find another way," Nicole said, shaking her head. "Just don't go. I'll think of something, some way we can save everyone without you dying."

"You don't sound very convincing." That'd been Sorun's one attempt to bring some humor into the situation. All it did was make Nicole look worse and pull him closer. "Nicole. I'm going."

Her grip on him tightened. "No. Don't. I won't let you."

He hadn't taken that claim seriously. Just as Nicole being desperate and her just saying anything to get him to stay. But he'd heard that sound - like sifting sand against shards of glass - and took a quick glance around. His eyes widened a bit when he saw sections of the walls and ceiling distending and morphing into small bulges.

At seeing that, Sorun realized that Nicole was more serious than he thought. It was, oddly enough, extremely touching that she valued him enough she'd go that far to save him, enough that his heart skipped a beat. But he'd already made up his mind, and one way or another he was going through that portal to save the world. So he'd made a decision in that moment and decided to commit to it before he'd regret it.

"... My mind's made up." He lifted his left hand holding the scabbard and held it against Nicole's back. "It'll be fine," Sorun murmured out into her ear as he leaned closer. "I'm gonna go fix this and get everyone back, okay? Just don't wait up for me."

"No, no you're not, none of this is okay-"

Sorun tilted his head kissed the top of Nicole's head.

It hadn't been much. By all rights it was the most chaste kiss imaginable, though it had been enough to cause Nicole to freeze up entirely while her eyes had widened as much as her body allowed them. Sorun himself wasn't wholly sure why he'd done it. To catch her off guard was the main reason, a desired result which seemed much more effective than he thought it would be. And he would acknowledge that, somewhere in the back of his mind, seeing as he didn't even have an hour of life left now was as good a time as any to say "fuck it" and show some affection for the girl he liked. The lack of future consequences made the decision all the more appealing.

In the end, he wasn't so sure how Nicole was going to take it after this. And he didn't have time to contemplate this seeing as she'd completely frozen up as a result of the kiss, after which Sorun placed his hands closed around their respective items on her shoulders-

"Goodbye, Nicole."

- and then promptly shoved her away from him as hard as he could.

Evidently the lynx hadn't expected it, as she'd stumbled back very far away from Sorun with surprise and anguish appearing on her face. Sorun'd hadn't even thought twice and leapt right towards the portal, jumping in and spinning around only once he'd crossed the edge of the portal's threshold. He'd seen that Nicole had already regained her footing and was reaching out towards the portal. Her and the dozen or so pairs of metallic hands literally growing out from the walls, ceiling, and floor, all reaching out in the same direction she was and towards him.

"SORU-!"

Nicole's final cry for his name was cut off when Sorun swiped Yamato in front of him and cut the portal off completely. He landed through the other side on his back, eliciting a small grunt from him due to landing on the filled backpack he wore. The darkened sky painted with black clouds filled his sight, and Sorun found his limbs going limp as he chose to just lie there on the grass, staring upwards as he thought about what he'd just done.

He kissed Nicole. And oddly enough... somehow he didn't feel as happy as he thought he would. There was a warm spot in his heart he could barely feel, but it was hard to perceive past all the sadness.

The fact he was slated to die soon was likely to blame. Strangely, in spite of this, he couldn't feel himself regretting what he'd just done. It was probably the only reason he felt the barest of smiles form on his lips.

At the very least he'd die with one less regret.

"Man. What a dick move. Worth it." His small smile disappearing with a groan, Sorun sat straight up. The Yamato was inserted back into its scabbard, and then used as a crutch to help Sorun up to his feet. "Alright, let's get it done."

Finally getting up to his full height, Sorun chose to turn around. A number of tropical-looking trees surrounded him at all sides, and right in front of him was the mouth to a cave. The entrance to the chamber containing the Master Emerald on Angel Island, if he hadn't screwed up in making the portal. Seeing as he recognized it from the first time he was lead here by Knuckles' father, Sorun felt he'd come to the right place. Assuming Enerjak was in there with the Master Emerald it should just be as simple as walking in and finishing it.

... Hopefully he was in there, at the very least. Sorun didn't know where else he would be if not near the Master Emerald in what Knuckles considered to be his home.

"I mean, he should be in there. There aren't many other placed he could... nah, he's in there. Gotta be," Sorun rationalized to himself as he began walking towards the entrance. "According to Finitevus this all started here, after all. Where else would a god-tyrant be if not sitting on the most powerful object in the whole world? Classic final boss dungeon."

"Hey, can we take two seconds so I can be the voice of reason here?"

With a barely-suppressed sigh of frustration, Sorun stopped just shy of the mouth of the cave entrance. He turned to his right, seeing his own mirror image, blue coat and all, leaning against the entrance with his arms crossed and eyes boring straight into Sorun's own. He looked to be frowning just as heavily as Sorun was.

"I'm not arguing this with you," Sorun said to Sorun. "We're going in there and we're killing ourselves with Enerjak, end of story."

"I just want to make sure you realize what all that entails," Sorun said back to him. "We get one redo. One. And we already used it." His blue-eyed gaze hardened. "We die again, that's it. No do-over, no reset, nothin'."

"Yeah, I was there when the concept of extra lives was explained. You don't think-?"

" You're not thinking , that's the thing." Sorun appeared right in front of Sorun, holding that same dead-serious stare. Sorun didn't so much as flinch as a response, though he did remain rooted to the spot as he listened to him. "You heard Finitevus. Our soul isn't like the souls everything else here have." He walked a short distance behind Sorun, who turned his head to continue looking at him. "Because we're so different we don't get to go to the afterlife like everyone else," Sorun said, pacing a short distance while throwing his arm to the side. "No, 'cause we don't have a Chaos Force link, remember? Our soul lacks the substance theirs does."

His eyebrows creasing, Sorun turned his head away from the pacing Sorun. "I know where this is heading. And I won't hear it."

"But you already know it." This was whispered into Sorun's ear by Sorun, who'd appeared right behind him. "That first time we ended up as a ghost was a fluke 'cause of the Chaos Emeralds. What happens when we die without 'em?"

Sorun shrugged Sorun away. "We don't know-"

"Yeah, that's the thing, ain't it!? We don't know!" Sorun shouted. "When the seven Emeralds get used up they shoot off to who the hell knows where. Seen it happen with the portal machine, and if what the stories say is true it happened to Sonic whenever he went Super. Forget we don't even know if this whole 'going Super' thing is gonna work, if it does have you put any thought into what happens afterwards?" Sorun asked Sorun. "'Cause it's a time-limited transformation. And the Emeralds fly away after they're used. Follow the logic."

Shaking his head, Sorun turned his head back to Sorun. "We don't know I'll lose the seven Chaos Emeralds once the form wears off. For all we know they'll stay in us and we'll be left with the seven normal powers," he argued. "Then we die and it's back to being a ghost."

"Sure, yeah, maybe that happens, or maybe we lose the Emeralds like Sonic does after he goes Super," Sorun said. "Look, we don't know, and because it took us literally dying to get them out the first time I'll say it's probably safe to say we'll keep them. But you need to realize what happens to us on the off chance they do go away."

The mirror image stepped closer to Sorun. Enough that their faces were centimeters apart, each wearing equally grim expressions, with their hair moving in complete sync as a gust of wind blew past them.

"If we die while not connected to any Chaos Emeralds, then that's it. You heard Finitevus when he said our soul can't survive outside a body in its normal state," Sorun said in a grave tone. "We'll be erased. Completely. No afterlife, no walking around as a ghost, not even that black void. We'll just be gone. No different from deleting a save file. We won't exist anymore in any capacity whatsoever."

The possibility was one that had been niggling in the back of Sorun's mind. Frankly speaking there were a lot of unknowns when it came to the Super form. What would happen to him, what happened once it wore off, if he could even do it. But the possibility of dying without the Emeralds, of being erased completely this time around, did cross his mind. It even caused him to hesitate somewhat as he considered the full ramifications. The idea of just not existing anymore; a complete cessation of awareness forever. Something so incomprehensible he was honestly terrified of the possibility. But, in the end, he'd still spun back around towards the cave entrance.

"What difference does it make? I don't know how it'll end, but the path to get there is still the same," Sorun stated as he began walking towards the cave. "Enerjak has to be stopped, and we're going to die in the process. I don't care at this point what happens after. It doesn't matter."

Whether he ended up back to being a ghost or just being deleted from reality, he just didn't care. All that mattered was that Enerjak died and everyone else got to live. That's all that mattered to him. He was fine with whatever happened afterwards as long as he got that result. Unknowable, bleak fate of becoming nothing be damned.

Sorun watched as Sorun walked off into the cave. He stood there silently staring at his back for a full ten seconds, and then sighed and began jogging to catch up to him. "Alright, fine, guess we're doing this," he said, catching up to Sorun and matching his pace so he walked besides him.

A humorless, bemused grin graced Sorun's lips as he glanced besides himself at Sorun. "Just like that?" he asked. "I would have figured you'd be more resistant to this."

All that Sorun offered was a shrug. "Not like we have any reason to live if this all keeps continuing," he said. "All of our reasons had their souls sucked out." He paused. "Well, almost all."

His heart heavy with grief, Sorun gave an agreeing nod. "Yeah." He blinked, and when he opened his eyes he was left walking alone in the cave. "Yeah, I guess."

A/N- Ironically Sorun probably emotionally abuses Nicole more than any other character in the whole story (I mean it's not like it's intentional, but just look at the moves this guy keeps pulling).

Chapter 78

A/N- Yeah, I know, this one took a while. Some chapters are easier to make than others.

Recursion Error

Episode 78- The king of blocking

Every single step further into the cave became harder and harder. Like the weight of Sorun's feet was increasing every time he made a bit of progress forwards. Breathing was becoming a bit of an issue, too. Not to a point it was detrimental to him, but it was hard not to notice how uneven the breaths had gone.

When he saw the faint, green light up ahead, it only got worse. The weight of his steps and his breathing. Anxiety that had Sorun second-guessing himself and wondering if this was really the right course of action. He only needed to divert his thoughts to the others and what had happened with the word to find the will to keep moving forwards, but it was a reminder he was having to rely on more and more with each passing second. He honestly had to wonder if he'd even make it into the chamber.

By some miracle, he had. He was somewhat wishing he hadn't, but he'd made it. It was the exact same as he remembered it: large, circular rock cavern with an open ceiling that revealed the darkened sky. Completely empty, save for steps in the back leading up a large, stone altar, atop which sat the Master Emerald. And there, sitting right on top of it, one leg over the other, head resting on his fist, and looking bored of all things, was him. Enerjak. Knuckles' body, adorning that regal, golden helmet with the white eye lenses that only revealed his mouth. More elegant-looking golden armor that draped his whole form. The blue bits of clothing he remembered him having was gone, bits of black and red cloth replacing whatever was exposed that the golden armor didn't cover.

Somehow, despite the fact he looked so casual sitting up there on top of the giant Chaos Emerald, Sorun felt threatened by merely being in his presence. Like it was suffocating just being in the same room as him. He soldiered on, though, somehow managing to continue his even stroll right into the room as he continued looking up at the god.

"Hey, Enerjak," Sorun glibly called out, sounding about as casual as Enerjak looked despite how frightened he felt, "your soul-sucking days are... over..." His footsteps slowed to a complete halt when Sorun made it to the center of the room. "Wha... what the...?"

It was only from here that he saw the bodies. Almost everybody in this world that he knew. Everybody in the Freedom Fighters, the Chaotix, he even saw Shadow and Rouge up there. All strung up on the walls around the Master Emerald, arms outstretched and bound to the cave wall along with their feet with what looked like stone shackles that grew right out of the wall. They all had the same expression Cream had. White, vacant eyes. Gaunt expressions, mouths hanging open.

All of his friends, reduced to nothing but lifeless husks. Like corpses strung up all around the single person responsible for all of this, who was looking on without a care in the world.

Sorun, in response to seeing this sight, had made a choking sound and gripped his face with his right hand. A single laugh, devoid of all joy and sounding like he was on the verge of breaking down, left him. He didn't know if there was some proper emotion to convey at such a horrifying sight. What he did feel was an incomprehensible torrent of emotions whirling through him. He didn't even know what to think, other than to hold his face and let out that quiet laughing that sounded like it was bordering on crying.

When his hand dropped away and he looked up at Enerjak, Sorun's mouth was formed into a shaking, broken smile. In contrast to this was a single tear rolling down his face. That incomprehensible torrent of so many emotions mixed together, of shock and horror and grief, just wouldn't cease and only worsened the longer he looked at those bodies. It was all he could do to make that face and keep himself standing straight. "You... really need to work on your interior designing, you know..."

A moment passed as Enerjak regarded him. In the second moment, his form straightened up a bit, and his head left his closed fist, as if he was suddenly intrigued by something. "Sorun...?" he confusedly called out, in a voice that somehow was Knuckles' but sounded nothing like him. Like the way he said the words were wrong. "You remained on Mobius...?"

It was Sorun's turn to look confused. "Sonic or the rest really never told you guys what happened?" He reached up to wipe the errant tear away from his face. The longer he looked at all his friends' bodies strung up on the wall, the more that intense, ineffable horror he felt faded, quickly being replaced by growing anger. "Well, whatever," he grunted out, harshly flicking the tear onto the ground. "Yeah. I stuck around."

"Really now..." The tone Enerjak used was one mixed with intrigue and amusement. Like all that Sorun amounted to for him was an interesting thing to pass the time and nothing more. Even the way he tilted his head and gave him that lopsided smirk he wore did nothing but aggravate Sorun. "I have to wonder why your soul wasn't collected with the rest when I willed it. Well, it's no matter."

The moment that final syllable left his mouth he was in front of Sorun. There'd been no movement on his part, not even a flash or any other visual cue to indicate he'd teleported. He'd just gone from sitting on the Emerald to standing right in front of Sorun in that brief of an instant. In response, Sorun's breath choked in his throat, and his grip on the Yamato, his only comfort in this nightmare, tightened. A very heavy sense of dread and fear swam through his whole body at seeing the golden-garbed echidna in front of him, and he found he wasn't able to move his feet.

"It was good seeing you again, Sorun, but I don't really want you around." His grin widened as Enerjak extended his open right hand onto Sorun's chest. "Just give it over and I'll put you up on the wall with the others. There's an open spot next to Sally that you'd be perfect for."

Sorun stared down at the hand resting on his chest, breathing heavily and trembling slightly as he watched, too afraid to do anything. He expected his whole world to go dark any moment now, for him to lose all sensation or to collapse, but, surprisingly, nothing happened. As the seconds ticked by he found his breathing began to normalize, and when he saw Enerjak give a small frown all the confidence he'd immediately lost when Enerjak appeared in front of him began to slowly return.

"... Where is it?" Enerjak asked, sounding less intrigued and more confused now. "Your soul, I can't... why can't I find it?" he muttered, more to himself than Sorun. His frown tightened and his fingers seemed to strain, but nothing happened. "I can't... it's so faint I'm not even sure if it's you I'm feeling or the energy of those I already have within me. It's like trying to grasp a single molecule..." His helmeted eyes turned to Sorun. "Do you even have a soul?"

"Th-that's... the big question, ain't it...?" Sorun hadn't meant to stutter when he said that. What should have been a cheeky remark came out more as a frightened question. He was sure he looked equally as foolish as he sounded with the cold sweat he'd broken out in and the way he was still trembling. He mentally cursed himself in shame when Enerjak made an amused "hmph" sound, smirking at him in contempt.

"Well, you always were an odd one. Somehow I'm not surprised." He pulled his hand away from Sorun's chest, letting the human take in the breath he didn't even know he'd been holding. "Well, whether you truly are soulless or it's just that pathetic I can't even see it, it doesn't matter too much. Maybe it's fortunate you happened by after all." He turned around and began to walk towards the altar's steps. "Maybe you could give me some feedback? The only other person I can think to ask is Finitevus, and I still haven't caught that rat yet."

"Feedback...?" Sorun repeated in a quiet, disbelieving voice. "You-you want to know what I think about all this...?"

"But of course. An outside perspective would be refreshing." Enerjak's foot touched down on the altar's first step. "I mean, you were always such a card, so I figured you'd have something memorable to say."

"What exactly am I supposed to say?" As he watched Enerjak ascend the steps, Sorun found that his voice returned to him as his anger began resurfacing. "You stole the souls of every single living thing on this planet! What, were you expecting praise from me!?"

A sigh left Enerjak, and he stopped ascending the steps halfway up. "Don't you think it's so interesting I was able to do all this with a mere thought and wave of my hand? Not even that insane man Eggman could do all this. Oh, he wanted to, and he certainly put the effort in. Even came close a few times. But I just find it... well, comical, really, how easy it was for me to do it." He turned around, lowering himself and sitting down on the steps as he looked down at Sorun. "But what else could one expect from the great Enerjak?" He leaned forwards a bit, resting his chin on the back of his hand. "But really, I genuinely am curious. I haven't had anybody else to talk to in days, after all."

"There aren't words for what I'm feeling about all this," Sorun said. "What do you even want me to say? Something creative? What, you think I have some deep, provocative thought over the fact you stole every soul in the whole world!?" he yelled at him. "What kind of messed up logic are you even using that made you think this was such a good idea!?"

Enerjak frowned a bit. "You know, if I really wanted to just explain the 'why' of it, I could just bring one of the others back and tell them.

Seeing as your existence is hindering on how amusing this conversation is I'd switch up the subject."

"Well, that's just too bad. I'm not giving you what you want."

The frown lessened. "What cheek. From an amoeba like you of all things. Fine. I suppose you've earned an answer for getting this far." His head tilted up towards the open ceiling that revealed the darkened sky. "The fact of the matter is this world suffers a shortage of capable leaders."

"Oh, don't you dare start on this path..." Sorun angrily ground out. "Let me guess, 'cause I already see where this is going. 'I'm all-powerful, I'm all-knowing, I'm the only person in the whole world who's qualified to lead civilization into a golden age because I'm some random narcissist with godly power.'"

"It's not narcissism. It's fact," Enerjak snapped, looking back down at Sorun. "This world is in ruin because of the decisions everybody who had any amount of control made."

"It's not even that apocalyptic of a world!" Sorun yelled out. "It's post-post-apocalyptic if anything! It isn't... I mean it's not great out there, but it's pretty far from bad!"

"Is that really how you see it? My entire species-"

"Oh my god, shut up about the echidna," Sorun said in an exasperated tone. "I get it. You guys had the whole civil war because half of you want to be insane evil cyborgs. A lot of your kind died because of that and a whole lot of other reasons. Have you ever thought and stopped to think that there's other people on the planet with their own problems?"

"Fine, then why don't we talk about other people?" Enerjak challenged. "An insane madman that brought the entire world to heel using machinery, killing who knows how many along the way? A violent species dependent on technology that waged brutal war against Mobians, who only managed to survive because one of their own helped the Mobians before betraying them. An entire republic of complacent Mobians relegated to a single, technology-fueled-"

"This is the technology thing all over again!" Sorun interrupted. "Just because you don't like it-"

Golden bolts of electricity arced out of Enerjak's body and struck the stairs around him. A deep grimace settled over the echidna's features at the same time, causing Sorun to go completely silent as Enerjak rose up into a standing position.

"Technology... is a sin," he plainly stated as the golden arcs settled. "Every unfortunate circumstance that has ever plagued this world has been a result of an abuse of technology and inept leaders. Weapons of mass destruction. Tools of conflict. Machines of war. Metal that corrupts flesh. I simply wish to create a world devoid of these problems." He turned around and began to ascend the steps leading up to the Master Emerald. "A world rid of technology's corruptive influence. A unified world without war. A peaceful world rid of unnecessary deaths. It will be a perfect world. A utopia." He stopped right in front of the Master Emerald, and then turned around to look back down at Sorun. "I'm the only one capable of turning this world into a paradise."

The look Sorun gave him was beyond skeptical. "You? Make a paradise? Out of all this?" A thrust his open hand out to the bodies hung up on the wall. "How does hanging up all our friends' soulless bodies up on the wall like you're some kind of sick trophy collector fix anything!? What were you even thinking!?"

"It's their fault to begin with. All of them." Enerjak's features thinned as he turned to the motionless Mobians hung on the wall. "I gave them, all of them, everything I had before I was Enerjak, and when I finally presented a solution to fixing it all what did they do? Oppose me? Try to take away my power?" He made a sneer in contempt at them. "Some 'friends'. What 'loved ones' they all turned out to be. Because of a mere disagreement they tried to strip me of my power and deprive the world of its one and only savior." He turned his head back to Sorun. "They betrayed me. They all did. It's only out of respect for what they used to mean to me that I allow them to be reminders to me for why I do this. And I have plans for them regardless."

The anger inside of Sorun became scalding the longer he listened. It was all he could do to maintain enough control not to rip Yamato out from its scabbard and try cutting Enerjak right now, but through it all he managed to stay his hand. "And just what exactly do you plan on doing?" Sorun asked. "You really think you're the one to fix this whole world? How?"

"Because I'm Enerjak. What other reason could there possibly be?" he scoffed out. "I can provide everything needed without the use of technology. I can tend to the needs of those that require healing with a mere thought. Modern 'conveniences' will be unnecessary in a completely peaceful world under my watch. Information and history can all be dictated by me. What use is there of history in a never-changing utopia, and what is there to know outside of what is needed to exist in my world? And on the off chance any seditious ideas or persons arise it can simply be stomped out and eliminated with my power."

"You would honestly set this world back in the dark ages?" Sorun asked, voice in a mixture of disbelief and anger. "You'd abolish all technology and keep the world in ignorance just to keep everyone under your thumb?"

"A peaceful world. One where nobody has to needlessly die. It's for their own good in the end," Enerjak claimed. "And I'm eternal , Sorun. Immortal, thanks to my power. I'll watch over this world until the end of time if need-be if only to ensure this peaceful world I'll have created will remain for all time."

"He's nothing but an insane luddite that thinks he's better than everyone because of his power," Sorun heatedly thought. That's all he could see when he looked at Enerjak. A tyrant that wanted to dictate the entire world. Somebody who wanted to control everyone's ways of life because he considered himself to know better. Somebody who hated technology enough and saw it as such a genuine threat he'd completely destroy it all for his new world order.

An abolishment of all technological and cultural progress. Intellectual suffocation. An entire world kept in ignorance all for an idea of "peace" that came from the same person that stole the souls of every person on the planet. Sorun absolutely refused to let someone like that have any iota of influence in the world. He didn't even want him to exist anymore.

"You would do nothing but stagnate all of civilization. That's all you would accomplish," Sorun claimed, voice having gone quiet. His body posture had gone more relaxed, though his blue eyes were still smoldering as he looked up at Enerjak. "You'd keep the entire world in a state of limbo where nothing would ever change just because it's 'for the best'? Because you said so? You're not even giving anybody any say or choice in this; it's all nothing but slavery you're trying to pretty up with noble intentions. You're no better than Robotnik."

"I am nothing like him," Enerjak hotly claimed. "He sought to rob everyone of free will just for his own benefit! I'm doing this for the benefit of everyone in the world!"

"They can't even decide of themselves if it's good or not! You're taking that choice away from them! None of your plans factor in their consent!"

"What use is there for free will if I make a world where everyone is content to begin with!? They've clearly abused it with all the suffering this world has seen!"

Sorun's teeth clamped down in both anger and revulsion, with a low hiss breezing past his teeth as he breathed out. "And just how," he asked, "do you plain on maintaining such a world? Omnipotent or not, you're just one person."

Enerjak's head picked up, like he'd just realized something. His mouth was set back in a neutral expression, and he'd made a small "ah" noise, almost in remembrance. "Yes, I knew I was forgetting to mention the crucial point in my vision. I'm so glad you reminded me." He lifted his right hand up. "Perhaps once you see what I have in mind you'll shift your position on the matter."

His fingers snapped. At the exact same moment, numerous golden circles had instantly appeared all around the tall altar Enerjak stood on. Portals, Sorun had realized when he saw figures begin to step out of them. The same bipedal monsters made from golden energy weaved like threads he'd seen before, with the colored spheres in their chests. Dozens of the things, all of which stepped out of the new portals Enerjak had created. They closed soon after, leaving all the creatures standing motionless around Enerjak as gestured out to them.

"These are my answers to your question. It's admittedly a problem I anticipated ahead of time," he told Sorun. "Even with all my power, I'm unable to make lifeforms capable of independent thought and actions on my own. It's how it should be. Only life should create life. Another taboo technology breaches." His face soured at the mere mention of technology. Sorun felt even more anger spike in him. "Making vessels that can be inhabited by already-formed souls is another matter entirely, however. Though these creatures you see before you are all... well, prototypes, I suppose you could say. Rudimentary proofs of concept, but nothing close to actual completion. Until now, at least."

Once again, he snapped his fingers. In front of Sorun's eyes all the golden thread monsters began to unravel, like balls of yarn being pulled apart. The golden threads of energy all snaked through the air and towards Enerjak, dissolving and reabsorbing into his being. The colored spheres acting as their cores all likewise flowed towards him, seemingly melting through his body and disappearing within him. By the end all that was left was one single creature. One that had a bright blue sphere as its core.

"It's actually fortunate you happened by at this time now that I realize it," Enerjak claimed as he pointed his hand out towards the last monster. "I finally created something I'm satisfied with that meets my vision just last night. I've reabsorbed every single one of the inferior versions I've ever made with the exception of this one before you, just so you can see."

Enerjak's hand began to glow. The golden threads making up the creature began to glow brightly, brightly enough that its entire form was concealed by the corona of energy it began emitting. Sorun was actually forced to close his eyes due to the brightness, and even then he was able to make out a silhouette due to the intenseness of the light shining through his eyelids. Fortunately, it died down after only a few seconds. But when Sorun opened his eyes to see just what had happened, he found himself wishing he'd never opened them back up to begin with.

The golden creature that had been standing near Enerjak was no more. In its place was something whose shape resembled a Mobian. And as far as Sorun saw, that was all it resembled. The size and shape was there, but there was no fur. Its skin was nothing but a smooth, silvery surface, more like a robot than an organism, but there were no visible seams as far as Sorun saw. Just a creature of completely smooth, silver skin and absolutely no features on its face save for the eyes. No nose or even a mouth. Just eyes colored in a solid, glowing blue that looked down at Sorun with what he perceived as malicious intent.

That wasn't what horrified Sorun, though. What horrified him was that he recognized this thing. There was something familiar about the blue of its eyes, the pair of glowing lines going down its torso, and the rings around its ankles. And atop its head was a silvery growth perfectly blended into its head that looked like the exact same haircut of someone he knew very well. Even the way it was standing, that stance, seemed familiar to Sorun.

"S... Sally...?" Sorun mumbled out in shock, taking a step back as he looked up at the thing above him.

"SSSZ-Z-Zall ll ..." The thing that looked like Sally spoke with a voice that barely even sounded like hers despite the lack of a mouth. It was so high-pitched and distorted it sounded less like a person and more like a dying speakerphone. "Z-Z-Zal- ZZ- Sal-Szal..."

Its distorted speaking and the small amount of twitching it was displaying caused a small, dissatisfied frown to go over Enerjak's lips. "Well, perhaps there are still some flaws I've yet to iron out. As close to perfection as I am, even I am not perfect." His gaze shifted to Sorun. "But isn't it beautiful? A faithful servant, dominated completely to my will and sustained with my power? Requiring neither rest nor food, able to carry out its responsibilities for the rest of eternity?"

He flicked his hand towards Sorun. As if it were obeying some invisible order, the silver monstrosity that looked like Sally let out a high-pitched, stuttering noise and leapt through the air and towards Sorun. Sorun, snapped out of his shock from the silver creature falling towards him with its hands extended, automatically reached for the handle of the sword he was holding with his left hand. Yamato was torn out of its sheath and swung right in front of him, cutting completely and cleanly through the thing in a single swipe.

It hadn't even crashed into Sorun after he cut through it with the katana. It'd dissolved into a cloud of evaporating blue and silver particles, leaving behind a floating, light blue sphere in the wake of its disappearing body. It floated off from Sorun, who watched it depart as he slowly settled the katana back into its scabbard. Enerjak, likewise, turned his head to follow the sphere as it floated towards where Sally's body hung on the wall.

The sphere melted through Sally's chest and disappeared into her body. There was a moment where all was quiet and motionless, and then she gasped out loud. Life returned to her face and her pupils and blue irises appeared back in her white eyes as she looked around wildly, panting heavily as her arms and legs unconsciously struggled against the stone restraints holding her against the wall.

"Wha-what's going, I, I can't- what's going on-?" She was cut off when Enerjak teleported right in front of her, floating off the ground. Her face morphed into one of terror and panic as her limbs began to wildly twist and turn in the restraints as Enerjak's hand reached out towards her chest. "No, no don't, please don't- no, NO DON'T-!"

Sally's terror-filled screams were completely and abruptly cut off when the light blue sphere phased right through her chest and flew into Enerjak's hand. She went completely limp, like a puppet with its strings cut, and the lifeless look and white-filled eyes returned to her face.

"Hmph. I shouldn't be surprised that thing you carry around is so efficient at dispatching my Prelates," Enerjak scoffed out as Sally's soul shrunk down in his hand before disappearing completely, having been reabsorbed into his body. "Admittedly they're a bit more fragile than I'd like, but it's not as if I can't continue to reuse the souls. That's the remarkable thing about them: all the skills and abilities of the originals without any pesky memories or egos getting in the way. An army that's veritably endless, much like myself."

Sorun stared. His arms had gone completely limp, though Yamato was still held in his left hand. His irises had shrunk to pinpricks as he stared up at Enerjak, with his expression having gone eerily blank. Despite his calm exterior there was a rage inside of him that he could scarcely comprehend, let alone define. A wrath so boiling hot that he heard a dull ringing in his ears as he continued to stare with that empty expression.

"But really, they should all be honored to have the positions I've chosen for them," Enerjak continued, seemingly ignorant and uncaring towards the human teen standing nearby. "My supposed 'friends' deserve nothing less than oblivion for their betrayal, but in this way they get to serve a greater purpose. They get to ensure peace for this world for the rest of time. What better fate could these so-called Freedom Fighters ask for?"

The backpack was shrugged off Sorun's shoulders and into his grasp.

"Though I think there will have to be some changes in my new world. For how violent they've been with Mobiankind I think I'll just do away with the entire Overlander species in its entirety. Perhaps the humans at Station Square as well, just to ensure that meddlesome weed is stomped out for good." Enerjak's turned towards Sorun. "But you need not fear such a fate, Sorun. Soul or no, I'm positive I can do something to convert you into a Pre-"

Sorun's hand slammed down into the opened backpack.

There was a bright flash of light where Sorun had been standing. His entire body alit with a golden corona of energy so intense that Enerjak had grunted out and held a hand up to shield his eyes from the light. As for Sorun himself, he felt surprisingly very little as he was engulfed in the golden energy. There'd been a rush of energy and heat, enough that it had even been painful, even, but soon after a coolness washed over him that oddly left a warm sensation sitting inside of him. An odd paradox that'd put him a bit off at first.

But there was no denying what he felt beneath that. Power. Familiar power.

Bolts of golden energy arced out of the golden corona surrounding Sorun, striking the ground around him in violent torrents as more gold energy rushed around him. Enerjak, for his part, slowly lowered himself back down until he was standing in the middle of the altar's stairs, looking straight towards Sorun with a heavy frown on his face. The golden aura eventually began to rapidly dim down, and then disappeared entirely, revealing Sorun to the empowered echidna. His frown deepened even further when he saw Sorun.

There had been a change. What had once been a head full of free-flowing black hair was now a head of hair that shone a bright yellow color with a golden sheen. There'd been a change with his clothes as well, with the blue, tri-tailed coat he wore having converted into a gold color. Even the Yamato had changed; the normally dark-blue ribbon tied to the sword's scabbard was now a solid golden color.

Completely disregarding the smoldering glare Enerjak was sending him, Sorun looked down, towards a small divot in the stone floor of the cavern where he saw a small pool of water. He saw eyes that were supposed to be blue, now colored a light teal, looking back at him from his reflection, and then noticed the rest of his changes. With all the emotions he currently felt, he didn't so much as scoff at his appearance.

"Christ, it really is just goddamn Super Saiyan." He looked up from the reflection and at Enerjak. "All this and still no Devil Trigger. The hell."

"What have you done?" Enerjak demanded. The confident drawl he'd been using earlier was completely gone. Now his tone was clipped, almost angered. He appeared completely affronted by the being standing before him. "What have you done to yourself?" he repeated, sounding marginally angrier.

"Something profoundly stupid," Sorun answered, tossing the empty backpack away to the edge of the cavern. "I'm so sick of people trying to change this world 'for the better'. People that act like they're better than everyone around them, people who think they know better." His right hand re-grasped Yamato's handle. "All of you people hurting so many others just because you think you're right. You think this world is so messed up it's okay to hurt so many people just to get it your way." Golden sparks were emitted as the sword was slowly pulled out of its scabbard. "Why can't you just give this world a chance like I did?" Sorun asked, sounding genuinely sorrowful past the frustration and anger in his voice as he fully pulled the sword free.

"I did give it a chance. My entire species almost went extinct as a result," Enerjak plainly answered. "Monsters like Robotnik exist because we 'gave the world a chance.' No more. I know what's best for this world. I am doing what's needed because I am the only one who can!"

"That's not for you to decide!" Sorun yelled at him. "You think you know what's best because you're so all-powerful!? No, you don't! You're just some old scientist possessing my friend that doesn't even remember who he is anymore! Nobody even remembers who you originally were!" The golden ribbon on Yamato's scabbard, seemingly moving of its own free will, wrapped around Sorun's waist. The black scabbard hung off his waist as a result, with Sorun grasping the katana with both hands. "You're just a loser with way too much power. That's all we are, Enerjak. Losers with power. And the world has enough losers without us making things worse. It's time for both of us to go."

"You stand there, judging me without seeing the fruits of my work as if you know any better than I do, and you dare have the gall to compare me to you?" Enerjak slowly began to descend the steps as his voice grew more heated. "You? Some commoner from a foreign world? How could you possibly know better than I for what this world deserves, Sorun? You don't even belong here."

Enerjak extended his right hand. From a plume of golden light shining from his palm, an item appeared. What looked like a khopesh sword fashioned from pure gold appeared in his hand, which Enerjak grasped and swung in front of him.

"You could have been glorified for all eternity as a Prelate along with the others. Now you'll go down in the annals of history as a childish upstart who truly thought a bit of Chaos energy would be enough to topple the god of this world. No, not even that. I'll ensure you're erased from this world's memory entirely after you die today." He stopped at the second-to-bottom step, still glaring at Sorun past the white slits in his golden helmet. "You could have finally had a place in this world. A purpose. Now you'll be less than nothing."

In a bright, golden flash, Enerjak teleported right in front of Sorun, khopesh fully extended with his arm and ready to strike. Though the golden hair hid it, Devil's Body along with the rest of Sorun's old abilities were in full effect from having absorbed all the Emeralds and the rings, so when the strike came Sorun was actually able to perceive it. The curved, sickle-shaped blade rushed towards him quicker than he would have expected even with the enhanced reflexes afforded by Devil's Body, but it was still slow enough that Sorun was able to Trick away, leaving behind a cloud of black and golden vapors that instantly disappeared when the khopesh's blade sliced through it.

Enerjak started in surprise, and then instinctively whirled around. He dodged to the side just as Sorun sliced downwards with the Yamato where he'd been standing, with the human taking a step forwards as a result. He immediately whirled around when he saw the strike missed and, seeing Enerjak charge him with the khopesh raised, rose the sword back up and sliced it back down again.

The silver and golden blades clashes against each other, neither giving way due to the equal strength both of the blades' users wielded. They both stared at each other past the locked blades, Enerjak's face alight with fury and Sorun wearing a passive, yet nervous expression. Golden sparks seemed to pour out from the point their blades met as the two continued to struggle against one another.

Enerjak

The Deific Malefactor

"I'm taking their souls back," Sorun grunted past the sound of the struggling blades. "Everyone whose futures you've stolen. I'm taking it all back."

"You'll take nothing!"

The struggle had become too great, and the two managed to push each other away. Violently. Sorun's body flew backwards and crashed into the altar's steps. Enerjak had slid all the way to the center of the cavern on his feet, holding his weapon in front of him with his teeth grit.

No sooner had Enerjak stopped did Sorun teleport right behind him with Yamato at the ready. Enerjak had smirked, and then teleported before Sorun had even swung, appearing behind the golden-haired human. Before he could strike Sorun Tricked again and appeared behind the echidna, katana still at the ready. The smirk disappeared from Enerjak, though he did, once again, teleport behind Sorun. For a third time Sorun Tricked behind Enerjak, though this time the self-proclaimed god shouted out in frustration and swung his khopesh behind him.

His swing had hit nothing but air, as, once more, Sorun teleported away. Enerjak gasped out at this and, sensing a presence above, looked up. He saw Sorun right above him, body twisted in the air and both hands on his sheathed katana as he stared down at Enerjak. The echidna jumped away just as Sorun's body zoomed straight down at the ground with unnatural speed, leaving behind black and golden speed lines in his wake. Yamato had quickly been drawn out in a downward cleave right as Sorun had made contact with the ground, forming a long, straight groove in the stone due to the attack missing its target. Enerjak laughed at the kneeling human, and then extended his open left hand towards him.

"To think you'd assume such an attack would land on me!" he boasted as golden energy gathered in his hand. "Take this! Thunder Arr- agh!"

Enerjak was cut off when three golden spectral swords suddenly found themselves impaling his torso. Sorun stared on, completely silent while Enerjak looked at him with his mouth drawn in a snarl, the energy fading from his hand.

"That's what you get for callin' your shit out," Sorun thought as he re-sheathed Yamato and stood up to his full height. "Fucker's an amateur. All power, no skill. Like I'd expect anything more from some egghead, and Knuckles always preferred punching his problems away." His mouth creased in worry. "He always was a great fighter, though. Quick on his feet, too..."

Glaring hatefully at Sorun past his helmet, Enerjak reached up and grasped at the hilt of one of the swords impaling him. He squeezed down, causing the sword to shatter into crystalline shards that rapidly evaporated in the air. Before he could move to remove the other two they detonated, hitting him with enough force that Enerjak stumbled back on his feet. As the gaping holes in his torso closed Enerjak managed to catch his footing, looking forwards just in time to see Sorun appear in front of him while swinging his sheathed katana at him.

He ducked his head to avoid getting hit in the head by the sword's handle. Without uttering a sound Sorun swung the sword the other way, aiming for the tip of the scabbard to hit Enerjak. Like the first strike he'd dodged the second, making Sorun's brow furrow. He grabbed the sword's handle and tore it out in an effort to slash at Enerjak, though his blade was blocked once again by the echidna's khopesh.

"These moves of yours... they lack a certain weight to them," Enerjak noted as their blades locked again. "As if they're borrowed. You don't truly own them." He grit his teeth in exertion at the force pushing him back. "Where did you learn this style? I know Antoine never taught it to you."

"At least I've practiced with a sword. Have you ever even held one before now?"

"For beings such as I, practical skill is unneeded. Chaos energy provides all that is necessary." Once again, the two pushed each other away, though this time they only slid back a marginal distance from one another. "Though... your words have merit," Enerjak admitted with a contemplative hum. "I know what happens if that abomination strikes me. We won't have a repeat of that." He rose his left hand in the air, the appendage roiling with golden energy. "Let me show you... why I stand above all others."

His fingers snapped. Golden circles began to appear all around Sorun, golden lightning striking out of them at random intervals as they began to brighten in intensity. Feeling worry at being surrounded, Sorun flexed at one of his powers and breathed out in relief as the silver wave that inverted the colors of the world around him spread out, making time itself come to a halt.

And then his breath hitched when a golden wave originating from Enerjak spread out, impacting his own wave and causing both to vanish. Sorun was shocked to find colors returned to the world as things began speeding back up to a normal pace.

"Surprised?" Enerjak asked. "You honestly thought something as banal as time itself is beyond my grasp? You won't be performing that again, either."

"He can negate Quicksilver? That's bullshit!" The golden, glowing circles floating around Sorun began to glow with such intensity he couldn't see their actual shapes. Beams of pure white light fired out of them - beams Sorun was able to avoid easily enough by simply Tricking out of the way of where the circles were aiming. He found no respite, though, as an arrow-shaped bolt of energy impacted him in the shoulder after he reappeared at the other side of the room. He frowned, glancing towards Enerjak who was holding his hand out to Sorun, with more of the yellow bolts sailing towards him.

He continually kept Tricking back and forth, doing his best to avoid the myriad of projectiles that kept being fired at him. And it was becoming too much. Too many lasers firing at him from golden circles that kept appearing everywhere. Too many of the energy arrows Enerjak kept conjuring and firing at him. And the echidna himself was teleporting all over the place in the same way Sorun was, sometimes appearing on the other end of the room, other times appearing next to Sorun in a split second just to swipe at him with his khopesh and teleport away before Sorun could swing back. It was all he could do to simply just avoid the onslaught, and even then he wasn't always successful.

"He's doing nothing but spamming attacks at me, and I just can't keep up." A large gash on Sorun's cheek sealed itself and healed completely before it even had time to bleed. "What was the point of even going into this stupid golden form? I don't feel any different. It's the exact same speed and strength I had with just Devil's Body - there's been no change. I'm not noticing any difference in my abilities other than the color." He Tricked away just as a dozen electric arrows touched down where he'd been standing, creating a deep crater. "So why? What did it do? What changed?"

A large part of him was concerned that he wasn't compatible with a Super form after all, and all mixing those rings did really was just turn his hair, coat, and powers golden. He'd be incredibly annoyed if that really was the case, and worried, too. He couldn't do anything with his powers as-is if he kept being overwhelmed like this.

"I'm honestly disappointed in you, Sorun. Truly," Enerjak drawled out, sounding about as uninterested as possible. He stood off on the other end of the cavern, near the altar's steps, while he watched Sorun continually avoiding more and more energy projectiles that kept racing towards him. "I honestly thought you'd see sense in what I'm trying to do, but like all the rest you're little more than some short-sighted fool who can't see what's right for the world. I'd hoped you'd at least put up a decent struggle, unlike all the rest, but it seems you're failing all my expectations today."

Sorun hopped away just as a white laser cut through where he'd been standing momentarily. "Yeah, well... I've disappointed every single person I've ever met, so you're not special in that regard."

Just as he finished speaking, more golden circles appeared. This time they were resting flat against the ground at Sorun's feet, and the only reason he was able to know they were there to begin with was because he caught their glow just on the bottom of his vision. His teal eyes shot down, and then widened when he saw spears made from raw, electrical golden energy shoot out from the circles. He'd managed to raise his sword just in time to catch the spear tips with the flat end of the blade, gold sparks falling all around him as his entire body was thrust backwards from the force of the block. He'd tumbled over and over three times, still sliding back even after righting himself on his feet while looking ahead. To his panic, he saw Enerjak was gone.

He'd heard it before even turning around. The crackling of electrical energy, just behind him. An alarmed Sorun had whirled around before he'd even come to a full stop, just in time to see that Enerjak had teleported behind him. A victorious smirk on his face and a large, golden bolt of lightning held in his hand, twice the length of the echidna's own body. And the instant Sorun's eyes locked onto the crackling spear Enerjak had thrust it towards Sorun's body.

There'd been no time to concentrate on a spot for him to Trick to. The idea of teleporting away from the danger hadn't even crossed Sorun's mind as he saw the electrical spear fly towards him with the intent to skewer him. Baser instincts had taken hold, and, without thinking, he'd dropped Yamato and held his right hand up directly in the path of the spear in a feeble attempt at protecting himself. All this move seemed to do was encourage Enerjak, as he'd seemingly pushed even harder with his arm and rammed the tip of the spear right into Sorun's hand.

There was a sound.

It had been a peculiar sound. A cross between glass being smashed and something heavy crashing against metal. A sound that seemed to come directly from where Enerjak's energy weapon had impacted Sorun's hand.

To Enerjak, the sound was completely foreign, and he'd made a confused hum while turning his head a bit.

For Sorun, it was a sound he was intimately familiar with, and to him it may as well have been the equivalent of angels singing in his ears.

The mild confusion that had been on Enerjak's face turned much more severe when he pulled his crackling spear away and saw, to his shock, there wasn't a single injury on Sorun's hand or person. Not even so much as a scorch mark. He'd teleported away back to the bottom of the altar's steps, frowning greatly as he looked towards Sorun, who was staring down at his hand with a wide-eyed expression.

"..." Blinking, Sorun turned towards Enerjak so that the two faced each other. He had on an owlish, disbelieving look on his face that looked too hopeful for the echidna's liking. He'd made a small growl and threw his energy spear at the human, who only watched as it sailed through the air towards him. Sorun blinked, and then, the instant before the energy lance struck him, close enough that it may as well struck him by the time he made a move, he rose his hand up.

The strange, crashing sound appeared again. The spear impacted Sorun's hand, and, very briefly, a cone of golden energy spread around the point of impact before disappearing entirely, along with the energy spear. Once again, Sorun was left without so much as a scratch. He blinked once more, and then looked down at his hand with a dumbfounded expression.

"Oh. That's what Super gets me. I get Royal Guard," he realized. A small, bemused chuckle left him, and he flexed his hand. "Oh, well, that's it. That's the whole fight right there. I just win."

"What are you babbling about over there?" Enerjak demanded, a displeased scowl forming on his mouth. "You haven't won a thing."

"No, dude, you don't understand. I literally just won the fight. It's over." Looking more confident than he'd felt in months, Sorun looked up at Enerjak with a teasing, coy smile that instantly got on the god's nerves. All it did was make Sorun feel more gleeful. "In fact..." he continued, summoning Yamato back into his hands. He stared down at the weapon for a long moment, and then scoffed, letting it disappear in a shower of golden particles. "I'm not gonna need that until I'm done with you. I'm not gonna need anything but Royal Guard."

Spectral Swords? Unneeded now. Spectral fists? Unnecessary. Teleporting, time-stopping powers, regeneration? All of that was useless now that he had this power. And that information filled Sorun with so much excitement that, if it weren't for that display he'd seen with Sally minutes ago, he'd be feeling almost pitying towards Enerjak right about now. But it had, so he didn't. All he felt was glee. A sadistic sort of elation and anticipation for what was about to happen.

"'Royal Guard?'" Enerjak repeated with a scoff. "You always did have colorful names for your abilities. But really, I'm insulted. You gain a brand-new ability from a temporary form of ascension, and you honestly think it will be enough to beat me? Truly?"

"Mm-hm." Smiling, Sorun pointed his right index finger at Enerjak. "Hey, lemme ask you somethin'. What would you say if I told you I could beat you using nothing but dumb kung-fu poses?"

The scowl Enerjak wore worsened, as if he was greatly offended. "I'd say you've finally gone mad and I'm disappointed you think so little of me."

"Man, if that's what you think, then you're gonna be really disappointed by what happens next."

And then, Sorun began walking. Not teleporting, not even sprinting. Walking, straight towards Enerjak. There wasn't an ounce of worry of concern in neither his gait nor his expression. His steps were confident, and his expression was full of a smugness that did nothing but anger Enerjak further. His golden khopesh shining in his hand, the echidna teleported in a flash of gold light and reappeared right next to Sorun mid-swing.

In an instant, there was a shift. Sorun had spread his feet out, placing his left hand over his waist, his right elbow pointed towards the ground, and his hand in the direction of the khopesh's edge. At the exact moment the sword made contact with him Sorun activated the new power. The crashing sound was heard again, golden energy shimmered over his arm for a brief moment, and the momentum of the blade was completely reduced to zero, leaving no damage on Sorun.

"Royal Guard."

Enerjak slowly brought the blade back, looking almost dumbfounded at what just happened. Gritting his teeth, he swung again. All Sorun had done in response was shift his body into another exaggerated pose, this time blocking with his left hand. Once again he called out "Royal Guard" as the blade hit, and, just like before, there was a sound and a shimmer of golden energy, and a lack of any damage being done to Sorun's form.

Snarling in outrage, Enerjak teleported away from Sorun. At the same time the golden circles appeared again, all around him in the air and on the floor. Sorun, for his part, merely stood his ground, waiting for the attacks to come. Soon enough a barrage of white lasers and crackling, golden energy lances assaulted him, but with his enhanced speed and reflexes he was able to intercept them all, his hands a blur as they whirled all around his body. When an attack neared him, he'd raise his hand to block it. Like all the times before, he'd be completely unharmed, as if the attack itself was negated in its entirely.

"Royal Guard!" He'd call it out every time he successfully defended against an attack. Unnecessary in all honesty, but Sorun saw Enerjak's ire grow whenever he did it, so he took personal pleasure in doing it just to get on the god's nerves. Between that and successfully blocking all the attacks thrown at him, Enerjak's features only began to become more and more enraged. He'd thrusted his hand out at Sorun, summoning all manner of energy-based projectiles to fire at him. Lances, spears, bolts of energy.

Laser beams with enough intensity to cut through buildings with perfect precision. Energy spheres with enough destructive potential to level towns.

None of it proved effective. There were no blasts, no explosions, no signs of cuts or singes, nothing. No matter the attack Enerjak would summon, once it reached Sorun, the strange sound was heard and the shimmer was seen as Sorun physically blocked, and the attack was negated. As if any attack that power was used on disappeared entirely, like it never existed. Sorun didn't seem the worse for wear, and grew more and more confident with each attack negated. And he kept calling the name of the power out, over and over, which only served to annoy and enrage Enerjak even further the longer this went on.

"Royal Guard! Royal Guard! Royal Guard! Royal Guard, Royal Guard, Royal Guard Royal Guard Royal Guard Royal Guard Royal-Guard-Royal-Guard-Royal-GuardRoyalGuardRoyalGuardRoyalGuardRoyal-!"

"ENOUGH!" Enerjak roared out. The countless amounts of energy attacks of various shapes and compositions ceased. The bolts, balls, lances and lasers disappeared, leaving Sorun standing across from a now-visibly fuming Enerjak while he stared on with that cocky grin. "Why are all of my attacks ineffective against you!? You should be ash!"

"Royal Guard, son. It blocks anything you throw at me." Sorun un-spread his feet and stood up at a normal height, sighing and running a hand through his hair. "You can't hurt me, Enerjak. Not as long as I have this power."

"Is that how you think it is?" White-gold energy began coalescing around Enerjak's hand as he rose it up towards Sorun. "Well, if I can't attack you, then I'll just fling you up into space. We'll see just how well that insufferable blocking ability of yours-"

Sorun twitched his right hand, and the crashing sound was heard again as well as a faint, golden shimmer momentarily washing over his body. Otherwise, there was no change in him. Enerjak had gasped out in shock, and then made a reaching gesture towards Sorun again. Once more, Sorun twitched his hand and activated Royal Guard, causing him to remain in place.

"Why? Why isn't it working!?" Enerjak continued making the grasping motion, though no matter how many times he tried it seemed to be in vain. Nothing happed after Sorun used Royal Guard. "Why can't I grasp you!? This shouldn't-!"

"You don't seem to get how this works." The cocky grin fell off of Sorun's face entirely. His expression had gone back into a cold, apathetic glare. "Royal Guard completely negates any action I construe as an offensive action against me. Everything from physical to energy to mental attacks, to even trying to telekinetically grasp me. Royal Guard blocks everything . There's not a single ability in your arsenal that can get past it. Royal Guard overrides your omnipotence." He glanced down at his right hand. "It comes with its caveats, of course, but for someone like me it's a non-issue."

Enerjak's breathing grew heavier. His arms began shaking in fury, and his teeth were gritting down hard. "I won't hear another word of this," he growled out. The white-gold energy roiling over his hand turned into a green color. "Just disappear already."

There was a small, tingling sensation Sorun felt on his hand. One that almost felt like it was burning if he really concentrated on it. When he looked back at his hand, he saw a green spot on the back of it. Green energy that was trying to eat away at his flesh, like acid eating away at some material. The spot wasn't growing, however. It looked like it was trying to, but the green spot would continuously grow and shrink at a rate that it never expanded beyond a spot on the back of his hand about the size of a coin.

"Why aren't you disintegrating!?" Enerjak roared out at him.

"Ultra high-speed regeneration sure is a fun power, ain't it?" Sorun looked up at Enerjak, and then flicked his hand. There was a gold shimmer, and the green spot disappeared. "Also Royal Guard."

Before Enerjak could vocalize his outrage, Yamato appeared in Sorun's grasp. He Tricked away, disappearing from Enerjak's sight who'd instinctively leapt forwards to avoid the edge of the supernatural katana cutting through his back. He whirled around to face Sorun, who was staring directly at him as he slowly sheathed the blade.

"If it hasn't sunk in yet, you're going to die here," Sorun told him. "No ifs, ands, or buts about it. You're done. Get it?"

"I know that golden form well," Enerjak stated. How sounded unsettled, deeply so, and there was a frantic edge to his voice. "It's similar to the one Sonic bore in the past, and I know it's temporary. I can just simply leave-!"

"What, and leave your precious Master Emerald all alone with me? The source of all your power?" Sorun interrupted, causing Enerjak to freeze. "I wonder how much damage I could do to it? I'm a pretty creative guy." He slowly began to walk forwards towards Enerjak, who had begun shaking. "Just admit it." Eight golden swords began spinning around Sorun. "There's no running from this."

He Tricked in front of Enerjak, who himself had teleported away to avoid the spinning swords around Sorun. He'd frowned as a result, and then willed the eight swords to pause in place and close in on him. As Enerjak charged an attack of his own in his hands the swords shot outwards, one of which impaled Enerjak right through his shoulder, causing him to shout out. Before he could reach up to take it out the sword detonated, and in a gravity-defying act Enerjak's body was lifted up into the air. He let out a cry of surprise at this, and just barely managed to twist his body out of the way when Sorun Tricked right next to him and swung his sword. He teleported again to get away form Sorun, appearing back down in front of the altar's steps.

Panting heavily, more out of worry than exertion, Enerjak thrust his hand out. "Help me!" he bellowed out, his hand flashing as more of the silver constructs he'd devised began to materialize in front of him. A silver hedgehog with red glowing eyes. Another one with blue eyes. A silver fox with yellow eyes and two tails. A silver chameleon with purple eyes. The blue-eyed silver chipmunk from before.

All of them were ingulfed inside spheres of warped space before they could even move. Numerous blue slashes from inside the spheres rent the Prelates apart, leaving behind the glowing cores to float away.

"Relying on numbers isn't gonna save you from me, Enerjak!" Sorun called down from above, Yamato held in his hands. He teleported right next to the growling echidna, who blocked his sword strike with his khopesh.

Snarling out in rage, Enerjak began slashing at him with the khopesh. The movements themselves were frenzied, heavy swings behind large arm extensions as Enerjak swung that blade seemingly as fast as he could manage. No skill or thought put into the attacks themselves. They were swings full of raw desperation that almost matched the raging look he had on the part of his face that was exposed by the helmet. Rage that only increased every time Sorun used Royal Guard to block a strike.

"Why!? What right do you have!?" Enerjak screamed at him. Sorun's response was to continually stare at him, silent and with that cold expression as he almost casually blocked every single strike of his khopesh with the back of his hand. "What right!? That look you're giving me says it all!"

Four golden swords appeared behind Sorun. They each began swinging at Enerjak in slashing patterns that varied between the swords. Random swipes and jabs that forced Enerjak to defend himself with the khopesh as he began backing up.

"You say I've stolen this world's future, but you're the one who's taking it! I'm the only one who can save this world's future! You think you know better!?" The four swords swung around and under towards Enerjak in a vicious, slashing uppercut. Four consecutive upward cuts pushed Enerjak all the way up into the air, who was still pursued by the now-spinning swords. "How could anybody who wields a demon as a weapon be any kind of savior!?" He continued to scream as he did his best to deflect the spinning swords with his khopesh. "The eyes! I see them, Sorun! I SEE THEM!"

One of the spinning swords nailed Enerjak in the back. For a single moment gravity lost all meaning for Enerjak, and he was flung higher up into the air with his back facing the ground. The four swords continued to fly into and cut him, again and again with each hit raising him back into the air when he began to fall. When he moved his arm to try and intercept the swords with his khopesh, their movements shifted, the four swords tilting diagonally so that their tips touched. The four swords spun towards Enerjak in tandem, like a giant, spinning golden drill that rammed right into him. He attempted to blocked with the khopesh, sparks flying out from where the fours swords ground against the flat end of the blade, but it proved to be too much. The sword was flung from his grasp, and Enerjak was sent flying back - right towards Sorun.

Midway towards reaching Sorun's position, a group of twenty spectral, golden swords spawned above Enerjak in his flight path, all pointing downwards. Just before Enerjak passed under the cloud of swords, they all began raining down. He'd tried his best to twist his body to avoid the swords, though, unfortunately for him, he'd been nicked in the arm by one of the swords. That proved enough for the effect of the Heavy Rain Swords to take effect, causing his body to slow down to the point he almost seemed to be paused in the air. His teeth were grit, with his head looked towards Sorun in what was surely a baleful look, his body shaking as his muscles and divine powers attempted to break out from the pausing effect the swords had afflicted on him.

And as Enerjak floated there in the air, completely helpless while in front of the person responsible for his position, Sorun did something unexpected. He didn't attack any further with his swords. He didn't make any sort of large movement. All he did was continue to stare at Enerjak as he remained frozen in the air, with his right arm outstretched towards him. His index and middle finger were pointed out with his thumb raised, making a large finger gun pointed directly at Enerjak's face. And then, his face still eerily blank with his eyes locked onto the white slits in Enerjak's helmet, he uttered one, single word in a dull, quiet tone:

"Jackpot."

It was little more than a taunt delivered with such a serious tone. Even still, the single utterance of that word made Enerjak's expression grow slack for just a moment as he processed the word. And then, he'd grown angry. Furious. His efforts to escape the Heavy Rain Swords' hold seemed to double in their effort from how much his body was quivering in the air. He was practically foaming at the mouth in rage, snarling and keeping his eyes locked right on Sorun and the finger gun he was making as he struggled in the air.

Of course, eventually, the effect wore off. And the second it did Enerjak, in all his rage and anger, channeled so much Chaos energy into his hand that his entire arm was practically glowing a green color, green bolts continually arcing off of it. He'd still been falling straight towards Sorun, and in that moment of undefinable, pure rage of being insulted on top of everything else Sorun had done, he'd aimed that fist charged with so much Chaos energy downwards and punched directly at the finger gun pointing at him.

There was a crashing sound, and a golden flash.

Royal Guard, like all the other powers gifted to Sorun through the Chaos Emeralds, originated from the same games as all the rest. He recalled hoping once upon a time that this power specifically was one of the abilities the Chaos Emeralds would grant him. Alas, they never did, and while he got by just fine without it regardless he still would have preferred to have that over some others. And for good reason.

It wasn't a skill of Vergil's interestingly enough, unlike most of the other abilities Sorun had been given. It was a skill of his twin brother. Essentially it was a blocking ability, but in the hands of the right player, it was, without question, the most powerful skill in the entire game series, bar none.

While true that Royal Guard could block all damage, depending on which game it was featured in there were penalties for blocking damage, such as chip damage or an expenditure of a variable amount of energy resources depending on the frequency and power of the attacks. If one were to block perfectly using Royal Guard, however, meaning that the attacks were blocked at the same moment they connected, the attacks were negated entirely with no penalties whatsoever.

But that was only half of what Royal Guard was capable of. Energy from attacks blocked using Royal Guard was stored, and could thereby by released back onto the attacker. Using the same perfect timing for perfect blocks it was possible to expend the entirety of this stored energy in an single attack as opposed to using it piecemeal, which ultimately resulted in a staggering amount of damage.

In the hands of a skilled player, it was the ultimate offense and defense. The entirety of the games could be finished by users of Royal Guard without so much as using a single weapon due to its ability to block all damage with no exception and release attacks that caused grievous damage even to the most heartiest of boss health bars. The cost, of course, was perfect mastery of the skill, and needing to learn the perfect timing required to consistently pull the skill off. For a majority of those who played the 'DMC' games this proved too high a skill ceiling to break through, so they sought other means of beating the game.

For Sorun, who'd grown in enough skill in the past to be able to beat the games solely using Royal Guard just for fun, mastery of the skill had been a cinch. And the supernatural reflexes given to him by Devil's Body certainly helped matters.

The plan had been simple enough: use Royal Guard to keep Sorun alive from all of Enerjak's attacks, all the while storing enough energy to disable him in a single hit of Royal Release. Once enough energy was stored, get him in a position so that, when Sorun did use Royal Release, it wasn't in the direction of all the bodies hanging up on the wall so they weren't caught in any potential blast. He'd managed to do that by successfully stalling Enerjak in the air with the Heavy Rain Swords, so all that had been left was the small taunt.

It was long ago that Shadow taught Sorun against using taunts in a serious fight. Generally he followed the advice, but in Sorun's eyes this particular foe was a special case mainly due to one reason: Enerjak had an ego larger than Sorun could imagine. That much was plain to see to the human throughout the duration of the fight, and in the words he chose to use when they conversed. His demeanor, his goals, it all screamed of him being full of himself. It was a point only proven when Sorun showed off being able to negate all of his abilities regardless of what he tried. The taunt had mainly just served to goad Enerjak into attacking Sorun while he was in the perfect position. An act he likely would have committed regardless if there was a taunt of not, he certainly looked angry enough to try, but there was a sense of personal victory Sorun felt when he managed to say that one word aloud to Enerjak's face. As far as he was concerned that made it more than worth it.

So Enerjak had broken free of the Heavy Rain Swords' hold once the effect wore off, and then struck Sorun. The exact same moment the strike struck was the moment Sorun activated Royal Release, and was subsequently blinded by the light it caused. A golden beam of light so intense he wasn't able to see shot out from his arm, engulfing Enerjak who'd let out a pained scream that was quickly drowned out by the roar of the beam. It'd only lasted for a few seconds, after which the beam dimmed down at such a rate that, if one weren't paying attention, it would have seemed to have disappeared all at once.

At the end of it Sorun was left standing there, panting lightly not from the exertion of the attack he'd just unleashed, but from the intense rush of having felt all that energy channeled through him and expunged. Like a monetary adrenaline rush, magnified tenfold and only lasting for a brief moment before his senses were returned to normal. He immediately saw the damage the attack had sustained on the cavern: the entrance leading into the spacious chamber was gone. Melted away completely, with light from the outside bleeding through to the inside the cave from the widened opening. The sides of the new entrance were still glowing red-hot, smooth and, if one were to look closely, almost running due to the molten surfaces that were quickly cooling. Even some of the ground leading up to the entrance of the cavern had been scorched by the Royal Release, leaving a long groove of molten glass in its wake.

And then, there was Enerjak himself. He was left stumbling back a bit, mouth gaping in a silent, gasping scream, unable to do anything but stand there. His left side was entirely gone, from his whole arm to the left side of his torso and hip. In fact, there was so little flesh and bone connecting the upper half of the body to the lower half now that it was honestly a miracle the two halves didn't snap away altogether. And the flesh exposed from the intense blast of Royal Release was less burnt flesh and more charcoal now; the exposed side wasn't bleeding at all, and instead was a large, black mass that was crumbling apart in flakes the more Enerjak moved.

Unflinching at the sight, Sorun willed a golden, spectral arm to appear over his right shoulder. The feathered Bringer Claw struck forwards, down towards Enerjak's legs. It struck with brutal savagery, delivering enough force that both legs were completely severed at the knee due to the single punch. The discarded limbs flew away, blood streaming out from what was left of Enerjak's legs as the force tossed him up in the air. His strangled scream was interrupted when the left Bringer Claw lashed out and clamped onto his helmet, hard enough that the golden material began to crack. The spectral limb slammed his head into the ground, smashing away the helmet completely to reveal a head now slightly deformed from having its skull shattered against the ground. The golden Bringer Claw lifted the body up by the head, and then threw it far enough that it rolled against the ground at the landing and stopped at the center of the room.

A small exhale left Sorun as the Bringer Claws disappeared. He heard a commotion from behind him, confused murmurs and shuffling sounds, and quickly realized the vessels for the souls from the Prelates he'd killed a minute before were coming to. Ignoring them for now, he opted to look out towards the mutilated body, slightly quavering as it attempted to move, and began walking towards it. He saw Enerjak had tried to raise himself up, but lacking an arm and legs he kept falling back down onto the ground with every attempt. The sheathed katana in Sorun's left hand was only gripped tighter the closer he got to the unmasked echidna, and he felt something inside of him give an uneasy stir when he saw Knuckles' pained face attached to that mutilated body in that pathetic state.

"How disappointing this must be, hm?" Sorun murmured out quietly, stopping in front of Enerjak. He was lying flat on his stomach, just barely held up by his remaining arm as he glared up at Sorun. Green energy was completely enveloping the half of his body that had been vaporized and what remained of his legs, and Sorun could see the bones in his anguished face moving around as they righted themselves in their proper positions and healed. "How long is it going to take for you to regenerate your body? Six seconds? Eight?" Sorun wondered, pulling Yamato out of its scabbard. "When you're finished healing Knuckles' body I'm separating you right out of it and killing you."

Enerjak's breathing became heavier. Rage, pain, and quite possibly fear was all mixed into an expression of pure hate that was glaring right through Enerjak's eyes. But when Sorun looked closer he saw, strangely, that he wasn't looking at Sorun's face. He was looking down a bit, off to the side. And when Sorun traced the direction his violet eyes were looking with his own he realized he was staring right at Yamato's blade.

"Those eyes..." he whispered out, "they keep staring at me..."

"... Right..." Unsettled slightly, Sorun brushed off Enerjak's words and looked back towards his body. The half of his torso that had been blown away had already been regenerated, along with his arm and legs. He looked to be almost fully healed. "Looks like you're all healed up," he said, gripping Yamato's handle with both hands.

It wasn't clear what Enerjak's plan was from there. If he'd been trying to somehow feign still being injured despite his appearance or if it was just some frenzied, desperate reaction on his part. Whatever the case, he'd lunged towards Sorun, hands balled into fists with green energy arcing between the two spikes on each hand. A howl that almost sounded deranged left his mouth after he sprang up and tried to rush Sorun with those fists, but, before he'd gotten close enough to strike, something struck him from behind.

Slckht!

Enerjak stopped dead in his tracks, the energy fading from his sharpened knuckles as he looked down. The golden blade of a spectral katana was piercing his shoulder from behind, coming out through the other end. Releasing a shaking breath, he looked away from the Sorun in front of him, spark of golden electricity occasionally arcing over his whole form, and looked over his shoulder to see the golden, spectral clone of Sorun standing right behind him, piercing his shoulder with a spectral Yamato. He attempted to raise a hand up to attempt to dislodge it, but before he could he'd made an involuntary grunt when Sorun, using the real Yamato, pierced the opposite shoulder.

"That's game, Enerjak," Sorun muttered, golden energy flowing down the length of the silver blade. "Now get out of my friend."

Green lightning sparked around Enerjak's form. There was an attempt at struggling against Sorun, but by then it was too late, as he'd gripped the echidna's face with a golden Bringer Claw. The blades were pulled out from his shoulders after a small flash resulting from the movement, after which Knuckles' body was tossed far away as Sorun looked at what was leftover.

It was the same, ghostly golden phantom Enerjak had left the last time Sorun had separated the two. A golden phantom with shimmering skin that closely resembled the armor and helmet he wore, hollowed and empty but still staring up at Sorun. Before it could move he stabbed it through the chest with the Yamato, eyebrows furrowing in concentration as he channeled Yamato's power through the blade.

There was, however, an issue, which Sorun felt through his blade which caused his eyes to widen a small amount. At the same time there was a roar - loud, and so distorted it barely sounded like the voice of a person screaming. There was an explosion of light that originated from Enerjak's ghostly form that was sufficient in knocking Sorun back far enough that he'd smashed right into the altar's steps, causing that small section to crumble as his body bounced up onto the stairs above.

Grimacing a bit, Sorun sat upwards and began lifting himself up to his feet, his minor wounds from the crash regenerating. "Well... that didn't work," he thought to himself, stabbing Yamato into the stairs to use it as a crutch. "I'd hoped to sever his Chaos Force link to make him disappear entirely, but it seems Yamato can't affect that. Too much Chaos energy for it to work..." He began stepping down the stairs. "Fine. We'll do it the hard way. Yamato can still hurt him. And if I kill his spirit, he's still gone forever. It's fine either way..."

He heard more of the distorted screaming as he came to the bottom of the steps. Enerjak's spirit was still at the center of the room, on its knees and screaming that distorted wail. Bolts of golden energy were snaking out of its body with such intensity it was leaving grooves and cracks in the stone walls and floor were the branches of energy touched. His hold on Yamato tightening, Sorun sprinted ahead straight to Enerjak, his golden Doppelganger appearing next to him and running right alongside him.

The wild, arcing energy whipping around Enerjak attempted to strike Sorun and the Doppelganger as they neared. There were dodges and teleports from both of them as they avoided the arcing tendrils, still approaching closer to the kneeling form at the center of the room. Pillars of golden energy that completely tore the cave ground up raced towards the two, but those were dodged even easier than the energy bolts.

As the two neared, the ground underneath their feet began to rumble. Golden cracks of glowing energy appeared, Sorun and the Doppelganger looking down in unison and jumping upwards just as planes of roaring, wild golden energy ejected from the ground in long, flat geysers. By now Enerjak was close enough that the pair were right on top of it, though the near-lack of distance made the wildly arcing energy around the phantom harder to dodge. Sorun had been forced to swipe at one stream of energy to disperse it before it'd struck him, and then another as he began falling. The Doppelganger had been struck behind by one of the bolts, causing it to dissolve away in a cloud of energy and electric sparks as its spectral Yamato flew from its grasp.

His eye darting back, Sorun saw the spectral sword spinning in the air and snatched it with his left hand. Armed with both the spectral and solid Yamato in his hands, he began slashing back and forth madly at the energy tendrils as he continued descending towards Enerjak. The ghost was still screaming, its empty helmet with those white eyes that somehow seemed to be staring at Sorun so hatefully staring right up at him as he descended.

All the screaming had served to do was make Sorun grit his teeth harder and harder the louder it became. The density of the electric tendrils was sufficient that, even with two weapons, he wasn't able to fully defend himself and continued getting struck by bolts. He still fell, right towards the wailing phantom, his body spinning around with the swords outstretched to form a deadly, golden wheel that shredded through everything between himself and Enerjak. But, finally, Sorun had dropped within range. The spinning had ceased, momentum cutting out as Sorun straightened his body with the two swords held above his head. With Enerjak still screaming at him in defiance, Sorun himself had shouted outwards as he cleaved the two katanas downwards just as his feet touched the ground.

Brightly-glowing, golden ichor sprayed away at both sides as two golden, ghostly limbs flew away from Enerjak's torso. The armless body screeched, causing another explosion of light to manifest and blast Sorun back. This one, however, had been significantly weaker, only serving to throw Sorun away by a few meters. The teen had bounced and rolled over the ground, the spectral Yamato shattering and evaporating away while the real one had impaled its blade in the ground in front of him after he came to a stop.

A short huff left Sorun. The pain had almost-instantaneously been offset by the regeneration, but exhaustion was beginning to plague his senses, and the edges of his vision were growing slightly darker. Thankfully, at least, his ears weren't being assaulted by the screaming anymore, and when he looked up, he saw Enerjak was still there. The arms he'd removed, interestingly, weren't regenerating. The disarmed shoulders just continued to bleed that golden fluid as their owner kneeled there, still and staring towards Sorun.

"You..." His breathing becoming heavier, Sorun, with some difficulty, planted his knee on the ground. "You're not going back. You're not going anywhere." He pushed himself up off the ground, dragging his feet towards Enerjak while also tearing Yamato out of the ground as he passed it.

If Enerjak even had the capacity to respond, it didn't use it. That ghostly, armless visage just continued to sit on its knees as it watched Sorun slowly approach it.

"I'm going to use Yamato and its power of separation to kill you," Sorun rasped out. "You're not going back to the Chaos Force. Not there, not the afterlife, not even that void I wound up in when I died. There's nothing for you after this."

There was, surprisingly, little malice in Sorun's voice as he continued to approach Enerjak. There was exhaustion, of course, bitterness even, but seeing Enerjak in the sorry state that he was in, Sorun couldn't muster up the energy to feel complete hatred towards the sad thing he was limping towards. Enough that he was able to keep moving forwards with the intent on erasing the phantom from existence, but it didn't belay the pity he felt in addition. Feelings that increased the nearer he got to Enerjak.

"You'll cease to exist. You're never coming back to hurt another soul ever again..."

He stopped right in front of Enerjak. Two hands gripped around the sword's handle as Sorun's breathing increased. Something - some garbled, distorted speech that was almost too quiet for Sorun to hear - left the empty helmet staring up at him, but Sorun wasn't even able to make out if those sounds were words or just random noises. He rose the blade over his head; golden energy began to flow over the sword, enough that the silver blade was completely bathed in golden light with energy crackling up and down its length.

More incoherent, distorted sounds came from Enerjak's spirit. The white eye slits in the helmet were looking up at the katana raised above its head, though without any expressions it was impossible to tell what it was feeling. Eventually, the thing slumped forwards, with its head bowing down as if it was giving up entirely.

"A[illegible]"

Sorun sliced the Yamato downwards. A thin, clean white line that bisected Enerjak's entire body appeared, instantly cutting off the warbling sound coming from the phantom. It'd frozen completely as small, white bolts of energy sparked out from the seam separating its body in half. The phantom began shaking as the lightning slowly increased in its density and intensity, while at the same time its entire body began to glow brighter and brighter.

Before anything else could be done, there was an explosion of light.

He hadn't been knocked completely unconscious from the blast - Sorun was certain of that much. There wasn't the telltale loss of cognition between losing consciousness and regaining it upon awakening that he was familiar with from having been knocked unconscious in the past. It had been less of that and more, quite simply, that he was getting extremely tired and it took him a few minutes to muster up the energy to open his eyes after the blast of light knocked him down.

When he did open his eyes, Sorun found that his vision was blurry, though blinking was serving to quickly straighten it out. He looked down and, to his surprise, found he was still standing, though rather worryingly it was hard to tell he was standing. The actual sensation of gravity weighing down on him was faint enough he had to search to feel the feeling. Looking beyond his feet he saw the spot Enerjak had been kneeling in before he landed the final blow. There was nothing there now. Just a small crater and splatters of a dull, dark yellow fluid that once held a shining luster, which was slowly disappearing.

It was when Sorun looked up at the sky he saw it, or more accurately them . More souls. Enough of the colored, glowing spheres to completely and utterly cover the entire sky, enough that it was impossible to see the sky itself or the clouds covering it. A massive corona of color that covered as much of the sky that the cavern allowed, all floating along the sky, some falling down while others moved on in various directions.

Hundreds of millions of them. Billions, probably. It was hard to count with the limited sight Sorun had, and he mentally wasn't fit enough at the moment to make an honest effort at counting them all. He did note that, under normal circumstances, it must have been a sight to behold. But, as it was, he just wasn't in a state to appreciate it fully.

"Huh. I did it." Sorun looked down, towards his own body. He found it noteworthy that his coat was flashing between a blue and golden coloring, quicker and quicker. And then the gold seemed to dissolve away entirely, solid blue coloring bleeding back into his clothes as he felt his power begin to fade away. Wisps of energy particles were leaving his body and gathering around at seven points around his body, until finally they solidified into the seven Chaos Emeralds. They glowed brightly, and then shot up into the air. "So that's how it works," Sorun thought to himself, watching past the now-black locks of hair blowing in his face as the Emeralds reached the sky, and then blast off in seven different direction. It was just after he saw the Emeralds leave that a sudden bout of weakness overtook him, causing Sorun to fall down to his knees. And then he'd seen his hand. "Oh dear."

He only needed a glance at his hand to confirm something was gravely wrong. The flesh had taken on an ashen gray pallor, and the hand itself was littered with cracks along its surface. He even saw small pieces of skin slowly flaking off of the hand in the breeze, and from the corner of his vision he saw more of the flakes near his head, likely from his face. Like his body was crumbling apart. "So that's how it is." The arm went slack at his side. "Kinda... funny how it came full circle there in the end..."

With that thought, he completely collapsed onto the ground on his front side. He heard a commotion from somewhere behind him, shouts of alarm and stone breaking. The others, Sorun assumed, finally breaking out of the restraints. He was at least glad to hear the souls were returning to their rightful vessels, so he'd at least succeeded in doing that much. The knowledge brought him more peace than he figured it would have.

He heard a single pair of rapid footsteps near him, and then stop right next to his head. His blue eyes glanced up, and met with a pair of panicked, alarmed green eyes. He didn't have the energy to scoff when he saw the Mobian's face. Of all the faces he wanted to die seeing, Sonic's wasn't anywhere close to the top of the list. He'd rather it be hers more than anyone else.

"Hi, Sonic." Sorun's voice came out as weak and scratchy, and he found it a struggle just to speak. "It seems I've made a bad habit of doing this."

"S-Sorun...?" It was almost odd, hearing the hedgehog's voice after so long. And the way he sounded, too. So... disheartened and sad. Sorun wasn't used to hearing him sound like this. "What-what did you do to yourself?"

"I would think it's fairly obvious," Sorun tiredly mumbled out. He pressed his palms against the ground and pushed himself up. He tried standing up, but failed and only managed to roll over on his back so that he faced the brightly-colored sky, his arms outstretched at his sides. "Nicole's going to be upset at me again," he said. "That's all I ever seem to accomplish with her. Make her upset."

"Th-that isn't- you can't- Sorun, what did you do ?" Sonic stammered out. He kneeled down at Sorun's side, looking him up and down and ending on his face. "Y-your skin, it's- why are you falling apart!?"

"You... know I can't withstand Chaos energy. And I needed a lot to... to beat Enerjak." Sorun made a sigh, his head lolling to the side. "I don't need to explain it to you, do I?"

He wasn't able to place the expression on Sonic's face. It honestly looked like he was torn between breaking down and shouting at Sorun, and his hands, hovering over the Earthling's form, were shaking in indecision. He eventually seemed to reach an internal decision, and then reached down towards Sorun's body.

"Alright, come on," Sonic muttered out. He pulled Sorun's right arm up and slung it over his shoulders, and then supported the other teen with his own arms as he helped him up to his feet. "W-we're gonna fix this, okay?"

If he had the energy, Sorun would have scoffed. "There's no fixing this," he rasped out, voice dry and barely above a whisper. Sonic began walking towards the altar, where Sorun saw everyone else was, and due to being supported by his body he had no choice but to be dragged along by Sonic. "Sonic-"

"I don't want to hear it," he said. "I just- I can't believe you- what, Enerjak did whatever he did and you decided it'd be such a great idea to go and do this to yourself again!?"

He sounded angry. And hurt, and frustrated, and above all that scared. Sorun supposed that was natural. He doubted they all even knew what happened with the world if they didn't have their memories past when Enerjak stole their souls from their bodies. Thinking on that note it probably wasn't any wonder why Sonic was reacting like this. The poor guy must have been so confused waking up to what he had, probably everyone else, too, and Sorun honestly doubted he had the time to explain it all to them. Nor did he want to, really. He barely had the energy to stand.

"There wasn't anyone else," Sorun informed Sonic in a quiet voice.

"What do you mean 'there wasn't anyone else?'"

"Just... ask Nicole. When you get back," Sorun told him. "I don't think I have the time to tell you."

"Don't say stuff like- ahh..." Sonic cut himself off with a worried whine when Sorun grew more limp while leaning against him. His features tightened, and he shifted his arms so they provided more support for Sorun's body. "Okay okay okay, just, just chill out here for a minute while we figure this out, alright?"

Practically carrying him at this point, Sonic dragged Sorun off to the cavern wall, nearby and to the left of the altar stairs. He sat the human down against the wall, taking one last worried look at him before retreating to go back to the others nearby.

"What is he trying to do?" Sorun silently wondered. He saw the others looking his way, all with their own reactions. Mostly shock, confusion, horror and realization. Mixtures of all those emotions spread out towards everybody when they realized what was happening with him. "Why do I have to die seeing them look at me like this?"

The first time he'd died he'd wished he wasn't alone during it. It was terrifying enough dying as it was, and having to do it alone had been woeful enough. But now he was here, dying again, and now that he was surrounded by people he considered friends he was beginning to wish he was alone the second time around, because it was almost too much to handle the looks they were all giving him. The human propped up against the wall that looked like he was crumbling apart. He even caught a few individuals like Tails and Antoine shedding some tears his way.

It was touching knowing he had people that cared this much about him, but he just couldn't handle seeing those expression. Having those faced in his mind as he sat there slowly dying didn't conjure good memories. And Sorun couldn't even do anything about it but stare blankly at all of them because he didn't even have the energy to make his face make any kind of emote. If he could he'd just crawl away to get away from them all, but he couldn't move. He wasn't sure what to make of all of it. The looks, how sudden and jarring this must have been for all of them. Too much happening at once. It was all strange and disorienting, and it made his head hurt.

He heard arguing nearby. His blue eyes just barely managed to look over in the direction, where a blue hedgehog was arguing with a black and red hedgehog. Interestingly Shadow looked even more confused and conflicted than anyone else there. Angrier, too. Sorun wasn't sure what to make of that.

"Explain to me right now-!"

"Does it look like we have time to explain everything!?" Sonic shouted at Shadow. "Look at him! If we don't do something he's gonna-!"

"Why is he still here !?"

"It's a long story, okay!?"

Darkness briefly washing over his vision and a wave of exhaustion assaulted Sorun. It came on and off, vision continually darkening and clearing back up. He was fairly certain he was fading between consciousness and unconsciousness, because every time he lost sight and regained it people's feet were in different positions. Or it could be he was just mistaken. Sorun wasn't sure enough to tell for certain.

He couldn't think much past how tired he was getting. How it was getting harder to stay awake, how breathing was becoming more exhausting, how he was losing more and more feeling in his body by the second. How his skin was crumbling away quicker and how the cracks were growing in length and number. The thoughts were significant enough that they overrode any worries he had about dying, the people around him or everything else going on. He was tired enough that he just wanted to close his eyed and go to sleep. And he nearly did until he felt someone shake his shoulder.

"Sorun? Sorun, hey, come on, stay with us."

He cracked his eyes open. Sonic was kneeling in front of him, hand on his shoulder. Less panicked, but still very worried and solemn-looking.

"..." Sorun's eyes slowly trailed to the hand on his left shoulder. "Go away." He tried to brush the hand off of him, but he only managed to raise the hand halfway before it dropped back down to the ground.

Sonic made a sad sort of frown. "Sorun, seriously, come on. We have an idea."

"What?" Sorun looked back to Sonic's face. He shook his head. "No, I'm not-"

"Would you just listen!?" His raised voice seemed to surprise Sonic himself, as he'd looked momentarily stunned before calming down. "Look, I know you might not be wild about this, but just hear it out." He glanced past his shoulder. Near them and ahead of the crowd, Sorun saw Knuckles. He still seemed to be nursing the two stab wounds in his shoulders, and there was still some blood crusted in the fur around the wounds, but he seemed fine otherwise. His face, on the other hand, told a different story. There was a heavy amount of guilt mixed into the sorrow that everyone else around possessed, and he wouldn't stop staring at Sorun. His father was nearby with a similar expression. "Alright," Sonic continued, looking back at Sorun, "w-we can't... we don't know how to stop this -" he gestured down to the crumbling flesh on Sorun's hand, "- but we might be able to stall it."

"Sonic-"

"A long while back that Mogul guy, you remember him, the whole prison thing, he got, err, he got frozen in the Master Emerald, right?" Sonic explained in a quick pace. "We talked it over with Knux and his dad and they think they can do the same thing with you-"

"Sonic, I don't-"

"It'll just be 'til we figure something out, you won't even-"

"Would you stop it?" Sorun had tried to sound as loud as possible, but in his state, he'd barely raised his voice above a whisper. Sonic still seemed taken back by it, and closed his mouth while allowing Sorun to speak. "I... no, Sonic." He shook his head. "I'm done. Alright? Look at me." He glanced his grayed, crumbling hand. "I-I can't..."

He slumped forwards before he could finish speaking. The energy to do so just wasn't in Sorun, as by now all his effort was completely just focused on staying awake. Sonic seemed startled by this, scared, even, and after a moment's deliberation he pulled himself back together and reached for Sorun.

"No, come on, you're not leaving us now," the hedgehog said as he grabbed at Sorun's body. He pulled him upwards, dragging - more carrying - Sorun towards the altar steps as he continued speaking. "You just pulled your life back together! Y-you were finally... egh, it's not happening. Not again. We're not letting you die again."

As he was carried up the steps, Sorun found himself thinking about all the ways he could be protesting against this. About how stuffing him inside of a giant Chaos Emerald to put him in stasis sounded like an insane idea he wanted no part of. How he was too tired to try and do anything and just wanted to sleep. How he wanted to struggle in Sonic's grasp to escape, but he didn't even have the strength to speak, let alone move, so he was helpless to do anything.

But the way Sonic sounded made him think, at least using what little thought Sorun was capable of gathering now. How... resolute he sounded. How serious, like he was sure he was going to save Sorun's life. Half of him wanted to laugh, but the other half found itself being cautiously hopeful. Living past this point wasn't the plan. Managing to do so would be... it would be nice, wouldn't it? And Sonic sounded so sure, but Sorun... he was too tired. Too tired to even notice when they reached the top of the altar.

Gently, Sonic set Sorun down next to the Master Emerald. He knelt down in front of Sorun again, putting a hand on the Earthling's shoulder even though he didn't have the strength to look up at him. "Sorun, I'm sorry. I'm so sorry," Sonic said to him, voice wavering. "Th-this wasn't supposed to happen, you weren't supposed to be doing this anymore, you... you were finally getting happy." He made a choked sound and stood up. "We're not leaving you in there forever, alright? It's just until we find a way to fix you. We'll get you better and things can go back to normal. You can go back home and see Nicole and everyone else, j-just don't di-"

Sorun couldn't listen to Sonic anymore. Words were blurring together as his weakness worsened. He couldn't even remember most of what he had said, and what little he did remember he couldn't make sense of. It was all just garbled nonsense that Sorun had no choice but to cling to with the last vestiges of consciousness he possessed.

The sporadic blackout that kept playing over Sorun's vision were reappearing again. It was bad enough that he didn't even notice when Knuckles and his father appeared. Standing there, in front of Sorun. Greenish energy was wafting around their hands, and their mouths were moving in sync as the pair of echidna were chanting something. Sorun couldn't hear what. All his hearing was at this point was a low drone.

There was a small jerk on Sorun's arm. He looked towards it, and saw that Sonic had moved his hand so that it was touching the Master Emerald. And that it was... sinking into the large gem. Phasing through, almost, though the actual rock's surface wasn't being disturbed and he could make out his hand on the inside through its green, translucent surface. The green energy from the echidnas' hands was spreading around them, waving through the air and flowing towards the Emerald, which was beginning to glow more brightly.

He was getting pulled further into the Emerald. First his entire arm, and then his shoulder. He wasn't nearly cognizant enough at this point to even feel what was happening to him at this point, other than recognize the darkness encroaching on his vision and mind. The last thing Sorun managed to see before his head was phased inside the Emerald was Sonic looking after him as he was subsumed into the Emerald.

Consciousness had long faded from Sorun by the time his entire body was placed inside the Master Emerald.

A/N- If you really wanna bead on how picky about the swearing thing Sorun is then there's a small detail that he refuses to swear in front of Enerjak. He does this because Sorun's worried that Knuckles would be left with the memory of Sorun swearing, and he's so neurotic about who hears him talk like that that he's borderline obsessive about choosing who to swear in front of. It's not all that important but I thought it was a cool detail.

But anyways, yeah, I gave Sorun Royal Guard because I literally couldn't think up of any other way he could have possibly beat Enerjak. I'll admit it right now, he only won because of that one power. It carried him through the whole fight. And in my defense they never even really figured out how to beat him in the comics. The first time Locke had to kamikaze himself just to stop him and when Silver had to go fight the alternate universe version he basically did the same thing Sorun did but instead of Royal Guard he had telekinesis to fall back on. That's the problem with writing near-omnipotent characters that are so absurdly broken compared to the rest of the cast - you gotta jump through these kinds of hoops just to find ways to beat them.

And to be fair Sonic gets a flat invincibility buff when he goes Super, along with a lot of other plot-convenient powers, so I don't think by that point Royal Guard is that big a stretch.

So that whole ending scene needed a lot of rework on my part. During the whole planning phase of this story Sorun, from the point he found out Earth was gone to now, was supposed to be borderline suicidally depressed throughout the entire duration, and this whole arc was really just supposed to be an excuse for him to finally die while saving everyone in the process. Due to a combination of me wussing out on going that hard on the depression and the story flowing against that concept, the whole idea kind of went on the wayside since the story portrayed him to be getting better to a point he wasn't nearly that bad anymore. I mean Sorun flat-out stating to Finitevus he didn't wanna die but was gonna kill himself to save everyone anyway because there was no other choice pretty much blows it out of the water. What I wrote was an ending sequence three times longer than what was there, where Sorun was arguing about Sonic that he didn't want to be saved and just wanted to die, and Sonic was basically yelling at Sorun the whole time. I go over it, and then realize that it's so out of place it's almost narrative-breaking, so I end up re-writing it three whole times before eventually deciding it just doesn't work so I redid it entirely. So we got this instead of Sorun arguing he wanted to die because, with all the context the story gave us prior, it doesn't actually make sense he'd act like this. It's not that big a problem, might make things a bit awkward later since I kinda planned around that, but in the end everything should work out.

Chapter 79

Recursion Error

Episode 79- The future sucks

Sleeping was a strange thing. The sensation of drifting off towards unconsciousness, slowly becoming more and more weightless until consciousness is snapped off entirely. You're not aware of the exact moment you fall asleep. Dreams, nightmares, or the lack thereof on either side is never a straight line; rarely is there a starting point, or an ending point, and for most simple awareness over their reality being a dream escaped them barring rare circumstances.

Being stuck inside a giant magical crystal wasn't like that. For Sorun, it was... well quite frankly it was boring. And annoying. He'd been floating, for what was either minutes or hours. In the same way one couldn't tell how much time passed as they drifted in and out of sleep, he couldn't tell how long he'd been floating there. In some... green, vast, empty space, where the only thing besides him were strange, towering crystalline structures that dotted the infinite landscape, with seeming infinite lengths. That was all there was. Just an empty, green space he was consigned to float around in for who knew how long. During what he perceived as his first few minutes in there only one thought had gone through Sorun's mind:

"I'm gonna punch Sonic in the fucking mouth when I get out of here."

The fact he'd been shoved in the Master Emerald without his consent was something that caused Sorun great distress. This entire situation caused him distress, and he was honestly more upset at himself for being mad than at Sonic himself. He knew they were all just trying to help him, and he hadn't been in any condition to actually have any say over what was to happen with him. Maybe he'd even feel grateful to Sonic after a while, assuming this actually worked and he pulled through, but for now he'd be content at being mad at Sonic.

But, those were thoughts that had only lasted during the first few moments Sorun was floating around in that green space, the only time where he'd had any sense of lucidity. It'd lowered dramatically after that, as if his energy was being sapped right out of him. Ironic, really, considering he could almost feel the Chaos energy that saturated this space. Impressive, really, since he wasn't sensitive to sensing that stuff like other Mobians were. Then again, this was his first experience being inside an Emerald. He didn't like it very much.

He wasn't sure the why of it. Why he felt so tired here, where even here was, if it was some physical space inside the Emerald or some mental space, what was going on, if he'd actually been successfully put in stasis, anything. If this was just his mind shutting off due to a dying body or something else entirely. Mental acuity would fade rapidly as Sorun would go in and out of consciousness, on and off, and in the few moments where he would become awake before going back to sleep he didn't even so much have the ability to conjure overly tangible thoughts.

That was what it was like, being put inside of the Master Emerald. Floating around in a green space, drifting in and out of sleep, and never being entirely aware of what was going on when awoken because those periods of wakefulness were just too brief. To a point that, really, Sorun didn't remember how many times he'd awoken for what seemed like a few moments, only to go back under to sleep, his body still floating in that green space. He could only recall a handful of moments, though something at the back of his mind told him there were many, many more times than just a few. But he never had time to contemplate this, or even try to remember, as he'd go back to sleep right after, and more often than not any potential he had to remember those memories were lost.

And the dreams themselves were even more incomprehensible than his bouts of wakefulness. Flashes of images of things he didn't recognize, nor could barely remember once they passed.

A destroyed city in a desolate world. Familiar surroundings, decayed and dead.

A battlefield littered with the bodies of machines, Overlanders, and Mobians alike. Red blood and black oil both stained the ground. A lone figure stood in the center of all their corpses, purple coat freely flowing in the breeze. In their right hand was sword, a twisted amalgamation of metal and meat. A curved blade fused to a mass of flesh attached to the handle of a noble broadsword.

A tower.

A Mobian. A hedgehog that once likely had such an immaculate coat of white fur, now stained in blood. The body was littered with cuts and bruises, limbs bent and twisted in wrong directions. The face was frozen in a anguished expression, and one of the yellow eyes was gouged out completely. There was a large crater in the chest, where something had impaled the hedgehog to the ground. The purple figure standing in front of the corpse reached down, gripping the white hedgehog's right arm and ripping it completely free of its socket. An item was retrieved from the severed arm: a strange, orange gem, hidden within the glove worn by the arm. The figure in the purple coat clutched the gem tightly as the arm is thoughtlessly discarded.

Eyes.

Fleeting images that held absolutely no meaning to Sorun. Images that a mind in the state of flux he was currently in had no way of comprehending or even remembering. Most of his effort, what little he had to spend, was spent trying to sort through all the madness as he floated there endlessly in that green, empty space.

Of course then there'd been a bright flash of light. The dreams ceased and Sorun suddenly felt like he was falling.

Reality snapped back in a literal flash of light. Following that was the sensation of gravity taking hold, and then Sorun grunting out loud when his back impacted hard, solid ground. The sudden rush of sensations, temperature and smell and actually feeling atmospheric pressure instead of floating in a void, overwhelmed him all at once along with the memories of what happened.

The fight with Enerjak. Him disintegrating. Sonic - fucking Sonic - putting him in the Master Emerald. An undetermined time of drifting in some space, vague memories of dreams he couldn't decipher, no recollection of time. All of it too much, making Sorun's head throb as he reached a hand up to rub at his forehead, though massaging his head went and did nothing towards soothing the migraine he felt.

"What... the fuck ... was all that...?" Groaning once more, he opened his eyes up. The sight that greeted Sorun wasn't one he was expecting. "Oh, what the hell now...?"

His vision was still clearing up, though even now he could see he wasn't in the natural cavern that was the Master Emerald's chamber. This was something artificial. A vast, circular metal room, colored in blacks and gold. Dark and dreary, with little lighting. At a first glance it looked less like a room and more like a gilded storage room. Or a prison cell.

Groaning a third time, Sorun pulled his hand away from his forehead. To his surprise, he saw that the skin on his hand had gone back to its normal, pale complexion, free of the gray color and cracks along the surface. He felt equal joy and confusion, but didn't have the patience currently to contemplate it. "Cool," he muttered out, shaking his head and sitting upwards.

The first sight that greeted him was the Master Emerald, sitting right at the center of a large, circular metal platform they were both on. And unlike the last time he'd seen the Emerald, where it'd been affixed to a regal altar in an almost reverent manner, now it was suspended off the ground by multiple chains wrapping around it that lead to the far walls of the room. And not a single altar in sight.

"I... I got no idea what's going on here? Do you? Not really, no," Sorun muttered to himself. He stood up to his feet, surprised to find that he was able to find stable footing, and then looked closer at the Emerald. "Huh?"

He saw his reflection in the gem's green surface. Everything seemed to be right: same face, same clothes, same blue coat, same everything. There was something off with his hair, though. Still its normal shade of jet black. Still a bit of a wild mess. But for some reason, it was shorter than it should have been. Where it used to reach all the way down to his chin, now it barely reached beyond his ears.

"What happened to my hair?" Sorun asked himself, running a hand through his black locks. "I don't have a single clue. I'm still trying to figure out how the hell I'm still alive."

If he recalled correctly Sonic putting him inside the gem should have just been a temporary form of stasis until they found out a way to stop him from disintegrating on the spot. He honestly doubted such a thing could ever happen, but evidently something worked seeing as he was standing here and not crumbling to pieces. What he couldn't figure out was exactly what was done to him. Or why he was all alone. Or why the hell the Master Emerald had gone from being in a cave on an altar to this dreadful-looking place.

"This place kinda reminds me of something you'd see in 'Warhammer'." Sorun walked away from the Master Emerald and towards the edge of the platform he stood on. It was essentially a saucer suspended by more chains over a hole in the center of the circular room. What was at the bottom he didn't know, because when he looked over the edge all he saw was an abyss. Beyond that was more floor outcropping from the room's wall that circled the hole, and near the back side of the room he saw a door leading out. "I'm not even sure I wanna know how the Master Emerald ended up from being in a cave to wherever this is. Just where am I? Who knows, man..."

Fortunately, the gap between the saucer platform and the floor on the other side wasn't that vast, and he was easily able to hop over to the other side. The door was just a short walk away, though he had to pause when he reached it.

"What is this sci-fi nonsense?" There weren't any visible knobs or handles in the slab of metal blocking the way that he could see. Based on the seams he saw in the center it looked like the kind of door that split apart and retracted into the walls, and the electronic panel next to it lead credence to that guess. "Alright..." Sorun leaned closer to examine the panel jutting from the wall. A bright blue display with a small number pad under it greeted him. "Alright, what do we got... hm?"

Curiously, the display only had two images displayed on it: an image of an opened door, and another of the door being closed. Blinking, Sorun reached forwards and pressed the image of the open door, not at all expecting anything to happen. To his surprise, the image brightened for a second, and then the actual, physical door split open and sunk into the wall, opening the way for Sorun.

"Uh..." Stepping away from the panel, Sorun looked towards the opened door with a dumbfounded expression. "I-I didn't think... what, does it only lock from the outside or something?" He regarded the doorway for a few more seconds, and then shrugged before stepping out.

Sorun's first assumption was that, strangely enough, he was in a dungeon of some kind. The dark, dreary lighting, tight stone corridors, and the numerous locked rooms he kept coming across painted a clear enough picture. That and how dank the place looked, felt, and smelled, certainly a large contrast to that admittedly clean, metal room he'd just left. The lighting and dark colors made Sorun uneasy just stepping around in the place, jumping at the smallest noises.

And there were some rooms he'd come across that he was able to see in. Rooms separated off from the main corridors by bars, and inside of what he could see was usually strange things. Things that looked like artifacts and cultural pieces, all chained off the ground like he'd seen the Master Emerald. He didn't recognize any of them, and he didn't care to try and memorize anything he'd seen, just that it all looked old.

Another odd thing was that he wasn't encountering any locked doors. He had confirmed, however, that the door to the room containing the Master Emerald did in fact lock from the outside. There'd been a panel on the other side, and when he'd pressed the display to close the door it'd asked for a code when he attempted to open it again. Ever since then he'd been careful to leave any doors he came across open, but it confirmed enough to him that he was working backwards from whatever this place was. But, without any kind of map or even so much as a mental layout, all he could do was blindly go forwards until he found something.

"Maybe it's some kind of storage place or something like that. Some of those rooms back there, though, the doors that lead into rooms I couldn't see... they seemed kind of small. Like the kind of thing you would see in some castle dungeon. Or a prison." He felt a chill go through his spine despite the lack of a draft. "There's something wrong with this place. How dark it is, how eerie everything feels, the shapes... where the hell am I? What happened?"

Eventually, thankfully, he'd found stairs that lead upwards. He'd climbed them without hesitation, anxiety still steadily growing even as he neared what he assumed to be the top. He did manage to reach the top; thankfully there was just a normal door there, doorknob and all. And even more fortunately the door wasn't even locked.

When Sorun decided to open that door, he was forced to squint when a practical wall of light flooded in through the doorway. Blinking his eyes heavily a few times to clear the blurriness, he managed to see that the door lead out into a hallway. A large, wide hallway, brightly-lit by artificial lights attached to chandeliers hanging from the ceiling and lightbulb sconces hung on the wall.

Rubbing at his eyes some, Sorun released his hold on the door and stepped out into the hallway. Unlike the dank dungeon he just walked out of, this hallway by comparison was downright opulent. Expensive-looking red carpeting that ran the entire length of the hallway's floor and beyond around corners he couldn't see, expensive-looking vases on handcrafted, wooden stands. Yellow walls that shone so brightly Sorun wouldn't he surprised if the things weren't made from actual gold.

"Well this is... huh..." Sorun mumbled out, not too sure on what to make of it. On the one hand the bright lights and lack of grime compared to the dungeon was assuring, on the other hand there was something about everything around him that made him uneasy despite how immaculate everything looked. He couldn't put his finger on what, though, until he'd walked a few steps away from the door he just emerged from and just happened to catch something out of the corner of his eye hung up on the wall. "Wh..." he whispered out, not even being able to form a single word as Sorun turned to see it fully.

It was a painting. A full-body portrait that was hung up on the wall portraying a Mobian with one of the most intense scowls Sorun had ever seen. The weird part was Sorun both recognized the scowl and the Mobian himself.

What he didn't recognize was the golden crown and the red cape the Mobian wore, because Sorun never once saw Shadow wear any of those items in the time he spent with him.

"... I'm choking Sonic out when I find him."

It had only taken Sorun some walking around to figure out that, wherever he was, it was a castle. It had to be for how big and complex the layout was. For now he'd only been walking for about five minutes, and had chosen to stick to the floor he emerged from out of the dungeon door as he figured this was the ground floor and didn't want to get more lost. But no matter where he turned it was just more gaudy hallways. And a painting here and there. Surprisingly no suits of armor hung on displays like one would think to find in a castle, though Sorun couldn't find it in himself to focus on that.

Through all the walking he'd turned his head to the leftmost wall, which was lined with windows tall enough that they reached the ceiling high above his head. Out of those windows he managed to see that there was a courtyard of greenery that surrounded the entire castle. No fencing or gateways, either, which he filed away for later if he needed.

But beyond the castle itself? It seemed, from what Sorun could see outside the window, that the castle was dead-center in the middle of a city. Not a city like New Mobotropolis, which was really just a large village with a few large structures. This was a proper city, like the kind Sorun would see back home on Earth. High-rise buildings as far as he could see outside the window that stretched everywhere and bright lights everywhere that illuminated the night, traffic from both ground cars and, from what he could see at this distance, flying cars of all things, even a sizeable amount of dots walking between the buildings that he assumed to be people.

The sight alone caused Sorun to stop so he could stare out the window. What he saw out there was nothing short of a full-blown metropolis, a bustling city full of life. The kind of sight he hadn't seen since the mission he'd taken part of in Station Square some months back, and before that when he was abducted from his home planet; seeing this sight alone was enough to cause a strong sense of nostalgia to beat inside of Sorun's heart.

"There were not that many places on Mobius that had these kinds of cities. Wherever I am is not the Mobius I'm familiar with. It just can't be..." Sorun thought. "What happened to me? Where is this? None of this makes sense, none of it, none of it..."

He pushed away from the window, head throbbing from the sheer confusion his mind was suffering from. How nothing made sense and he couldn't figure out what was happening, where he was or what this place was or what the painting he'd seen even meant. None of it.

"What is it, what, is it a whole new Mobius altogether? Did I get spit out in some other universe? What did they call them, zones? Di-did something else happen? Is this just some sort of screwed-up dream? Can barely remember anything that happened inside that Master Emerald..." He continued walking on, idly dragging his fingers along the walls and panes of glass as he kept soldiering further. Most of his focus was spent gazing down at the floor as he walked forwards. "What could have possibly happened while I was in there?" Another thought passed him. "How long was I in there?"

It was a chilling thought to have, and one Sorun didn't want to entertain with much thought. He immediately found himself shaking his head in an attempt to rid himself of the idea altogether. That he'd potentially been in there for longer than a few hours or days. "No, no no, it's something else, something else happened, gotta be something... voices..."

Automatically he'd dipped down into a crouch without even thinking about it, moving forwards towards the nearest corner. He creeped his head around it, heart throbbing and head spinning as he peered down the next hall, releasing a short breath when he saw them. Two figures at the end of the hallway he was peeking in. Definitely echidna from what he was able to identify, the red fur and dreadlocks was a dead giveaway, though he recognized neither one. A male and a female talking amongst themselves, both garbed head to toe in black, almost sinister-looking garb. The male one in particular had a dark, hooded cloak of all things, and the female one had a tight-fitting leather outfit.

"The hell's up with the skimpy one over there?" Sorun wondered, eyes drifting to the coiled whip she wore on her belt. "Can't make out what they're saying from here, and no way am I getting any closer." He moved back behind the corner to take full cover from their sight before they could notice him. "From how casual they're acting they're probably guards or soldiers or something. Dressed in full black... yeah, I'm not trusting that."

A part of him entertained the idea of revealing himself, but the paranoid part of his brain took over. The part that had an ingrained mistrust of echidna, the way those outfits looked so shady, the paranoia and fear he'd been feeling ever since exiting the Master Emerald. He shook his head and crouch-walked away from the corner, back down the hallway he'd walked in from to get there.

"I can't trust anything here, wherever I am. I need to find... what do I even need to find? Someone I know? I know Shadow, but... but something's wrong, I can't... what am I supposed to do?" Sorun's breathing became a bit heavier after backtracking by a few hallways. He felt his heart thumping quickly in his chest, and he looked out the nearest window towards the city beyond. "Need to get out of here. Find help, find... something! I don't know how long I have until someone finds me." He leaned closer towards the window, angling his head so he was able to see the ground. It wasn't far from where the window was; just a short hop more than anything. When he looked up, he saw that the lawn separating the castle from the rest of the city was clear of guards. "Fuck it, there's nothing out there, I can just break the window and make a break for the nearest alley before someone comes to investigate. Doubt I'd make it through the front door if I even found the thing anyways."

He could give up all hope of sneaking through the front gate if this place was fully staffed with watchful eyes, and he wasn't nearly confident enough in his stealth skills to pull that kind of exit off. Especially considering he had no idea what the status of the gate was, or even what the layout of the castle was. And the alleys between the nearby buildings looked too enticing for him to pass up. Alleys easy to get lost in. A maze that promised safety that Sorun desperately desired at the moment.

Making his decision, he looked around until he spotted one of the wooden stands holding a vase. He carefully removed the vase from the stand and gently set it on the ground, and then hefted up the wood stand in both of his hands. Struggling a bit with its weight, he swung it back and forth a couple of times, both to test its weight and build momentum. At the third, largest swing he let the stand loose and let it fly through the air, watching as it smashed right through the window.

At the same second he heard the sound of shattering glass, Sorun dove forwards and jumped right through the new aperture in the window. He landed on the grass on the other side, wincing and hissing at the sensation of glass shards cutting into him, and did his best to ignore it as he stood up to his feet.

He ran. As fast as he could, straight towards the nearest alleyway he could see. He almost dove once again after he crossed the street and reached the alley, not even stopping until he'd reached a corner to swing behind. It was only after he was behind the cover of the building's wall that he stopped, bending over and placing his hands on his knees while breathing out heavily from exertion. After catching his breath he'd creeped back towards the building's corner to peek around it.

There were already people swarming around where he'd broken the castle window. More echidna in the black uniforms, at least a dozen of them, and thankfully enough none of them were looking over in his direction. He noticed the female one from earlier, the one with the whip secured to her belt, shouting at some of them like she was barking orders. Seeing enough, Sorun leaned back behind the corner and let out an exhaustive breath.

"Alright... alright, we're good." Running a hand over his ragged face, he palmed the wall behind him and pushed off it, stumbling a bit from feeling the rush from earlier quickly wear off. "Okay, gotta, gotta find... find something, I dunno. Anything. Where even is here?"

Shaking his head, and still clueless as to where to go from here, Sorun decided that the best course of action was to, one, get as far away from that castle as possible, preferably deeper in the city. And from there... from there he wasn't sure what he was supposed to do.

He decided at first to keep to the alleyways, away from public sight. He could barely even tell it was nighttime due to the amount of city lights all around, which in other times would have been a warming sight for Sorun, but now all it did was further fuel his anxiety and cause him to continually shoot paranoid glances behind his shoulder whenever he felt spooked. He mostly stuck to cover where he could, hiding behind corners and dumpsters and only transitioning between buildings when there weren't many people around.

There was a wide mix of Mobians that wandered the streets. Mobians of so many varieties and species he couldn't count them, much less identify half. Lots of echidna, too, which Sorun had found odd. At least he did until he discovered, much to his dread, from eavesdropping on some groups of Mobians talking that this city, Portal City they called it, was on Angel Island. The information alone had sent Sorun into an panic-fueled wheezing fit, and he was forced to hide somewhere until he managed to calm down and process that information.

The Angel Island he knew was practically a wasteland. Ravaged by Eggman and most of its inhabitants evacuated by Enerjak. There had been a city, Echidnaopolis, but from what Sorun knew that place had been little more than ruins by the time he came onto Mobius. Everything he saw was in direct defiance of that. It was wrong. All wrong.

It also meant he was stuck here until he found a ladder that reached for a few miles, but one problem at a time.

"Then there's this..." Sorun thought to himself as he peered out an alleyway. He was looking out into what looked like a town square, full of Mobians. Praying Mobians. All praying to a statue, it seemed. What was really bizarre was that it was a statue of a human. Or an Overlander, perhaps, but Sorun wasn't able to tell. A stone statue of a human or Overlander girl that didn't even look to be a teenager yet, with large, angelic wings sticking from her back.

"They... worship a human-looking girl...?" The sight did, oddly enough, put some ease in Sorun's heart, and he found himself easing up off the alley wall he was taking cover behind. "This just gets odder and odder. I... maybe it's fine if I just walk around normally? Guess I can just hide again if worst comes to worst..."

Certainly it'd be much easier getting around without having to stalk through alleyways, so he figured it was worth a shot. He'd made his way away from the square with the statue, though, if only so he didn't inadvertently interrupt something or cause something else that was unpredictable to happen. A few city blocks later, and another ten minutes of gathering the nerve up while Sorun nervously muttered to himself, and he'd stepped out onto the sidewalk and began walking in a random direction that struck his fancy.

Fortunately enough, nobody accosted him, which was a huge breath of relief for Sorun. He did get some odd stares from passing Mobians. Whether it was at what he was or the blue, exotic coat he wore he wasn't sure, but nobody was chasing after him or calling out at him, which was good enough for him. He did make a note of the strange fact that some Mobians he passed bowed their heads and quickly muttered something under their breaths, but it was always too quiet for Sorun to make out. He decided to ignore them all and press on.

"There's something reaaally wrong with this place..." Now that he was out of the alleys it was easy for Sorun to see what the city looked like from within. Digital signs were plastered on the surfaces of all the biggest buildings he passed. Like advertisement billboards, except instead of advertising products these signs looked like they were displaying propaganda. "'The Chaotix is watching y-' Christ, it really is '1984' out here. And what does that even mean? What, is the Chaotix some kind of secret police now or something? God, is that Knuckles ?"

It was on the one sign he was paying particular attention to. The stern face of an echidna he was very familiar with was superimposed over the Chaotix message, though Sorun didn't remember Knuckles having a red, cybernetic eye replacing his right eye. Chrome metal around the socket and a big, red lens in place of an actual eye. There were other signs besides that one, too. Signs that read things like "obey", or "King Shadow's word is law". That last one was particularly unsettling to Sorun.

"It's all wrong. Wrong. Wrong, wrong, wrong..."

He felt his left hand unconsciously clench inside of his pockets. He couldn't help the deep yearning he felt for Yamato. The security in feelings its weight in his hand, the safety its power provided. But knowing his hand was empty just made Sorun all the more nervous.

Sorun wasn't sure how long he'd been wandering the streets. An hour, maybe two. Doing nothing but walking with his head hunched down, thoughts looping over and over in his head as he tried and failed to make sense of everything that was going on. How nothing made sense and how his mind was stuck in perpetual confusion, wondering and trying to make sense and failing and feeling scared over the whole ordeal. He only got snapped out of it when he accidentally kicked a can that had been lying in his path. The sound of it skittering and clattering across the ground made Sorun look up, and for the first time in hours he took a look around at where he'd walked to.

... It was still just streets and buildings everywhere, he didn't know where the hell he was.

"Sorun...?"

There was a heavy blink. Another blink. He heard his name called out in that quiet voice, and he recognized the voice, though there was something different about it he couldn't place. He dared to hope, though, and the teen forced himself to turn his head to the left towards the source of the voice he heard call his name.

He was right. He had successfully recognized the voice. He was there in the alley next to Sorun, sitting against the wall with a trashcan nearby. Sonic. More... disheveled than Sorun remembered, but the blue fur and green eyes was hard to miss for Sorun. There was something else different about him, beyond the patches of matted fur and the worn shoes and gloves, but Sorun couldn't place what it was...

"S-Sorun, I can't believe it." The look of disbelief that was on the hedgehog's face began to morph into a smile of relief, while Sorun silently continued to stare at him. "You're... you're really here. Oh, Sorun, I can't tell you how glad I am to see you-"

"YOU MISERABLE FUCK!"

The shout had stunned Sonic, who'd frozen halfway towards getting him. He'd been so surprised, in fact, that he wasn't able to react at all when Sorun burst forwards and punched Sonic right in the mouth. The hit surprised Sonic, who made a grunt of pain as he fell down on his back. Not even a second later Sorun pounced on top of him, straddling him and wrapping his fingers around his throat before squeezing down as hard as he could.

"What the hell were you thinking putting me inside that thing!?" Sorun screamed out, his voice drowning out the choking sounds Sonic was making as he clawed at Sorun's arms. "You stick me in there and I wake up into whatever this place is! What was actually going on in your damn head you fucking fuck!?"

Sonic's hand reached up to Sorun's face in an attempt to try and push the teen off him. In his frightened, frenzied state Sorun bit down on one of Sonic's fingers, causing him to yell and kick one of his legs out. The kick struck Sorun in the center of his chest, throwing him back against the wall.

Gasping, Sonic sat up and grabbed at his throat while breathing heavily. He was only allowed a moment's respite before the lid from the nearby trashcan flew through the air and struck him right in the center of his face, knocking him back into the wall. On the other side of the alley Sorun was sitting against his wall, breathing heavily as he stared towards Sonic with eyes full of scorn.

"You owe me... so many fucking answers..." Sorun gasped out between breaths, pointing his finger at Sonic. "Start talking."

"Ah, man, Eggman was right, you really do swear..." Rubbing at the spot he was struck with the trashcan lid, Sonic groaned out and sat against the wall facing opposite of Sorun. The relief was all but gone now. In its place was a tired, dour expression that overtook Sonic's face. "In answer to the first question, I was trying to save your life, buddy ," Sonic said in an unamused tone.

"Save my life? Pfft, yeah, right..." Sorun glanced up and threw a hand up. "I'd say I was grateful but then I woke up here."

"Glad to see you're so thankful," Sonic remarked.

"... It's not that I'm not, it's just... ugh..." Sorun pinched the bridge of his nose. The truth was he was grateful to still be alive and not be reduced to, well, absolutely nothing upon dying without any Emeralds infused in him, but the gratitude fell short given current events. An array of feelings and impulses was really why he decided to attack the blue hedgehog. Half of Sorun felt like apologizing. The other half reminded him it was his fault he was here and suddenly he felt the urge to try and choke him again. He resolved to just keep talking. "Fine, yeah, thanks, now what the hell's going on?"

He flinched back, like he'd been struck. "Can you cool it with the language, man? Seriously." Rolling his eyes, Sonic asked, "You mind telling me what even happened? How are you here?"

"I don't know, man, you put me in there, I was in a weird dreamscape or whatever for I don't even know how long, then I wind up in some creepy castle dungeon, did some running, wound up here." Sorun made a sigh and deflated against the wall. "Dunno what happened, dunno how I got healed from literally disintegrating, dunno what...

what all this is." He gestured around at the buildings around them. "I-I don't know. Was hoping you did."

A low sound left Sonic's lips. He gave Sorun an appraising look, and then glanced down at his worn shoes as a troubled look settled over his features. "Yeah, I... guess that'd be pretty disorienting for you," he muttered out.

Sorun's eyes narrowed. He was still hearing it. The difference in Sonic's voice. It was different, rougher... aged. "What's with your voice?" Sorun asked him, though it came out sounding more like a demand. "There's something different with you."

"Oh, noticed, huh?" A dry laugh left Sonic. He ran a hand over his quills, some of which were standing up and away from the major spikes hanging off the back of his head. "Yeah, I guess being in your forties'll do that."

"Forties...?" Sorun quietly repeated. He felt his throat grow dry as fear and denial gripped at his heart. "W-what do you mean-?"

"Sonic? Sorun!?"

The new voice caused both males to perk their heads up and turn towards the source. The owner of the voice was standing at the mouth of the alleyway. Despite the toolbelt, goggles, and other assortments worn on their body, Sorun would be hard-pressed not to recognize Tails given his abnormal amount of tails, new physical maturity aside. There was somebody else behind him, but he didn't recognize them. A female echidna, clothed with a navy blue pair of boots and a jacket Sorun had realized with a quiet scoff. He paid less attention to her than the fox in front of her giving both him and Sonic a large, bug-eyed stare.

A short grunt left Sorun. He should have been happy that he finally found people he knew, but the forties comment from Sonic earlier was screaming inside his head and he was finding it hard to be happy over everything right now. "Hey, Tails," he lethargically greeted, gripping the wall behind him and rising to his feet. He took a few steps in the direction of the fox, leaning closer as he looked him over. A mixture of wonder and fear went through him as he took in the details, the more angular features and trimmer form the Mobian held now, and the maturity in his eyes that he didn't recognize. "Wow, you... you grew up. And got taller. I mean not by much, but-"

"H-hey!"

"- but this is just... man..." Sorun glanced over Tails' shoulder and at the echidna behind him. "... I don't know who you are," he said.

"Oh!" The girl - teenager from the sound of her voice, Sorun guessed around his own age - cleared her throat and adjusted the glasses on her face before addressing him. "I'm Lara-Su. Nice to meet you!"

"I-I still don't know who you are."

The small smile she held instantly vanished. "Yeah, well, feeling's mutual," she said, causing Sorun to rear his head back a bit. She ignored him and turned her attention towards Tails. "Hey, Tails, who's the weird Overlander?"

He didn't respond immediately. The yellow Mobian was still staring towards Sorun, eyes wide and mouth agape. There was a pained expression on his face, and in an attempt to form words he ended up making a stammering sound before finally getting something out. "He's... he's a ghost..." he mumbled out, much to the confusion of Lara-Su.

"A... ghost?" she repeated. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"He means this human ," Sorun said, giving the echidna a pointed look, "is an old friend." His eyes snapped to Sonic, who was silently observing the three. " Very old, evidently," he hissed out, causing both Sonic and Tails to glance away at him.

"Human?" Lara-Su echoed, watching as Sorun leaned his back against the wall opposite of Sonic. "You mean like that Overlander subspecies that live under that mountain?"

"I'm not explaining it. Don't have the time." Sorun's glare shifted to Sonic. "You know what we do have time for? You fucking explaining to me exactly how long you left me in the Master Emerald." Lara-Su blinked in surprise, features thinning as she continued to look at Sorun. Tails had practically jumped hearing him speak, after which his expression turned more and more regretful the longer he looked at Sorun, whose glare hardened, causing Sonic to shift uncomfortably from where he was sitting. "Everyone's older. You, Tails. I don't recognize anything around here, and apparently Shadow's a king now?" He leaned forwards. "Sonic. What. Happened?"

"Sorun, I..." Sonic tried to explain, but words seemed to fail him, causing him to sigh out and hang his head. Tails, similarly, avoided eye contact with Sorun, a fact the human took note of, while Lara-Su watched on in confusion. "Twenty-five years," the hedgehog said, causing Sorun to snap his head to him with wide eyes. "You were in there for twenty-five years."

Twenty-five years. The number echoed repeatedly in Sorun's head, so much that it was the only sound he could recognize. He'd felt his breathing increase slightly, and he had to fight from collapsing right there out of shock. Amazingly, he managed to keep his composure, just barely, though it didn't help all the thoughts running through his mind.

Shock and denial, which was quickly fading away to outrage. Anger. Confusion and more anger, all aimed at the hedgehog sitting across from him. He tried breathing heavily to calm himself down, but Sorun was finding that it wasn't helping in the slightest. He felt his hands twitch, the urge to pull a sword out from an invisible scabbard that he wasn't holding very evident to feel, but instead of doing that all he managed to do was run a hand over his face.

"Twenty-five years...?" Sorun mumbled out, equal parts angry as he was astonished. He'd missed Tails stepping towards him holding a hand out to try and help steady him, but he'd frozen when the human began speaking. "You... I can't believe it. You gave me the Noctis treatment?" The anger overgrew his astonishment. The hand was dropped to his side as he gave Sonic an angered look. "No, it's even worse than Noctis!" he yelled out. "He was only in his magic crystal for a ten-year timeskip, you stuck me in one for more than double!"

"I don't know who Noctis is!" Sonic exclaimed, throwing his hands up. "And-and what was I supposed to do, Sorun, huh!? Let you die!?"

Gasping out in outrage, Sorun pushed himself off the wall. "I don't even know what's worse at this point!" he angrily stated. "Twenty-five years of my life just gone like that, fuck all the effort I put into fixing my life, and I get to wake up in this dystopian nightmare, and all you got to say is 'what else was I supposed to do!?'"

"What were we supposed to do then, huh!?" Sonic argued. "Let you die!?"

"You could have not stuck me in the Master Emerald for two-and-a-half decades and ruin my life! Again!" Sorun screamed out. "Jesus fucking Christ, twenty-five years , Sonic!? What the actual fuck were you thinking!?"

"It wasn't his fault, Sorun!" Tails' voice made Sorun whip his head towards the fox, though he found his anger subdued somewhat when he saw the saddened, and heated, look the older fox had on his face. "We tried everything we could to save you, alright!? For years! We tried for years to find some way of saving you but we just couldn't find anything! I tried, Rotor tried, Knuckles and his dad tried, Sally and the Republic tried, even Shadow got G.U.N. to try! Nobody could figure anything out!"

The information did nothing to assuage Sorun's anger. "So you all thought the best solution was just to leave me in there!?" he yelled.

"'Ah, Sorun, cool guy, saved all our lives multiple times now, guess we should just leave him in the stupid magic crystal forever!' Is that how it went!?"

Tails' expression began to turn into something that was equaling Sorun's own anger. "What, would you have preferred we just let you out to turn into dust right in front of our eyes!?"

"No! Maybe! Fuck, I don't know!" In anger Sorun pounded the wall behind him. He instantly regretted it, recoiling his hand back and hissing a bit as he felt the appendage throb from the impact. Afterwards, a sudden weakness began hitting him once the heat of the anger began to ebb off, and Sorun was forced to lean back against the wall. "Arguing about the ethics of what you did to me isn't gonna get us anywhere. We're here. So does someone mind explaining to me what 'here' is? How Shadow became a king?" His eyes darted across all three Mobians. "Anybody?"

"That," Sonic began, gaining Sorun's attention, "is a bit complicated." He made a low sigh, staring down at his shoes as a look of deep contemplation overtook his features. It took a full minute of silence before he began speaking. "Some time after you were put in the Master Emerald someone killed Eggman. Him and Snively. We never figured out who. Best we ever got were reports of someone wearing a lot of red from some of the Dark Egg Legion guys, but... well, to be honest, I don't think anybody ever cared enough to look too deep into it, and it never came up again, so who knows?"

Sorun stiffened. He'd been near-elated to hear Eggman had been killed off until Sonic mentioned someone wearing red. "That's three times now. Three times I've heard about the same person. The man dressed in red..." Sorun thought to himself. "This guy..."

"Things worked out really well after that," Sonic continued, though by now Sorun was only paying half-attention, too caught up in his own musings. "M-me and Sally actually got back together, you know? And-and after a while Elias stepped down as king, so... so we took over leading the Republic. Can you believe that?"

"That people trusted you enough to be a king?" Sorun asked with a barely-suppressed scoff. "Not really," he truthfully admitted, though he was surprised Sonic had even chosen to shoulder that much responsibility to begin with. Sorun never pegged him as that kind of guy.

Sonic actually laughed a bit at Sorun's response. "Yeah, well... won't lie, kinda hated the job," he admitted. "Things were going well, but..."

"But then the time anomaly happened," Tails finished, drawing everyone's attention towards him. "I don't know exactly what caused it, but I saw enough that I was able to protect myself and my family from... from whatever happened in time. That's how I managed to remember everything, why... why it feels like I'm walking around with two sets of memories now," he said. "Is that what you mean to say?"

"Yeah. That," Sonic confirmed with a small nod. There was a moment where he'd looked happy at the mention of Tails' family, a bright look that had quickly flashed over his face, though it'd left as soon as it arrived. "Rotor managed to figure it out. Him and this other scientist he worked with, Cobor. Said it was my fault," he muttered out, causing surprise to bloom on the faces of the other three watching him. "Me breaching dimensional barriers back and forth using my powers all the time back in the day, saving the whole planet from the stupid Quantum Dial thing the Xorda used that one time, that zone me an' Knuckles blew up in that one fight long ago, it... I dunno, it all stacked together or something."

"You did what ?" Sorun muttered out, half in shock and half in tired disbelief. "Since when can you do all this? W-how did you and Knuckles-?"

"It was... it was all before you came to Mobius. Earlier on," Sonic quietly answered. "I never really traveled to other zones 'cause I didn't have reason, and the thing with Knuckles is a... it's a long story, and it's not important." A short sigh left him. "Rotor and Cobor said everything I did caused some kind of anomaly to form, that it was tearing apart the fabric of reality or something. We were all feeling it - the earthquakes and the storms that wouldn't go away. Pretty plain to see something wrong was happening, and according to him we didn't have long before the whole zone was consumed in it.

"So... we decided to fix time."

"... Fix time." The words that left Sorun were equal parts flat and incredulous. He'd followed along with the story easily enough to this point, trying his best not to think about all the reeling implications of being twenty-five years in the future, but this was making him pause. "You decided to 'fix time,' huh? And how exactly did you plan on accomplishing this?"

"Robotnik was makin' a time machine." Any further questions Sorun had died on his tongue when he heard Sonic say this. "Long after you were put in the Master Emerald. 'Fore the red guy got him. Guess he saw he was losing and was desperate to try something. We'd been routing him for a while, and someone or something, don't know what, kept hitting major installations of his, stalling his plans and shorting his resources. Whatever was hitting him was making it so we were cleaning house, so the best we could figure is that it was a last-ditch attempt at winning. But I guess the red guy got him before he finished it."

The pieces were beginning to click together in Sorun's mind. "Sonic, don't tell me you tried using an unfinished time machine made by that madman to fix this," he said, mostly in a groan that well-hid the pleading tone in his voice.

"Call him whatever you want, but Eggman's stuff usually worked. Rotor just didn't have time to think up anything else; there weren't any other options. So I went in the... what was it, the tachyon somethin' or..." Sonic paused as he attempted to remember the name, but then shook his head with a grunt. "Doesn't matter. The scientists had a plan, we had the machine, I just had to go in and fix everything."

"Christ, you did." Suppressing a sigh, Sorun reached up to pinch at the bridge of his nose. He wanted to shout, but the part of his brain telling him he wasn't there and couldn't judge kept reminding him of the fact. He snapped at that part of his consciousness in anger, and did his best to keep his voice level as he looked back to Sonic. "So what happened?"

"..." Staring towards Sorun with a blank, unknowing expression, all Sonic could offer was a shrug. "I guess I screwed up," he said. "One minute I'm there, fixing everything, the next minute I'm... I'm here in this alley, in a world I don't recognize, and I... I... I don't know what happened, Sorun."

"You altered the timeline." This came from Tails, in a tone more grave than Sorun wanted to hear. All eyes focused on him, with Sorun withering a bit when he saw the solemn look on the fox's face. "I don't know exactly what you did, Sonic, but you're not in any of my memories of this timeline. In fact, I don't think anybody here knows you. Knuckles did, I talked with him earlier and he knew-"

"He was there when the time machine went... all wrong. Him and Rotor and Cobor," Sonic supplied.

"So the tachyon chamber did preserve the memories of those that were nearby..." Tails mumbled out, rubbing at the back of his head in an uncomfortable motion. "You shouldn't have been messing around with time like that, Sonic. You stopped the time anomaly, but best I can see is that you wrote yourself out of history up to the point in time you used the time machine in the process, and because of that the timeline got... well, you see. It's so altered now that it looks nothing like the other present."

"Wait. W-wait, just wait a second." Sorun held a hand up, his breathing increasing a bit as he gave Tails a wide-eyed stare. "What does that even mean-!?"

"It means nothing in the original timeline, the one we remember, ever happened. None of it exists anymore," Tails sadly stated. "Us, the Freedom Fighters, our experiences, events, everything . Because Sonic was never there due to erasing himself from time history took a different course. This course." He rose a hand up to gesture at the buildings surrounding them. "This timeline where Shadow conquered the whole world, because Sonic wasn't here to save it." He focused his attention on Sorun. "I don't even know what happened with you since you don't even exist in this timeline, but what happened back then's starting to make more sense. Maybe the Master Emerald... preserved you somehow. Chaos Energy and time don't really go hand-in-hand so maybe being in there, maybe, shielded you from the time alteration? The shock of the timeline shifting must be what ejected you from the..."

The sound all around Sorun began to fade out to the sound of his own heartbeat. The feeling he felt was the emotional equivalent of hearing a record screech to a halt. Tails' words echoed endlessly in Sorun's mind, reminding him no matter how many times he tried to deny it of what happened. That the world he'd been living in didn't exist anymore.

That everything he did didn't exist anymore. That none of his actions carried over into this world.

That almost everyone he knew didn't even remember him anymore.

It was almost maddening, the torrential rush of emotions going through him, and all he could do was stand there while staring down at the ground. He felt his head throbbing, repeatedly, tried holding a hand to his forehead to try and calm the throbbing but it did nothing to help. He had to fight down the urge to scream.

Instead, Sorun ended up laughing.

It wasn't an overly loud or energetic laugh. It was more a quiet, dry chuckle that held absolutely no joy or mirth in it. The three Mobians gathered around all gave the Earthling odd looks as he turned away from them, hand held to his face as he continued with his low, choked chuckling as he slowly shook his head.

"This is just rich. Truly," Sorun muttered out, hand dropping from his face as he turned his head to Sonic. His face was far from amused. It wasn't clear if he was about to break down and cry or fly into a rage. "The biggest hero in the world dropping the ball this badly. I really can't believe it."

"W-what the..." Sonic's features began tightening. "What, you think this is funny!?"

"I'd find it hilarious if I wasn't dragged into this mess, too." Sorun's features began to change to match the growing, angered expression Sonic was adopting. "The Sonic the Hedgehog, the guy everyone looked up to, fucking king of all things, and what'd you end up doing, huh? How big a failure did you end up being?"

"I did my best-!"

"Oh, your best, is it? Your best!?" Sorun's voice began to grow hysterical as he shouted over Sonic. "Yeah, some good your best did, huh? Fucking erased any evidence we ever even existed from history, all our friends are gone and replaced by whoever the hell lives in this world, changed the world into som-some dystopian world, this was your best!?" He ran his fingers through his hair, shouting out, "For god's sake, the world was screwed up enough as it was, how the fuck did you manage to screw it up even more than it was already-!?"

"I LOST MY KIDS, SORUN!"

He stopped dead at hearing that, having frozen in shock. Before Sorun could even respond Sonic had zoomed up off the ground he'd been sitting on, standing mere centimeters from the human's face with a truly furious expression.

"W-wha-?" Sorun stammered out, but was silenced when Sonic began screaming directly into his face.

"Yeah, Sorun, my kids! The ones I had with Sally! Two of them!" he exclaimed, loudly enough that Sorun began shrinking back. "But she doesn't even know who I am in this timeline, so guess what!? They don't exist anymore! You think I don't realize what I've done when my own children ended up getting wiped out of existence!?"

Tears had begun streaming out from the corners of the hedgehog's face halfway through his rant. He'd stopped eventually, either from running out of steam or being too emotional to go on without bursting into tears, though he continued to stare at Sorun through the tears even with the heaving breaths he was taking.

Sorun didn't respond. All he could do was stare back at Sonic, looking more shocked than anything else. He listed off backwards, his hand moving up to cover his face as he looked down, quiet sounds coming out of his mouth, muffled by his hand. Sonic looked ready to go off shouting again, but then he'd leaned in closer, and stopped completely when he made out the words coming out from Sorun's mouth.

"What are we supposed to do? I don't know, Sorun I don't... is there anything we can... don't know, you seriously want to fix... Yamato, maybe, but I don't think... that isn't gonna work, you know there's nothing it can... we can't just leave things like this..."

"S-Sorun?" The furious look Sonic had held began to fade away into a more disturbed one the longer he listened to Sorun. He looked to the side, growing more visibly worried when he saw both Tails and Lara-Su both had equally disturbed, unsettled looks on their faces.

Before anybody could say anything further, Sorun's hand dropped away from his face and slapped against the wall. The three Mobians jumped in shock, looking towards him and recoiling when they saw the vacant, empty stare he was giving the ground. Sonic was the first to react, slowly reaching forwards to try and jostle Sorun, but before he could make contact the human lifted his head and looked right into Sonic's still-moist eyes, surprising the hedgehog somewhat.

"Alright. Alright," Sorun mumbled, voice dry. "We're gonna fix this." He used his hand to push himself off the wall, coattails blowing past his legs from a passing breeze as he shook his head. "Not gonna let this lie. We're gonna make this right."

"Make this right?" Sonic echoed. "And how exactly are we gonna 'make this right,' Sorun?"

"Dunno. We'll figure something out," he claimed, walking past Sonic towards the alley entranceway. "But we're getting your kids and the old timeline back."

He was stopped in his walking when he passed by Tails, who reached out and grabbed at Sorun's wrist. "Sorun, this isn't something we can fix. We can't just 'reset' a whole timeline," he said with a shake of his head. "And besides, we have other things we need to talk about. You-"

"Whatever you have to say can wait," Sorun said, pulling his wrist free from the fox's grasp. "We're dealing with this now before anything else."

"No, Sorun, you don't understand, wait!" Tails shouted out as Sorun began walking away. "You told me that- would you just wait !?"

"I don't care what you have to say. I'm not gonna stand around waiting when-!"

"Hey, would you just chill out!?" Once more, he was grabbed. This time by the echidna, on his shoulder. This resulted in Sorun deeply inhaling after halting in his movement, and then turning to meet the echidna teen's eyes while resisting the urge to smack the glasses off her face. "What exactly is your plan, huh!? You can't just go off half-cocked without even knowing what you're doing!"

"And what's it to you?" Sorun shot back, slapping the hand off his shoulder and then turning to Tails. "Who even is this?"

Seeming to suppress a sigh, as well as visibly appearing to hold in a great amount of frustration, Tails gestured out to the echidna. "As she said, she's Lara-Su. She's Knuckles' daughter. She retained some memories of the previous timeline, probably because of her Chaos powers, we're not a hundred percent sure."

"Oh. Oh ... I see." Immediately, Sorun's face took on a soured expression, surprising both Sonic and Tails and causing Lara-Su to scowl at him. He completely ignored their reactions and looked closely at her face, particularly at the stands of pinkish hair amidst the fleshy dreadlocks on her head that blended well with the red fur and the purple eyes behind the glasses. "Pfft. Friggin' figures you're his kid."

She didn't seem very appreciative of the tone Sorun had taken. "And just what is that supposed to mean?" she demanded.

"I don't mean any offense, but your father isn't exactly on my list of favorite people right now." Sorun glanced off to the side. "He's pretty low right now, actually, you know, with his face being on evil-looking billboards all over town and everything."

"Hey, he's a great guy! And a great dad!" With anger in her voice, Lara-Su stepped forwards and jabbed a finger in Sorun's chest, hard enough that he was sent back a step. "I don't know what your problem with him is, but I don't see how some guy I've just met-!"

"You poke me one more time and I'm breaking those glasses right off your-"

"FREEZE!"

Following that yell, and a series of thunking sounds, the entire alleyway was engulfed in bright light. The light was intense enough that Sorun and the rest were forced to shield their eyes from the sudden brightness, and when Sorun lowered his arm from his face, he felt his stomach drop when he saw something at the end of the alleyway. A lot of somethings.

Cars. Both the floating variety and the ground variety, all parked or floating at the end of the alley and shining their headlights at the four occupants. And alongside and in all the vehicles were echidna, wearing matching tan uniforms and pointing weapons right at them.

"Wait, is that...?" There was something on the sides of all the vehicles that caught Sorun's attention, forcing him to look closer. Even as he and everyone else were forced to raise their hands in the air in surrender, he couldn't help but notice the red, swirling, tribal-like symbol that was emblazoned on the sides of all the vehicles shining their lights on the group. "Isn't that the same symbol that was on Shadow's bike from that one time? Man, what the fuck, he's got his own symbol and everything." A figure, one of the echidna, stepped in front of all the other ones pointing their guns at the four of them seemingly to address the group. All of Sorun's attention was torn away from the symbols on the vehicles to the sole echidna standing in front of them all. "Oh, it's you, huh?"

From how menacing his face seemed from all those billboards Sorun had seen wandering the city, he would have assumed Knuckles would look more authoritative at the moment. He certainly looked the part, with that tan uniform and the wide-brimmed, leather hat he was wearing on his head. That and his visible age made it so Sorun wouldn't have recognized him at all if it weren't for the red, bionic eye he'd seen in the posters. But at the moment Knuckles didn't seem so authoritative at all. Not menacing in the slightest, even given the squad of heavily-armed echidna right behind him.

No, he was... surprised, and that was about it. Surprised and disbelieving, with his sight focused solely on Sorun. Not on Sonic or Tails. Not even his own daughter, who was standing besides Sorun and giving her father her own shocked expression. He was only looking towards Sorun.

"It... it can't be..." Knuckles mumbled out under his breath, so quiet Sorun could barely hear him. "You... you're not supposed to exist in this... Sorun? How ...?"

There were a lot of words Sorun wanted to say to Knuckles. Some kind, most not so kind. And certainly there were enough grievances, both due to present circumstances and Sorun's current disposition over the echidna and everything else. That would have colored most of everything he had to say in a negative light. Instead, all he could do was look up at the hat Knuckles was wearing, and then make the loudest scoff he could utter.

"I was wrong. That hat looks ridiculous on you, Knuckles."

A/N- So originally I had this whole chase scene planned out where Sorun had to run away from the castle while being chased by echidna, followed by a motorcycle pursuit. I had it planned for the entire time ever since I started writing this story, but then I got to this point and I realized two things: baseline human Sorun has a 0% chance of outrunning a Mobian of any kind, hands down. He'd have, like, ten seconds at best before getting dogpiled.

As for the motorcycle scene, the idea was that there was a couple who parked their bike in front of the castle and Sorun would just steal the bike and drive away, resulting in this big thrilling, high-octane motor chase. Even if I managed to write around that being too convenient, there's the matter that Sorun would barely even know how to drive a motorcycle to begin with. How to operate one, yeah, vaguely, but he isn't nearly skilled enough with one to outrun being pursued by other vehicles. So for the sake of "realism", a term I use really loosely considering the setting, substitute it for immersion if you really feel like it, I cut the two scenes out in lieu of the practical "just break a window and run out when no one's looking" solution.

So I find sometimes in writing, when you've planned a whole story out, some parts of it are planned different. There are parts where you go, "I know exactly how this chapter/part/arc whatever is gonna go 100%," and sometimes there are parts where you go, "kinda iffy on the details here but I know the general important bits so I'll just improvise it when I get there." In terms of how I've done the story it's about 80% the former and 20& the latter, give or take 5%, and this whole section of the alternate future, out of all the parts I had planned for this whole story, sits firmly in the latter category of "I'll wing it when I get to it." Part of it is because when this happened in the comics there were a lot of details and specifications that weren't ever really addressed or they were poorly explained. And technically speaking this never even happened in the main "cannon" timeline, it was one of those alternate universe timelines (alternate future turning into a different alternate future, as if that isn't confusing enough), and technically events in the main cannon timeline should have made it so something like this could never even happen, but all I have to do is get Sonic to say "there was a red guy that did such and such" as a way of the story saying, "Rubrum did some stuff in the background offscreen that made all this possible." And since that's the case there's some details that aren't completely 100% in-line with the comic variation of these events, but they're relatively minor, doesn't affect much, and I honestly don't think anybody even cares to look that deeply into it as long as it's done well enough.

Chapter 80

A/N- Man, we're a million words in and the story still hasn't explained why it's called 'Recursion Error' yet.

Recursion Error

Episode 80- The future really sucks

Used to be easier. Get by one day, rest in preparation for the next. Some were easier than others, some weren't. Still, routine was an easy enough concept to find comfort in, and with that came complacency - and Sorun found he enjoyed a complacent life.

And then Mobius happened, threw everything off kilter. Fight in a war he didn't want to fight in, die when he didn't want to die. Old way of life destroyed, adapt to the new. Had its own challenges in of itself, ones he himself was surprised in overcoming. Not for virtue, but merely for managing to stick it out long enough to acclimate. Its own respect in some regards.

But then, once again, he started to grow into complacency once again. Began carving a new routine out, a new life. Grew comfortable and quiet, had finally once more found a home to set himself down in. He'd started to finally believe happiness was something he could truly have after all. It was supposed to be the end of it there.

And then Enerjak happened. And that Emerald. And Sonic, once more turning Sorun's world upside down. His home, gone again. Complacency, gone again. Once more - once more - there was nothing but emptiness that he tried to fill with anger and spite over this entire situation. Some was aimed at Sonic, whose fault this all lied upon. It was his fault this future had changed, it was his fault he was put in the crystal, everything was his fault.

Hearing he'd lost his children had stayed Sorun's hand from lashing out at him, and made him realize that he wasn't completely to blame for this. That his only fault was in attempting, and admittedly succeeding in some regard, to saving the world, just at a... steeper cost than anticipated. Sorun couldn't fault him for that, even if he wanted to. So all that was left was bitterness. At the situation as a whole, mostly.

That and the fact his arms were tired. Having them shackled above your head apparently did that.

Knuckles - ever faithful to his duty regardless of the timeline it seemed, Sorun had snidely thought - as the chief enforcer to... whatever King Shadow's regime could be described as, empire, dominion, had taken them all back to the castle. For what reason they could only stipulate. That they all had knowledge of the old world, and King Shadow saw that as a threat for some reason. Their working assumption, at least. The officers, Knuckles included, hadn't been very talkative of the matter.

So here they were now. Back in a dungeon Sorun had escaped from not too long ago in a panicked haze, manacled to walls by cuffs made from pure energy emitted from outlets in the wall their wrists were cuffed to. Tails, the lucky boy - man now, Sorun had to remind himself - got an extra set of energy shackles just for his tails. Sorun didn't know whether to scoff in begrudging respect at the precaution or curse King Shadow's paranoia.

"So what's the plan, Sorun?" He looked up at the wide cell they'd been locked in, at his mirror image squatting on the ground in front of him, eyes cast upwards to meet his own. "What are we doing? Actually wanna bring the old timeline back?"

Sorun made a grunting sound as an affirmation.

"How's that gonna work?"

"Dunno. Find a way."

Sorun tilted his head a bit. "'Find a way.' Tails doesn't seem very convinced a way exists. None of them do. Why so desperate to go back anyways? What's so wrong with this world?" He stood up to his full height. "Everyone's older, sure, but even though we lost twenty-five years doesn't mean our body did. We didn't move on, even if the world did. Could still make something of it."

"I don't want to , though," Sorun argued. "Had a life, people, community. Fought and bled for it. Don't want to restart, not again. I want to go back to that life. When everything was easy, when I didn't have to worry." His eyes trailed down. "I want to go back to my friends. People that are the closest I have to family anymore. I don't want to restart and lose them if there's a way I could just get them back."

He liked that life too much. More than he realized, now that it was gone. Earth may have been gone, it was a fact he'd long accepted, but he'd made something nearly equivalent in that old Mobius. He refused to cast all that work aside, to have his own sacrifices mean absolutely nothing. He didn't deserve that. Neither did Sonic, who'd lost his own children to this whole mess. He'd get it all back or die trying. Damn the consequences.

"Well, we're gonna have to find a way out of this bind first before you do anything." Sorun's eyes turned up to the shackles cuffing him to the wall. A resigned look overtook his features. "Without our abilities, or even the skills necessary to escape this, I really doubt we're gonna find a way, though."

Another grunt left Sorun, this one more agreeing. It certainly was worrying, being trapped down here in a dungeon.

"Hey, uh, Sorun? Could you... maybe not mutter to yourself like that? Really freaking us out here."

They could have at least locked them up separately.

Wordlessly, Sorun turned his head to the left. Sonic was locked up next to him in the same position he was, followed by Tails, followed by Lara-Su. They didn't seem nearly as worried about all this as he did, a fact that made Sorun confused. A bit angered, even, when he saw the small smirk on Sonic's lips.

It was the same smirk. Even after all these years, he still had that same confident, cocky smirk Sorun hated so much. Like it was ingrained in his very being.

"Seriously, are you okay?" the hedgehog asked, face growing concerned. "You're really scaring me with-"

"Fuck you, Sonic." He missed the shocked and hurt look Sonic gave him when Sorun hung his head forwards. "I have nothing to say to you."

A silent beat passed. "Sorun-" Tails began.

"Fuck you too, Tails."

"Okay, you know what!?" This aggravated response came from Lara-Su, who'd moved as far as the shackles allowed her so she could glare directly at Sorun. Despite this, the Earthling didn't so much as stir. "We've just met, and I'll admit I don't know a whole bunch about you, but for someone who Sonic claims to be a Freedom Fighter you sure don't act like one!"

" Was a Freedom Fighter. I left." Sorun's eyes glanced to the side, at Sonic. "Didn't stop me from fighting though, now, did it? Going from fighting god himself right into this mess, glad you're asking if I'm fine with all this. I'm not."

Whether out of shame or wanting to give him space, Sonic looked away. Lara-Su glared harder, only growing angrier at Sorun's words.

"I don't have a whole lotta memories from the old timeline like the rest of you do, but I know the Freedom Fighters were legends. Heroes that saved the world and put others before themselves! Nothing about you says you were ever a Freedom Fighter."

"And who are you to judge?" Now he was looking up to meet Lara-Su's gaze, even if he was rapidly becoming more and more irritated with her. "Random person like you who only ever heard stories. You weren't there. Your words are empty."

"Hey, my words have plenty meaning!" she heatedly argued. "I'm a Guardian!"

Sorun's expression grew flat. "That title means nothing to me. It means nothing to anybody not an echidna." He looked down a bit, seeing bits of a white crest pattern on her chest above the line of her shirt and jacket. He scoffed. "Knuckles filling your head with nonsense of a worthless title like that? Genes and powers - those are the only worthwhile things you got from him." He looked back up at the echidna's face, a sneer on his face. "That and bullheadedness."

Based on the look Lara-Su was giving him, she would have punched him if the shackles weren't restraining her. "You don't know what you're talking about. There's nobody among echidna more respected than the Guardians! They have the biggest responsibility of making sure our kind is safe from danger!"

Sorun laughed out loud at that. "Oh, that's rich. Things back in the OG timeline would have went real smooth if that were the case." He looked back forwards, spiteful grin still on his face as he continued speaking. "Noble Guardians? Really? Here's what they really were: a cabal of old fools that groomed their children into taking over the title." Once more, he scoffed. "Guardian. Right. They didn't even care about all echidna kind, just the ones on Angel Island. Knuckles? I think he was the only person in that whole messed up family that saw the world was bigger than this fucking island, and he was the strongest Guardian ever with his powers. But if the results he got was indicative of a Guardian's worth, then I really don't see why you aspire to be one."

"And just what's so bad about being a Guardian!?"

"Oh, nothing much. Knuckles did his best. It's not like his people were torn apart by civil war. It's not like he failed to save nine-tenths of his whole species from being wiped out. It's not like he became a mad god-tyrant that threatened the whole world. Twice." A beat passed. "Oh, wait ...!"

A low, seething breath that did nothing to calm her down left Lara-Su's mouth. "And I suppose you're so great by comparison, huh? And what have you done that makes you think you're so better than him?"

"Saved some towns. Saved the world that one time. Surprisingly my record's pretty fuckin' stellar compared to Knuckles'."

"What, and that gives you the right to make fun of all the echidna lives lost!? What if they were your own people!?"

Sorun lethargically turned his head towards Sonic. "Should you tell her or should I?"

"Would you knock it off, Sorun? Seriously," Sonic muttered out, smirk dropping and tone turning irritated. "I get the Guardian's aren't your favorite people-"

"Literally the only ones that were still left alive when I came to Mobius was Knuckles and his dad, and the whole species still almost got wiped out. Guardians didn't protect shit."

" I get it , but this isn't helping! So quit it." An uncharacteristically deep frown settled on the hedgehog's face. "Besides, you were never there for any of that, either. You're only getting all this from everything Knuckles ever told you."

Sorun rolled his eyes. "I'd point out how reliable a source of information that is along with, you know, all the dead echidna and insane cyber-psycho ones that were around, but fine. Have it your way." He sagged back against the wall, noting how the soreness in his raised arms was making him more irritable than the nearby echidna chained to the wall with him. She seemed to settle down in a huff and settled down as well, though he tried not to think too hard about her.

Maybe Sonic was right and he was being too hard on her. He wasn't an echidna; he didn't understand the cultural importance of a Guardian, or everything the title entailed. Even if from his perspective it didn't amount to much. But either way Sonic was right: this wasn't a conversation that was helping them out of this mess.

The moan Sorun heard besides him served as a reminder for just what kind of position they were in to begin with. Sonic had been pointing out how odd it was that they hadn't met up with Rotor and that other scientist he mentioned, Co-something, since they were in close proximity of the time machine when... whatever Sonic did went off, which, according to all evidence, should have meant they were left with memories of the original timeline.

Well, it became pretty clear what happened when the four of them had been locked in this dungeon room.

The walrus was shackled to the wall besides Sorun on his right side, already having been there when they'd arrived. Significantly older-looking than what Sorun remembered him as. Unlike them he was unconscious, and Sorun only needed a cursory glance over his body to tell him why. The bruises discoloring parts of his purple body. The fact his left tusk was broken in half. The long lacerations all around his body that cut through the tattered robe he wore and skin, as if he'd been struck repeatedly struck by something.

Nobody else wanted to comment on it, the Mobians on his left side were actually taking great care to avoid Rotor altogether, but Sorun saw it for what it was. Felt the rage boil through him as his irises had constricted at the sight of it. The brutalized and tormented body next to him. But what really set him off was how Sonic and Tails didn't seem overly concerned about it.

"Damn them..."

The door to the cell opened, making Sorun's and everyone else's heads snap forwards. The person that entered had been that one echidna he'd seen before when he'd snuck out of the castle - the woman. She was flanked by two more echidna guards dressed in dark uniforms, carrying those strange rifles he didn't recognize. Energy rifles of some kind, probably. Despite the dangers they posed he couldn't help but keep his eyes focused on the woman.

"You know, it's not too often we get dissenters that stir up as much trouble as you lot," she said. The longer she stood near the more and more Sorun disliked her. The haughty, superior tone in her voice, that confident smirk she wore and that damn look she was giving them. Him in particular for some reason. That "I'm better than you in every way" look, the way they were slightly closed and so unconcerned with everything. "It's gotta be so sad for you, though, Sonic. To go from being on top of the world to this lowly state. Don't know about you, but I'd say it's pretty fitting."

The look that was on Sonic's face didn't paint him as being nearly as amused as the echidna woman looked. "Hey, Lien-Da," he dryly stated, form slumping against the wall. "So you retained your memories of the other time like us, huh? How'd you pull that off?"

Sorun cocked an eyebrow in Sonic's direction. He sounded familiar with her, though he himself didn't recognize her or the name. He did see her brush a hand over something on her right arm, a strange metal band, but he didn't see the significance behind it.

"Oh, I had something special made up. Nothing you need to worry about." Her blue eyes shifted towards the side, right at Sorun. "As much as I'd love to catch up with you, I have other business to attend to. But we can get back to that later." She motioned to one of the guards besides her, who slung his rifle as he approached Sorun. "You. Boy. You're coming with us."

Confusion and a tinge of fear grew in Sorun as the echidna guard began fiddling with the energy shackles chaining Sorun to the wall. The fact Sonic had suddenly grown a worried expression didn't do much to help his nerves. "What do you want with him?" Sonic asked her. The uneasiness in his voice wasn't helping much, either.

"Who knows?" The echidna, Lien-Da, gave a shrug. "The king wanted to see him for some reason. But considering what I saw him setting up, I wouldn't count on him making it back here."

His arms finally being freed from being raised over his head was little comfort to Sorun, not after what he'd just heard. Nor was being poked in the back by a rifle held by the echidna who just released him. He honestly would have preferred to remain chained to the wall, but the look Lien-Da was giving him didn't leave room for much argument.

"Hurry up, kid, I don't got all day. Unless you think you're fast enough to dodge a photon beam going over two-hundred and ninety million meters a second at point-blank range?" The defeated slump in the teen's shoulders did enough to answer that question. He looked down, hoping she wouldn't see the submissive look on his face, but it didn't seem to do enough from the laugh he heard from her. "Yeah, that's what I thought. Come on."

Sorun couldn't help from gritting his teeth. The humiliation almost burned enough to make him forget the fear and worry for what was about to happen to him. Almost. He looked to the left, seeing both Sonic and Tails giving him worried looks. Even Lara-Su looked just about as worried as they did. Probably even more so.

Were it not for how grim the situation was looking and felt, he would have scoffed at the looks. As it was all he could manage was to slowly walk away with the three echidna. He heard the three whispering to themselves behind him, but he'd already been lead out of the room with the door snapping shut behind him before he could make out anything meaningful.

The guard behind him poked Sorun's back with the rifle again. For fear of getting a hole burned through him, he resisted the urge to try and slap the gun out of his hands, and settled for following the other two echidna marching in front of him.

There was a primal kind of fear Sorun felt as he was lead further down the dungeon by the three echidna. With all the media he'd consumed in life with similar situations, it was hard not to think about what possibly awaited him. Here, down here in this dark dungeon. Especially after he saw the state Rotor had been in.

It was probably the growing adrenaline that made him feel so wired, what was causing his breathing to quicken. His immediate desire was to try and flee down one of the corridors in the dungeon they passed, but ration told him that he wouldn't make it five feet before he got shot with a laser. Or they decided to save whatever powered the weapons and just run him down to physically restrain him. Both options were equally as viable, really, and without any of his abilities there was nothing Sorun could do in the situation.

Helplessness, dread, fear and anxiety, it was all racing through him and he hated so much that there wasn't anything he could do to stop it. That he was in this situation to begin with. Because of how wrong this timeline had gone. All of it. He hated all of it.

He tried taking his mind off of it, mainly failing to do so, by trying to examine Lien-Da as she and the guards lead him down the dungeon. He still didn't recognize her, but he saw some of the dreadlocks on her head were metal, artificial replacements. He'd wondered why those seemed familiar until he remembered Julie-Su had similar cybernetics, and just thinking that word made him wonder if she had been a part of that Dark Legion. Probably why Sonic had recognized her; he'd never actually encountered them himself, unlike him and the other Freedom Fighters. He couldn't help but be unsettled further by those thoughts, seeing as how unhinged everyone had always made them sound.

But what really drew his attention was the weapon clipped to her belt. The black, leather whip. The same kind of weapon that would leave marks like the ones he'd seen on Rotor. Those long, straight gashes.

"I honestly don't know why King Shadow is so interested in you. Or anything relating to you for that matter," Lien-Da said as they continued making their way through the halls. "As far as I could see you were pretty unremarkable even in the other timeline."

"... So you know me?" Sorun quietly asked, his voice barely above a murmur.

"I knew of you. Not much. Eggman had some info about you in a database I read, back when I and the Legion worked with him during 'that' time. And I knew further down the line the Republic and a whole bunch of other parties spent a lot of resources trying to save you from something relating to the Master Emerald. Not much beyond that." She turned her head to look at him as they continued walking, an inquisitive look on her face. "I can't for the life of me figure out why so many people would go to so much trouble just for some nobody like you, though."

With how he felt, Sorun couldn't even muster up the will to sigh at the degrading remark. He did, for some reason, feel the need to probe further. "If I'm such a forgettable person, why tell your king about me?"

"Oh, King Shadow doesn't have any memories of the other timeline, like most other people. I had to fill him in on some things. He's real worried anybody with original memories are going to try to do something to disrupt his rule, so he wants you all taken off the board. That's usually the fate that awaits all his enemies." That cruel grin returned to her face as she turned back forwards while giving a shrug. "Really you seem like such a low-level threat I never would have bothered, but he wants every single person who even knows about that timeline not under him to be eliminated, so what can you do?" Her head picked up. "Oh! here we are."

They arrived to the door of a room, not unlike a door that lead to one of the cells in this place. Lien-Da had opened the door and guided them in, with one of the guards shoving Sorun inside with his rifle. The inside of the room, oddly, was cleaner than most of the other rooms he'd seen in this dungeon, and there were computers and bits of electronic equipment scattered all around. Even the lighting was brighter.

But what really drew his attention was the thing in the center of the room. A metal table, like the kind they would strap someone down in at the dentist's office. It was fitted with leather straps more than likely used to restrain someone and, even more worryingly, wires and electrodes, though Sorun couldn't tell their purpose.

At the behest of the guard behind him, who seemed to only be capable of communicating by jabbing Sorun with his gun, he'd climbed onto the table. Lien-Da was the one who began strapping him secure to the table in addition to attaching various electrodes on his body. She maintained that cruel smirk of hers the entire time.

"You know, publicly speaking our government's not supposed to do things like this, but the great thing about being part of King Shadow's illegitimate enforcers is that we don't have to worry about things like that. Not that he even needs to bother; not like there'd be any use in anyone protesting." She tightened a strap around his wrist particularly tightly and gave it a mocking pat. Sorun stared. "But I mean, hey, I'm not complaining about how much creative freedom we get over interrogating criminals."

"'Creative freedom,'" Sorun repeated under his breath. "Is that what you call what you did to Rotor? Torturing him like that?"

"Calling a few lashes torture. Pfft. I had way worse growing up and training in the Dark Legion, and you don't see me crying about it.

Besides, King Shadow did way worse to him than I did," Lien-Da said with a dismissive roll of her eyes. "At any rate, you should be thankful. Death by electrocution is one of the more merciful deaths criminals get around here." She tightened the last strap around his leg and then fully faced Sorun. "Then again I hear the engineers crank down the voltage on these things so it takes a few minutes to fry completely to death, but I'm not gonna tell people how to do their jobs."

Unconsciously Sorun's limbs fought against the restraints. He managed to keep a straight face, but he wasn't able to stop himself from shaking. Or even to look up at Lien-Da's face, who seemed to grow an even bigger grin when she saw his quavering body.

"That's enough."

The voice. It was one Sorun recognized, enough that he'd stopped his shaking, though the sensation of dread he felt didn't dissipate when he knew who the voice belonged to. And even then there was something wrong with it. The tone it was spoken in, the way the words came out. Like recognizing the sound itself but not the speaker.

Immediately the three echidna had formed a line and turned towards the voice, standing at attention. Following this Sorun heard footsteps - heavy, like metal striking the floor with each step. Being strapped to a table left little room for Sorun to move his head to look, though this proved unnecessary as the owner of the voice had stepped into his view.

For all appearances, outside of the golden crown and the red cape, this Shadow looked the exact same as the one Sorun knew. Not a hint of aging to be found on him, unlike everyone else he'd met so far. But when his eyes had turned to Sorun, he'd frozen in his restraints completely. Multiple emotions, contempt and rage and hatred, all played over his face and eyes, only adding to Sorun's confusion. There was nothing but pure hostility in his eyes, all directed at Sorun. Why? Why all that hate, when he'd never met this version? Was it just because he had knowledge of the original timeline, and that alone was enough for King Shadow to feel threatened? That alone?

He was severely overestimating Sorun if that were really the case, but the human himself wasn't able to voice this out of fear for the gaze that was burning into him. It was an even more intense glare than the one the other Shadow had given him when they'd first met.

"... You haven't aged a day." Of all the words Sorun expected the black and red hedgehog to say, that hadn't been them. He made a puzzled expression as a result. "Do you remember me?" King Shadow asked. They were words less said and more growled out, and were it not for the restraints Sorun would have shrank back further against the table were it possible. "Well?"

"I... only knew the other you. F-from before," Sorun answered in a small voice, blue eyes darting away from the crimson eyes staring at him.

"No. We've met."

More confusion. Uncertainty. That statement didn't make sense to Sorun. "Wha-" he began, though only got that far before one of Shadow's gloved hands grabbed at Sorun's face and forcefully positioned it so that he was staring at King Shadow's face. He'd gasped out in panic and squirmed harder in the restraints, but had to stop when King Shadow painfully squeezed down on Sorun's face as a result of his struggling. Mercifully, he'd relaxed his grip when Sorun stopped struggling, though he still kept a firm grip on him and forced the two to maintain eye contact.

"You remember me," King Shadow claimed. "Decades ago. Above the sky at Space Colony ARK. You disrupted the plans I had for this world."

"What? I 'ever-" Sorun's face was released mid-sentence by King Shadow. He'd winced in response at the sudden release, and then managed to speak out normally without the hand disrupting his speech. "I don't know what you're talking about."

For whatever reason, King Shadow's glower only increased. "You stole two of the Chaos Emeralds from the main weapon. You attempted to cripple me. You twisted my limbs and ground all of my bones to dust. It took me hours to regenerate from the wounds I sustained because of you!"

Maybe it was the confusion masking the terror Sorun felt. Or, strangely enough, seeing a familiar face despite the fact it wasn't friendly. Acceptance for his situation slowly setting in. Whatever it was, somehow Sorun found enough will to tell King Shadow plainly, "I honestly have no clue what you're talking about. We've never met before this point." He'd even managed to do it without stuttering.

"..." Miraculously, the intense glare King Shadow held settled into a heavy scowl. He regarded Sorun for what seemed like whole minutes, silent and unmoving while the three echidna on the side continued to stand at attention. He found something in Sorun's face, though he personally wasn't sure of what, and then he finally turned to the three echidna. "I'm overseeing to this execution personally," he told them. "Leave. Now."

Sorun heard a series of "Yes, your grace" from the three echidna, followed by their footsteps departing the room. King Shadow only shifted his gaze back to Sorun once the door had closed, leaving the two of them alone in the room. The half-Mobian's expression, oddly enough, had changed. Still angered, but it was much more subdued compared to what it had been a minute prior. More... confused. Or solemn. Sorun wasn't completely sure. He wasn't sure of much except for how peculiar the situation had become.

"I was never much one for public executions. Necessary at times, in matters for 'moralizing' the masses, but I always found the simpler and expedient solution was more often than not the best one." King Shadow turned around and began slowly walking towards a nearby computer console. Sorun saw there were wires connecting it to the table he was strapped to. "One memory that sticks out to me is during the time I was wrestling control of the world away from that infuriating Robotnik. I'd planned on beheading him in front of as many broadcast cameras as I could fit in a room, but he'd escaped my grasp a day before his execution. When I caught him the second time I decided to just plunge a Chaos Spear through his heart and save myself the trouble. As it turned out people were just as satisfied to see a corpse anyways."

He began typing away at the console. Sorun began fidgeting in the restraints again when he heard electrical sparking sounds.

"I suppose at this points it's just habit for me," King Shadow continued. "It's simpler just to remove things that don't belong. Easier. And the world was always better for it. I don't see why this should be any different."

There was a quiet, yet audible whirring sound that reached Sorun's ears. Like the sound of some electrical device beginning to charge up. Sorun began struggling harder in his restraints, a small, uncontrollable whimper leaving him when he saw blue spark jumping out from the cables. "No, no no no please don't please I don't want it stop it stop it pleae-!"

In an instant, King Shadow was at Sorun's side. And then, bizarrely, he'd reached out and grabbed at the electrodes that were strapped to Sorun's body. The diodes that had been taped to his arms, the coat's sleeves having been rolled up, the ones on his chest underneath his clothes and the ones clamped to his head. Even more bizarrely was that King Shadow removed them all, and quickly at that. Thankfully quickly enough, as it was when he set down the last electrode on the table and removed his hand they all began sparking.

Sorun's body automatically flinched when it happen. Small streams of blue electricity were being spit out of the electrodes, and the voltage was enough that they were jumping around on the metal table. Thankfully, he himself was untouched from it due to their removal. It wasn't what he'd expected to happen. Not the electrical torture he hadn't been prepared for followed by death. Just... him sitting there on the table, completely confused as he shifted between looking at the dancing electrodes and King Shadow, who was staring down at him with an unreadable expression.

Without making a sound, King Shadow turned around and walked back to the console. After a few keystrokes the electricity was cut off: the whirring sound disappeared and the electrodes stopping jumping around and spitting electricity. Not missing a beat, he'd turned towards the door to the room, walked to it, and exited the room while swiftly closing the door behind him. As Sorun laid there, catching his breath in heavy heaves, he managed to make out muffled voices beyond the walls, though he wasn't able to make much out. There was then the sound of departing footsteps, and he'd thought that'd been the end to whatever was happening until the door opened again. King Shadow stepped back in, once more closing the door behind him, and Sorun found himself growing still.

"It's a shame the person that set this device up miscalculated how much electricity a member of your species can withstand compared to a Mobian," King Shadow said, his voice breaking the tense silence. "I was so looking forwards to seeing you suffer a painful death for the humiliation you handed me, but much to my consternation you died instantly once the power kicked on. Lien-Da seemed equally as disappointed and went to go confront the engineer at my order. I imagine he won't live to see tomorrow morning as a result of his blunder."

"... You're... not killing me after all...?" a quiet Sorun asked, the faintest bit of hope in his voice. Those hopes were dashed when King Shadow shook his head.

"That's not what's happening." Slowly, he began walking towards Sorun's table. "The memory of what you did to me aboard the ARK haunted me for years, you know. Those Chaos Arms bending and twisting me in impossible positions. I'd never felt such excruciating physical pain, and never have since." He stopped besides Sorun, eyes boring down into his own. "When I was informed of your capture, I wanted to do the same to you. To break your body like you did mine. To beat your head until it was nothing but mush like I did that meddlesome scientist when he refused to answer my questions. Cobor, I believe his name was."

The name rang familiar to Sorun's ears. The other scientist that had been working with Rotor on the time machine, that had been his name. He remembered Sonic wondering why he hadn't been down there with them and Rotor. He supposed he knew now, and the knowledge made Sorun loudly gulp as a result. "So, uh... s-so what's happening now?" he stuttered out in question.

"What's happening now is I have an image to maintain as king. Showing mercy is a sign of weakness. But you dying to the incompetence of a single engineer is a completely different matter entirely." King Shadow glanced to the side. "I'd call it a shame if the man weren't so replaceable, but still, he did... somewhat admirable work. I'll have to remember to have someone draft a letter to his wife and child commemorating his service to me." He looked back down at Sorun. "But don't get any ideas. You're not leaving this room alive."

A bit of disbelief mixed into Sorun's expression. "You're killing someone off just because you don't want to torture me to death? Even though you actually do?" It sounded like sheer lunacy to him, causing Sorun to shake his head. "What the hell kind of illogic even is that?"

There wasn't a single facet of any of this that made sense to Sorun. He couldn't figure out King Shadow's actions, nor even the words he spoke. Why he was speaking as if they knew each other when the two of them had never spoken before today. The mention of "Chaos Arms", something that sounded vaguely like his Bringer Claws, made some uneasiness stir in Sorun, but that was still impossible. There was no way he could know about that power.

None of this made sense.

"I have my reasons," King Shadow stated in response to Sorun's question.

"Your reasons," the teen repeated. "Okay, then do you maybe mind divulging these so-called 'reasons' to me? I'm dying anyways, thanks to you no less. It's the least you owe me."

Indignation crossed over King Shadow's face, causing Sorun to clamp his mouth shut and question why he'd suddenly grown so lippy to the man holding his life in his hands. Thankfully, the king had let out a small, almost imperceivable sigh before addressing Sorun.

"... You could say it's out of thanks."

"Are you being for real right now?" That's what Sorun wanted to say. He didn't out of fear of retribution, so instead he said, "I don't understand."

"I made a promise to somebody once, long ago. To protect this world. Back then, twenty-five years ago, when I'd just been awoken from cryostasis I'd been... admittedly volatile. Angry. Something very dear to me had been taken away and I wanted nothing more than watch the entire world burn for what it had done. So I set out to do exactly that."

"The orbital cannon," Sorun suddenly realized. "The one on the ARK. You told me about it once."

"Is that so?" King Shadow's eyes narrowed at Sorun. There was confusion and some other emotion in his look that Sorun couldn't identify. "But yes, the cannon. My plan was to use it to destroy the entire planet. But then you stopped me and absconded with two of the Chaos Emeralds needed to power the cannon, permanently thwarting my efforts." He turned around, leaning against the table while crossing his arms. Sorun just stared on. "I never heard of you again until today."

None of this rang a bell in Sorun's memories. "And... you're sure this was me, 'cause-"

"I remember perfectly well your face and voice. Even the coat. You wore this exact coat that day." He glanced down to eye the blue coat Sorun wore, the helix designs on the coat's breasts and sleeves. "I would never forget something so distinctive."

Well, that clinched it even further. King Shadow was right: the coat was too distinctive. And Sorun had it on good authority he should be the only person around with it. It still didn't satisfy any of the questions that were zipping through his head, such as what King Shadow was even talking about and why Sorun had no recollection of a single word he was saying. And though he tried, he couldn't come up with any reasonable explanation for what he was hearing.

"It was because you rendered the orbital cannon inoperable by stealing two of the seven Chaos Emeralds needed to power it that I'm thanking you," King Shadow continued. "I had some time to think following that... encounter of ours, up there and aboard the space station. I came back down to Mobius afterwards, to truly look around and see just what was so special about this planet." From how much of King Shadow's face Sorun could see from this angle, he saw it wrinkle in frustration, like he'd been exposed to something sickening. "It was utter madness - an entire world at war with itself. A madman vying for world domination and destroying everything in his way, a deranged empress in the eastern lands attacking the villages and settlements and empowering the clans of bandits, a kingdom of Mobians in disarray, an oppressive Overlander government, the echidna of this island tearing themselves apart in civil war, villains and miscreants left and right plotting and planning inane schemes, it was, it was..."

He looked so angry and upset Sorun wouldn't have been surprised if King Shadow began shouting right there. He managed to calm himself down, though, taking in a deep breath and taking a second to compose himself. It was after he shook his head that the king continued speaking.

"Insanity. This entire world was besieged by insanity," he told Sorun. "So I decided to do what I promised to do. I was going to save this world." He rose his right hand up, greenish energy swirling between his fingers briefly. "And as it happened I had the power to make this desire a reality. I made this world my own, battle after battle and conquest after conquest. There wasn't really anybody alive who could match me, though some certainly tried. They died. I subjugated and destroyed everything in my way until this entire world was mine."

"I can understand the intention behind wanting to take over the world for good intentions, but this is coming from the same guy who openly admitted to me that he just offed some innocent engineer. Along with all the other shady stuff I've seen around..." Sorun pointed out.

"Yes, you wouldn't be the first one to criticize some of my policies. And it seems no matter how many times I stomp these protestors out more always rise up out of the woodwork," King Shadow grumbled out. "People always seem so quick to judge how I rule but forget all the good that I've done for the planet as a result. The world is unified under my rule. The death tolls of the past ten years are a fraction of what they were during those days of madness. Nobody dies of hunger and medical technology was distributed to every corner of the globe. Pollution caused by Robotnik's ambitions was eliminated and measures were taken to ensure similar damage was never done to the environment ever again. Crime is nearly nonexistent. People are free to live their lives as they see fit as long as they follow my laws. What exactly is so wrong with this world that you don't agree with what I've done to save it?"

"Yeah, sure, all that stuff sounds fine. Except for the people you're torturing and killing in a castle dungeon to maintain that status quo," Sorun rebuked. "What about their lives? Are they just not good enough to live in your world?"

At hearing that, King Shadow turned around so they the two could face each other once again. "I do what is necessary so that the good I've done for this world is not undone. If people take umbrage to that, then that is their problem. They're free to disagree in the privacy of their own homes. But actions against the status quo will not be tolerated. I will not allow even the smallest risk of disrupting my world order to persist," he said to Sorun. "If a single person must die so that a hundred others can live in peace, then it is a worthwhile sacrifice." His eyes narrowed at Sorun. "Do you believe differently? Would you truly kill a hundred people just so that one would live?"

"Yes. I would."

It hadn't been the answer King Shadow was expecting. That much was obvious from the way the anger on his features melted into confusion, uncertainty. Like he couldn't comprehend the answer he'd been given. He'd looked down a bit, as if he were attempting to think over the answer and puzzle it out, but in the end he'd just lifted his eyes back up to Sorun's with that same confused look that betrayed how he couldn't understand.

"How can you even justify such an answer?" King Shadow demanded, halfway between confused and angered.

"How are the lives of a hundred people more valuable than a single person's life?" Sorun asked back, voice completely even and serious. "Because there's more of them? Is that it? Is the fact every life is unique and unquantifiable not taken into consideration?"

King Shadow shook his head. "What does that even matter? Of course lives are precious, but so are the ones connected to those lives. Killing one person as opposed to a hundred causes less pain overall for every person connected to those one-hundred and one lives. It's the lesser of evils. It's just."

"It's just because you say it's just. King." A scoff came from Sorun, and his head rolled to the side. "There's an adage where I'm from, about six people tied to train tracks with a train bearing down on them. Five tied to one track the train's heading for, one tied to another track. You have the option of pulling a lever to divert the train to the other track." Sorun rolled his head back so his eyes met with King Shadow's. "You're the kind of person that would pull the lever and kill one person. I'm the kind of person that would let the train kill five people. I'm afraid it really is just that simple."

They stared at each other for a long while. Blue and red eyes staring at each other, unblinking. Sorun tried thinking over King Shadow's words, but no matter how many times he replayed the voice he just couldn't see the sense in it. How killing ordinary civilians was a "necessary act" even if it meant others got to live in peace. The reasoning behind it just wouldn't click for him, and he found himself hating even the very idea. And it seemed, from the expressions flashing over King Shadow's face, he was reaching the same conclusion as Sorun. They broke eye contact, King Shadow stepping away while Sorun remained in place, strapped to the table.

"It seems we can't come to an agreement on this," King Shadow admitted after a long moment of silence. "But nevertheless, you're wrong. I only need to look out a window and see the world I've created to know it. Your way is nothing but insanity."

"I'm the sanest person on this whole island. You're the crazy person killing random people in a torture dungeon." Sorun's own glare intensified. "Killing that scientist, Cobor. Torturing Rotor, executing me, probably planning to execute Sonic, Tails, and Lara-Su, too. Just because we all know about the original timeline. Where the fuck is the sense in any of that?"

King Shadow's face wrinkled in displeasure. "Come, now, you're better than using crass language like that," he chided. Were it not for the anger Sorun felt he actually would have felt amused at that tone he'd taken with him. "Sorun... was the name Lien-Da gave to me," he continued, tone turning back to his serious, grave way of speaking. "I told you that not even the smallest threat to my world order cannot be allowed to persist. I can't have people with knowledge of another time, with another way of living that ignorant people would perceive as a better way of life than this one, running around. And I can't have people like that blue hedgehog try and stage some kind of coup to usurp me as king just for him to undo all my work and the good I've done in an attempt to change things back to the way they were in his time. And I certainly can't have scientists with working knowledge of time travel exist." He shook his head. "The old echidna scientist died because he wouldn't talk no matter how many times I beat my questions into his skull, and serves as an example to the walrus. He's been... stubbornly resistant to my attempt at extracting information, but I've cracked worse. The others will tell me all they know, whether they want to or not, and then they'll be summarily executed. Lien-Da can fill in the rest with her knowledge, and once she's outlived her usefulness in this matter I'll dispose of her, too."

"So that's it? You'll even kill people loyal to you because you're that paranoid over your rule being disrupted?" Sorun asked in disbelief. "Even Knuckles? Your big chief enforcer? The guy whose face is plastered everywhere?"

King Shadow waved a hand. "It's a regrettable loss, but a necessary one. It would have been quiet, but his daughter just had to get wrapped up in this, too. I'll need to dispose of his wife as well for her connection; that entire family is just too much of a risk. But everyone else will get to live on happily in honor of their sacrifices. That is all the justification I need, Sorun."

Sorun's eyes narrowed, and then closed. Something that sounded like disappointment left him. "It's not sacrifice if you don't give them the choice."

The look King Shadow gave him was the equivalent of an invisible shrug. "It's as you said. I'm king. My word is law, and the power to dictate what is right and wrong lies with me."

"So that's how it is..." With a resigned sigh, Sorun allowed his head to thunk back against the table as he opened his eyes up at the ceiling. "So what about me? Why all this? Why bother with the words when I'm dead anyways?" He couldn't figure out why King Shadow would have any reason to bother with any of this, unless he really was just that bereft of entertainment. And even then it didn't explain why he wasn't being slowly shocked to death.

"Right. You." Sorun found himself blinking in surprise. King Shadow's voice had gone quieter. "Certain details were shared to me by Lien-Da. What the previous world was like, what that version of me did." There was a small clacking sound, like teeth gnashing together. "Why that version of me chose to throw his lot in with those insolent soldiers at G.U.N..." he growled out, sounding more angered than Sorun had heard him since entering this room. It was surprising enough that Sorun had lifted his head back up to see King Shadow, but by then he'd already taken a calming breath. He looked back at Sorun, saying, "According to her you, for whatever reason, were trapped inside of the Master Emerald and that various governments and organizations tried to find a solution for removing you. Is this correct?"

"It was a bit more complicated than that, but yeah," Sorun answered.

"Including G.U.N.?" he pressed, to which Sorun nodded. "Why?"

"Well... you asked them, from what I was told. The other you," Sorun clarified. "You had a lot of pull with them, being their top agent and all."

King Shadow closed his eyes, and then let out a small breath. "I see." He opened his eyes back up to look at Sorun. "And what were we? In that time? What significance did you and I hold towards each other?"

For some reason he didn't sound nearly as demanding as he was with the rest of his questions. It almost sounded to Sorun like King Shadow was simply just asking him. He couldn't fathom why this was, but lacking a reason to refuse him, even out of spite, he decided to answer.

"We were friends," Sorun honestly answered. "That's the only reason."

"..." The mouth on King Shadow's tan muzzle thinned. He looked down again, silently contemplating something as he thought Sorun's words over. Sorun saw his shoulders fall slightly. "I think I can see why, hearing you speak," he said, looking back up at Sorun. "You. Those words, some of them at least. Your species, your... your eyes."

Sorun made an odd expression. "I... don't understand."

"You just remind me of someone. Maybe that's why." Without elaborating any further he stepped back to Sorun's table. Sorun felt his heartrate pick back up when King Shadow began to reattach the electrodes. "It's because of that and out of thanks for preventing me from destroying the planet in my blind rage that I'm offering you mercy. As well as... recognition, for the relationship we shared." The final electrodes were clamped back onto his head, prompting the half-Mobian to turn around and make his way back to the console connected to the table. "I'm modifying the amperage on the device," he explained, his fingers running against the console. "You'll be struck with a high enough voltage that you won't even realize what's happened. Death will be instantaneous. Painless."

"I'm not feeling very gracious." Sorun's eyes glanced down at the wires connected to the table when he heard a small, whirring sound.

"I suppose you'll have to live with that with what little time you have left." King Shadow stepped away from the console and began making his way to the doorway. He stopped right next to Sorun's table, his eyes glancing down at the human one last time. "I don't expect you to understand, but everything I do is for the sake of the entire world. I've done too much good for it all to be undone." He turned his head back forwards. "Goodbye, Sorun."

Without any further words passing between them, King Shadow walked out of Sorun's field of view. He heard the door to the room open, and then close, followed by the muffled sound of a single pair of heavy footsteps disappearing down the hallway.

Sighing, Sorun laid his head back on the table. Slowly but steadily the whirring sound from the wires and nearby capacitors was growing louder. He didn't know precisely how much time he had until they were fully charged, but he didn't imagine it would be long until all that electricity got discharged into him. Escape would have been ideal, but he didn't have a way of accomplishing that.

"Well, this fucking sucks," Sorun morosely thought. He felt grief and sadness eat away at him as, once again, it seemed like he was going to die. "I got this far just to go out like this. 'Least I won't feel anything, but... yeah, that's not really that big a comfort. Goddam-"

A new sound tore Sorun from his thoughts and caused him to look towards it. There'd been a small, rattling sound that came from a nearby ventilation grate on the ceiling. It rattled a few more times, and then a sound like something striking the gate was heard. It fell away from the ceiling, clattering on the ground below, and from the resulting hole in the ceiling a head popped out upside-down, looking down towards Sorun.

Sorun was pretty certain he'd never been so relieved to see Tails' face ever before. With all the emotions he'd been subjected to today he wasn't so sure what to feel about that.

"Sorun! Hey!" A smile spread over the upside-down fox's face, and a hand extended from the vent hole and waved at him. Sorun stared at him dumbfounded, losing the capacity to speak momentarily as the Mobian dropped out of the vent. "Hold on just a second, alright? I'll get you out of there as quick as I can!"

"Uh... sure, yeah..." Sorun mumbled out, not managing to say much else as he saw the fox dart towards the console connected to the table. He still heard the nearby capacitors whirring louder and louder - much louder than they had been the first time around when they'd went off while detached from Sorun - and the copious amount of blue sparks flying out from the cables and wires wasn't doing anything to calm his nerves. He actually began to feel his hair stand up on end and was beginning to fear that Tails was being too slow and that'd he'd end up dying. Again.

But, in the end, it seemed those fears were unfounded. There was a loud clunk! sound, followed by the whirring sound abruptly quieting down to nothing while at the same time the blue sparks died off. A massive sigh of relief came from Sorun, who quickly was growing sick and tired from brushing so close to death so repeatedly.

And then the anger began setting in. Anger at Lien-Da for everything she did and that haughty expression she wore and that sadistic smile. Anger at King Shadow and every single thing about him. Anger at Sonic, anger at himself for being too weak to do anything and having to be saved again , anger at this whole situation.

"Hey, Sorun, it's alright. You're safe now." The words barely reached Sorun's ears as Tails stepped besides him and began undoing his restraints, though he did feel another spike of intense anger at that patronizing voice he had used on him. He couldn't manage to focus on Tails, though, more focused on the mirror image of himself sitting on top of a nearby metal box bolted to the wall, legs swinging freely as the two Soruns looked at one another.

"Okay, great, se we live to see another day," the Sorun across the room demurred, resting his head against a closed fist with the elbow leaning on his leg. "Do we actually have a plan, though, or are we just winging it again?"

There was a question he wished he had an answer to. "I don't know. Let's just see what happens and we'll go from there," Sorun muttered in response. He felt Tails stop undoing the restraints momentarily, and he glanced at the fox to see him giving Sorun an odd look. Whatever had given him pause seemed to wear off, though, as he then resumed freeing Sorun while also removing the electrodes. A few seconds later, and he was completely free of the table.

"Alright, there we are." After freeing him, Tails had reached forwards and gently gripped one of Sorun's arms to help him sit up. His voice had taken on a soothing tone. Sorun wanted to punch him for it. "It's alri-"

"Don't fucking touch me." Barely suppressing a snarl, Sorun tore his arm out of the shocked fox's grasp, barely avoiding lashing out at him. He turned his back towards him, head bowed towards the ground with teeth clenched out of indignation. Humiliation for having to be saved, for everything that had gone on so far today. Those sounds, those damn pitiful sounds he'd made in front of King Shadow when he thought he was going to be shocked. The squirming.

Goddammit, he hated all of it.

Tails, who'd recoiled his arm in shock, slowly lowered it. His expression turned into a scowl. "Sorun, do you really have to use those kinds of words?" he asked, sounding partly uncomfortable and partly irritated.

"Fuck you, you're an adult now, I can say whatever the fuck I want." A beat passed as Sorun stared down at the floor. "How'd you get out?"

"Knuckles came and freed us," Tails explained, causing Sorun to feel some surprise. "When we got out I got into the castle's systems, managed to reroute most of the guards. I found out from there where they took you so I came to get you out." There was a shuffling sound as Tails crossed his arms. "You're welcome, by the way."

Even after hearing that Sorun didn't thank him. "So Knuckles just changed his mind or what? Thought you said he wasn't helping out," he muttered out.

"He had his own plan."

"And that plan involved us getting arrested and me almost dying, huh?"

"He didn't want to arouse suspicion, and seeing as we're all free and you're fine I don't see why you're complaining."

Sorun made a scoff. "Yeah, well... I'm still punching him when I see him."

He heard a small, disappointed sigh from behind him. "Sorun," Tails began, admonishing, "I know you're stressed out over everything, but attacking our friends isn't gonna solve anything."

"I'm still a bit salty over the whole Enerjak thing. I'm owed one solid hit." His hands gripped the edge of the table, and Sorun pushed off it so that he was finally standing up. He rotated his arms a bit, and then made a small sigh as he turned to meet Tails' face. He saw him staring intently at him. "Still, uh... yeah, sorry. Thanks," he mumbled, glancing away so he didn't have to meet Tails' eyes. He felt that just maybe he should have been a bit more concerned over himself that he only recognized the gratitude he felt for being saved far after that fact, but he managed to shake it off quickly enough. There were more important things he wanted to focus on. "I found out what happened to that Cobor guy Sonic was talking about. Sha... the king beat him to death."

Tails flinched, heavily. He glanced down, ears flattened halfway and a weary breath leaving him. "Yeah. Knuckles told us," he said in a somber tone. "His daughter went to go take Rotor to the nearest hospital for his... you know, the injuries. She said she'd come and help right after."

Sorun made a small nod. "Alright, so what are we doing? What's the plan?" he asked him.

"Well... I think it goes without saying that we need to get King Shadow off the throne," Tails said to him. "I know you weren't, well... there during that time, but Sonic and I have the memories to compare how things are here compared to how they are then, and we're in agreement that what Shadow's doing is wrong."

A troubled hum left Sorun. They decided to throw a coup, right in the middle of this? Sorun didn't want a coup or a change in government; he wanted things to go back to normal. He almost said as much to Tails until he remembered King Shadow's words, and how desperate he was to make sure he remained in power and would retaliate against all threats against the world order he created.

In the end, Sorun held his tongue. If he, or any of them, wanted to have any chance at doing anything at all, he needed to be dealt with first and foremost. They wouldn't get anything done with King Shadow hounding their every footstep, and Sorun didn't like his odds of outlasting the immortal, super-powered Mobian.

"Okay..." he agreed in a careful tone, "so how are we going to go about doing that?"

"Well, Sonic already went to go confront King Shadow. They're probably fighting right now as we're speaking," Tails informed him. "I'd like to say Sonic's got this in the bag, but, well..." He frowned a bit. "Shadow's Shadow, and Sonic, he's... he isn't really in his prime anymore. I can't help him fight, but you..."

"Yeah, sure, if I had my powers, but I don't," Sorun expressed with a shake of his head. "So unless you're carrying around a Chaos Emerald or two we're sunk."

For some reason, Tails smirked. "Funny you should say that," he said, and then reached down towards the toolbelt strapped to his waist. Sorun watched the movements with a curious eye, blinking in confusion when he saw Tails open a small, square pouch on the belt. He was about to ask what Tails was doing until he pulled it out.

Sorun stared, wide-eyed, at the blue, glowing gem that was held in Tails' hand. The blue Chaos Emerald. So similar to the one he was accustomed to in the other timeline it may as well have been the same one. He couldn't help but adopt a dumbfounded expression, while Tails held a cheeky smile at seeing Sorun's reaction. "..." Blinking a couple more times, Sorun looked down from the Emerald and at the pouch on Tails' belt. "Dude, how the hell did you even fit that in there?" he asked, noting how the pouch itself was smaller than the large gem Tails was holding. It hadn't even looked deformed in the slightest from holding such a large item.

"Oh, uh... it's bigger on the inside." At Sorun's blank stare, Tails was forced to elaborate. "I invented it a few years ago." Suddenly looking abashed, he turned his head away from Sorun. "Mostly 'cause Mina kept telling me the garage was too cluttered. I kept trying to tell her it was fine, but the kids kept getting into things, so... yeah."

"Of course you managed to figure out hammerspace and- wait, Mina?" Sorun did a double-take on Tails. "Li-like the singer? Her? You ended up marrying her ?"

"U-um, yeah. She's my wife," Tails confirmed. He made a sheepish laugh, a small blush creeping across his face. "It's actually a long story since-"

"But-but what about her and Ash!? Last time I saw them they looked like they were in a really steady relationsh... you know what, I don't really care." He shook his head to take his attention off of the topic and then began reaching towards the Chaos Emerald Tails held. "Whatever, good for you, gimme that."

Sorun's intention had been to take the Chaos Emerald and use it to manifest one of his powers. Which one he hadn't decided on, maybe Yamato, but the allure of the Emerald and its power had been so tempting that he hadn't even thought that far ahead before reaching forwards to take it from Tails.

But then Tails pulled the Emerald away before Sorun's fingers could brush up against it.

"..." After a long, slow blink, Sorun's eyes slowly traveled back to the Emerald, which was being held away from Sorun by Tails. He almost thought the fox was playing a joke on him first until he saw the serious look in his eyes. "Tails, give it."

"I can't yet," Tails said to him. "We have to irradiate you first."

"..." Sorun's arm fell slack at his side as he regarded Tails with a dumbfounded expression. "I'm sorry, what?"

"I know what happened to you while inside the Master Emerald. At least I managed to piece the important bits together," Tails murmured, looking down and cupping his chin with one hand while the other one ran its fingers over the blue gem. "When it comes to Chaos energy it's an entirely unique cosmic force separate from time. Er, well, technically speaking entropy, but same thing regardless. Chaos Emeralds are completely immune to the effects of time, and the Master Emerald is pretty much just a giant, more powerful Chaos Emerald, which is why you were essentially 'frozen' in time when you got put in there. It's probably why you weren't affected by the chronal shift when the timeline was altered - it managed to protect you since you were inside the thing - but the shock must have caused some reaction that affected your own chronological clock as well as ejecting you from-"

Sighing out loudly, Sorun held a hand up to stop Tails mid-sentence. "For god's sake stop the technobabble and give me the barebones answer."

Both of Tails' arms dropped and he gave Sorun a flat look. "The Master Emerald de-aged you. From the looks of it not much, probably just a few months, six at most, which is how your injuries disappeared."

"Was that so hard?" Well, at least that question was answered. Explained the hair at least - he'd have to grow it out again, he'd liked having it reach past his chin - but it was still nice knowing that- "Wait, hold on." Sorun's eyes suddenly widened in realization. "Oh, fuck, it didn't rewind me so far back I lost my ability to touch Chaos Emeralds without absorbing them, did it? I need that!"

Based on the look Tails was giving him, that was most likely the case. The shortened hair lead credence to that fact, and when he thought back to that day that they opened the portal and saw Earth, he recalled his hair having a longer length than this. Probably. The more he thought on it the less certain he actually was with that particular detail.

"I'm... actually not so sure," Tails admitted to him. "We could have you test it out by touching this one, but-"

"But if I did lose it I'll be stuck with it and out twelve years," Sorun finished with a resigned sigh. That was a serious problem. A permanent power would be nice, but he couldn't swap them out as opposed to just using an Emerald. And he wasn't too keen on shaving years off again, either. Suddenly his eyes held a lot more trepidation as he eyed the Emerald in the Mobian's hand. "So what was that you were saying about irradiating me?" he asked.

"Well, if you need to get that ability back if you did lose it, then we just need to repeat the circumstances that gave you those powers to begin with, don't we?" Tails asked him. "So we just need to give you a heavy dose of radiation. Aaaand, as it happens King Shadow hoards a lot of weapons and artifacts and keeps them in vaults inside the castle dungeon. And as it just so happens I found out where he's keeping a cache of old Overlander nuclear warheads down here," he finished, a small, proud smirk spreading over his face. "I just gotta disassemble one to get to the plutonium core."

Sorun, by contrast, didn't have so much as a hint of a smirk on his face. "Do you even know how to do that?"

Tails actually managed to look insulted by the question. "Sorun, I could build a nuke if I wanted to. Not that I ever would," he hastily added, "but I could." He gestured to his belt full of pouches. "Plus I got a whole workshop's worth of tools with me, so it shouldn't be any trouble."

"Well, when you put it like that..."

It was only after spending an extended period of time alone with this older Tails did Sorun realize how different he was. Watching him skulk down hallways with Sorun close behind in tow, the way he exuded sheer confidence when he tore apart a bunch of wall consoles to hack through any doors in their way, the lack of pause. The determination in his steps.

Hell, even his voice kept catching Sorun off guard. The way it sounded so similar to what he was accustomed to, but more mature now. The boy was a man now. A family man at that, which made Sorun feel twice as awkward since he hadn't grown up along with everyone else. If anything he'd actually gone backwards, physically at least. And now he felt like the kid. It was almost insulting, like the universe was playing yet another cruel joke on him amid all the others.

Then again, twenty-five years was twenty-five years. It was practically a lifetime. To that end Sorun made the decision that the Tails he was with now, the one working on disassembling a nuclear missile they'd found locked in a storage room while Sorun himself sat on top silently watching, may as well have been a completely different person from the Tails of the past that he knew. Practically strangers. And really, what could Sorun have possibly been to Tails? A friend that hadn't even been there for a full year of his life when by now he was in his mid-thirties? Even less than that considering he was working with two sets of memories, one of which Sorun was completely absent from?

No. There was little substance there. In a weird way he was and wasn't his Tails. It made Sorun muse if he should even care about the fox past his utility and usefulness, which made him consider how cold that reasoning sounded. Regardless of what they meant to each other back then, he'd had time to reflect on the fact people had tried to save Sorun while he was inside the Master Emerald. They'd all failed, evidently, but he couldn't fault their efforts. And he didn't want to think of someone like a tool and nothing more when they were a person. That was going too close to King Shadow's philosophy, which he absolutely refused to entertain.

But it was still hard to see the person below him and picture the timid nerdy kid who liked building things that he knew in the past. Twenty-five years did a lot to change someone, apparently. Well, either that or marriage.

"I can't believe he fucks an idol. My man." Sorun palmed the surface of the missile and slid off it, feet touching the ground and then spinning around so he could admire the missile. On the outside it didn't look that special. It looked like an ordinary missile, smaller than the ICBMs of his own world by a large margin. Small enough to fit in this room, at least, which was about the same size as the one that held the Master Emerald was. There were others, all shelved on a giant rack of all things, though Tails assured him he only needed the one to fulfill his plan of irradiating Sorun.

It was a plan Sorun himself had many reservations over.

"So how exactly is this gonna work without me dying of radiation poisoning?" Sorun asked Tails, crossing his arms and arching his eyebrow in the fox's direction. He didn't even turn to acknowledge him, his arms elbow-deep in the electronic innards of the missile's warhead, various tools scattered around his feet. "I needed a hospital the last time around to avoid that, so unless you got a bottle of iodine for me to chug or something in your magic inventory pockets I don't see this turning out well for me."

"Surprised you even know what iodine is," Tails commented, his eyes still locked onto the warhead.

"I know things," Sorun said defensively. His grip on his arms tightened. "Answer the damn question."

"Your white-haired form regenerates you and cures diseases, doesn't it? You should be fine after going into that state for a couple of seconds."

"... I suppose so..." Sorun admitted after a long pause, grip on his arms loosening. That form was limited to his knowledge of the 'DMC' games and the benefits of being a fictional devil-human hybrid. He knew the regeneration was top-tier, at least in terms of pure speed compared to every other regeneration system he'd seen in fiction. He didn't exactly know it inside and out since the lore of the games never went that deep on the subject. But there had to be something going on there since one of the characters lived exclusively off deserts and pizza and managed to stay in top physical condition without even trying, not to mention none of the characters had ever grown sick. At the end of the day it was up to the interpretation of the Chaos Emerald and his own heart how the power manifested.

Still though...

"I'm not a hundred percent on the diseases part, so I don't know where you're pulling that from. More like ninety, but if it was a cure-all wouldn't it have cured the mutation that gave me the ability to freely control Emeralds in the first place?" Sorun asked. "Or does that just not count since it wouldn't be classified as an 'ailment' due to being exclusively beneficial for me?" Could it even differentiate the difference? Was the power just that good? Or was he actually missing something? He knew for a fact that demons' evolution in the lore of the games was partly dependent on will and desire, not just environmental factors and genes. That was hard canon, and would have been factored in when his heart made the ability. So did him subconsciously considering that mutation as something "good" exclude it from Devil's Body curing it?

Tails shrugged. "You'd know more than me."

"This doesn't exactly come with an instruction manual, Tails."

A short sigh left the fox. "Alright, listen," he began, turning his head over his shoulder to look at Sorun. "There was a lot of people that went through the effort of examining your blood while trying to figure out how to save y-"

"People did what?"

"They stuck really big needles in the Master Emerald, would you just- look, let it go." He made a huff at Sorun's bewildered look and turned back to the opened warhead. "Your biology is really weird. By that I mean everyone I talked to said your blood samples reacted really, really weirdly to Chaos energy. And Chaos energy has always had a similarly weird relationship with radiation - the radioactive isotopes mixed in with the Chaos energies used in the gene bombs the Xorda set loose on Mobius is the only reason Mobians even exist. Chaos energy wasn't even proactive on the planet until those bombs," he said. "So your alien biology mixed with Chaos energy mixed with radiation does really, really weird things."

"Like let me use Chaos Emeralds?" Sorun asked.

"Like use Chaos Emeralds," Tails confirmed. "I don't know. Maybe it's the same reason why some Mobians are so much more, you know, Chaotically inclined than others. Evolution, biology... not really my field." He reached further into the warhead and pulled at something. Sorun heard a few snapping sounds. "Then again Mobians aren't exactly immune to radiation, so take it for what it's worth. I've personally seen that. Do you really need to take it any further than 'Chaos energy plus radiation equals control of powers?'"

"I mean not really, no," Sorun conceded, arms falling to his side. "I just don't want my hair falling out or something like that."

Tails laughed at that. "Sorun, you'll be fine."

Well, he sounded confident enough. That combined with Sorun's own reasoning of the situation and Devil's Body was enough to convince him. At that point he practically had more evidence for than against this being a good idea. And besides, reservations aside he trusted Tails.

"Well, here we are." Tails seemed to finally be finished with his work. He stood up from the warhead, turning around and presenting to Sorun an item held in his hands. "Here it is. One plutonium core, fresh out of the weapon of mass destruction."

It was such an innocuous little thing. The item in Tails' hands resembled little more than a chrome sphere about the same size as a shot put ball, the things athletes would throw in sports. If he didn't know it was a plutonium core for a nuclear weapon Sorun could have easily mistaken it for an oversized ball bearing. Somehow that made Sorun even more afraid of the thing.

"You're... sure that's safe, right?" he hesitantly asked.

After a moment's consideration, Tails crouched down and gently set the ball on the ground. "Relatively."

"Tails..."

"Sorun, it's fine. Trust me." He stood back up to his full height, and then held a second item out to Sorun: a hollow, metal hemisphere. "This is a beryllium cap," Tails explained after handing the thing to Sorun. "The basic gist is that, by covering the plutonium core with this, you're going to cause the neutrons emitted by the plutonium to bounce around against each other. This will create a nuclear reaction and release enough radiation to irradiate you." When Sorun grabbed the cap, Tails grabbed at his wrist and gave him a very serious look. "Now listen to me very closely. Don't let that cap cover the core for even more than a second. If you leave it on too long you'll cause the core to meltdown, and the explosion will not only kill us but destroy the whole island and everything on it. No more than a second. Take it off right after putting it on."

Somehow Sorun didn't feel like the grave tone Tails had taken didn't belay just how deadly the situation was. He felt a cold sweat begin to form on his face as he shakily took the metal cap from Tails. "You know this is how the guy that was messing around with the Demon Core died, right?" he shakily asked, having to force himself to grip the cap tightly enough not to drop it.

"Is that something from your world?" Tails asked, stepping back from Sorun. "The Demon Core?"

"It was just a silly nickname some scientists gave a plutonium core they were experimenting on back when nukes first became a thing," Sorun explained. "One slip of a screwdriver and the guy dies a week later from radiation poisoning." He blinked. "Now that I think about it you're having me do pretty much the same thing that got him killed."

Tails grimaced, turning his head slightly to avoid Sorun's gaze. "Well... I won't lie to you. This is a lethal dose of radiation we're hitting you with." Sorun had opened his mouth to argue, forcing Tails to quickly add, "But we're curing you right after so it doesn't even matter!"

Sorun closed his mouth. He had a pretty good point. "... Alright, fine," he sighed out. "So where are you going to be?"

"In the hallway, behind the lead-lined walls and far away from this. Just come out when you're done and I'll give you the Emerald."

"Yeah, sure, that's a... pretty solid plan, yeah." Sorun's voice trailed off as he watched the fox quickly - a bit too quickly for his liking - retreat out of the room while closing the door behind him. "All I gotta do is not screw up and cause nuclear armageddon, easy, no pressure, my species has a real great track record with that," he continued under his breath, turning back around to look down at the metal sphere at his feet.

The beryllium cap he was holding was beginning to feel like it was made of lead. He didn't even know if that expression was apropos; how the fuck was he supposed to know the density of some obscure metal he'd never heard of before now? And he didn't know why he had to be the one trusted with not causing a nuclear explosion when he had a bad history of screwing things up.

"Alright, just gotta... just cover it for a second. Single second, probably even less than that. I'll drop it on and slap it right off. That should work, right?" He let out a shaky breath and reached up to wipe the cold sweat off his forehead. "I mean I need these powers, but... well, Tails is usually right about these things, so can I really say there's that big a risk...?"

The Earthling got down on his knees, breathing heavily as he held the cap over the core. The knowledge that this was may very well be his last thirty-odd seconds of existence was pounding in his head about as hard as his heart was pounding in his chest. He could probably kill everyone on the island accidentally just by dropping this thing over the core and being too slow to remove it.

"Eeeeasy..." The cap was lowered over the core. Only a single millimeter of space was left between it and the ground. One single millimeter away from sealing the core completely and potentially causing a nuclear eruption. "Oh shit here we go!"

The very instant he'd dropped the cap over the sphere, Sorun experienced heat and light. Blue light that engulfed him and the entire room, seemingly shining from the reacting core next to him somehow, like the light was so intense it was shining through the metal cap. Or maybe the cap itself was the one bathing Sorun in that blue light. And the heat was... odd. Not the kind of heat one would experience when being shined on by the sun, or if they were close to a roaring fire. This heat felt more internal. Similar to the momentary adrenaline shock one would feel after a massive surprise, but hotter. More intense.

Whatever the case was, Sorun hadn't even experienced it for a full half-second before shrieking in fright and slapping the metal cap off the core. The blue light and heat completely disappeared the moment the cap was removed with such force it rolled away to the other end of the room, leaving a completely normal-looking metal ball sitting in front of Sorun.

"OH...! Oh, man..." Gasping out a heaving breath, Sorun bent forwards and had to place his hands on his knees for support. "Oh god, I feel... I feel... I feel pretty normal actually, huh..."

He straightened up and began patting down his body in surprise. He didn't feel any differences or abnormalities. No fever, no sickness or aches, no anything. Not even the smallest bit of nausea. Maybe it was too soon to be feeling the effects of radiation poisoning a few seconds in. Well, whatever the case, he was actually feeling pretty good all things considered.

"Hey, Tails, I'm done with the blueberry-whatever-it's-called cap," Sorun announced, opening the door and walking out into the hallway. He quickly found the fox leaning on a nearby wall, blue Emerald in hand and a relieved look growing on his face. "Hurry up and give me the Emerald before my skin starts sloughing off and I begin sounding like I've been smoking for a consecutive hundred and twenty years."

Tails gave Sorun an odd look that belayed no understanding whatever of what he just said. He hadn't even said a word in response. All he'd done was flatten one of his ears and tilt his head in confusion at Sorun.

"It's... it's a 'Fallout' reference, there- it was supposed- gimme the damn rock," Sorun snapped, snatching the glowing gem right out of the Mobian's hand. To his own satisfaction, he didn't find that the Emerald instantly glued itself to his hand. He even began tossing the gem back and forth from one hand to the other, but it seemed nothing was happening. "Well, either it worked or I never lost the ability to begin with and this was a waste of time. Win either way."

Gripping the Emerald with both hands, Sorun let out a small breath as he began focusing. He saw Tails blink in surprise when his dark hair began to turn a striking white, and with it came the energized, healthier-than-life-itself feeling Sorun got whenever he transitioned into this form. "Man, could spend a lifetime staying like this," he muttered, letting the transformation fade a few seconds later. His hair darkened back to completely black, and right after the blue Emerald instantly transmuted from a blue gem into a sheathed katana. "Hello, old friend..."

A strong sense of solace flooded Sorun when the familiar weight of the katana settled in his hands. Fortunately, the Yamato seemed to be unchanged along with what he felt while briefly using Devil's Body. Seemed nothing with the abilities themselves changed, which was further relief for Sorun. He idly began twirling a finger around the blue ribbon tied to the sword's black scabbard while turning to Tails.

"Everything okay?" Tails asked him, only briefly regarding Yamato before turning his eyes upwards at Sorun's face.

"Hm? Oh, yeah," he confirmed with a nod. "Just, uh... thinking about how the sword alone isn't gonna be enough for the king upstairs. I mean even with Sonic I'm not so sure, and if it gets knocked out of my hands-"

"Well, fortunately for you I got the solution to your problem right here." Sorun watched, wide-eyed, as Tails reached into the pouch he'd pulled the blue Emerald from earlier and pulled out, to his shock, a second Chaos Emerald. The red one. "I had two," Tails explained.

"... Wow, geez, that's perfect." A short laugh left Sorun as he reached forwards and took the red gem from Tails. "Where'd you even get two Chaos Emeralds to begin with? I would figured Shadow'd hoard 'em all or something like he did with the Master Emerald."

"Well... you gave them to me."

Sorun paused. He took his eyes off the Emerald to look at Tails, and to his confusion he was giving Sorun a completely straight expression. Like he wasn't kidding around. "Pretty sure I didn't," Sorun said, slowly and unsurely. "I... would remember pretty clearly me doing that. And I haven't even been in this timeline for a day."

A drawn-out sigh left Tails. He reached up to run a hand through his hair, and then shook his head while muttering to himself, "Right, you wouldn't know." Sorun was about to ask what that even meant, but before he could he said, "I'll explain when this is all over, alright? But right now we really need to focus on King Shadow."

"... Okay, I guess I'll hold you to that." The words spoken by Tails left a lot of questions burning in Sorun's mind, more than he was comfortable with, but he agreed in that King Shadow was the more pressing issue at the moment. The numerous questions could wait for after. "Anyways, I know exactly what to do with these two. Hold this."

Sorun tossed the red Emerald back to Tails. The Mobian caught it, and was about to ask what Sorun was doing before he unsheathed the katana and began dragging its edge along his fingers. "Er... Sorun, what are you doing?" Tails asked, looking squeamish at the sight.

"Gotta separate out my sense of pain for this next part."

"Why do you- SORUN, WHY !?"

Apparently Tails hadn't been that prepared to see Sorun lift his vest and shirt up and then stab his stomach with the katana. He would silently admit he probably should have warned him in advance, but then decided by the time he began dragging the blade across his torso it was probably too late. "Relax, it's a tried and true method," he grunted out, though it did nothing to wipe away the horrified expression Tails held. Sorun shook his head and rolled his eyes as a result, and then reached forwards to take the Emerald from the frozen fox's hands.

Once again he found the sensation of inserting a large, foreign object in his guts to be an unpleasant one. Like being unnaturally full and carrying around a weight that wasn't supposed to be there. His hair turned white once more, and he felt a momentary twinge of pain from the gaping slit he'd carved into his stomach before the wound healed completely, trapping the Emerald inside him. He made a discontent sound, shaking his head and inserting Yamato back into its scabbard.

"Alright, we're good to go," Sorun said, turning to a staring Tails. "What?"

"Why... would you do that...?"

"In case I lose this-" he shook Yamato, "- I'm not left completely defenseless and, you know, die in a single punch or something. No way I'm losing the one inside me unless it gets torn out."

"I-I... I mean, sure," Tails mumbled out, shaking his head, "but couldn't you have just held it?"

"What about this aren't you getting? If I lose both it's game over for me. No way do I rely on items." He turned his back to Tails. "And if I use the one in me to make Yamato it transfers to my hand, so it's not like I gotta cut myself open again to get it out." He began walking forwards, sighing a bit while holding his free hand up to his head. "I'm not so sure this'll still be enough to take on Shadow, though. Just two? Yeah, but we got Sonic, too, so it's not completely hopeless."

"Sorun?" Tails began walking after Sorun. When he didn't respond to him calling out, his walking increased so he could catch up to Sorun faster. "Hey, Sorun!"

Seemingly ignoring Tails, the human kept moving forwards. "I'm still worried about what we're supposed to do after. I dunno, we'll figure it out, that's pretty much how we solve all my problems at this point. Yeah, I get it, but this isn't-"

"Sorun!" After finally catching up with him, Tails shot his arm out to grab at Sorun's. He stopped in his tracks, turning his head to meet Tails' eyes. "Why do you keep talking to yourself like that?" the Mobian asked, worry creeping into his tone. "It's... you're really making me concerned."

There was no response from Sorun. He simply kept staring at Tails, a vacant, empty look on his face, like he hadn't even heard or registered the question that had been asked to him. Tails was ready to try again when Sorun suddenly looked down at the hand grabbing him, looking confused.

"Tails, what are you doing standing around for?" Sorun asked, shaking the grip off and nodding his head. "We got a king to overthrow, come on, get the lead out."

"Uh..." Speechless, Tails could only watch was Sorun turned back around and continued down the dark hallway. Eventually he shook his head, made a resigned sigh, and began to follow closely behind. "Yeah, sure, let's go."

In fairness to himself, Sorun didn't have a plan moving forwards.

What was he supposed to do? Getting rid of King Shadow was a given - wouldn't get a moment's peace to do anything otherwise. After that? Sorun just didn't know. Ideally he'd fix this timeline so it'd just go back to the way it was, but he wasn't sure how he was supposed to go about doing that. Nobody else seemed to think it was possible, and the way Tails was talking about how Sonic wanted to stage this coup and become king again to fix the world made it sound like they all already decided they were just sticking with this timeline.

It was a conversation they could get to later, where Sorun would tell them he completely disagreed, but as he was stalking through the castle halls, freshly out of the dungeons below and into the brightly-lit, opulent hallways, he couldn't help but continually remind himself that he didn't know how he was supposed to fix an altered timeline. Or even if it could be fixed to begin with.

Maybe Tails was right. In fact, he most probably was, and he'd know more about it than Sorun. About how the change was irreversible and nothing could be done about it, that they'd just have to buckle down and make the best with what they had now.

A dark look overtook Sorun's features. Easy for Tails to say that. He got to keep his family.

But, at the end of the day, he didn't know what to do other than begrudgingly admit that Tails, despite in Sorun's personal opinion being very heavily biased towards the decision of not messing with time further, had a real good point he himself couldn't counter at all. And either way they'd have to talk once this was over anyways, about the Chaos Emeralds and what Tails said about them and Sorun and how he'd "given them to him." Whatever that meant. But later. Once King Shadow was dealt with.

And Sorun was still struggling figuring out just what he was supposed to do about that guy...

He was so caught up in his silent musings, in fact, that when he rounded a corner into a long stretch of bright hallway, he hadn't noticed the trio of individuals in front of him until he just happened to look up, and then froze mid-step in surprise. The three echidna he'd run into, a few meters ahead, seemed to be frozen in a similar state of shock. Tails, following behind Sorun, had been more responsive and have made a startled noise before diving behind the cover of the nearby corner.

Sorun didn't do the same thing. He just stood there, staring at the three when he realized they were the same three echidna that had taken him out of the cell. The two nameless guards and that female one, Lien-Da. The one that had tortured Rotor. Who probably would have tortured Sorun, too, if King Shadow hadn't called dibs. And Sorun was very cognizant of the white locks of hair on the edges of his field of vision.

... Well he wasn't going to go out of his way specifically for her, but if they just happened to run into each other, then it was a different story.

"You're supposed to be dead." To her credit, Lien-Da had snapped out of her shock rather quickly, narrowing her eyes in Sorun's direction. The two male echidna had, too, getting into more balanced stances while aiming their rifles at Sorun.

"I know, right?" Sorun replied in a nonchalant tone. He was aware that the slightest grin might have appeared on his face with the knowledge that, yes, it was very likely these three would never eat solid food ever again after the next minute or so. And the knowledge there was nothing they could do to stop Sorun helped enforce that idea. The physical abilities of Devil's Body were so far above the norm of a normal Mobian that it wasn't even funny. Except maybe for this instance.

Lien-Da's eyes shot up to the top of Sorun's head. She made a scoff. "I heard stories about people being so frightened or stressed that their hair turned white, but I didn't know it was actually real." A frown grew on her features when she looked down into his eyes. "I don't know how you're here, but I'm going to make you regret every single second you dared to think you deserved to live past dying at the king's hand."

Sorun idly tapped his left fingers on the scabbard of the sword his left hand held. His grin grew fractionally wider. "Ya think?"

"Men." There was a whirring sound. Sorun saw yellow light gather in the barrels of the rifles the two guards besides Lien-Da carried. "One chance. You go with me in one piece or lots of pieces. Your call."

"What if-"

For what was a fraction of a fraction of a second, Sorun felt a searing pain in his left shoulder. It'd made him cut off what he was trying to say, with his face going flat when he perceived the trail of yellow light in the air fading. He looked at his left shoulder, seeing a hole in his coat and a patch of skin, completely unmarred and healed.

"Guess I can't dodge lasers," he bitterly thought. That'd originally been his intent, but it seemed that he wasn't on a sufficient enough level to dodge an attack going at the speed of light. He wasn't even able to perceive its flight path before the laser hit him. It'd just appeared, instantly, and left almost as quickly. "Well, whatever," he thought, gripping Yamato's handle with his right hand, "those guns can't do anything to me anyways."

In the time it took to blink, Sorun had pulled the sword out, slashed it in the air twice, and then re-sheathed it. Blue lines appeared on the photon rifles held by the echidna guards, though they quickly faded away to reveal impossibly clean cuts bisecting their weapons. The guns fell apart in pieces in the Mobians' hands, and before they could even act out in shock Sorun was right in front of them, moving past the threshold using supernatural speed they had no hope of keeping up with.

The end of Yamato's scabbard flew forwards and impacted the leftmost echidna in the chest. He doubled over, completely winded, with the sound of crunching ribs accompanying the sound of him hitting the ground. Before the rightmost echidna had any time to react Sorun's right hand had reached out, grabbed his face, and then slammed his head right into the wall. The head had gone right through, cracks spiderwebbing around the entrance and the echidna going limp after Sorun let go.

When he turned forwards to Lien-Da, he noted, with some amusement, she was clutching to that whip of hers. The way she was holding it implied she actually intended on using it against Sorun, and while she was doing a good job of not shaking in her boots right there, her eyes were beyond uncertain. Frightened, even.

"So. Magic katana that can cut through time and space versus a leather whip. Which one you think comes out on top?" Sorun asked.

She actually tried using it on him. He didn't know if it was sheer audacity that guided her hand or blind, animalistic panic, but she'd attempted to strike him with the whip. With his reflexes, though, it would have been impossible not to catch the whip before it cracked against him. As such, he actually had caught the whip and sharply tugged it, making Lien-Da stumble right into the backfist he'd swung right on her jaw.

It was less he felt and more heard bone completely shattering under his fist. The handful of teeth he saw fly out of her mouth as her body hit the ground was also a good indicator of what he'd done. He'd done so much damage with that one hit alone that Sorun had leaned forwards a bit to examine her after Lien-Da fell, worried he'd accidentally hit her too hard and snapped her neck. But he'd heard a small, pitiful moan leave her, and saw the body twitch, and was satisfied enough to leave it be.

"That was... more annoying than anything else," Sorun thought, feeling odd at the sensation. He thought he'd feel something more than that. Satisfaction, vindication, something along those lines. He didn't, and more than that he didn't feel the need to dwell on it. So he turned around and began walking away. He'd glanced a bit to the left while walking, making a satisfied sound when he saw the hole in the coat's shoulder shrink down as it repaired itself. "Well, if my life were simple Shadow would go down that easy. I feel like he's not gonna go down that easy."

"Wha-what the... Sorun!"

The teen stopped in his tracks. That was Tails' voice, sounding distraught and horrified. Based on that tone, when Sorun turned around, he'd half-expected to find King Shadow right behind them, carrying Sonic's mangled corpse with him. He'd even began reaching for Yamato while mentally preparing himself to see the sight of a Chaos Spear running through and killing Tails.

What he did see was something he couldn't have prepared himself for. He saw Tails, almost looking like he was stricken with grief, kneeling over Lien-Da. That echidna he'd just taken out. That enemy. Eyes wide and horrified, mouth agape. It was a sight odd enough Sorun almost dropped the Yamato.

"You... you completely destroyed her jaw..." Tails mumbled out in shock, not able to take his eyes off Lien-Da.

"Er... yeah." Something about his even, neutral tone caused Tails to stiffen and snap his gaze up to Sorun. "That's what I was going for," he said.

"Why!?"

"... 'Cause it was easy?" Sorun gestured to Tails while shaking his head. "What do you- what do you want from me? I saw some enemies, I disabled them."

He actually had the nerve to look angry at the explanation. "You could have done it without crippling them for life!" Tails shouted at him. He swept his arms to the side to gesture at the three bodies. "Look at them!"

"I don't care." Ignoring the shocked look on Tails' face, Sorun turned around. "Come on. We still have to deal with Shadow."

Sorun began walking forwards, but then quickly noticed he didn't hear a set of footsteps behind him. He stopped after a few steps, sighed, and then turned around. Tails hadn't moved from his spot near the echidna, and his glare towards Sorun was still heated.

"King Shadow can wait," Tails said. "We need to get these three to a hospital."

It was a struggle for Sorun not to rush forwards and slap the fox right across the face. He settled for keeping on an impassive face and said, "No thanks. I don't want to."

"Sorun-!"

" Leave it , Tails. They don't matter." With a disgusted sigh barely disguised as indifference Sorun turned back around. "She's honestly lucky I don't tear her in half for what she did to Rotor. If you wanna waste time with them than feel free. I really doubt Shadow's gonna wait around for you, though."

How this was even an argument was beyond Sorun. He went out of his way to make sure he didn't use enough force to kill them, but even that wasn't enough. He honestly didn't see the problem, and decided Tails would just have to deal with it. It wasn't any inconvenience to Sorun what he decided to do anyways.

Eventually, he heard a sigh behind him. "I'm going back to the security center to double-check and make sure you don't get bogged down by guards fighting King Shadow." The whirling sound of Tails' tails spinning up reached Sorun's ears. "Once he's dealt with I'm arranging for these three to get medical attention."

"Fine. Whatever. Do what you want." The retreating sound of the whirling let Sorun know Tails had flown away without saying any parting words. He resisted the urge to roll his eyes and pressed forwards. Towards the direction Tails had previously told him was the throne room.

He could already hear the sounds of fighting from here. Of high-speed objects colliding, the vibrations in the air. He could have sworn even the walls were shaking. With all that it didn't seem likely neither Sonic nor King Shadow were holding back against one another. It did little to assuage Sorun's anxiety, maybe even enough he considered turning back. He probably would have followed that instinct, too, were it not for the knowledge he was through on options.

"With how blatantly the king's playing for keeps, I really don't think Shadow's gonna go easy. Hard to see him even staying down." He felt his right fingers lightly ghost along the Yamato's handle. "I really do hope Sonic had a plan for keeping him down and didn't charge in without a real plan." A sad frown grew on his face. "Sonic, you... you know what you're doing, right?"

Sorun hoped he did, because he couldn't even say he knew what he was doing anymore.

A/N- I know it feels really weird and out of place that Sorun hasn't even once thought of Nicole's name and hasn't mentioned her in any capacity. The reason behind that is because this whole arc was planned out long before that was even a concept, so I chose to stick with what I had planned out. If you want kind of a gimped explanation you can imagine in the back of Sorun's mind he realized there's a minute chance he might see her again and have to deal with that super stupid mistake he did before leaving, so he's subconsciously trying not to think about her at all to avoid thinking about any possible consequences.

Chapter 81

Recursion Error

Episode 81- The future well and truly sucks

The throne room to the castle was about what Sorun had expected. Big, open, brightly lit. Bright colors everywhere. Interestingly two giant thrones were set up at the back of the room, and if he looked up he could see another statue of the human/Overlander girl with the angel wings fitted in a depression in the wall above the chairs. And honestly the place was so big it was less a room and more a great hall.

Sonic flying into Sorun's view and rolling to a stop at his feet ceased the sightseeing, however. Lazily, Sorun looked down and noted the multiple scuff marks all around the hedgehog's body, the somewhat laboored breathing and shaking, though otherwise he seemed no worse for wear. He glanced up to see King Shadow across the room, giving Sorun a wide-eyed look, his crown and cape discarded, and then looked back down when he heard him cough and saw Sonic looking up at him.

"And here I was thinking you'd already have this wrapped up," Sorun said, voice slightly mocking.

Sonic groaned and had the audacity to roll over on his side. "Gimme a break. My knees started clicking a couple years ago."

"... Dang man." Not feeling overly sympathetic, Sorun looked back up at King Shadow. "Well, catch a breather and come help when you can. I'll take him on."

"Yeah, sure, go for it." Sonic waved a hand up in the air as Sorun stepped over him and began approaching King Shadow. "Just gonna... phew, yeah, just gonna chill here for a bit."

On the outside, Sorun managed to keep on a neutral, overly unexpressive face as he slowly walked towards the dark hedgehog. On the inside he was worried. He'd only ever fought him once, that one time long ago, and that'd been against a Shadow for the most part going easy on him in a training bout, whereas this one was likely aiming to kill Sorun right here.

But, on the other hand, Sorun liked to think he was at least moderately more skilled than he was back then. Even so, he wasn't comfortable going into this with just two powers, really one and a weapon he could lose. He wouldn't be comfortable doing this even with all seven if it were possible; he was, after all, a Shadow if not his Shadoow. He'd seen what he could do, and Sorun genuinely didn't think too highly of his chances at winning this. Maybe if Sonic managed to get back in fighting shape, maybe, though it stung Sorun's pride to no end that he had to rely on him for help.

Still, this was something that had to be done, whether Sorun liked it or not. And it was far too late to turn back anyways.

"I vividly recall having killed you," King Shadow stated in an even tone. Sorun had stopped right in front of him, the two once again staring intently at each other. Sorun had unsheathed his katana, scabbard held in his left hand and the sword in the other, while King Shadow's right hand was tightly clenching a crackling spear made of pure Chaos energy.

Sorun shrugged at the observation. "I'll be real with you, Shadow. With how many time's I've come close to dying or actually died in the past year, I really don't think I can die."

"That remains to be seen, I'm afraid." The two slowly began to circle one another. "What exactly is it you hope to accomplish here?" the king questioned him. "Depose me of the crown and then what? You'll 'fix the world' of all my crimes?"

Sorun didn't respond at first. He'd glanced over his shoulder and saw Sonic still lying a fair distance away from them. A fair bit out of earshot, probably even passed out from the way he was barely moving. "I don't really know what Sonic has planned for the government," Sorun admitted, turning back to King Shadow. "And I don't much care. His goals aren't the same as mine."

King Shadow's features tightened. He shot Sorun a wary look at the answer. "Is that so? Then why go through all this? You could have simply left after escaping that table, however you accomplished that. You evaded me for twenty-five years after the ARK, despite my efforts; you could have done so again."

"I seriously don't have any idea what you're talking about," Sorun claimed, a weathered sigh leaving him as he slumped his shoulders.

The harsh glare being sent to him by the half-Mobian didn't waver. "Explain," he demanded. "Why do this? What do you possibly have to gain?"

"If you really must know, I don't agree with them. Those quitters are content to just make whatever they can of this new world." Sorun had grown a tone that made it sound as if he was disgusted with the entire situation, and in all honesty, he was. He wasn't satisfied settling for this world, this timeline. Not at all. Not when there was a chance at fixing everything. "No, I'm after something different entirely. I want to return to the other timeline. The true timeline. Not this... mockery that should never have even existed in the first place."

King Shadow blinked at first, almost in confusion. He'd glanced down as he processed Sorun's words, like he couldn't believe what he just heard, though slowly his crimson eyes had widened further and further. And then he appeared to grow angrier by the second. "You're insane," he snarled out, snapping his head back up to meet Sorun's gaze. "You would return this world to all that chaos I saved it from? Undo everything I've done to save this world for... for what? Why?"

He sounded more than angry, Sorun had realized. Some other emotion behind his tone, more primal than anger. He sounded horrified, not out of fear, but out of the mere implication of Sorun's goal, out of genuine confusion for why he would even want that. It caused the human to pause when he realized how heavily King Shadow actually believed in everything he'd done being for the better. And a small part of him would admit that, if he looked hard enough, he may have found himself somewhat agreeing.

But he was beyond caring at this point. It didn't matter. None of it did. The only thing that did matter was the right timeline.

"I don't like you," Sorun said in a plain, honest tone, causing King Shadow to stiffen. "Not you, nor this world. That's all." He rose his sword up and pointed its tip at King Shadow. "And as it stands, you'll just do everything you can to stop me. That's where we are, and that's where we'll be until we settle this."

"It would appear so," King Shadow agreed, tone low and eyes smoldering. Quite literally, actually, as his red irises were glowing slightly and the Chaos Spear he held was crackling with more intense energy. "I don't know if what you desire is even possible, but it won't matter. I will not let that blue buffoon back there undo my work. And above all else, I will not let you undo this entire world."

Sorun blinked, and lowered his sword down. The conviction he heard in the other's voice was more genuine than he thought anybody could make themselves sound, enough that he found himself surprised. He shook his head of it after, grip tightening on his sword and scabbard as he stared the down the darkened hedgehog.

Deciding not to waste any more time, Sorun decided to make the first move. He rushed forwards, closing the distance between the two of them in a single step and swinging the Yamato at a speed so fast King Shadow had fractionally widened his eyes in surprise. He was quick enough, however, to raise his Chaos Spear up and block the strike, deadlocking the two weapons as white and green sparks flew between the pair as they struggled against one another.

King Shadow

The Despotic Savior

King Shadow had began gritting his teeth and putting his all into pushing Sorun's sword back with his energy spear, but despite his efforts he wasn't able to make the human budge even with both hands on the weapon. Sorun was making an equal amount of progress, scowling as he used his left hand to push the sword's scabbard against the back of the blade. In a rare moment of being proud of himself Sorun was pleased to find it was actually sufficient in pushing King Shadow back. It was slow, but he was winning the contest of strength.

Disbelief crossed King Shadow's face as he found himself being pushed back. He planted his feet on the ground, pushing the entirety of his weight against the sword, though it did nothing to halt Sorun's progress. A growl left him at the same time an igniting sound was heard, Sorun glancing down to see the jets on the underside of his shoes had activated. And with that Sorun found that he was the one being pushed back now.

"Forgot about those," Sorun thought. He decided to abandon the deadlock, twisting around King Shadow's body and dragging the sword along the side of the green Chaos Spear. The sudden lack of pressure bearing down on him had forced Shadow to unexpectedly dash forwards, and a hiss left him when Yamato's edge dragged along his shoulder and cut him as he passed Sorun. He huffed out, green energy surrounding the cut and causing it to slowly closed as he turned towards Sorun.

"You were never this fast or strong. What did you do to yourself?" he asked, eyes glancing up at Sorun's hair. "You cha-"

He was cut off when Sorun rushed forwards again and slashed at King Shadow. He dodged back to avoid being cut by the blade, though he did offer Sorun an incensed, almost insulted glance as the human met his eyes right after.

"We had a chance to talk it out. That's long passed." Sorun sheathed Yamato, feet widening as his eyes narrowed in concentration. Crackling, blue energy began arcing over the Yamato's scabbard. "You made your stance on the matter clear enough anyway."

In credit to his guile, King Shadow had moved like he intended to attack Sorun. Before he'd had the chance, though, Sorun's arms had moved, and for a split second the entire sword he held shifted into an intense blue color. Using the Yamato's power to cut through time and space itself, he'd unsheathed and re-sheathed the katana in a movement so fast not even King Shadow had been able to perceive it, causing his movements to stall in surprise. His entire body was surrounded by a bubble of warped space, and he had the sense to try and dodge out of it once the brief confusion passed him.

He'd been just a bit too slow, though. His left arm had still been caught in Judgement Cut's area of effect, and had been assaulted by the endless amount of ethereal slashes in the bubble. He shouted out in pain, rolling away into a kneel while panting heavily. He brought his left arm up to his face, a gasping sound leaving the hedgehog when he saw his entire arm was riddled in countless, bleeding gashes and cuts.

Before the disbelief and confusion faded from his face, another warped bubble of space surrounded him as Sorun unleashed the technique yet again. King Shadow had been quicker at reacting the second time around, his shoes igniting and propelling him far outside of the attack's range before it managed to strike. Sorun's own eyes did their best to keep up with the king as he quite literally skated in circles around him. Skating fast enough that he was easily able to outmaneuver the bubbles of warped space that appeared in his path that threatened to cut him to ribbons.

Seeing that his efforts were doing no good, Sorun released a quiet, disgruntled sigh as he did his best to keep up with the red and black blur circling around him. He was surprised to find that, even with Devil's Body's enhanced reflexes, he was having trouble keeping up with him. He'd been easily able to sidestep it when a Chaos Spear had been thrown at him, almost effortlessly, but the hedgehog himself was skating at a speed just too fast for Sorun to follow with his eyes. If he weren't so frustrated he would have been impressed.

Then he heard it. That unique whirring sound. That high-pitched whine that indicated something was rapidly spinning through the air, and Sorun knew exactly what that object was. It'd struck before he even had time to react: King Shadow's spinning body, spines flared out, zooming past him and shredding across his arms and chest. The wounds healed instantly, but it was still distressing for Sorun to learn that the hedgehog's Spin Dash was somehow even faster than him simply skating around him on the rocket shoes.

It was a que King Shadow seemed to pick up on, too, because he kept doing it. Skating outside of Sorun's melee range, keeping to his blind spots and then quickly Spin Dashing towards him at a speed Sorun couldn't intercept. He certainly tried, swinging Yamato in the direction he heard the sound in or in the direction his peripheral caught a hint of black and red, but either he was too slow or King Shadow was so maneuverable even while in a Spin Dash he could simply just dodge the sword strikes. Sorun reckoned both cases were true, which made him even more concerned.

There was intense worry, too, every single time he felt the king shred across his body. The regeneration would hold up, but unlike it Sorun's stamina wasn't infinite. He wasn't feeling winded, not yet, but that wouldn't remain true for long if King Shadow kept chipping away at him with those damnable Spin Dashes.

"If he keeps hopping around like that I'm gonna cut his fucking legs off." He was probably going to have to at this rate, what with Sorun steadily realizing that, even with the white hair, he was getting outclassed here in terms of speed. But the problem was King Shadow was sticking to a winning strategy and unless he used something else-

Suddenly Sorun's head picked up in realization, but then he grimaced. This wasn't something he wanted to use so early, and it said a lot that he was being forced to pull this out near the beginning of the fight. But he was running out of options, desperate, and Sonic still hadn't gotten up to help. But even still, this wasn't something even King Shadow could doge as long as he was caught in it, and, lacking any other options, Sorun decided to commit to it.

The Yamato was fully sheathed, and Sorun's feet slowly spread out. He let out a slow breath as he concentrated as hard as he could at the sword held in his left hand. A wide ring of blue energy spread out around him-

King Shadow Spin Dashed across Sorun's back. The human stumbled, cursing under his breath as his wound healed, but the blue circle had faded. He tried once again, assuming the same stance with his right hand hovering over the katana's handle, eyes piercing as he tried to focus, but the blue ring that had been spreading from his body the second time around didn't even get the chance to fully expand before he was once again struck by King Shadow.

"It's no good. He's not giving me an opportunity to get Judgement Cut End off." It was a fact Sorun was coming to a grim realization of, even as he stood firm and attempted to initiate the move, over and over, only for it to be interrupted by a hit from King Shadow. The move itself required an intense amount of concentration just to perform on Sorun's part, and while he theoretically could perform it no problem even while under the assault of light damage, the equivalent of having a spinning buzz saw the size of an adult Mobian shredding across his body was by no means light damage. If he were in his normal, black-haired body just one of those hits would have been enough to kill him. The large splashes of blood - Sorun's blood - thrown all around the glossy flooring around him said enough.

While Sorun continued to stand there, silently panicking as he attempted to figure out what to do next, the miraculous happened: King Shadow made a mistake. Perhaps he'd grown tired of using Spin Dash, or, and Sorun figured this was most likely, him standing in place and essentially tanking all the Spin Dashes with subsequently no visible wounds on his body must have given the impression to the half-Mobian that what he was doing wasn't an effective strategy.

He'd be wrong in thinking that, of course, as it actually was a devastating strategy, but despite the blood all around Sorun there was no visible evidence of that. So it seemed that King Shadow decided to change his approach and did probably the most foolish thing possible:

He went in for a punch.

Sorun had seen it immediately when King Shadow began skating straight towards him, fist reeled back for the punch and the angry look on his face. Sorun was almost tempted to laugh at him, and probably would have if it weren't for the fact that the punch actually landed.

Sure, the combination of the rocket shoes and King Shadow's swing speed made it so that Sorun had no chance of dodging the hit. And yes, it'd struck with enough force that Sorun felt the bones in his face splinter and break under the one hit. Superficial damage seeing as it would all heal before the gloved fist would even leave his face. Sorun didn't care about that.

What he did care about was that King Shadow wasn't able to pull his hand away nearly as fast as he was able to punch with it. Which gave Sorun the perfect opportunity to snap his right hand up and grab King Shadow's wrist.

By then King Shadow's eyes had widened, realizing the mistake he'd made. He attempted to wrench his arm out of Sorun's grip, but the teen held firm. So firm, in fact, that he felt bones creaking and crunching under his grip he was squeezing down so hard, causing an angered King Shadow to grimace in pain.

"Nowhere to run," Sorun growled out, twisting the wrist around. He felt bone splinter in his grip, causing King Shadow to grit his teeth and pull harder in an attempt to free himself. It wasn't enough, though, and Sorun took this to heart as the blue ribbon on the Yamato's scabbard wrapped around his waist of its own accord. His left hand grabbed the sword's handle and pulled it out, dark scabbard secured to his waist as his blue eyes gazed downwards, to the hedgehog's legs.

There'd been no hesitation or consideration on Sorun's part. He'd swung the Yamato as quickly as he could, right at King Shadow's thighs with the intent on cutting clean through his legs. There was no way for King Shadow to avoid it, and he seemed to catch on to the plan as his pulling became more frantic. But by then it was no good, as the blade struck true and hit its mark.

But then something happened that shouldn't have.

Sorun stared, wide-eyed and disbelieving. The sword had struck King Shadow's leg; that wasn't the problem. The problem was it was stuck halfway into his leg, wedged between muscle and tissue, not even reaching the bone. Which shouldn't have been the case, as the blade should have effortlessly cleaved through both of the limbs with its power of separation. It shouldn't have been stopped at all.

Unless...

"Oh no. You're kidding me." So stunned by this new revelation Sorun wasn't able to immediately pick up the sound of crackling energy near him. He did eventually, though by the time he looked up towards the source of the noise, the crackling Chaos Spear in King Shadow's left hand, it was too late. The king swung the energy spear at Sorun, who was forced to block it with the flat end of the blade after it had been swiftly pulled out from King Shadow's leg. It'd struck with such force Sorun was tossed backwards, losing his grip on the king's arm and rolling across the ground before coming to a stop.

A small grunt escaped Sorun, who'd stopped on his back and facing the ceiling. He heard a wheezing sigh besides him, and turned his head enough to see that he happened to land next to Sonic, who was now sitting up and glancing down at Sorun. Between that and the troubling information the Earthling had just encountered, he couldn't help the deep frown that settled over his face.

"Hey, Sorun, how's it going?" Sonic tiredly mumbled out, glancing between him and King Shadow, who stood nearby with that smoldering scowl on his face. "I thought the magic sword was supposed to cut through everything?"

"It would appear Shadow has so much Chaos energy naturally running through him that he's negating Yamato's power of separation," Sorun blankly responded, a bitter edge to his tone. It was just like all the way back when he was fighting that mech suit Eggman was in, the one with the Chaos Emerald installed in it. He wouldn't be able to instantly win with a single, clean strike. And what made it worse was that whatever that alien DNA mixed into his biology did made King Shadow, at least his muscles, tough and dense as hell. Separation power nullified or not he still should have been able to cleave through his legs with his current strength.

A pit began settling in Sorun stomach as he was beset with worry. This fight just grew much, much more dangerous if that was the case. He'd been banking on ending this with a single, decisive hit. But he couldn't even get that, and he was struggling to think of another solution to beating him. Never mind even getting another chance at getting a hit in.

"Really, huh?" Sonic's voice made Sorun shift his attention back to him. A troubled look was on the blue hedgehog's face. "So it can't hurt him?"

Sorun began sitting up alongside Sonic while saying, "Well, I can still cut him with the physical edge of the actual sword." His frown worsened. It was looking like he'd need Sonic help with this, desperately, a fact that was only increasing his frustration at the whole situation. He squashed the feeling down and looked at Sonic. "I'm going to set up 'that' move. I need you to keep him off me and lead him into it."

Sonic sent him a confused look for a second before he made an understanding noise. "Oh, the big ring thing with the-"

"The Judgement Cut End, yes," Sorun sighed out. He bit his tongue to avoid shouting out when he heard Sonic chuckle besides him.

"Almost forgot about those names." Sonic made a soft grunt as he pushed up off the ground. "Get him in the circle, right, no biggie."

Sorun nodded at Sonic, and then looked back towards King Shadow. He was still giving the both of them smoldering glares, and it seemed Sorun had caught him just when he had finished healing. There were still vestiges of green energy floating around him that were fading away, but the mangled bone in his wrist was straight again and the cuts on his arm had disappeared entirely. And he seemed to be giving Sorun more attention than Sonic.

He would have likely made a move against the Earthling right there and then if he wasn't struck by a blue object moving faster than Sorun's enhanced eyes could perceive. King Shadow had stumbled back, though from the look on his face he looked more insulted than stunned in any capacity. He snapped his head over his shoulders to glare at Sonic, body practically quaking with rage.

From there, Sorun just wasn't able to keep up with what was happening. The best he could make out were two vaguely round, spinning objects clashing against each other over and over, zooming and curving all around the throne room at such speeds Sorun wasn't able to pin them down at specific locations. Most of what he could make out were the trails of blue, black and red being left and the sounds. The high-pitched whirring of their spinning bodies moving quickly through space and shredding through sound barriers, the loud, dull thuds of their bodies impacting each other at such a high rate a machine gun firing would have sounded slower.

It was honestly chaotic to behold, almost disorienting. And this was with Devil's Body's reflexes. Sorun wouldn't doubt if he had to watch this fight with normal eyes he'd either see nothing or throw up from all the motion. His jaw had tightened at the sight. How not just one, but two people could be moving so incomprehensibly fast.

He scoffed and tightened his grip on Yamato. It didn't matter if his speed couldn't compare. He had things over them. All he had to do was win this fight to prove that much.

Once again beginning the process of clearing his mind and putting all his focus into the sword he held, Sorun felt the ring of blue power fully extend around him as the Yamato's energy built up. He'd cracked his eyes open, right hand hovering over the handle, to observe the battle between the two Mobians, but they were still moving hopelessly fast and the blue wall of flowing energy surrounding him didn't help his visuals.

Though, actually, now that he looked closer he could see... yeah, Sonic was slowing down. He was still moving incredibly fast, but it was measurably slower than King Shadow and dropping. What quick glances Sorun could catch revealed a strained, winded look on the Mobian's face. Either exertion from the blunt injuries he was sustaining or dropping stamina. Likely both, and the fact he was fighting someone eternally in the prime of their youth likely didn't help matters.

But he was still doing his part, leading King Shadow towards the blue circle surrounding Sorun. Mostly just drawing him further in by hanging around just outside the technique's range of effectiveness, though no matter what he did King Shadow wasn't being baited into entering the circle. He wouldn't even enter it to try and disrupt what Sorun was doing, likely, and correctly, assuming he'd had enough time to set up the technique and was just waiting for him to enter.

It was as frustrating as it was harrowing. This wasn't something Sorun could hold forever; the physical toll was draining. He only had a few more seconds before he'd be forced to drop it entirely, and in his state Sorun wasn't positive that Sonic would be able to defend Sorun if his guard were to drop for that long.

Just as worry began to set in Sorun Sonic had done something. Either out of desperation or seeing Sorun's distress, he'd pulled a move and curved mid-air right behind King Shadow in a move that, if Sorun were a physicist, he probably would have called impossible without sheering his body in half. Despite that, Sonic had still managed the maneuver and exited it kicking outwards. King Shadow, mirroring the movement, had committed to the same kick, causing both hedgehogs to be struck and sent flying back. Sonic had impacted the ground a far distance away and rolled to a stop.

King Shadow had been launched right into the Judgement Cut End's area of influence. For the briefest moment Sorun had caught a look of panic on the half-Mobian's face. That was the only action he was able to do before Sorun disappeared entirely.

Time itself completely froze. Innumerable, invisible seems in space appeared, accompanied by momentary warps in the air around them as space and time were cut apart, with King Shadow's motionless body frozen in the air in the middle of it all. Phantom silhouettes that had cut the seams converged into a single body, who slowly began to sheath the katana as the invisible seams thinned.

At the moment the sword was fully sheathed, the seams disappeared, time resumed, and pieces of reality broke away and rained down like immaterial shards of glass. There was a single scream and the sound of blood splattering the ground behind Sorun as blue electricity arced violently around his whole body.

The human teen turned his head right when he heard King Shadow's body thump onto the floor. To his surprise, King Shadow was still fully conscious, albeit kneeling down on a single knee. How he was still conscious, though, Sorun didn't have a clue. Long, deep gashes had been cut throughout his entire body. Cuts deep enough that in more than a few spots Sorun saw hints of white bone peaking out from the deep cuts, with blood freely flowing out of the wounds and matting the fur all over his body. Heavy, heaving pants were leaving the hedgehog as he fixed Sorun with exhausted, baleful eyes, eyes so full of hate they somehow were able to mask the pain he was in.

More unbelievably, he began to stand up. It was plain to see he was having difficulty, his body was shaking from the effort, but he was still managing it. Sorun scowled at the sight and fully turned towards King Shadow.

"How the hell are you still standing?" He was honestly surprised he was even in one piece. That technique didn't cut the targets it was intended for: it cut the very space they occupied. By all rights he should have been diced into a million pieces, though it seemed the Chaos energy that allowed him to nullify Yamato's abilities allowed him to weather even that. Just barely, at least. Though Sorun found his scowl deepening when green energy began to surround the dozens of bone-deep cuts spread all over King Shadow's body. "Oh, you're kidding. Black Arms DNA is such bullshit."

King Shadow didn't bother responding. The wounds he suffered were closing - slowly, more slowly than they had been since the beginning of the fight Sorun had noted - but they were still rapidly healing. It was enough that King Shadow seemed to get some of his composure back, and made it known he was still willing and able to fight by taking a step forwards.

A step forwards was all he managed before he froze entirely. It was a pause so sudden even Sorun was a bit surprised by it, by that and the intense shock that instantly formed in King Shadow's eyes. He slowly dipped his head down, something like fear appearing on his face as he looked towards his feet.

He'd let out a strangled gasp when he saw his shoes littered in deep gashes, the occasional electrical spark sputtering out from one of the cuts made in the footwear.

Of course Sorun had been aiming for the shoes when he'd finally caught King Shadow in the Judgement Cut End. They'd been his true goal, though severely wounding King Shadow to this state, if not outright decommissioning him entirely, had been a swell enough bonus. As far as he knew, unlike Sonic, all his speed depended on those things. Even without them he may have had advanced speed above a Mobian's norm, but Sorun doubted it was above his own while in Devil's Body. Even if it was as long as it slowed him down that Sorun could actually hit him it didn't matter.

So yeah. He'd aimed for the shoes. As far as Sorun cared it was the equivalent of cutting his legs off.

"Yeah, that's right." Sorun ripped Yamato from its scabbard as he began stomping towards King Shadow. "No more zipping around on fucking rocket shoes for you."

The expression that formed on King Shadow's face caused Sorun to pause in his footsteps, more out of surprise than anything else. He'd thought he'd seen the upper limits on how angry King Shadow could look, both him and the actual Shadow Sorun knew. That anger or frustration could only bring him so far and that Sorun had seen all of what he had to offer in that department. He just wasn't the kind of person that ever went beyond quiet anger.

Apparently that was wrong, because Sorun didn't think he'd encountered the expression King Shadow wore when he looked up at him on anyone else in his entire life. To call him angry or livid would be a gross understatement. There was such fury twisted onto the hedgehog's face that it was almost staggering to see how angry a single person could get. He could practically feel the rage wafting off of him. Hell, for all his Chaos powers for all Sorun knew he really was projecting tangible anger for him to feel. Either that or he left that much of an impression.

But none of that could have prepared him for the sight of a single, lone tear rolling down from eyes that, just now, Sorun had realized held more than anger and rage than his face. He looked almost distraught. Pained. Not from physical wounds, but from something deeper. With that added into the rage he held it formed an expression Sorun would have figured was reserved for when someone's mother was just shot to death in front of them. He couldn't fathom why he held that expression until he remembered that King Shadow hadn't looked nearly upset until he figured out Sorun destroyed his special shoes.

"How attached was he to those things that he's crying over them?" Sorun wondered. Despite the fact he'd just crippled King Shadow's mobility, something primal in himself was letting off warning signs, and he found himself growing wary of his opponent. "Guess I'd be upset if my coat got permanently ruined, but come on-"

Mid-thought King Shadow had disappeared, and Sorun found himself remembering that there were other abilities the half-Mobian held on account of his alien DNA outside of what he'd encountered already. Such as teleporting. And stopping time. He didn't know which one King Shadow just used, but he was cognizant of the presence suddenly behind him and the sound of crackling energy.

In a desperate bid Sorun whirled around, raising his sword up defensively. By the time he managed to see King Shadow he'd already been mid-swing with a Chaos Spear. He'd felt Yamato's edge brush up against the spear, but he'd been too late to even attempt at parrying or blocking the strike. By the time Sorun managed to recognize what was happening it was far too late.

That was primarily the reason why the Chaos Spear ended up cutting through his whole neck.

This thing was an impossibility.

Thing. Oddity. Anomaly. Those were the only labels Shadow could see himself giving Sorun, because he couldn't see him as an Overlander. Or that strange lot that lived in the city in the mountain, those humans. Humans and Overlanders didn't have abilities of this caliber. Not even the odd technomancer that cropped up among Overlanders, like that annoying woman from the eastern lands he'd killed long ago. Humans and Overlanders in general had such weak Chaos Force links they never manifested abilities outside of those exceptions.

He'd thought as much until they first met twenty-five years ago on Space Colony ARK. He hadn't had white hair then, or these enhanced physical attributes, or that thing he kept swinging around. He had everything else. The face, demeanor, clothes. Missing was the flippant attitude he'd held.

That and those... arms. The ones he'd broken Shadow with. He fully expected those to come out at some point during the fight in an attempt to twist Shadow into submission yet again, prepared for it, even, but they never sprouted over his shoulders. They never showed up even once, not a hint of them, which was an extreme curiosity to Shadow. Maybe Sorun didn't figure they'd be useful to countering his speed, and to be fair, he'd be right.

Or maybe he didn't have them. Which would support the argument that Sorun was telling the truth in that they never met. Shadow hadn't believed him, not a word, but that in addition with the lack of those arms, these new powers... well, frankly he had to wonder if he was telling the truth and it really was someone completely different. The fact he showed no visible age from back then lead credence to it. A son, maybe, the age fit, the coat could have been handed down, but the fact they had the exact same face and voice made him hesitant to accept that theory.

Something didn't add up. He wanted to know what, because he hadn't gotten this far leaving unknowns and curiosities in his wake, things that posed a risk coming up to bite him in the back when he gave slack. He'd learned that particular lesson long ago. But the fact he and that blue meddler were playing for keeps and refused to back down, and that somehow Sorun had evaded death itself, took precedent over unraveling a curious mystery. Not after all the work he'd done towards finally making a peaceful world. He wouldn't let anything or anyone put that in jeopardy.

It was somewhat of a shame Sorun would die before Shadow would ever figure out what exactly his deal had been, but it wasn't as if it would matter once he died. Give it a few decades and the memory would fade away. It wasn't important in the grand scheme of things.

He thought it'd be as simple as overwhelming Sorun with sheer speed until the fight had actually begun. He honestly didn't know what Sorun had done to himself. What his abilities really were, where this strength that he obviously hadn't had before came from, what the significance behind the change of hair was. He almost suspected it to be a Super form of some sort, maybe even a bootleg or poor mimic, but that theory was cast aside. It didn't appear anything of the sort and he would have felt such a thing. Another mystery to be cast aside with the anomaly's corpse.

It would have been as easy as that, but whatever change Sorun had gone under was significant, though he was still slow. Oh, he was fast, there was no doubt on that. From observing Shadow concluded that this new Sorun could move at speeds even a Mobian couldn't perceive. To him it was still slow as could be. No, the danger was his strength. That and his... recovery ability.

That was what was really throwing him for a loop. His hits were landing, he knew they were. The blood surrounding the boy proved that he was doing damage. But every time he'd looked back there wasn't so much as a single wound on Sorun's body. He'd peg it as regeneration, but to think he could heal so fast the wound disappeared in practically the same breath as the wound being inflicted was impossible. Not when even Shadow himself couldn't regenerate to such an insane degree. But something was going on with him that was making it so wounds just weren't sticking. Even that strange coat of his was repairing any damage it sustained.

Another oddity. Another mystery. Another thing to forget about once this was over with.

The fight itself was progressing along how Shadow had expected it to. There were admittedly some hiccups, ones he should have predicted beforehand, but they were easily circumvented. It would have easily concluded in his victory if that meddler, that false king, that... pretender hadn't decided that being knocked around senseless one time around hadn't been enough.

It shouldn't have mattered. That blue hedgehog was old and worn. That boy just didn't have the power. Shadow should have been able to handle them easily enough until Sorun had unleashed that... attack. The one with the field of blue energy surrounding him.

He'd tried using it multiple times in the fight. Every sense, Mobian and otherwise, screamed at Shadow that he absolutely did not want to get caught in whatever it was. He'd been able to knock him out of performing it a few times before he fully prepared it, and that had been working well enough, but then the false king Sonic interfered. Bought the human enough time to prepare the attack. And if it weren't for him sacrificing himself like a queen on a chess board he could have simply avoided going near Sorun.

Except he had. Shadow's instincts must have been true, because Sonic apparently thought the attack was worth taking a devastating hit just to get Shadow in its attack range - what he assumed the blue circle surrounding Sorun represented. He hadn't even had the time to react before it happened.

Pain, deep and excruciating, had erupted on multiple points of his body. Simultaneously, with no gaps between them. Time manipulation of some sort, had to be, and considering what happened on the ARK he couldn't be that surprised; he'd hit him with such a cheap trick before after all.

But this was different. The influence on time was there, but subtle. The feeling of space temporarily being warped, seeing pieces of reality fragment out of the space around them before it repaired itself, the cuts all along his body that somehow felt like more than cuts, the overwhelming amount of that rancid energy that lingered in the air. The pain of those horrible, grievous wounds.

Worry that hadn't bloomed in so long he'd nearly forgotten the feeling spread in his chest. Genuine worry for his own life was beginning to show, and he didn't like it. It wasn't supposed to be feasibly possible. The entire reason he was engineered was to be superior to all other lifeforms. Biology couldn't outpace him. Engineering couldn't overcome him, and Robotnik had stressed that theory to the limit before his demise. His power over Chaos was supposed to be second to none.

And Sorun had none of that. None. So why was he getting so far? What was he?

The fact he had to kneel there, heavily panting while struggling in his mind not to succumb to the pain of his wounds was just as nauseating as the wounds themselves. The cooling sensation of pain being deadened by his regeneration was a comforting one, but the repairs were going slower than he would have liked; his powers were being pushed to their limits with these cuts, and with everything that'd already happened the beginning tinges of exhaustion were already setting in.

"How the hell are you still standing?" Shadow looked up. Sorun was just standing there, that... look in his eyes. It was something so beyond contempt Shadow couldn't even comprehend what it was. Scorn the likes of which nobody had ever dared give him of all people, even before he'd been crowned king. It was more insulting than the wounds he'd inflicted. "Oh, you're kidding. Black Arms DNA is such bullshit."

It wasn't a total shock Sorun knew of his origins, G.U.N. had leaked all sorts of information before its disbandment and he hadn't cared enough to try and plug information leaks over the decades, but it was still somewhat surprising. Then again, he'd known where Space Colony ARK was. How that had been possible he'd never discovered, and every Overlander he'd ever spoken with swore they'd never even heard of him. And he'd been thorough with the questioning.

Still, it didn't matter. He felt some indignation at the language used at him, but it was false bravado at the end of the day. A single glance told Shadow that the blue hedgehog was unconscious and down for the count, which just left Sorun. And as there was no way Shadow would ever go into that attack again, he was essentially defenseless against him while Shadow himself couldn't be touched.

Shakily, he stood up to his feet in open defiance to Sorun's insulting gaze and took a step forwards. It would be over in a matter of moments. He'd aim for his limbs, dismember him one by one starting with the arm holding that infuriating-

The jets on his sneakers didn't fire.

A strangled, uncontrollable gasp left Shadow. That shouldn't be possible. Those sneakers were designed to be as timeless as him, by a mind greater than anyone else this planet had ever produced. They'd never failed him even once in his over eighty decades of life. The technology was infallible. Perfect. There was no possible way they could fail to activate even after he began directing his Chaos energy into the devices... unless...

Terror, actual terror completely separate and unrelated to Shadow's own life, gripped his heart as he slowly looked down. They couldn't be damaged. That couldn't happen. The worst of G.U.N.s weapons and Robotnik's machinations never so much as laid a scratch on his precious footwear. There was no conceivable way-

Something inside of Shadow broke when he finally saw his sneakers. They were in tatters. So many cuts and fissures that half of the shoes were practically gone, circuitry and wires spilling out of the exposed parts. Any attempt at activating them resulted in pathetic, blue sparks being spit out from the exposed internals.

"Yeah, that's right. No more zipping around on fucking rocket shoes for you."

Sorun's voice completely failed to reach Shadow's ears. Most of the world around him faded away, his sole focus on the pieces of ruined footwear he had on. Distraught that was near a level he'd only felt once in his entire life tore through him as he took in the remains of his sneakers, or at least what little was left of them. He was so stunned he didn't even notice the single tear rolling down his face.

Images flashed through his head of a smiling old man and a laughing girl. Hundreds and hundreds of images that remained crystal clear despite every other unrelated memory dulling with time. Among them was the image of the both of them presenting those very same shoes he cherished so much, both holding joyous llooks. The shoes that had been his only companion ever since those two people were lost to him. His only mementos.

He ruined them.

There was rage as the world faded back into his senses. Anger that sent his blood boiling as he looked up at Sorun, the corners of his vision tinted red. He'd paused while moving towards Shadow, some of the contempt fading from his eyes to show surprise at Shadow's sudden turn.

Shadow didn't care. His power flexed outwards, a red ring spreading out from him and temporarily bathing the entire world in inverted colors for a few moments before everything returned back to their normal colorization. Everything, from physical objects to Sorun to the air itself had been completely frozen as time ground to a halt, all except for Shadow, who began trudging forwards with heavy pants.

By now his wounds were only halfway towards being healed and he was really feeling the strain. Were he in top physical form he would have formed a Chaos Spear right now and skewered Sorun's face while in the stopped time, but with how he was now he was struggling just to maintain the halted time. He'd have to do with appearing behind him and beheading him with a hastily-made Chaos Spear once he let go of the power.

He deserved more as far as Shadow was concerned. He'd doled out far worse deaths to those who had done far less, but what Sorun had done, in addition to what he was trying to do, called for so much more. A simple beheading, such a quick and clean death, felt almost like a disservice. But he couldn't help it. So much hate boiling in him for the thing standing frozen in front of him. What he was, what he represented, the humiliation given to Shadow by him time and time again, ruining his most precious mementos...

There was no question that the person standing before him was the person he hated most in the entire world. So he couldn't control himself from moving forwards to cut his head off so he didn't have to deal with him anymore.

Once Shadow was in position behind Sorun, time resumed. The instant the power left and the world returned to motion was the same moment a Chaos Spear sprang to life in his hand. Sorun, surprisingly, had caught on to what he was doing and had whirled around, blade in hand. By then Shadow had already swung, and though he was near successful in intercepting it with his blade, Sorun had been just too slow.

He thought he'd feel satisfaction in seeing the Chaos Spear cleave through Sorun's neck entirely, leaving a large, red line. At seeing the mixture of shock and surprise on Sorun's face after getting his head severed from his body. But there was nothing. No satisfaction, no relief, no anything. Nothing but pain for the loss of the sneakers, and not even beheading Sorun was enough to ease the aches he felt in his heart.

Shadow turned around in disgust, not even bothering to watch Sorun's head drop away from his body. His eyes locked onto Sonic's body nearby. A snarl tore past his lips as he made his way towards the still body, Chaos Spear clenched in his hand. Everything was his fault. His and Sorun's. Him, that miserable mutant fox and family of echidna, everything. To having his rule threatened, to have all the work he'd done towards bettering the world go to waste, for destroying the last thing he had of her-!

The blade of a katana burst out through Shadow's chest. He gasped out in shock and pain, reflexively snapping his hand up to grab at the blade piercing through him. He heard ragged breathing from behind him, right next to his ear, and Shadow had a hard time figuring out if he was shaking from the blade piercing him or the impossible thought racing through his mind trying to make sense of this impossible event happening to him right now. It was less he'd turned his head around and more his own body forced it to confirm that the impossible hadn't happened, in order to assure his screaming mind something impossible hadn't happened.

Something impossible happened. Sorun had stabbed him. Sorun's head was still on his shoulders. The shocked and surprised look he wore when Shadow's Chaos Spear cleaved through his neck was replaced by a mad, frenzied look in his eyes that he wasn't even trying to hide.

"H-how...!?" This shouldn't have been happening. He should be dead . He killed him! He'd killed him multiple times by now! "Why won't you die!?"

"Regeneration."

There was no end to the malice that completely comprised the single word said by Sorun. It was less said and more hissed out, with more venom and hatred than Shadow thought possible.

And still, he wasn't satisfied with that simple explanation. A regenerative ability didn't explain it. Regeneration didn't save you from having your head cut off. He knew it didn't for him, so for anyone else it was impossible. Completely. It didn't make sense.

The suggestion was so outrageous, the audacity he would claim such a thing, lit a new fire of rage inside of Shadow and caused him to roar out as he swung his Chaos Spear. The blade was torn out of him as Sorun leapt back a fair distance, though he kept his eyes locked onto Shadow the entire time as the king turned around to face him.

"I cut your head off," he angrily snarled at him. "You couldn't have grown a new head! That isn't in the realm of possibility!" It was a bluff. Had to be. He didn't see a severed head lying around, and there would have been no way to transfer memories. Even if he grew a new head it would have been a cloned head with a freshly cloned brain. No experience, no memories. He shouldn't even have been cognizant if that were the case.

"Grow a new head? You're mistaken." Looking insulted himself, past all the hate and contempt he wore, Sorun reached a hand up to wipe a thumb over the bloody line on his neck. The skin underneath was completely unmarred and fresh, as if Shadow had never even struck it. Just like the rest of his body. "The regen's so quick it healed over. By the time your Chaos Spear came out of my neck it was already mostly healed."

"Regeneration isn't that fast." It couldn't have been. It wasn't possible. That would have been engineered into him if it were. "You're lying."

"Why? Just because you're the 'Ultimate Lifeform' and nothing's supposed to be better than you?" With a roll of his eyes Sorun nodded his head behind Shadow. Towards where the blue hedgehog was. "Oh, wait, there's Sonic over there. The guy's who's faster than you without your stupid shoes."

Shadow's teeth clacked together as his nerves flared. "Don't you dare..."

"I bet it grates you to no fucking end how you were engineered to be this perfect super weapon and some random hedgehog without a scrap of bullshit alien DNA was just born better at something than you," Sorun continued, tone scathing as he affixed Shadow with a hateful sneer. Shadow bristled uncontrollably at that look. "Hell, even in the true timeline you had a rivalry with the guy, but at least the real version of you was way more humble about it. I liked that guy. I liked him a lot. He was real down to earth. You, though..." Something, maybe sadness or pity, flickered in Sorun's eyes, but it was drowned in the hate and derision shortly after. "You're fucking nothing compared to him. Loser who has to have everything his way and turns into a crybaby over a pair of shoes. You shouldn't even exist. None of this should."

Somewhere inside of Shadow something had snapped. Having heard enough, he disappeared from his location and appeared next to Sorun, Chaos Spear mid-swing. Simply teleporting seemed to be much more ineffectual than moving within the stopped time, however, as either he'd been expecting it or Sorun's reflexes were sufficient in intercepting him. The Chaos Spear was less parried and more simply batted away by Sorun's sword, as if he felt so much disrespect he wasn't even bothering to take proper form with his sword.

Even more Shadow found his limits being pushed. At Sorun's words. His attitude. The fact he just wouldn't die . Nothing he was doing worked: teleporting around Sorun to try and surprise him would just result in him swinging the sword at Shadow, something he had no hope in overcoming other than to simply block or dodge, and with his exhaustion coupled with the teleportation delay he couldn't deploy it fast enough for rapid position switching to try and confuse the monster.

Throwing the Chaos Spear was even more ineffectual. He'd just sidestep it if it soared towards him, lazily, as if to personally insult Shadow. He'd tried tossing it at Sorun's feet, charging the Chaos Spear to explode and perhaps catch him in the explosion, but somehow Sorun knew they would explode and would just leap or sprint away before that spot would be engulfed in an explosion of energy.

Another sphere of warped space engulfed Shadow. He knew what followed this, and tried his best diving out of the way of it. His speed even with the sneakers were far above a normal Mobian's, but even that wasn't enough to save him from catching a few new cuts from the strange slashing effects that manifested inside whatever that sphere was. Sorun knew he was at a disadvantage without them, too, because he kept releasing that power. Over and over. To Shadow's credit he managed to dodge some. Some, but not all.

He was left a panting, bleeding mess, once again riddled in gashes his powers were trying desperately to heal. The thought of blood loss was yelling out to him somewhere in his mind, though he tried pushing it away. That and the sensation of his body constantly reminding him of his exhaustion. Sorun, from across the throne room, wasn't blind to his obvious health, and stopped where he was. With the way he was breathing heavily he seemed almost as exhausted as Shadow was, even if he didn't have the wounds to show it. Even still he didn't look victorious over Shadow's visually worse state. Not even happy in the slightest. He just kept staring at him like he was something that brought Sorun visible distress just to look at.

The blue ribbon attached to the scabbard of whatever that weapon was wrapped itself around Sorun's waist. He gripped the sword's handle with both hands, twisting it around and bringing the sword up to his eye level with the tip of the blade pointed directly at Shadow. Blue arcs of lightning began dancing around the length of the blade.

"I'll find a way to erase this timeline and bring back the real one. The one that's supposed to be here. The only one that should." More Chaos energy began crackling along the blade's length, and off Sorun's own body. The incomprehensibly concentrated Chaos energy that was somehow being emitted by that sword was so intense that it came off as a deep, blue fog gathering and swirling around Sorun and the sword.

Shadow reeled from the power. Not by the amount of it, but from the quality. What if felt like. From the moment Sorun had first entered the throne room he felt it, that sword. There was something intensely, extremely wrong with it, but Shadow just didn't know what it was or why it felt wrong. It just was.

But now that he could feel it so clearly due to its sudden intensity it was all too clear. It was Chaos energy so warped by whatever Sorun had done to it that it barely even felt like Chaos energy. Twisted beyond recognition. Cold where Chaos energy was warm. Intrusive and prickling on his senses when Chaos energy, even radiated by his opponents, had always felt inviting. But this was foul, stifling, and...

Pulsing. Like something with a heartbeat. But it was a heartbeat with a rhythm so off and wrong that it couldn't possibly be a beat made from a heart.

It could have been the severe blood loss Shadow was no doubt facing. That, the disorienting sensation from trying to focus in on the energy that sword was producing, anger clouding his vision, a number of combination of things. But past that swirling blue energy and sparks around the sword's silver blade, for just a moment, he could have sworn he saw them. Eyes. Dozens of eyes, housed in the blade's reflective surface, mottled in blackish-blue flesh. All staring at Shadow with the exact same look of pure disdain Sorun held. Even their color was the same as his eyes. But when he blinked, that image of the eyes in the sword was gone.

A momentary hallucination due to all the stresses on his body and mind. It was the only acceptable answer Shadow could think of. But it didn't explain why half of his very being, the Black Arms DNA that comprised his cells, was screaming at Shadow that the abomination Sorun was holding needed to be thrown into the nearest star.

"You, this castle, this world's history, all of it." The rancid Chaos energy flowing around Sorun intensified as he spoke. "I'm turning everything back to normal."

"Normal?" Of all the things Sorun had said, of all the spiteful, infuriating things he'd said and done, somehow that was worse than everything else to Shadow. He didn't mean to simply undo his work like the blue hedgehog did. At least if that happened there'd be history of what he'd done, everything he accomplished. Something for people to look back on as a guideline for how things should be should the worse pass. People loyal to him that would carry on even should he fail. A legacy made it so that wasn't a completely hopeless situation.

But what Sorun wanted... was so much worse. He didn't want to undo his work. He wanted to erase it completely! That and this entire world! Everything! All just to bring it back to... to that . That time. That awful, awful time. And the way he said it, that look in his eyes, it all conveyed the message to Shadow that Sorun didn't even think he or anything else in this timeline had a right to exist. That because they weren't in the "normal" timeline he and everyone else was less than worthless. Because they weren't "normal" in Sorun's eyes. That they were less than people.

It infuriated Shadow. Enraged him. More than that, it horrified and disgusted him. Why anybody would ever want to go back to that horrible time when things here were so much better, where the world was united and the world hadn't been torn apart by degenerates like Dr. Robotnik and other of his ilk. He wanted to bring them back. Bring everything that was wrong with the world back while doing away with people he didn't consider living people. It was revolting.

"Why!? Why are you so insistent on going back to that time!?" Shadow screamed out at him. "I saved everyone from that insanity, and you want to bring it all back!? Insanity like Robotnik!? Others like him!? You'd bring them back to life along with everything else!"

Some small part of Shadow had hoped Sorun would see sense. That he maybe misunderstood the gravity of his desire, that maybe he hadn't thought it through and wouldn't keep going forwards when the full weight of what he was trying to do crashed down on him. But he wasn't relenting in the slightest. His cold gaze remained firm and the energy swirling around him only intensified.

"I dealt with every single villainous scum plaguing this world and united everyone years before that blue cretin did in his timeline!" Shadow continued screaming out, his voice growing hysteric. "This world had peace YEARS before he managed it! Do you not think that means there are people alive in this time that never even existed in the other time!? That people that died in that time are alive in this one!? If you do this, you'll kill them all! They'll cease to exist! ARE YOU THAT SELFISH!?"

Sorun moved forwards, and not in a way Shadow expected. There was a flash of bright, blue light from the sword, and Sorun's body seemingly slid forwards without him actually moving. Like the space separating the two of them suddenly vanished and he'd been pulled to Shadow's position, almost too fast for him to react. He'd gasped out, raising his arms up to block the incoming strike from Sorun's sword. It clashed against the golden rings on his wrists, the blade struggling and sparking against them as Sorun continued pushing with the blade.

"And what about people who are dead here that are alive there!? What about people like that scientist you killed, Cobor, huh!?" Sorun yelled out as he struggled against the two rings. "Don't they deserve to live just as much!?"

Shadow found himself losing in the struggle. Against that cursed blade pulsing with blue energy, against Sorun who continued pushing against it. He tried to fight back as hard as he could, but to his utter shock Sorun kept pushing him back.

"Y-you... you're insane...!" Shadow gasped out, even as he tried calling on every bit of power he had to try and fail to push Sorun back. "People shouldn't have to die just for your selfish desires!"

Sorun didn't respond. As he continued slicing down on Shadow's wristbands, he heard it. A small crack at first, followed by subsequent, louder cracks. He looked towards the source, crimson eyes widening when he saw the sword's blade begin to chip and break through what were supposed to be the indestructible, golden rings on his wrists. The cracks became larger and more pronounced the further the blade dug into them, and red sparks of Chaos energy began arcing out from the cracks.

Were he not fighting for his life Shadow's arms would have gone slack in shock. He was actually meaning to break through the rings to get to Shadow. By all accounts that was... possibly the poorest possible choice Sorun could make. He'd intentionally guarded with the rings thinking Sorun would go out of his way to avoid them because the risk for breaking them was too great. When he actually struck Shadow figured he had taken a risk, not figuring his sword would slice through the rings.

He was honestly more surprised that Sorun was actually trying to do it than that he even could do it. Shadow only needed a moment's thought to figure out why he would ever try to do such a thing.

"He doesn't know about the inhibitor rings." That was the only conceivable explanation. There was no way Sorun would actually go for the rings otherwise.

It was probably the one saving grace that would win him this fight. As it was, there were a number of ways Shadow could have avoided the sword cutting deeper and deeper into the rings. From teleportation to stopping time to simply trying his luck to roll out of the way in hopes the blade would miss. Maybe even try to knock Sorun back with a Chaos Blast with his remaining reserve of Chaos energy. Any one of these methods would have been viable.

Instead Shadow chose to let Sorun cut through the rings and cut his hands off.

In hindsight, at some point in time, maybe Sorun should have asked the real Shadow what the deal was with the rings he wore on his wrists.

He always found it odd. Shadow never seemed like one to accessorize. The rocket shoes somewhat flew in the face of that, but they at least served a function. They got him around. That should have been Sorun's first hint that the rings he wore on his wrists, too, more than likely served some kind of function, and weren't just mere trinkets he wore. Because Shadow had been one of those Mobians that wore nothing but gloves and footwear, so the rings always seemed off to Sorun.

The second hint should have been that they looked just like Power Rings. That was probably significant.

He really should have asked.

After he killed King Shadow's shoes the fight had been going well enough. Cutting off the hedgehog's mobility like he had really put the ball in Sorun's court, because compared to that annoying aspect of King Shadow's, the rest of his powers and abilities were manageable.

Admittedly getting his... head nearly cut off... hadn't been ideal. There'd been a moment where Sorun genuinely thought he'd died there, but the neck wound had healed before the despair even set in, and he remembered his body regenerated so fast he doubted Sonic could even cut his head off fast enough to beat it. Probably the only thing Sorun had over King Shadow was that his regeneration was so much faster than his, something Shadow seemed to have a hard time believing.

Apparently demons beat out aliens on healing. Go figure.

That healing was probably the only reason Sorun even had a shot at winning, because there was a realistic chance he could just bleed King Shadow out before he himself fell. Even so, it wasn't a given, and Sorun's stamina was waning heavily, so he'd wanted to land a definitive blow and end the fight without leaving it to chance. He'd been hoping to catch King Shadow off guard by tricking him with the Yamato - using its separation power to separate the space between them so he'd instantly appear, and then use the surprise to land the definitive blow. He would have just preferred to have Trickster for a proper teleport, but a discount teleport would be better than nothing.

Or it would have been if Sorun had actually landed the hit, but King Shadow had blocked with the rings. So naturally Sorun endeavored to cut through them, maybe take King Shadow's hands in the process and make it easier on himself. To be fair he'd actually managed that. He'd even felt relieved when he felt his body suddenly lurched forwards, and saw pieces of ring and a set of hands fly away out of the edges of his vision.

And then King Shadow started glowing red. Not just the crimson stripes on his fur, but even his black fur, the white patch on his chest, and the tan fur on his muzzle. Every single part of his body began glowing red, began radiating Chaos energy thick enough that Sorun felt it crackling against his skin, and he realized right then and there this started happening because he cut through the two rings.

After that King Shadow exploded. Literally.

If Sorun were running a human body he would have died right there. In fact he was reasonably sure his whole face was flash-vaporized down to the skull after he was blasted, and then completely regenerated in the process of him being thrown back. He wasn't completely certain, but he knew he'd been blinded for a moment and he hadn't been able to feel anything in that time. Once the nerves regenerated all he felt was the sensation of being thrown backwards.

Then he hit a wall.

The fact that the entire wall, the entirety of the wall that made up that section of the throne room, completely fractured and splintered upon Sorun crashing into it was a testament to just how hard he'd been slammed into it. He'd slid down into a sitting position, panting heavily as he struggled to catch his breath even with his regeneration aiding him. When he looked down at his arms he saw that the sleeves had been blown away entirely, the coat slowly growing back over oddly clean-looking arms that Sorun suspected were freshly regenerated after having been completely destroyed from the explosion.

He was less worried about that and more on the fact his hands were empty.

A quick upwards glance revealed the blue Chaos Emerald all the way on the other side of the throne room and far away from where Sorun was. Likely blown away from him in the blast, or more likely he momentarily hadn't had fingers to grip onto the thing to prevent himself from losing it. Now it'd lost its sword form due to missing contact with him and was a disparaging distance away from him. He'd silently cursed at that, at losing the sword simply because it'd been tossed away from him. He counted himself fortunate that he'd had the foresight to surgically put the second Chaos Emerald inside of himself as a safety net, but the simple loss of Yamato justified in his mind how much Sorun hated relying on items for these life and death situations.

The giant beacon of red light standing between Sorun and the Emerald, of course, was the main reason Sorun didn't leap up and immediately try to go for the Emerald. That and he just didn't think he could get to it, with his energy exhausted to the point he was fighting to stay up. Even if he could Sorun wasn't sure he could, locked in awe and fear as he was staring at the thing slowly approaching him.

King Shadow had... Sorun didn't even know. Undergone some transformation that turned the entirety of his body red. A violent, churning red aura was permanently flailing around him with such intensity that the throne room flooring was being torn apart from his mere proximity to it, his footsteps leaving molten footprints in his wake.

And he wouldn't stop looking at Sorun. Even though his eyes had gone completely white, either from the transformation or due to his frenzied rage, Sorun could feel the hedgehog staring right at him as he approached. The power he was exuding was so intense that Sorun felt himself being pressed into the wall he'd been slammed into, felt his skin smoldering from the intensity of the power King Shadow was projecting alone.

Deep inside Sorun knew. A dreadful realization that, even with Yamato, he didn't have a chance of beating this thing. That primal and instinctual part of him was telling him flat-out this was an opponent beyond him, and with him losing the sword he was beyond hopeless. The only reason he wasn't being crushed to death under the weight of this power was because of Devil's Body, and even then he was struggling to weather it.

"This...? He... he had this kind of power the entire time...?"

There was movement along the stumps where King Shadow's hands had been cut off. Chaos energy, so condensed and pure it appeared to be a shifting, liquid form glowing an intense, blazing crimson, flowed out from the wounds. It was less the hands regenerated and more the raw Chaos energy simply formed itself into the shape of hands to mimic the function, and in those faux hands a single long Chaos Spear formed. A weapon that lacked the usual greenish-yellow hue. This Chaos Spear was an intense red, crackling with such energy and heat the air around it was being warped. All throughout the entire process King Shadow didn't halt his progress towards Sorun, or keep his burning gaze off the frozen human who could do nothing but stare at his approaching doom.

"You're... you're nothing but a monster... a demon... only a demon would use such a despicably perverse weapon like that thing you held..." King Shadow's voice was empowered enough that the very air was reverberating from its vibrations. It only emboldened the terror that was rapidly swelling inside of Sorun as King Shadow came within a meter of him. "I will not... let you kill countless people just to fulfill your warped desires... I promised her I would save this world... I promised her...!"

He rose the red Chaos Spear above his head, point directed right at Sorun. It shone with such intensity that the entire room almost looked darkened in comparison. Like the sun itself was right in front of Sorun and poised to strike through him. He wondered if there'd even be anything left of him once it hit. With how much energy he felt radiating off of that weapon he wouldn't be surprised if King Shadow ended up obliterating the entire castle with that thing.

It almost ended right there. Sorun had no doubt, absolutely zero, that being hit with that Chaos Spear would mean death for him, regeneration or not. All he could do was sit there, completely helpless, as King Shadow moved to thrust it down on him. He'd seen the muscles move, the tip of the spear descend towards him while King Shadow maintained that hellish gaze. It if weren't for the fact the energy pinning him down was so stifling Sorun would have screamed out in fury, outrage, and fear at his impending death. As it was all he could do was stare with horrified eyes as that terrible spear descended on him.

And then a pair of hands reached out from behind King Shadow and grabbed his head. A number of things followed this: King Shadow, who for all intents and purposes was the victor of the fight, began screaming. The red Chaos Spear faded from his grasp. The entire transformation faded, the Chaos energy supplementing his hands, the raging, red aura, the completely red body and white eyes, all of it. He reverted back to his normal form as his entire body was engulfed with a new, green aura of Chaos energy. Something that he quite obviously was doing his best to oppose as he flailed around in the grip locking his head in a vice.

After that he'd... frozen. Completely, and without warning. It was such a sudden thing, his screaming and flailing coming to such an abrupt halt, that Sorun almost assumed that, somehow, time had stopped. But there was no way it had, because he still managed to hear the quiet, ambient sounds of the empty throne room, and the green aura completely surrounding King Shadow's body was constantly in a state of movement, flowing around the black and red hedgehog. And yet the king himself was more than immobile - he was truly frozen in place. Expression completely locked in that terrible, raging expression, eyes motionless, handless arms uselessly trying to reach back and remove whatever was grabbing him. Somehow he looked more still than a statue.

It was like he was completely frozen in time.

Right when Sorun was catching his breath, his mind a whirlwind of relief over having narrowly avoided death again and confusion and lingering vestiges of fear, he saw a head with a smiling face poke over the frozen King Shadow's shoulder. Sorun couldn't help the exasperated sigh that left him when he saw it was Lara-Su's face, Knuckles' daughter. Any other time he would have had a negative reaction to the exuberant joy she held on her face, but at the moment he couldn't muster up the energy to do anything.

"Hey! Looks like I got here just in time!" The echidna teen maneuvered around King Shadow's frozen body - Sorun couldn't stop staring at it - and stood out in front of Sorun, bent down with a hand outstretched towards him. "I got here near the end of the fight. I hardly even needed to look for you two - the amount of Chaos energy you two were bleeding off was crazy!"

It took a few moments for Sorun to realize that the hand being offered to him was a sign that she wanted to help him up. He blinked at the appendage, and then, shakily, rose a hand up and accepted the hand. He was pulled up to his feet, though with how his legs wobbled Sorun was surprised he didn't fall right back down, and he didn't know if it was whether due to exhaustion or sheer shock over what just happened.

He still couldn't stop staring at King Shadow and his frozen expression. Really, he had no idea what was going on.

"You have a really funny surprised face." That single sentence was enough to drag Sorun out of his stupor and look besides him. There was a sheepish, teasing grin on Lara-Su's face. "I-I'm sorry, I just couldn't help myself from pointing it out. What's the matter?"

"No-nothing, I... you..." Sorun looked away from the echidna and back towards King Shadow. "What did you do to him?"

"Really advanced Chaos Control technique," she replied, leaning around Sorun so she could stare at the king along with him. "Used a bit of time manipulation to force him in a stasis bubble. He's not aware of anything. As far as we have to worry he's stuck in there until the effect wears off."

"Ah... ah-huh..." Numbly, Sorun looked back at Lara-Su. "And how long will that take?"

The lighthearted smile she wore turned significantly more smug as she turned her nose away from Sorun. "Oh, I would count on him still being in there for my grandkids to see. And my grandkids' grandkids. And their grandkids. And so on and so forth."

"Oh, you can... you can just do that, alright..." Well that was certainly busted and overpowering to a degree that Sorun could barely comprehend it. He didn't even know that kind of thing was possible. Either Lara-Su inherited more than just good genes and powers from Knuckles or she really was a prodigy with this Chaos Control stuff. Or both, maybe. Sorun didn't know, and from how terrifying that thought was, that she could just pause somebody in time for that long, he didn't want to keep thinking on it.

There was still a sense of confusion going through him even though there shouldn't have been. Whiplash from going towards inevitable death to the threat being taken care of in such a short manner of time he was still recovering from it. Some parts of him were still shaking, eyes still locked onto King Shadow. Harmless now. Completely neutralized when he'd almost killed Sorun literal seconds prior. The fact that the danger had passed and that they'd technically won hadn't even crossed his mind as he stood there, stock still and staring as he shallowly breathed out.

"Won, we... we won, it's over? I-I, it's... We did it? I did it? She... it's really over, just like that? I'm not dead?"

"Hey, uh..." Distantly, he felt Lara-Su tug on the newly regenerated sleeve on his coat. Through great effort Sorun managed to turn his head towards her. "Not to ruin the moment, but what'd you do to your hair?"

Sorun didn't respond. His gaze had shifted back towards the frozen King Shadow. He maintained his gaze for a few seconds, and then turned his head slightly, so that he was staring at the blue Chaos Emerald across the room. He began to move towards it.

"Er, uh, guy? Sorun? Hey, what are... alright." Lara-Su trailed off as Sorun silently passed her on the way to the Chaos Emerald. Her eyes followed him, a slightly perturbed look on her face, but she shrugged it off and then turned towards the throne room entrance when she saw movement. "Oh hey, Tails!"

The flying fox flew into the throne room, his eyes immediately locked onto the motionless, blue hedgehog lying at the center of the room. Both he and Lara-Su raced to his position, concern written on their faces as they attempted to rouse him. Their relief became evident when Sonic groaned out, slowly sitting up with Tails' help while rubbing at his head.

"Ugh, what, uh... what happened? We do it?" He looked towards the other hedgehog on the other side of the room, blinking when he saw the green aura around his frozen form. "Ehck! What happened to him?"

Sorun reached the blue Chaos Emerald. He bent down and picked it up, the glowing gem shifting into the katana. He turned right back around and began moving back towards where King Shadow was.

"Oh, I did that. Froze him, I mean," Lara-Su explained to Sonic. "I saw Sorun was having some trouble with him so..."

The words faded off the further Sorun got from the trio. He barely even registered them, having stopped right in front of the paralyzed half-Mobian. Still holding that same expression with enough rage to shake the world. It almost seemed like he was looking at Sorun, even in that flailing pose.

It was difficult to classify one distinct emotion of Sorun's. Indignation. Anger, shame, defeat. Hate. Of all of them that was probably the most prevalent one, right next to indignation. All directed at the frozen figure in front of him, whirling through him and unceasing. Strong enough that Sorun almost felt his head splitting from all of it.

Once again, he'd almost died. Once again, he'd been beaten by somebody. Once again someone stronger and blessed with more power had to come save him because he just couldn't do it. The fact that Lara-Su could just do this, could just freeze someone in time using a technique she possessed just because she was born with those powers, infuriated him to no end. He'd put his all into it, with his weapon and a body superior even to Mobians, and he'd still lost.

"Power. Why is the problem always power? Why do I never have enough of it?" There was a soft scraping sound too quiet to make an echo as the Yamato was slowly pulled from its scabbard. "Why does everyone always have to have more power than me?" His eyes snapped to the side, towards the nearby trio of Mobians. Specifically at Lara-Su. "Why does she get to have so much power? Why does she get to smile like that? Like nothing's wrong?"

He knew he couldn't smile. There was nothing to be joyful about this situation. The world was wrong and everyone in it but him was wrong. He'd almost died twice, TWICE, in the same night, but people like her and even Tails and Sonic got to go on smiling like nothing was the matter. It pissed him off to no end. Why were they smiling when everything was still wrong?

The sword was fully pulled free. Sorun shifted his gaze back to King Shadow. Him . Every emotion Sorun held was multiplied by tenfold when he stared at the frozen hedgehog, eyes widened and irises constricted at his mere sight. The one that beat him.

He couldn't stop the images that kept flashing through his mind. Him being strapped to that electric table. The fight, him cutting through Sorun's body, Sorun losing . That enraged, red form, that scorching, suffocating aura. The imminent threat of death, over and over, on that chair, in his words, in that Chaos Spear that had hung over Sorun's head. Sorun being frightened through it all.

The final image of King Shadow cutting through Sorun's neck with a Chaos Spear was what pushed him to raise Yamato up and bring it down on the Mobian's neck.

A loud and wet slicing sound echoed through the throne room. The jubilant conversation between the three Mobians died off completely, and their attention was drawn to the source of the sound. All of their eyes widened in shock and horror when they saw Sorun standing in front of King Shadow, his katana buried halfway through the frozen one's neck.

Sorun's eyes widened further in anger, furious and frustrated that the sword, the sword that was supposed to effortlessly cut through everything, his sword, didn't instantly cut through King Shadow's neck because he just had to be so fucking special . He pulled the sword out of his neck, and then cleaved the sword down on the same spot. His silent fury only increased when it still didn't go all the way through.

He kept pulling the sword out just to keep slicing at King Shadow's neck. Spurts of blood kept flying out as a result, pausing midair as they were enveloped in the same green aura that was freezing him. Frozen moments of time that only grew in volume the more he kept cutting at King Shadow's neck.

"Sorun, what are you doing!?" Sonic screamed out. He attempted to get up to sprint to Sorun's position, but then made a grunt and fell back down onto his knees, his arm held over his aching chest. He turned pain-filled eyes upwards and reached an arm out towards Sorun. "SORUN, STOP IT!"

A running pair of footsteps and the sound of a whirling pair of tails was heard approaching behind Sorun. He didn't care. They weren't sounds he was capable of hearing at the moment over the rushing sound in his ears. All that he cared about was finally cutting through King Shadow's neck.

And then, right before Lara-Su and Tails reached him, he'd done it. With one final swing the Yamato finally managed to cut cleanly through King Shadow's neck. The green aura surrounding him and the blood faded, the red liquid splattering down at Sorun's feet as the body fell limply on the ground.

His head fell down shortly after, rolling a bit before coming to a stop. King Shadow's face, expression deadened but somehow still rage filled, stared out at Sorun with glassy, dead eyes. The human stared back at the red eyes, looking almost confused as his breathing became shallow.

"I... I killed him? I killed somebody? Shadow? I killed... I killed Shadow? I killed someone?"

He would have thought he'd flash back to the real Shadow. The one he was actually friends with. That images of someone who was actually his friend would replace the images of this Shadow flashing through his mind, and then be replaced by the image of the lifeless head. But there was nothing. In fact, all the thoughts and images that kept distressing him disappeared altogether, and Sorun felt himself slowly calming down the longer he looked at the head.

"Shouldn't... aren't I supposed to feel something right now...?"

He didn't. Not sorrow over killing someone that looked just like his friend. There wasn't relief over killing the source of all his recent anguish, no joy in killing the most major threat that opposed him, no vindication for what he'd done to Sorun and others, no sorrow at the fact he'd just taken a person's life. Just... calmness. That was what was most shocking to Sorun, how calming this all felt.

The calm was ripped away when he felt a pair of hands roughly grip his shoulders and turn him around. Sonic seemed to finally find the wherewithal to ignore his pain and had reached Sorun's position.

There was... Sorun could scarcely describe the look on his face. Horror and anger, even outrage. There were similar looks on Tails' and Lara-Su's faces just behind him, the latter having risen her hands to her mouth she'd been so overcome with horror.

"Why did you do that!?" Sonic roared at him. His hands were squeezing down roughly on Sorun's shoulders, and there were even the beginning of tears pricking at the edges of his eyes. "You killed him! You... why!?"

"Why...?" Sorun echoed, confused, his voice sounding distant. "I-I-I-"

"You just killed Shadow! I can't believe- what were- what were you thinking-!?"

There was a sudden shift in Sorun's demeanor. In an instant he'd gone from appearing stunned and having a vacant look in his eyes to looking insulted and angered. The rush of anger was so intense that the hand holding the sword's scabbard lashed out, smacking Sonic across the face with the side of the scabbard. He grunted out in surprise and stumbled back, blinking his tears away and staring straight at Sorun as he held a hand to his face.

"Why!? The hell do you mean why!?" Sorun screamed at Sonic. "After everything he did you're telling me I was supposed to let him live!?"

"He was contained!" Sonic screamed back. "Helpless! He wasn't going to hurt anybody like that, and-and you just-!"

"Guys like that always come back, Sonic, they always do!" Sorun loudly argued, frantically shaking his head in refusal. "He was dangerous, he tried to kill us, fuck letting him live after all that." Breathing heavily, he turned his head down at the severed head. "Doesn't matter, I... I beat him. I won. I'm the winner. I fucking won. He didn't win, I did."

"You won!? That's your only take from this!?" The incredulity in Sonic's voice was mask by something breaking in his tone. "Y-you... Sorun, I can't... Sorun, how could you!?"

When Sorun looked back at Sonic, the Mobian looked at a genuine loss for words. From how he was sounding Sorun was expecting him to look angry, possibly getting ready to fight Sorun over what he just did. He would have been willing to, was even gripping Yamato to get ready for a fight.

What he was greeted to instead was a sight Sorun could barely fathom. He'd never seen so much raw disappointment on somebody's face before in his entire life. Disappointment and sadness, even grief, to the point that Sorun felt something uneasy in him stir when he saw Sonic giving him that look. Lara-Su certainly looked like she wanted to fight him, Sorun could have sworn he even saw a few flecks of green energy swirl between her fingers for a brief moment. Tails... he just looked completely shocked, arms and tails limp and his jaw hanging open.

"Sorun, you... you can't just kill somebody on a 'maybe'..." Sonic sadly mumbled out, shaking his head at the sight of King Shadow's severed head. "What makes you think this is okay?"

"Because it is okay. Fuck you for thinking it isn't." Sonic and the other two Mobians stiffened at Sorun's tone and words. He stomped past Sonic, eyes fixed to the ground. "I'm not gonna stand here taking criticism from someone so incompetent they can't keep their own kids from getting obliterated-"

He was stopped when Sonic's hand shot out and gripped Sorun's wrist. Sonic's head whipped up at a speed so quick it startled Sorun, eyes angered. Threatening.

"Sorun, you..." There was confliction in Sonic's face, amid the disappointment and new anger that was growing, but he seemed to be struggling to find the right words to say. "I... Sorun..."

"Let me go," Sorun demanded. Sonic's grip held firm, and in response a few bolts of blue lightning arced over Yamato's blade. "Is this really what you want to do? Really?"

Even in the face of the threat Sonic's gaze didn't waver in the slightest. Sorun saw Lara-Su take a step forwards, more green energy around her hands. A tinge of fear surged through Sorun at seeing that, plans already being made in his head to deal with the threat that could freeze him. Throw Sonic off of him, jump back while he was still holding on if need-be, get as far away from her as possible and use a Judgement Cut to-

"Everyone, stop it!" It was Tails that instantly shattered the tension between everyone. He stepped between Sorun and Sonic and, to everyone's surprise, wrenched the hedgehog's hand off of Sorun's wrist. "Fighting each other isn't going to solve everything!"

"You can't be serious!" Sonic argued. "Sorun just-!"

"I know what he did, but we're all going to die unless I get Sorun to do something!" Tails shouted. At seeing the bewildered looks everyone, even Sorun, gave him, he sighed out and shook his head. "It's... look, just let him go, alright? I get it, I do, but this is important. Please just trust me."

Sonic looked like he wanted to object. So did Lara-Su, but the tone Tails used, that desperate, pleading tone, gave them both pause. After what looked like much internal struggle, Sonic released Sorun, though he still maintained that angry, disappointed glare as he backed off. Lara-Su looked more hostile than anything else, but she'd still relented, letting the energy around her hands fade as she walked away along with Sonic.

"..." Sorun watched them walk off, expression moving back to apathy. He sheathed Yamato, eyes still lingering on Sonic's spiked back before he shook his head. This wasn't a matter that was going to be dropped, but Sorun didn't have any regrets. He'd deal with it if it became a problem. For now he had Tails to deal with. Him and... whatever this new problem was. When he looked at Tails, he had on what was probably the gravest expression he'd ever seen the fox wear. For some reason he felt like it wasn't because he just cut someone's head off.

"Sorun, we need to talk. We need to talk about something really important."

Chapter 82

A/N- Believe it or not I actually do read all the reviews. I know I said way back I was gonna be more interactive with that, and for the most part I failed in that regard. That being said I've been getting lots of questions by people so I'm just throwing this out here as a blanket statement to all of you:

I'm not answering any questions that would spoil future events of the story in any way whatsoever. Not on if such and such character is appearing, not if this one thing or power or weapon or whatever will show up, not on any of that.

Recursion Error

Episode 82- The future unequivocally, without a shadow of a doubt, sucks

---

Maybe there was something to be said about not feeling anything after performing the act of murder. Maybe. Sorun would argue context was important to such a thing, and a number of other factors and variables, but based on how everyone was treating him it seemed he was alone in that thinking.

Which in itself was strange. Maybe it was from back when, back when he'd been hyping himself up to kill Eggman when he thought it'd be the last thing he'd ever do before dying, and if there had been one single person on the entire planet that needed to die if only because it meant the quality of life of literally every single person would improve, it was that guy. Sorun wouldn't have shed any tears for his sake, and when he'd almost done it, he couldn't have been more zealous in the act. And he'd have done it, too, if it weren't for the fact he'd been just a second too slow.

But he'd never put any thought into how he'd feel after. Sorun figured since it was Eggman he'd feel nothing, even if he didn't have the time to ruminate on it. But now he'd killed that fake Shadow. King Shadow. Alternate Shadow. Did he deserve it? Well, Sorun didn't think anybody deserved to die, but he also made exceptions in life and made one for Eggman. Beyond that he considered himself to be the least-qualified judge of character when it came to King Shadow since he hadn't even been in this world for a full day when everyone else spent a lifetime here.

Still, he killed him. Because Sorun was just too desperate to go back to the original timeline and he was in the way. Because it didn't matter because he was going to change everything anyways. Because, the more Sorun thought on it, the more he realized he was completely okay with the fact he'd just killed someone, and really he just wanted to stop thinking about it and move on. The others weren't of the same mind.

Apparently they didn't even trust him enough to keep the Chaos Emeralds. They made him give them up. He would have argued against it, maybe just outright refused, but Sonic was there, Knuckles had returned, and his daughter with that bullshit time freeze ability was nearby and Sorun couldn't see him winning against that without outright killing or dismembering her, and that wasn't something he was willing to do. So he'd relented, given the Emeralds up, realized how brutally tired he was once Devil's Body had left him and his hair turned back black, and had chosen to just slump up the wall he'd been blasted into during the fight while everyone else talked things out.

It didn't help Sorun's mood that Knuckles had come along with a new face in tow. One he instantly recognized, but he knew just from a glance she didn't have a clue as to who he was. Even with the added age of twenty-five years Sally had a distinctive enough face. The hair alone was a dead giveaway, even all... done up like it was now, all regal-like along with the royal-looking dress she wore.

He didn't remember Sally ever looking at him like he was a rabid animal, though, and she chose to stay on the other side of the room along with the others. It might have to do with the fact there was a sheet-covered decapitated corpse near Sorun he kept taking glances at.

Hearing a pair of footsteps stop near him, Sorun turned his head to look up at Tails. Of everyone he was probably the most conflicted-looking out of all of them, and he, too, couldn't stop glancing at King Shadow's corpse. The way his facial muscles kept twitching it looked like he was struggling to make up his mind on whether to scream at Sorun, scold him, or just express his disappointment. Sorun couldn't help but wonder how long his patience would last under those circumstances. He didn't give himself good odds.

"What's she doing here?" Sorun asked, nodding his head in the older Sally's direction. Tails had immediately gotten his meaning, and sighed as a result.

"Knuckles had to look after her during your... fight," he tentatively answered, hesitating for a long time on the fight word. "She was getting ready to become queen. Was gonna marry Shadow and everything. She said she was doing it in hopes of getting Shadow to ease off some of his more unpopular policies."

Sounded like her, at least to Sorun. She never could stand not helping people. "Well..." Sorun drawled out, eyes turning back down to the sheet over King Shadow, "I don't think they'll be sounding the wedding bells any time soon."

Tails' face twitched. "You're making jokes after killing someone?"

"Yeah," Sorun answered, looking back up at the fox. He felt irritation rising. "It's called levity. Fucking look it up."

"I know what levity is, I'm just saying it's not appropriate," Tails said, the anger in his voice rising. "You had no right to make that kind of choice."

"And yet I made it anyways. Look where that got us." Sorun spread his arms out. "I don't see what the problem is. Sonic wanted his change in government? Well, he's sure as shit gonna get it now."

Tails shook his head. "That doesn't mean-"

"Listen, when you fight a guy radiating so much power the air around him is literally boiling then you can fucking talk," Sorun snapped out. He stood up to his feet, eyes narrowed and voice dropping a bit, though Tails stood his ground and simply crossed his arms. "'Til then you can't say shit about what I did, so shut the fuck up about it already."

"... Do you even regret what you did?" Tails suddenly asked, in a way that he sounded like he didn't want the question answered. "Are you even feeling any remorse? Guilt? Something over the fact you just murdered a defenseless prisoner?"

"Was nothing 'defenseless' 'bout that guy," Sorun argued with a dismissive scoff. "But to answer your question, no, not really."

For a long moment Tails just stood there, looking at Sorun. Then he sighed out, hanging his head in resignation as he mentally processed what Sorun said. After that, a weary breath left him, and his shoulders sunk down.

"You know, from your perspective, just a week or two back, you were a normal person everyone was friends with. You were a hero." He picked his head up to look at Sorun. He didn't know what to feel when he saw that Tails looked so sad. So betrayed. Disappointed. "What happened? What... what changed in you that turned you from the Sorun I knew back then to this?"

He could have made something up. From fighting Enerjak to falling into this mess, there were a number of things he could have said. He decided to just hit Tails with the truth. "Nothing changed. I was always like this," Sorun bluntly answered, making Tails stiffen. "This was just the first opportunity I had to kill someone without it being a problem and I took it. That's all." He paused. "And I mean, Enerjak, too, if you really count that thing as being a person."

Tails shook his head. "I don't believe that."

"Tails, for god's sake, you're in your mid-thirties. You're a grown-ass man with kids. I know you're not stupid, so what's so fucking hard to understand?" Sorun bit out, making the fox flinch. "For fuck's sake, your parents were war veterans, weren't they? You're really gonna stand there and tell me you can look at them without judging but the second I off an actual DICTATOR trying to kill us -!"

"That's different!" he loudly argued.

"How!? How is it different!?"

"Because you're supposed to be a good person!" Wildly, Tails gestured to the sheet-covered, headless corpse. "Good people don't... don't do that! They don't kill helpless people! Are you really going to stand there and tell me this is acceptable in your culture!?"

"Tails, I'm from fuckin' Detroit," Sorun said in a lame voice. "The violence there was admittedly way overhyped by memes and shit but that doesn't change the fact I had a nextdoor neighbor that got shot on three separate occasions when someone tried to mug him. Did Earl ever cry about it? No, he just punched the guy out after he got shot every time. Because Earl was just built different or something, never could fucking tell with that guy," Sorun muttered out. "Or Crazy Ricky, who I'm fairly certain killed, like, fifty people while in the army before he became that one weird homeless guy living in a box behind the local Wal-Mart. Or my..." The teen trailed off a bit, eyes growing vacant for a moment before focusing back on Tails. He made a defeated sigh. "Look, Tails, I don't know what you want me to say. Earth isn't Mobius. Things are different there. I'm different. What do you actually want out of me?"

"I want you to stop using your species being violent as an excuse and say you made a mistake."

Sorun made a sharp breath as displeasure creeped into his features. "Oh, is that really how you're going to play it? We're playing the race card now?" Sorun's eyes narrowed in the same way Tails' eyes narrowed at his. "You're gonna stand there and tell me your parents didn't kill any Overlanders in the war? That Sonic's didn't? That there aren't messed up Mobians out there that don't have a problem killing people, because this one jackal I punched out once says otherwise. And you really think there weren't humans where I'm from that'd be just as appalled as you are over the fact I just cut someone's head off?" He reached forwards and roughly jabbed Tails in the chest. "Fuck you, Tails. You don't know anything."

Tails' eyes darted away from Sorun's. He brushed Sorun's hand away. "At least we didn't blow up our own planet with nuclear bombs."

Sorun froze. He felt his right arm twitching at his side, and it took a phenomenal amount of willpower to not hit the fox standing in front of him right now. He managed to let out a steadying breath and stay his hand, even if he couldn't figure out why Tails was on his case so hard. If the hero mentality of being a Freedom Fighter and being a hero as a child was really so ingrained into him that he never grew out of it, If Sorun really did make that big an impression on him back then, or if he really was just that naïve. Maybe being that naïve was a good thing - the whole reason Sorun fought to save the planet and told so little about what Earth was like to people was just to preserve that innocence since he adored it so much. So maybe this was just a consequence of that.

Or maybe adult Tails was just that fucking irritating, but really, that was all his fault if that was the case.

"You sure grew snippy with age, didn't you?" Sorun's voice was cold.

"... Look, I'm not gonna argue this with you," Tails decided, releasing a sigh as the tension left his body. "Just... we'll talk about it later, after everything's settled and everyone's cooled off, gotten their heads straight. We have more important things to talk about."

"Alright, sure. Fine." Crossing his arms, Sorun leaned his back against the cracked wall and crossed one leg over the other. "You got some explaining to do anyways. Like the whole 'we're all gonna die unless I do something' thing, the Chaos Emeralds and how I apparently gave them to you when I didn't, and all this other stuff that isn't adding up like how the late and great king over there knew me when I never did any of that."

"You did. And didn't," Tails cryptically answered. Before Sorun could open his mouth and tell Tails how nonsensical that was the fox tossed him something that glowed blue. Sorun caught the object in the air, eyes widening in surprise when he saw the blue Chaos Emerald in his hand for a brief moment before it transmuted into the Yamato.

It was a move that puzzled him. They'd been so quick to take the Emeralds away from him after he killed King Shadow that he didn't expect to just be given one back. It was as comforting as it was confusing to Sorun. "Er, thanks," he awkwardly said, looking back at Tails, "but I still don't understand-"

"You went back in time."

Sorun automatically pursed his lips in surprise. All things considered he shouldn't have been that surprised, since it sat besides all the other wacky stuff and the fact he'd traveled forwards in time, technically, in an alternate timeline. But backwards was a whole different beast and he already was feeling the coming migraine just thinking about it.

It also didn't make any sense because last Sorun checked time travel was... well, actually, Sonic going into a time machine was what caused this whole mess, wasn't it? So he supposed it did exist. Extremely so. Still didn't explain what he had to do with all this.

"... Okay, I went back in time," Sorun echoed, slowly nodding along. "And how did... you know what, just walk me back from the beginning." If he had to listen to this he at least wanted it put in front of him in a cohesive enough way he didn't have to think about it too much.

"Right, right." Tails' eyes flickered to King Shadow's corpse. "So you know way back Shadow tried blowing the planet up using a weapon on the space station he was made in?"

"ARK, big laser, yeah I got the gist."

"And in our timeline Sonic stopped him," Tails continued.

"Mhm, mhm, yeah."

"Well, since Sonic wasn't there back then saving the world in this timeline it had to be left to the rest of us, and other people. World was an even bigger mess than it was with Sonic before Shadow came along." A regretful, pained look flashed over his face. "Things like dealing with Chaos in Station Square were... they were really messy without him there to help."

It took Sorun a second to connect the word Chaos with a name and not with the concept that had been screwing with him the entire time he'd been on this planet. "Oh, right, Chaos and Tikal. And those Chao," he said, vividly remembered the group he'd met. A tinge of worry went through him at the face Tails was making. "What... ended up happening?"

"It was bad," was all Tails offered. "Chaos was rampaging a lot longer than in our timeline. Shadow had to intervene, Tikal had to take desperate measures, and it wasn't... it didn't end like it did with Sonic there." Tails looked down at the floor. "You know the dungeon we were in with all the weapons stockpiled? Where we got the nuke?"

"Yeah...?"

"Well, Chaos and Tikal are down there."

For a second, a brief moment, Sorun felt a bit happy knowing they were close. But then it was dashed when he remembered the conversation he was having with Tails. "Why are they down there in a dungeon they keep weapons of mass destruction?"

"Because you wouldn't recognize them if you went down there to see them."

Sorun felt a stabbing feeling somewhere in his chest at hearing that. He tilted his head down, black hair brushing over his eyes as he made a breathy sound. A few moments passed before he shook his head. "I don't want to know," he said, hoping Tails would stop speaking on the subject. Fortunately, the fox nodded at him, looking eager to change topics anyways. "So I'm assuming Sonic wasn't there to stop Shadow from blowing up the planet?"

"No, he wasn't," Tails confirmed with a nod. "So you had to go back and do it."

It was amazing to Sorun how something could make so much and so little sense at the same time. "And I did this...?"

"It's..." Tails paused, sighing out a bit and holding a hand to his forehead as he thought. "From what I pieced together, from right now you used the Yamato to go back in time to stop Shadow, take the Chaos Emeralds, and then you found me, gave me the Emeralds, explained everything to me so that when I got to this point I could tell you all this so you'd go back in time and do the same thing."

"... What?" Confusion and bewilderment blossomed on Sorun's face. "I did what?"

"The sword you make," Tails clarified. "You used it to make a time loop."

"... The Yamato can time travel...?" Sorun muttered, mostly to himself as he glanced down at the Yamato. He gave it a critical look-over, mentally going over all the abilities he knew it possessed in his head before shaking his head in Tails' direction. "No I didn't."

"Yes, you did," Tails stressed.

"Tails, the Yamato can't be used to travel through time," Sorun rebuked. "It can do a lot, and I mean a lot, but time travel ain't one of them." He'd know if it could. Hell, he was the only person that could know if it did that, since he was the only person in the whole universe with intrinsic knowledge of it.

"Sorun, I am telling you-"

"And I am telling you it can't," Sorun interrupted, tone a bit angry. "Why the hell are you claiming to know more about its abilities than I do? You don't even know where it comes from."

"I know because you're the one that told me!" Tails yelled out, quieting Sorun. "You said its separation power could be used to make a portal that could separate the distance between one point in time to another! You're the one that said it can cut through space and time , aren't you!?"

"... Well I mean yeah, but..." Sorun trailed off, floundering under the look Tails was giving him and the steady realization that was coming to him. "But, but that doesn't... oh, wait, it actually might..."

The fact was that the sword he was holding wasn't the true-blue Yamato from 'DMC', but a replica his subconscious had made. That being said his knowledge of it was so thorough that, if it wasn't a 1:1 copy of it, the difference was so marginal it was practically negligible, and he knew the sword's power of separation was loose in that separation applied to everything. That was the power behind tying a power to a single word, how a single idea could blanket so many other concepts.

So time travel could in theory happen if he really utilized the Yamato's separating power to cut through time itself. Except it shouldn't, because the real Yamato never displayed that ability in the games. In fact nothing in 'DMC' lore displayed the ability to travel anywhere in time.

Well, except for that one thing.

"The fucking 'DMC 2' novel..." Sorun internally groaned out. He remembered now - how the worst game in the series had a novelization that had a demon named the Beastheads that could travel through time. Now that he thought of it that really did mean time travel was somewhat canon to the series if one accepted that book as cannon. And for all Sorun knew that mere idea somewhere in his subconscious was enough that the power to time travel was included in the Yamato's abilities, if in-universe time travel was a viable thing.

At least it was either that or he was right the first time and the power of separation really was so broad that the power to cut through points in time was just lumped in with it. Either way it was hard to refute facts - how Tails was saying all this, how he had the Emeralds, how King Shadow had knew him and implied Sorun was on the space station twenty-five years ago when he wasn't.

Unless he traveled through time.

"..." Sorun lifted the Yamato up, one hand gripping the handle and the other its scabbard. He pulled the sword halfway out, spotting his reflection in the immaculate, silver surface of the blade, how he was blinking down at in with a contemplative face before he sighed out in acceptance. "Alright," he muttered, sheathing the sword and looking back at Tails, "so future me got to this point, killing Shadow and everything, and after you said all this to him he went back, dealt with the ARK and past Shadow, nicked two of the Emeralds, the blue and red ones you gave me, gave them to past you and explained all this so when we got to this point, you could tell me allll this so I could go do the exact same thing."

Tails nodded. "Pretty much, yeah," he said with a nod.

"Okay." Sorun's mouth thinned. "I don't wanna."

The way Tails' mask cracked resulting in the frozen, half-confused and half-shocked look he was giving him would have been comical under any other circumstance. The dead body nearby sucked a lot of the enjoyment out of the situation, though. "You- I'm sorry, but what?"

"Yeah, I'm good," Sorun reiterated, shrugging at the now-sputtering fox. "Sounds like a lot of complicated work. I don't even like work in general, but throw something as bad as time travel in with it?" He made a low whistle. "Yeah, I think there's been enough time travel as it is. I'm just gonna not do it."

"No, you don't understand." Tails began to shake his head, vehemently, and took a step towards Sorun. "You have to do this, Sorun. There's no not doing it."

A groan left Sorun. He somewhat regretting how whiny it sounded. "But whhyyy ?" he groaned out. "Weren't you the one telling Sonic how bad messing with time was, and now you're here telling me I have to mess with time? What happens if I don't? I can't be that bad, can it?"

"Yes! It can! It can be very bad!" The panicked enthusiasm Tails had incorporated into his voice, and how actually panicked he looked, managed to catch Sorun off his guard. "You set up a time loop! Do you know what happens if you deviate from that loop and not go back to close it so the next Sorun can do the same thing!?"

"No, I don't! Jesus, Tails, I'm a gamer, not a... a time physicist," Sorun said in a tired voice. "Why, what happens? What happens if I don't go back and close the loop? We're already here because the loop was closed already, wasn't it? Why does it matter?"

Frustration began growing on Tails, both on his face and the way his tails were angrily swishing around in the air behind him. "It matters ," he said in a very stressed voice, "because if you don't go back in time to close the loop it'll cause a time paradox!"

Sorun's expression became entirely lost, which only seemed to make Tails more frustrated. "I don't get it. Is that bad?"

A loud sigh, short of Tails exploding and screaming in rage, left the Mobian as he did his best to calm down. He began rubbing at his temples with his fingers, muttering under his breath while Sorun silently watched on, and then breathed out.

"Alright," Tails began, light blue eyes opening up to stare at Sorun's confused blue eyes. "Let's say you don't do it. You don't go back and close the loop. Because we currently, all of us, are in a timeline in which you went back in time and stopped Shadow from using Space Colony ARK to destroy Mobius, you would cause a time paradox by not going back in time and stopping Shadow from using Space Colony ARK to destroy Mobius." He rose up two index fingers. "That would create two timelines - one where you closed the loop and saved Mobius, and one where you didn't. Imagine time as a straight line. You going back in time caused a curve that connects somewhere down the line, and when you go back to the future in curves back up. It makes a loop, a circle, but for all intents and purposes it's still one single timeline because the line carries past the circles. But if you don't go back and close the loop the line branches - we get two timeline."

"O... kay, but we're in the one where future... past, I dunno... me closed the loop and saved Mobius," Sorun pointed out. "So why does it matter?"

"Because a zone, this universe, doesn't have the energy or ability to house two alternate timelines! No zone does!" Tails snapped at him in a loud voice, causing Sorun to flinch. "Alternate zones with different histories is one thing, the multiverse is home to infinite zones in that regard, but there's a reason that the entire timeline was completely overwritten when Sonic used the time machine as opposed to it just making a new timeline, and we're beyond lucky that's all that happened. One zone can only have one timeline. One . So if a time paradox happens and creates two..." He loudly clapped his hands, startling Sorun. "The zone just can't sustain itself. Best case is that timelines or whole segments of time get annihilated. Worst, and most likely, case is that the entire zone grows unstable and just collapses. I'm talking complete and utter destruction of the entire zone and everything in it. The whole universe would just disappear."

Sorun's eyes widened. He felt something in him shudder uncomfortably as the weight of Tails' words settled in him. "Oh," he softly murmured out. "Yeah, you're right. That's pretty bad."

"THAT'S WHAT I'VE BEEN TRYING TO TELL YOU!"

"Alright, you don't have to shout!" Wincing a bit, Sorun rose his free hand to rub at his ear before continuing to speak. "God, this is frustrating. How do you even know all this?"

"Because you told me," Tails answered. "You explained all this to me so that I could explain it to you."

"Yeah, but there had to be a starting point to it somewhere, right? A Sorun that kicked off this loop?" Sorun asked him. "Ugh, I don't even want to think about what happened that made him desperate enough to do something like this. The trial and error alone he must have had to go through while dodging time paradoxes must've been a nightmare. Why'd he even do all this, anyways? Just to make sure Shadow didn't destroy the world?" It was a sobering through the more he dwelled on it. That a version of him at sometime had to deal with what was probably the most headache-inducing problem Sorun had ever tried to conceive. He evidently succeeded, at least, since they were all at this point, but Sorun still couldn't help but count himself lucky he wasn't that guy.

All Tails offered Sorun was a shrug. "We'll probably never know. But whatever that version of you did, it seems like it worked. We just need to send you back to reset the loop for the next Sorun, and after that everything should be fixed."

"... Fixed." The word felt dry and tasteless in Sorun's mouth. Like there was no meaning behind it. Wasn't hard to see why he felt this way when he looked around. "Right. So how long do I have to pull this off?"

"Probably not long."

"'Course, 'course..." He shook his head, sighing under his breath as he pushed off the wall. "Alright, you made your case. Give me all the details you can."

Well, as far as time travel plans were concerned, it was simpler than what Sorun had feared it would be, so he supposed that was a good thing. Go back in time to point A, do this event, take that, take them to so and so and give them the lowdown, then head back where, should everything have gone right, they'd be done with the time travel stuff for good. In this case it was go back to a specific date Tails had given to him, and then after that go to the space station Shadow was at, incapacitate him, take two of the Chaos Emeralds, go bring them to Tails and give him the information to give to the next Sorun, and then go back to the future.

Unironically it was way simpler than Sorun would have pegged time travel. Maybe he could chalk that up to Mobius and all its weirdness making something that was supposed to be as complicated as time travel simple. It inversed everything, apparently. Or maybe it was because he was going back in time using a magic katana that trivialized the whole concept.

Either way he wasn't complaining. Much. He would have preferred to just not do all this, period, but the threat of annihilation was as good a motivator as any.

He glanced down at the sword in his hands. From a normal person's point of view it didn't look like something that could cut through time, space, and apparently travel through time. By all appearances it really did just look like a normal katana, if a bit stylized. He knew people sensitive to Chaos energy always had weird reactions over it, though, even if it felt normal to him. He never could figure out what about it set people off.

"It's too bad going backwards with this thing has the whole time paradox risk thing if everything Tails said is right. I would have just went back in time and crushed baby Robotnik's head in with a brick otherwise." It made Sorun wonder as he pulled the gleaming, silver blade out of the black scabbard. How the one that set this loop up managed to do it without causing a time paradox. Must have been some mind-bending riddle he was glad he didn't have to solve.

Scabbard hanging off his waist, Sorun held the sword up, tip pointed forwards. He didn't know how this was supposed to work, and Tails knew even less since he'd never used the sword. The Sorun that set him on this path thankfully gave him the advice necessary, which basically amounted to doing the same thing he did whenever he focused on a location to cut a portal to. Except instead of a location just focus on a date, or the amount of time going forwards and backwards. Didn't sound right, but nothing did these days.

"Why am I at a point in life where this isn't even the weirdest thing I've done this week?" Suppressing a sigh, Sorun looked over his shoulder. He'd elected to go into the closest hallway he could find leading out of the throne room so he didn't have to be near everyone else while doing this. Mostly because he didn't want to be bugged anymore by the strangers wearing aged versions of his friends' faces, and fortunately Tails got the hint he didn't want to be disturbed and left him be. So it was just him in a narrow hallway attempting to cut through time and space with a katana to travel back in time. As one does.

Exhaling, Sorun faced back forwards and began focusing into the sword. The date Tails had given him was repeated in his head over and over in a mantra, and as he did this he pushed the sword forwards. Surprisingly, he met resistance despite the fact he'd stabbed forwards into empty air. The tip of the sword was struggling and scraping off against nothing, with heated blue specks occasionally flying off as if Sorun was attempting to stab into an invisible wall.

His eyebrows furrowed a bit. He could feel it - the same feeling he got when he was making a portal to a different location. A sensation that would travel through the blade to him, a mental click as the two locations were bridged and he cut a portal through space to travel there. In this case he felt the "location" he was trying to get to, the point in time he was trying to get to. It wasn't clicking, though. It was just hanging there at the edge of his mind.

He focused more power into the sword. More sparks flew off from the tip as the silver blade began thrumming with blue power. That location back in time was growing stronger in Sorun's mind, closer, and, rather bizarrely, he felt less resistance against the nothing he was stabbing against. Putting some more effort in found Sorun finally being able to sink the blade fully forwards into a thin, glowing blue fissure that had appeared in the air in front of him.

Grunting, Sorun began slicing downwards, lengthening the fissure. It wasn't like making a portal to simply teleport, where space parted effortlessly and was more or less made a smooth process. This was taking a phenomenal amount of effort and concentration by comparison, and Sorun could feel actual strain being put on the sword, the way it was vibrating in his hands. He'd finally cut the fissure long enough that it was as tall as him, and afterwards was forced to turn the sword and use it like a crowbar to widen the fissure into an entrance large enough for him to slip through.

"Okay-okay-okay this is way harder than I thought it'd be!" It was difficult to properly conceptualize the difficulty of using a magic katana to hold open a portal that, if everything went right, lead to the past. Like trying to keep a door wedged open with a crowbar while a raging flood was hitting the doorframe on all sides in addition to the pulsing waves Sorun felt go through his body. When the portal began to shrink he realized there was no way to open it completely for him to walk in: he wasn't strong enough, and the longer this went on the larger and more numerous he saw the hairline fractures alone the sword's blade grow. "Fuck it, here goes!"

Not seeing any alternative to his situation, Sorun decided to bite the bullet and dive right into the portal while it was still large enough for him to fit through.

Going through a portal through time wasn't like going through a portal that simply lead from one location to another. It wasn't simply walking through a doorway through a small interim of darkness intermingled with blue energy, skin tingling with the ambient energy as one made the journey. It wasn't the relatively calm couple-second walk that "normal" portals entailed.

There wasn't a scope to define what going through a time portal was like, much in the same way it was hard to describe what it was like opening it. For Sorun it was the sensation of falling, being pulling upwards, and somehow being yanked in all other directions simultaneously. Tumbling through an endless expanse of darkness and blue, where the space was so thick with energy it was like being dragged through the ocean. That's the best Sorun could come to even think about what was happening, as he could hardly see, and his mind was racing so hard he struggled to even comprehend the way his body was tumbling around this expanse. Like he'd been tossed in some king of cosmic washing machine.

Realistically the process only took somewhere in the ballpark of ten seconds, even though to Sorun it felt like minutes, and he'd been so disoriented the entire time that for all he knew the opposite was actually true, but he didn't have a way of knowing. Eventually, and mercifully, whether he'd been tumbling through some sort of undefinable tunnel and finally made it to the other side or reached the other portal he'd cut into this space, he made it to the other side and fell out. Flat onto his face, with the blue Chaos Emerald falling out after him and falling next to him with a soft plink! noise. The portal, less that and more a blue tear in space, promptly closed afterwards, leaving behind wispy, blue vestiges of power that slowly dissipated in the air.

For a solid minute Sorun laid there, completely motionless aside from his breathing. Then a groan left him, followed by some coughs, followed by Sorun, looking sick and feeling incredibly nauseous, pushed himself up, maintained the position for two seconds, and then flopped over and fell back onto his back.

"God, it's the wave pool from Adventure Bay all over again... fuck that water park..." Sorun groaned out, cursing at the memory and how falling through a time portal reminded him of that terrible trip he and his friends had went on during that one spring break. At least this time he hadn't almost drowned and didn't have water pouring out from his mouth, nose and ears and didn't feel like his head was going to explode from having his nasal system power washed. On the other hand every other symptom from his aching body to the nausea and disorientation was also there.

After a few more minutes, during which the nausea slowly faded away and Sorun didn't feel like he was going to throw up on the spot, he sat up. At this point he realized he was sitting outside, as opposed to the giant castle he'd been in prior. He was actually in front of a similar building, probably the same location since it had the same giant lawn space, instead of except of a castle it was more a giant townhouse. Rundown, dilapidated. Abandoned in every way, and the grass all around him was overgrown.

He grabbed the nearby Emerald, not paying it any mind as it transmuted into his katana, and stood up to his full height. The afternoon sun shined down on Sorun as he turned around to take in the city sight. A sight that was wholly different than the city he'd just come from. Where that city was lived-in, well maintained and bustling with bright lights, the city in front of him was completely empty, and in the same state of disrepair as the townhouse he'd just turned his back to.

"... Wow, it actually worked," Sorun murmured to himself, slightly in awe. It had to be the past, because it was either that or the apocalypse happened without him seeing it, and he doubted it was that latter explanation. There was a single, surreal moment where Sorun had actually stumbled on his feet, nearly dropping the sword he held when he realized he just time traveled . Genuinely and legitimately. He made a small, empty scoff, holding a hand up to his swimming head and shaking it in bemusement.

"Does it even get any deeper than this?" he wondered to himself, still murmuring as he turned his head up to the blue sky. "Jeez, and now I gotta go into space. Where even- where's that card Tails gave me?"

As Sorun began rummaging around in his pocket, he began to idly wonder if Tails really distrusted Sorun so much that he had to write explicit details about what he was supposed to do on a card for him to carry around in case he needed any reminders or pointers. As if the three separate times they went over what he was supposed to do wasn't enough in addition to the pressure named "The Universe is Irreparably Fucked if You Screw Up" bearing down on him wasn't enough.

Then again, Sorun barely even trusted himself to remember important details for something this incomprehensibly important, and the more he thought on it the more he supposed he couldn't blame Tails writing this all out just to make sure Sorun wouldn't make a mistake. He'd probably do it himself.

He brought the object out of his pocket. It was little more than a yellow sticky note, heavily crumpled and filled with Tails' messy scrawl. There was a basic outline of what he was supposed to do - stop King Shadow firing the ARK, get the Emeralds, yadda yadda - as well as some other important details that Tails figured must have been better written down than said. Like the coordinates for where the actual space station was, because Sorun didn't like his odds of blindly exploring space for that.

"Alright, Space Colony ARK, located... at wherever this mess of numbers is," Sorun said in a flat voice, exhaling a bit through his nose when he saw the long string of numbers. His brows furrowed, and he shoved the note back into his pocket as he looked back up at the sky. "Right, so how the hell do I go up to space to get into a space station...?"

A few minutes were passed with him standing there, standing and thinking. There was a good chance a breeze had blown a nearby tumbleweed passed him, but Sorun had been too preoccupied with his own thoughts to pay any significant notice to it. This went on for another minute until the blue ribbon tied to Yamato's scabbard reached up and tapped Sorun on the wrist.

"Hm? Yeah?" Blinking away his thoughts, Sorun looked down at the katana. Then he'd blinked in realization, and nearly rose his free hand up to smack him. "Right, I have this..." he said, slowly pulling the blade out while making incomprehensible grumbling noises all the while.

Teleporting to different locations via Yamato-made portal was still a much better experience than time traveling via Yamato. Less falling and feeling like one's body was being dragged through an otherworldly whirlpool. By comparison it was little more than a nice, small walk. One that didn't make him want to lose the little food he had left in his stomach.

God, but was he hungry. And tired. He couldn't even remember the last time he ate or slept. A large part of him hoped this would be over soon just so he didn't have to keep thinking on the subject.

When his feet emerged from the blue portal they touched down on hard, metal flooring. The Earthling's body emerged fully from the portal, absentmindedly closing the portal behind him and sheathing the sword as he took a look around. His environment had changed from the bright, barren city he'd just come from into moderately-lit metal corridors. There were paths that branched off into other hallways, with helpful signs attached to the ceiling above and even colored lines painted on the ground that coincided with the colored signs above, which made Sorun assume they were guidelines. A blue line that, according to the sign, lead to the cafeteria, white line for the labs, yellow for the sleeping quarters...

"Well, this certainly looks... space-y," Sorun noted. Having never been on a space station he didn't know what to expect. A small hop revealed that the gravity was normal, so either the people who built this figured out artificial gravity or he was in the wrong place. Temperature seemed normal, if not a bit cold, no feeling of wind or air circulation on his skin, and the air smelled... off. Akin to the way air in hospitals always smelled too clean, like antiseptic, but this was different. More stale.

It was just when Sorun was beginning to wonder if he was even in the right place that he turned around and saw the window right behind him.

An awed gasp left Sorun when he took in the vista before him, separated by what was hopefully reinforced glass. An infinite expanse of black dotted with innumerable lights. A moon that had a large groove carved through it, a whole chunk having been blown off with pieces frozen in orbit around it. And right down below both him and the space station was the planet itself. Mobius, what had once upon a time been an alternate version of the Earth he once knew. Speechless, it was all Sorun could do but slowly step forwards and press his hand against the glass as he looked down at the planet, eyes wide and shining.

Vaguely he remembered that map Sally had shown him, back when he'd first come to Mobius. For the most part the continents and landmasses he saw below was the same as those on the map. A planet that looked so much like his own, but warped, only holding the vague shape of the planet he was born on. Continents misshaped, islands missing, even the home state that had contained his city was gone completely, sunken to form a giant lake that was at the head of a great river that split what was once America in half.

"Huh..." Sorun breathed out, eyes glued to the sight before him. "Hey, mom. I did it. I'm in space." It'd always been a secret wish of his, to go up and experience space. Something about it, from all those games and movies... he didn't know. There was just an allure to it; just an urge to go up there beyond the sky to see what it was all about. Lots of people on Earth had that same urge.

Being here in person to see it, though, and have that dream realized so quickly and instantly, it left Sorun feeling about as hollow as it did breathless. He didn't think it'd be this easy. Realistically it shouldn't have been, because really he'd cheated to get here, and he couldn't help but feel that took some of the wind out of the accomplishment. Even so, he still felt accomplished. Oddly happy, which was probably the first positive emotion he'd had all week.

"Yeah, it's... it's, um, it's space. About what we expected it'd be like," Sorun continued to whisper out. "Real neat, um... you know. I know Dave and the others guys'd be just as psyched out about it as I am, and, uh... yeah. Yeah. Still miss you all." He pushed off of the glass. "'Kay, gotta... gotta go stop the crazy half-alien animal guy and save the world. I don't really get it either. S-so... yeah. Bye."

When he'd turned around and began walking away from the window, Sorun had noted that his left arm that was holding the Yamato began shaking. He did his best to steady the arm by holding it with his right arm, and had to use his right sleeve to wipe away some of the stray tears falling down his face as he made his way down the metal corridors.

Were circumstances different and he had more time on his hands Sorun would have loved nothing more than to explore the empty space station, creepy and noiseless as the place was. Because when else would he ever have the opportunity? Unfortunately the stake of the entire universe just happened to be resting on his shoulders, and he didn't want to risk something bad happening because he dawdled off. So against his more childlike instincts he had to resist the urge to run around touching everything.

Except a fork. He'd gone to the cafeteria and stolen a fork. It was completely indistinguishable from a normal fork other than the fact it came from space. But it was his space fork now. He was walking away from this with at least one souvenir.

On another note, Sorun had never been to the Space Colony ARK before now, so he didn't actually know where he was going. The signs helped out, and he was forced to rely on them and the lines painted on the ground to lead him around. From what Tails had told him all the Chaos Emeralds powering the super weapon were all slotted into a core somewhere in the facility, and all he had to do was walk up to it and take them out. So that was the easy part. The hard part was actually finding the thing.

At least it would have been hard if he didn't find signs and a path that lead him to the laser weapon core. Took him fifteen minutes to even find the pathway and another thirty minutes of following it to arrive at the place. Sorun didn't have much scope for how large the station was without getting an outside view, but based on the fact it'd been nearly an hour of him walking straight without seeing familiar sights the place must have been huge , which was mindboggling for Sorun.

The weapon core wasn't so large by comparison. The other side of a door lead Sorun to a large chamber lit up with blue, fluorescent lights. At the end of a platform fitted with large computer consoles was a catwalk that lead to a large, spherical piece of machinery suspended in the center of the room by cables and metal struts, held over a large chasm that Sorun could barely see the bottom of. He didn't even have to look for the Emeralds; they were slotted right in the front of the core, six in a circle surrounding the seventh one in the center. Just like Tails said.

"... Alright." Wasting no time, Sorun ran forwards across the catwalk and to the front of the mechanical core. He stopped in front of it, blinking as he looked down at his hands, one carrying the Yamato, and looked back up at the Emeralds slotted in the machine.

Sorun frowned. He looked back down, but even after he willed the sword to transmute back into the blue Emerald that still left him with one hand filled. "Okay, I guess I can just pocket one," Sorun quietly mumbled. His right hand reached forwards and gripped the red Emerald that was slotted into the machine. He pulled it out with surprising ease, causing the nearby lights to flicker and dim briefly, but otherwise there was no change. He looked down and attempted to jam the Emerald into his pocket, but to his dismay it didn't fit. "Man, what the hell?" he grumbled out. "Geez, why do these things have to be so big? It's gonna be really awkward trying to carry these..."

"And just what do you think you're doing?"

Hearing that voice was to Sorun the equivalent of somebody dumping a vat of iced water over his entire body. That voice, his voice, the voice of the person he just killed. Would kill. He slowly turned around, blue and red Emeralds in hand as he faced the owner of the voice, who sounded very displeased with Sorun.

It was him, alright. Shadow. This timeline's version, before he'd taken over the world and become king. No cape or crown, and otherwise he looked identical to the real one Sorun knew. But then again never saw his Shadow have that murderous glare in his eyes that turned Sorun's blood ice-cold. The kind of hard expression and determined look that promised quick and decisive death.

Not even King Shadow had looked that murderous until he and Sorun had started fighting, which made Sorun briefly wonder why this one looked so angry until he had to remember this version of Shadow was upset enough to blow up the whole planet. The details around that reasoning was still vague to him, but it was enough to put him on edge. Especially after how his fight with the future version had went, how poorly it ended.

"..." Sorun didn't have a response. He wanted to make one, maybe even make it somewhat witty to try and add some levity to the situation, but nothing could come to mind. His eyes darted behind him, at the core still holding the other blue Emerald he needed, and then he looked back at Shadow, stuttering out, "U-um, Emeralds need." He cursed himself for making such a stupid sentence.

His words seemed to annoy Shadow more than amuse him. "Is that so?" His eyes narrowed as he peered closer at Sorun's face. "Overlander. I presume based on that gaudy coat the Doctor sent you."

Sorun did his best to ignore the comment on his coat. "N-no."

The dark hedgehog's eyes narrowed further. "G.U.N., then? I'm surprised they even remember this station exists at all."

"Nobody sent me." Technically a lie, but it was more believable than the truth.

The crimson eyes staring into him un-narrowed. He pondered Sorun's words for a bit, and then beneath all the anger a bit of confusion set in. "Then who are you?" he asked. "Some self-proclaimed hero, come to stop my plans under some ill-conceived notion of saving this worthless planet?"

"Man, was my Shadow like this before he chilled out?" Sorun wondered to himself. He honestly couldn't see it even though it was coming out of the man's own mouth, alternate version or not, but this was so early into that and Shadow coming out of cryosleep that Sorun didn't even know if there was a fundamental difference between the two at this point in time. It made it that much harder for Sorun to understand him.

"Well," Sorun began, "no, not really. I just came here for some Chaos Emeralds, but I'm not exactly complaining about the fact it'll end up stopping your doomsday weapon in the process." Maybe the slight anger he felt at knowing Shadow wanted to blow the planet up gave Sorun the confidence to stop stuttering. That and the plan that was slowly formulating in his mind as he gripped the Emeralds tighter.

"And what business do you have saving that wretched ball of dirt?"

"'Cause... 'cause I live there and everyone I like lives there, what-what kind of question even is that?" Sorun asked, voice growing somewhat blank as he looked at Shadow with wide, confused eyes. He was just short of saying, "No shit I don't want myself and everyone else to die" right to Shadow's face, but he'd figured that reasoning would be so implied anyone with common sense wouldn't need it explained to them.

He guessed he was mistaken. That or Shadow was so single-minded in his goal to blow up the planet he wasn't thinking straight.

"Hmf." Shadow turned his nose up at Sorun. "As pathetic an excuse as any."

"I mean I thought it was a pretty solid excuse, but whatever, I guess." Evidently that hadn't been what Shadow had expected to hear, as he leveled his eyes back at Sorun, though now he looked even more confused than before. "Dude, listen, I don't know what your whole deal is and why you're upset, but I don't care. Like I really don't care, but you're dragging literally the whole planet into your drama and I have to be the guy to step in because there's nobody else to do it. So as much as I don't want it to be my business, you're making it my business."

"Your 'business' has nothing to do with this," Shadow rumbled out, teeth bared into an angered snarl. "Set the Emeralds down. And move aside. I will not repeat myself."

"You really think killing billions of people is gonna fix whatever your problem is?" Sorun asked Shadow, though the latter refused to back down from the words. "Seriously? That's your answer? Revenge at the expense of everyone else? Is it the anger blinding you or are you really that selfish?"

"Selfish? Selfish!?" Shadow roared out, breaking his composure and making Sorun flinch back. "Selfish is the world taking away the life of someone who only ever wanted to protect it! I will not-!"

"Quicksilver."

A silver ring expanded outwards from Sorun, spreading over everything. The colors of everything around him briefly inverted, and then slowly settled back to normal as motion halted. That was all expected when Sorun used the power. What he didn't expect, and what Sorun was elated to see, was that Shadow had stopped. Mid-sentence, his entire body frozen in time just like the world around him.

"You utter fool ." With renewed confidence Sorun walked directly towards Shadow, newfound vigor in his steps. A large part of him had been worried stopping time wouldn't work on Shadow; that, since Shadow himself could stop time with his natural abilities, he'd be able to negate it much like Enerjak had negated Sorun's timestop with his own timestop during their fight. He'd been wary of trying it at all for risking Shadow responding if he resisted the power. But it seemed either he couldn't or Sorun had caught him in surprise and he hadn't been able to respond in time before freezing. It didn't matter whichever was the truth. What did matter was that Sorun successfully caught Shadow in the timestop.

Which meant he basically already won.

He stopped right in front of Shadow. Sorun scoffed at the sight, half in amusement and half in derision. Here was the person that terrorized him so much, almost killed him during their fight in the future. One of the strongest individuals Sorun knew. Completely helpless and at Sorun's mercy, frozen in stopped time as Sorun pondered what to do. He looked down at the two Emeralds in his hands, humming a bit as he turned back to the machine core where the other six were.

Technically he could just collect the second blue Emerald, use one of them to make Yamato, and then leave, all while time was stopped. Shadow couldn't do anything about it, not while he was frozen in the stopped time, and without seven Emeralds the weapon he was using to threaten Mobius was effectively inert. But he didn't want something to go accidentally wrong. For the Chaos Emerald fueling the Quicksilver ability to slip out of his hands as he tried to juggle three of the gems or for it to just wear off and have Shadow attack him.

More than that Sorun was still pissed off at the fact his head was almost cut off.

With all that in mind Sorun turned back to Shadow, two feathered, spectral arms having appeared over his shoulders. The right blue-glowing arm clenched its clawed fingers into a fist and shot forwards, right into Shadow's face. His head whipped back from the impact, and then froze immediately after. Sorun leaned forwards to examine the damage, and saw that the hedgehog's muzzle was visibly distended, the bone underneath cracked. There were teeth peeking out between his lips, threatening to fly out once Quicksilver ended.

He got to work on his legs next, the Bringer Claws flashing downwards and gripping Shadow's shins. They squeezed down hard enough to splinter and pulverize the bone beneath the flesh, enough that when the blue hands released the legs they looked as if they had never been even remotely straight a day in Shadow's life. They punched his hands after, bending them far back enough to break the wrists while taking care to not even touch the golden rings hanging off of them.

At that point Sorun could have ended it. Shadow couldn't chase Sorun with busted legs or throw a Chaos Spear with broken hands. He was completely disabled until he healed. But Sorun kept going, for fear he'd regenerate too quickly for Sorun to get away once timestop ended. The Bringer Claws destroyed his joints, grabbed arms and legs and bent them backwards until the knees and elbows popped out, until his hands were touching his shoulder and feet his backside.

More memories assaulted Sorun the longer this went. That radiating, crimson aura that had been spreading around King Shadow as he attempted to kill Sorun with that blazing Chaos Spear. He'd almost succeeded. Sorun had the Bringer Claws dislocate Shadow's shoulder and hip joints and crush them. Tied down to that table, the crackling sound of electricity growing in tandem with the dread Sorun felt. Spectral, clawed fingers grabbed each of Shadow's fingers, twisting them backwards, crushing the bones, demolishing the joints until the bones were powder. That fight, him dodging all of Sorun's swings, spinning around and cutting through him so many times. The Bringer Claws pounded at Shadow's torso, shattering his ribs, clavicles, pelvis, the blows likely damaging if not outright bursting some of the organs underneath.

Him, this whole vendetta, how he tried to destroy the world and then changed his mind and fucked it up even more than it already was, how he thought his motivations and reasons were so much better than Sorun's, that he was better than him, everything he'd done and tried to do to him just to preserve his status quo. The blue claws reached up, crushing his scapulae to fragments, and then reached down to his spine, clawing and madly gripping at them, mashing the vertebrae together until it completely lost form.

Sorun's neck. He'd only felt it for the briefest times - that's how all his wounds worked while in Devil's Body because of the regen factor. Just fast enough to notice something happened to cause pain, but it never stayed enough to linger, for him to think on it. Even more that body muted pain somewhat. Not nearly enough to be traumatic in any significant way. But the feeling of that Chaos Spear dragging along his neck, feeling it heal just behind the spear as it went through his flesh, knowing he'd been that close to death again , it hit different. The memory stayed when nothing else did.

Some care was taken when Sorun's Bringer Claws began punching Shadow's face. Just enough to ensure the brain wasn't damaged in the same way he'd taken care not to accidentally rupture his heart when he'd attacked his torso. Less care was taken when his orbitals were shattered and his eyes began spilling out from the broken sockets, hanging by optic nerves.

Finally, Sorun stopped. He was breathing heavily, some flashes of what had happened with King Shadow still vivid in his memory, though they faded rapidly when he looked at Shadow's frozen body. He couldn't even recognize him the longer he stared, the way his entire body was mangled, how there wasn't so much as a single intact bone in his body. Seeing as how he and the rest of the world wasn't being consumed in a terrible time paradox, he didn't fear he'd gone too far and killed the hedgehog. And he felt somewhat relieved that his breathing was calming down to a normal rate the longer he looked at him.

The Bringer Claws faded away, and Sorun released the timestop. Where most bodies would have crumpled down Shadow's more or less spilled to the floor, like he couldn't support any of his own weight. Probably couldn't since Sorun shattered all his bones. He wasn't screaming, though in this state Sorun wasn't even sure he could. There was just a loud choking, gurgling sound coming from the mound of flesh that used to be his face. His entire body was twisting sporadically, likely in agony, but with how much damage Sorun had done all he could do was lay there in a broken mess.

"That's game, Shadow. I win." Still panting, albeit lightly, Sorun turned around and began walking back to the core. "I win," he whispered out, reaching its front. Frowning heavily at being introduced back to his earlier predicament, Sorun decided to just hold the one blue Emerald under his armpit as he reached out and pulled the second blue one out of the core. Again the lights flickered and dimmed, with the blue Emerald shifting into an unsheathed Yamato held in his right hand as he turned back around.

Sorun paused. Already there was a green aura surrounding Shadow's body as his regeneration went into overdrive to try and heal his body. The progress looked slow - parts of his body would seemingly snap together as the bones tried piecing themselves together, but more often than not they'd crumble back apart due to the extensive damage. He'd manage to fix himself completely eventually, but by then Sorun would be long gone, and the damage was so severe it looked to be inhibiting the process somewhat. It made the Earthling pause as he realized something.

"Oh, hell, that's what he was talking about back at the castle. No wonder he wanted to kill me so much," Sorun murmured to himself. A moment passed, and then he shrugged. "Oh well. That's future Sorun's problem to deal with now. Past Sorun? Eh, whatever. I'm gone."

Trying to open another time portal with a red Emerald in one hand and a blue Emerald under his arm was phenomenally more difficult than when he had a hand free. He'd had to summon the Bringer Claws back to help pry open the portal, only to then swear under his breath when he realized instead of awkwardly carry the Emeralds like he was now he could have just had the arms hold them. Regardless he'd still managed to open the portal, which was satisfactory enough as far as Sorun cared.

Before he'd stepped in Sorun took one last glance at Shadow's broken body. The eyes spilling out of his skull were pointed away from him, and even with the optic nerves still attached to his brain Sorun wasn't even sure of he could still see or not in this state. They were slowly sliding closer towards his skull and the eye sockets that hadn't mended yet in the same way some of his muscles that Sorun had torn were slowly reeling themselves back into proper positions, healing.

"..." Sorun turned away from the broken mess and back towards the portal. He didn't want to see him anymore. He couldn't have leapt through the portal fast enough just to get away from it all.

It was official: Sorun hated leaping through time portals he made. It was less disorienting going through a tornado than falling through those things. He counted it fortunate that when the portal spit him out onto the ground in the same way the last one did that it spit out the two Chaos Emeralds as well. He'd managed to keep a hold on Yamato this time but hadn't had a chance to keep hold of the gems while falling head over heels in whatever that space was that he fell through.

The climate he'd dropped into was a stark contrast from how the space station had felt. Where that place had been cool and relatively comfortable this new place was hot and arid, and a sweltering sun was beating down on him. Already Sorun hated it, and grew to dislike it more with each second as he picked the Emeralds up and then stood up to his full height to get a better sense of his surroundings.

He would have thought it was a forest were it not for the heat. Not a jungle, that was for sure. Not with how dry the air was. And the trees weren't as dense as he would expect a forest to be, the grass a bit too tall and less green. Across the way, past some rocks and trees, he spotted the beginnings of sand and tinges of blue to signify water. Somewhere close to a coast, then.

After examining his surroundings, Sorun tried to dig into his pocket, but found his hand full with a red and glowing gem. He made a displeased grunt and made a Bringer Claw to hold the gem, and then dug into his pocket to retrieve the note Tails had given him. His eyes traveled downwards, towards more barely-legible scrawl and a set of coordinates below that. His eyes darted above the note, back at the trees and nearby beach, and then looked back down at the note. He made a small nod, and then pocketed the note.

"Downunda. In another age, Australia. I still need to figure out how that joke carried past the apocalypse," Sorun thought to himself as he glanced around the area. "Tails told me he and his family eventually moved here, so their house should be around here somewhere. Why he decided that is something I'll never know. This place was full of things that wanted to kill you before all the animals on the planet mutated from the gene bombs."

He pushed through some of the brush and foliage to press forwards, dismissing the Bringer Claw so he could hold back onto the Emeralds. He didn't need to search long to find the house, so apparently Tails' coordinates had been spot on. Homely little place on top of a small hill, big lawn in the back that lead to the forest while the front had a nice view of the beach and ocean from this angle. He didn't see it until he'd moved to the back of the home, but on the other side there was an extremely long, flat stretch of land, with a large shack nearby the house on that side. He didn't even need to look in there to know there was a plane in there.

Sorun maneuvered into the backyard. Nobody present, thankfully, so he assumed everyone was in the house. He knew Tails was at least there: there was something that looked like a garage door behind the house, and he heard the sounds of loud whirring and screeching metal from the other side, along with bright lights flashing from the underside of the door.

"Alright, here we go." Sorun leaned his shoulder onto the garage door and knocked on it with the red Emerald he had in his hand. "Tails!" he shouted out over the sound of metalworking on the other side of the door. When there was no response, he banged on the door a few more time, putting more strength on the hits, and shouted, "Tails, it's important! Open the door!"

The metalworking sounds ceased after a few seconds. There were small shuffling sounds and metal clinking, likely tools being put down. A few more seconds later the garage door began to open up, forcing Sorun to step away from it. Eventually the door opened up, fully revealing the Mobian on the other side.

For all intents and purposes, this Tails... well, he looked the exact same as the other adult Tails Sorun spoke with before committing to this time loop nonsense. He had an apron on, orange goggles over his eyes, and there were dark smudges of grease and oil in some spots on his fur, but otherwise the same. He looked incredibly confused, though.

"Er... hello?" Tails greeted, awkwardly. "Can I help you? Who are you?"

A short sigh left Sorun's nose. Tails, the other adult Tails, warned him of this. How in the original timeline he'd built some kind of room to protect his family from the timeline's alteration due to Sonic's meddling, and how when they appeared in this timeline their memories were spared, unlike everyone else. But this was an event that was a week away from happening, so until then this Tails was only working with one set of memories, those of this timeline. And Sorun never existed in this timeline.

And he had the job of convincing this Tails he was a time traveler who he himself sent back to the past. Somehow the adventure on the ARK was seeming easier and easier by the second.

"... Yeah, hi," Sorun swiftly greeted. "Can I come in?"

"... No?" Sorun did anyways, pushing past Tails and walking into the workshop. "H-hey!" he shouted, wheeling around towards Sorun as he entered the workshop.

"It's a nice setup you set up for yourself," Sorun noted. The workshop was about what he'd expect from a busybody like the Tails he knew. Tables stuffed to the brim with electronics, tools and metal parts to the point he couldn't see the table underneath. Toolboxes with various tools spilling out scattered everywhere, a computer bank with multiple monitors pressed up against the far wall. Machines of various sizes and shapes scattered around, none of which Sorun could even guess the function of.

The place was honestly a mess. Sorun would bet money Tails considered it to be the most organized workspace on the planet.

He sat down on a stool next to the most empty table he could find, which wasn't saying much. He set down the red Chaos Emerald on it, and then the blue one, and then turned to face Tails while laying Yamato in his lap. The fox had moved the goggles up to his forehead, revealing eyes that were puzzled and a slight bit angry as he approached Sorun. Then he saw the sword lying in his lap, and then stopped completely. Confusion warped into caution, his body going unnaturally still as he looked up to Sorun's face.

Sorun found himself biting the inside of his cheek. He should have known approaching a stranger with a katana was a bad idea.

"I don't appreciate you barging in here without being invited," Tails began. His two tails swished through the air once in sync, almost in a threatening manner. "I appreciate it even less you brought a weapon into the same house my wife and kids live in."

"Admittedly that's on me, my bad," Sorun apologized. He tried sounding sincere, but it didn't get Tails to ease up at all. "I didn't come here to hurt anyone."

"Then why the sword?"

"'Cause I'm an idiot?" Sorun shook his head. "Because I need it. And look, gimme a break. It's Australia, and with how messed up this world is for all I know there's giant spiders skittering around."

The confusion returned to Tails' face. "... What's an Australia? And what do you mean giant spiders? You mean spider Mobians? Like Willy?"

Sorun did a double-take. "What?" he asked, mouth dry. "Insect Mobians are a thing? Wait, fuck, Charmy was a bee. Bees are insects. OH GOD."

"Yeah, Willy. He's the mail courier that brings mail to the house," Tails elaborated, not seeming to notice the light sheen of sweat that had appeared on Sorun's face. "Wait, why am I even- what are you doing in my house!?" Tails shouted out, startling Sorun and causing the idea of spider-people to leave his mind.

Wincing a bit, Sorun slowly pointed at Tails. "It's rude to shout," he admonished, though the heated look Tails was giving him didn't dissipate in the slightest. Sorun sighed and decided to just go for it. "I'm from the future. And the past. It's complicated."

The hostility in Tails' face diminished a small amount. "The future?" he repeated, disbelieving. "Like time travel? That's impo-"

"Tails, I have been introduced to two methods of time travel in the last twenty-four hours alone. I have a sword that ignores the laws of reality. Do not stand there and tell me something's impossible, because I barely believe in that word anymore," Sorun said to him. "And if it's really impossible then how do I have these, huh?"

He nodded his head to the nearby Chaos Emeralds. Tails shifted his gaze towards them, and after a few seconds his eyes widened in recognition. Wonder spread over his face, and simultaneously his disbelief grew. He stepped up to the table, standing right next to Sorun as he picked up the red Emerald to examine it closely. He looked closer, and then made a sharp gasp and almost dropped the Emerald back on the table.

"I-I'd... have to run some tests to confirm, but... yeah, these seem genuine," he mumbled, putting the gem down with a shaky hand. He turned back to Sorun, and immediately his face turned back into looking angry. "Are you trying to get my family killed?"

That hadn't been the reaction he'd expected. "Huh?"

"Everybody knows King Shadow hoards artifacts like this! You, you what, did you steal these from him!? If he tracks these back here then-!"

"He's not gonna know to look here," Sorun promised Tails. "... I mean if you wanna get technical I did steal them from him," he added, and he saw Tails' nostrils flare out as he breathed heavily through them, "but that was twenty-five years ago. Time travel, remember? So chill out."

"Okay, say I believe you." Tails took a few steps back and crossed his arms. "I don't, but let's pretend I do. Why come to me of all people?"

"What do you mean you don't- agh, look!" Sorun dug into his pocket and brought the note out. He threw it at Tails, though, due to it being a piece of paper, it'd barely carried far enough to even reach Tails. His hand still snatched the note out of the air regardless, and slowly he began to read it over as Sorun continued speaking. "It's a note in your handwriting! Ain't that enough!?"

"... Okay, I'll admit this is suspiciously close to my handwriting. I even use the same kind of notepads," Tails slowly admitted as he set the note aside on the table. He still didn't look convinced. "But that alone doesn't-"

"Your name is Miles Prower," Sorun interrupted, causing Tails to snap his mouth closed. "Your nickname is Tails, you have a plane you like to mess around with and fly in, your wife is a mongoose named Mina, you have an uncle named Merlin, your father was named Amadeus and your mother was named-" Sorun cut himself off, and then cleared his throat. "Her name was, uh... MMM... Martha..."

"You mean Rosemary?" Tails asked, expression unamused and voice flat. "My mother? Rosemary?"

"Look, I never knew your mother," Sorun breathed out. "I'm from an alternate timeline where we were friends. Then I got... kinda shunted into an alternate future timeline where we never met."

"Ah-huh..." Well, he didn't look totally unconvinced now. Sorun figured that was somewhat of a good sign. "And you came here to, what, catch up with your pal from another timeline?"

"No, I'm here because I got roped into a time loop and if I don't do this it'll cause a time paradox that-"

"YOU'RE MESSING WITH TIME KNOWING YOU'RE RISKNG A TIME PARADOX!?" That scream was loud to the point Sorun had shuddered and began fingering the inside of one of his ears once again. He'd never heard the fox sound so vocal before in his life, except for maybe that time he'd scratched his plane when he tried to fly it. Sorun still maintained the mountain came from nowhere. "Why would you- what are you thinking!?" Tails began to pace around, more nervous than angry, as he continued to rattle off. "Time is such a fragile, fragile thing and the keystone to the zone's integrity, and if your method of time travel actually carries the risk of a time paradox-!"

"Yeah, yeah, yeah, I get it, end of the world, life go poof, I heard it the first time you explained it to me when I pretended to listen," Sorun assured Tails, who wheeled back towards him with wide eyes. "It's fine-"

"It's not fine!" Tails yelled back. "Why are you time traveling with that kind of risk!?"

Sorun threw his arms up. "Well, it's not like I want to! We're gonna hit a time paradox and die if I don't do this," Sorun argued, making Tails calm down somewhat. "Considering I made it this far and we're not all dead yet I'd say I'm doing a pretty good job of it." Which was honestly surprising. Sorun fully expected to fail five minutes in, so the fact he made it this far to him was nothing short of a miracle.

"But do you realize how stupid this-!?"

"Yeah, Tails, it's stupid, I get it, but guess what not everyone is born a genius like you, so if you have a problem you're gonna have to take it up with the idiot that started this whole loop," Sorun snapped. "I'm just the idiot perpetuating it so we all don't, you know, evaporate into the ether."

At that, Tails deflated. He covered his mouth with his hand and muttered something into it, and then shook his head while combing his fingers through the tufts of hair on his head. "Okay. Okay, if it's like you say then all we have to do is close this loop and everything should be fine." He looked back to Sorun. "So what does that entail?"

Sorun nodded. Finally, he could explain all this and get out. "Through methods I'm not entirely clear on you and your family will get memories of the timeline I'm from in a week, then you go off to Angel Island to talk to Knuckles- er, the chief enforcer guy- forget it, Knuckles, you'll remember, and the rest'll take off from there." He reached to the side and pushed the two Emeralds closer to Tails. "You'll find me, but it won't be me me, past me, future me, don't know which term is appropriate, doesn't matter, just... when the time is right, give him these, he'll know what to do with them. And after everything has calmed down and nobody's in danger you need to do three things." He rose one finger up and stared Tails in the eyes. "A, you need to tell that Sorun all this. Tell him the Yamato can go back to the past by separating the distance from two points in time. He's gonna deny it, just tell him it works." He rose a second finger. "B, he needs to go to Space Colony ARK and stop Shadow from blowing the planet up by stealing two of the Chaos Emeralds from the doomsday weapon, from twenty-five years ago. It needs to specifically be the red and blue Emeralds for some reason. You'll remember how to do that when the memories hit you in a week." A third finger. "C, after that he needs to go forwards to the week before you get your memories and explain everything I just explained to you and give you the Emeralds." He dropped his hand.

Surprisingly, Tails had nodded along to the entire explanation, looking like he somehow managed to comprehend it all. "Alright, so assuming that everything you just said is actually the truth... That's it?" he asked, making Sorun let out a bemused scoff that he'd understood all that. There was still a veneer of caution over his face, some skepticism. He honestly couldn't blame him, but he wasn't outright refuting any of what Sorun said. Probably as good as Sorun would get, which was his cue to leave.

Rising from the stool, Sorun gave the Mobian a nod. "That's it," he confirmed. "Believe me, don't believe me, won't matter in a week when the memories hit you. I'll leave the Emeralds with you in the meantime. If everything plays out the exact same as what I just went through it should work out." He rose Yamato up and rested it on his shoulder. "So, uh... yeah. That's all I got. I'm gonna dip out now before your mailman comes around, because... well, I'm just never gonna sleep again if I see that."

He slowly walked past Tails, heading towards the exit to the garage. The fox didn't stop him, didn't even speak up as the human stepped around him and left the room. All he could do was continue staring at the two Emeralds sitting on the table with a troubled expression, sighing deeply as he held a hand over his mouth in thought.

A few seconds later Sorun peeked his head back into the garage.

"Hey, man, uh, you got any food in the house? I haven't eaten in forever."

The sound of his footsteps as he departed Tails' house was hardly heard as his feet thumped down on the soft ground. His left hand held Yamato, still rested on his shoulder. His right hand was holding a sandwich Tails had been kind enough to give Sorun. This Tails was at least generous enough, even if he didn't know Sorun. More of that Mobian kindness.

He wasn't so sure if the other adult Tails that saw him cut King Shadow's head off would be so accommodating.

Sorun still didn't know how he was supposed to play that. By all rights he was done closing the time loop: all the conditions were met and all he had to do was return back to the future after he'd gone back and everything should be golden. That was all fine. It was after that, having to deal with the after effects of his actions, he wasn't sure on. Frankly he didn't want to deal with it at all and just ignore everyone.

Problems for later. Potentially minutes from now, but before then he actually had to get there. He stopped once Tails' house was out of sight, near the same patch of forest he'd arrived in where the beach was visible, and then held up the sandwich to his face. He moved it to his mouth, but then stopped when he smelled a peculiar scent. He looked closer at it and saw a white substance on the inside, sandwiched between all the other ingredients.

"Fuckin' mayo." His nose wrinkling in disgust, Sorun threw the sandwich as far as he could into the woods so he wouldn't be offended by its sight anymore. His stomach rumbled in protest, though he did his best to ignore it as he gripped Yamato's handle and pulled it from the sheath. "Alright, one last time."

There wasn't a particular date Sorun had in mind. Just some point after he went back in the future. Preferably a long bit after, if only to just give everyone some time to cool off and settle with the fact he'd killed someone. Surprisingly he wasn't having nearly as much difficulty cutting this time portal open - he was able to cut it with relative ease and didn't have to put his all into having to use the sword to crowbar it open. Best guess Sorun had was that going into the future was far easier than going backwards. That or he was just getting better at this, but he doubted it.

Even falling through it proved to be an easier time. It was still Sorun tumbling through a dark space of blue lights, but it wasn't too disorienting by comparison to going backwards. He even managed to land on his feet when the portal spat him out into what was visually identical to the location he'd just left. But when Sorun looked up as the portal closed, he'd noted the sun was in a different position. A bit past afternoon. Or morning. He didn't know which direction he was facing.

A long sigh left Sorun. He turned towards the nearest tree he could find, trudged towards it, and turned around just as his back fell against it. Another sigh left him as he slid down into a sitting position, pulling his knees up to his chest as he sheathed the katana.

As far as closing a time loop to prevent total annihilation went, it was a lot simpler than Sorun thought it'd be. And somehow even more exhausting than he anticipated. He was swearing this time travel stuff off once everything went back to normal, because nothing was worth this amount of stress.

Normal.

Sorun's head picked up from his knees. His eyes were tired, his face ashen and gaunt as he thumped the back of his head against the tree bark. "The fuck even is normal anymore?" he wondered to himself. The word sounded wrong, like it wasn't applicable. "Once again the world's saved. Woo-hoo. Now what am I supposed to do?"

He still didn't want to stay here. In this altered timeline. He wanted to go back to the normal one and just do away with this one entirely, maybe try and go back to having some semblance of normality to his life like he'd had before. Away from all this. But Tails had still maintained that was impossible and they were stuck here.

The weight in Sorun's left had was too heavy not for him to notice. It wasn't the physical weight that was on his mind as he lifted Yamato up for him to see. Time travel - he wouldn't have thought it was possible until he'd done it a few times. Now it wasn't even a concept anymore, but an avenue. An avenue that Sorun was quickly growing to hate because of all the trouble it had caused him. Ripped the memory of him away from all his friends, altered their lives, threw him twenty-five years ahead of where he was, undid all his actions...

Unconsciously he'd gripped Yamato tighter than normal, but then stopped. A few seconds passed of him just staring at the sword, thoughts swirling through his head. He pulled the sword out halfway, just so he could see the shining surface of the blade.

"Time travel got me into this situation," Sorun murmured to the sword. "Gotta wonder... could it get me out?"

There was a faint shimmer along the blade. The reflections he saw were swapped out with images of black-blue flesh and numerable blue eyes staring back at Sorun from within the sword. He stared at them for a bit, cocking his head to the side in curiosity.

He still didn't know what the deal with the eyes were. He had an idea, and it unsettled him how familiar the sight was. Better maybe to just ignore it.

The blade was fully pulled from the scabbard. He experimentally held it in front of him, thinking of a destination. Back in time, twenty-five years. He stabbed forwards, but immediately frowned when the blade sunk into the empty space in front of him.

It was stabbing into the past, yes, but not the right past. Just this timeline's past. He pulled the sword out, the frown deepening as he stared at the sword. "The power of separation. Time and space, reality itself. Concepts. The simple idea of separation." A beat passed. "Could that work?"

Another idea was formed by Sorun. Something for him to focus on - a new target for the sword. Crazy, maybe, but that was his life now. He focused deep on the new idea and stabbed forwards.

A different reaction. Blue sparks flew out as the tip of the sword bounced on an invisible surface in the air in front of him. Sorun's eyes widened, his heart rate quickening as he tried stabbing forwards again.

No good. No matter how much force he put into it the blade wouldn't pierce. Even focusing more energy into the sword, enough that the whole blade glowed blue, wasn't cutting it. But there was resistance to his efforts. Something tangible that his sword scraped uselessly against. Proof that this idea might actually be feasible, that there was a path forwards.

"But not even you can do it, huh?" Sorun muttered to the sword. "If you don't have the power to do it..."

Sorun shook his head, and then sheathed the sword. Maybe he was rushing into things, messing around with forces he didn't have a clue about. He wasn't even sure if this idea really would work.

A second opinion was needed, one who knew a lot more about this than Sorun did. Fortunately just the expert lived nearby, assuming he was home right now.

Chapter 83

Recursion Error

Episode 83- F!#k the future

Sorun hadn't known what to expect. Really. Walked up to the house with zero expectations whatsoever. How Tails would react, how the family would react. Tails would probably be upset. Mina, he didn't know, the two of them barely ever spoke, it'd been twenty-five years, and Tails probably told her about him. The kids he was blank on. Really he was ready for anything.

Being ushered into the house with a warm smile somehow still managed to surprise Sorun. It was a pleasant one, granted, but still unexpected. He was still in a bit of a stupor when he'd been sat down in one of the most bog-standard living rooms he'd ever been inside of in his entire life, sitting down on a couch while being handed a sandwich. He hadn't even asked for one was the thing, not after what happened last time. He was just being offered one out of courtesy.

The hunger made it so he couldn't refuse, so he'd at least gone through and requested under no circumstances was so much as a molecule of mayonnaise to touch it.

"... Thanks," Sorun said, a bit awkwardly as he took the piece of food. He was sitting on the couch, so the Mobian woman standing next to him stood taller. Of all the future versions of Mobians he'd seen Mina had probably visually aged the least out of all of them, Shadow aside. There was still visible aging, mostly in the eyes, her demeanor, but then again he hardly knew her so he didn't even know if that was due to age.

She offered him a tentative smile, brushing locks of purple hair so it spilled over her shoulder. "It's no problem," she assured him. "It's just nice having someone visit from the... you know, the before time. It's been so long now that the kids have finally calmed down from it, so..." She trailed off, smile falling a bit when she saw Sorun was staring up at her blankly. She tried picking her smile back up. "It's just nice. Seeing you again. I know I can't really complain since you must be dealing with a lot more than a sudden case of double-memories, but if you need someone to talk to my husband and I are here."

They weren't friends. Sorun knew that, Mina would probably disagree despite the fact they'd barely ever known each other, but Mobians would be Mobians. Even if he wasn't committed to his plan Sorun still wouldn't take her up on that offer because he was Sorun, so he didn't so much as give her an acknowledging blink. He instead turned his head around, towards the open entranceway that separate the living room they were in and into the kitchen. He saw two small, yellow forms dart passed. Mina caught him staring and saw the two children.

"Er, sorry. Need to be a mom for a bit." She began stepping towards the kitchen. "I-I'll go get Tails when I get a chance."

Sorun watched her go off, silently. Saw Mina disappear around the corner, and then silently turned back forwards, blinking once as he looked down at the sandwich. He took a bite.

... Halfway decent.

By the time he'd finished the sandwich to calm the hunger pains he felt Tails had entered his vision. He made a small sigh, sitting down in the couch opposite of Sorun so they faced each other. His hands were clasped together, features tight and wound as he looked up into Sorun's eyes. The human kept his face blank.

"What took you so long?" Tails asked. "How long did it take you to close the loop?"

The question caught Sorun a bit off guard. He had to think a bit for the answer. "Like an hour? Hour and ten minutes?" he guessed.

"Okay, and you finished it? It's done?"

"I don't think we'd be here talking about it if I didn't finish it," Sorun answered. "Yeah. It's done. Loop's closed."

That seemed to be the answer Tails was looking for. Relief washed over his face as his entire body relaxed, sinking further into the couch as he let his arms flop to his side. Sorun blinked a couple of times as he stared at the fox, neutral expression discarded in place of some confusion on his face, and Tails offered the barest smiles and shook his head.

"Sorry, it's just... I've been wound up over that ever since you left," he apologized, sitting up straighter. "Waking up every day wondering if I was gonna look out the window and see the entire world disappear because of a time paradox. Thanks for everything, Sorun. I know it likely wasn't easy."

It'd been shockingly easy for Sorun to bend someone into a living pretzel. He didn't know what he felt on that. "It's fine." Sorun couldn't even tell if he'd said a lie. "How long was I gone that you're reacting like this?"

"You left for the past five months ago after we finished talking."

Sorun's lips thinned a bit. He'd gone a bit more forwards than he'd liked. "Time traveling's a new skill for me." Truth concealing a lie. It felt like he didn't even have to think of it anymore. "That's not gonna affect the loop, is it?"

Tails shook his head. "No, as long as you set up events so that the next Sorun in the loop can do the exact same thing you did to preserve the loop infinitely and you went back forwards to a point in time after you went back to close the loop, we should be good. You said it yourself: the fact we're still talking confirms it. We're set."

"Oh. Okay. Alright." Sorun still didn't know what his feelings were regarding the loop. How he'd condemned some past version of himself to repeat the same thing he'd done, only for them to do the same thing to another past Sorun. An infinite chain of repeating events. He tried likening it to how there was a Sorun a second in the past, who was sit still for a second until he was in the present, so now there was another second-in-the-past Sorun. Or something similar.

Time. The loop itself and the implication of infinitely repeating events was irrelevant since time flowed ever onwards. So it didn't much matter as long as time and the universe remained intact. He'd move on, they'd move on, everything would infinitely move on because time was time. The point was he fixed things so it wasn't something Sorun had to worry about.

Except now he was fixing to break everything he'd just saved.

"Um, I'm sorry." Sorun's attention was focused back on Tails. He was giving the human an apologetic look, which he found surprising. "I know this must be really hectic for you, how your life went from being in this one place to another, how everything's different. The future, the alternate timeline, all that."

"Mm. Wouldn't be the first time," Sorun commented, making Tails pause. "You would know since you were there for it the first time. Even facilitated in it. Made the portal, dragged me through." A long, uncomfortable silence stretched. "But that's in the past," Sorun finished, the response allowing Tails to breath again.

"Whew, yeah, uh... mmmmHM." He coughed into his fist to clear his throat. "Again, I'm sorry. I know you must be going through a lot."

"You didn't sound very apologetic after what happened at the castle," Sorun pointed out. "There's children present in the house so I won't get into specifics but you know what I mean." How he killed someone.

"Yeah, about that." Tails cleared his throat again, suddenly looking a bit more uncomfortable. "Look, I get tensions were fairly high, and you were probably dealing with a lot at the time. Your nerves were frayed, you were still coming down from fighting Enerjak and getting sent here, and I get even before that you'd been through, well... more than someone could be reasonably expected to handle. But it's been a while, and now that Sonic's the king again he's been fixing a lot of the things King Shadow twisted, so..." He fidgeted under Sorun's empty glare. "Yeah. Everything's going back to normal. I still don't agree at all with what you did, but everything worked out in the end."

Was it just denial? Tails claiming Sorun was in so much mental disarray at the time his judgement had been that skewed? Hell, he was probably right if that was the case; Sorun didn't know. Or had so much time passed it was all a distant memory and he found forgiveness in his heart? Because they were friends? Because everything was fine - everything was not fine - now they could just drop it? Sorun didn't even know if he should feel relieved or spiteful.

"Uh. Okay." It took some moments for Sorun to articulate sentences in light of Tails' words. "It's been difficult, wrapping my head around it all, how things are just gone and replaced by other things, memories, events." His eyes darted towards a nearby window. "It's like I don't even exist in this world. I didn't."

"I know. I know it's rough." The tight smile Tails wore dropped, his eyes turning sympathetic. "I know you put a lot of yourself into getting a new life on Mobius-"

"Yeah, Tails, I did," Sorun interrupted. Frustration, the first actual emotion he'd shown since entering the house after being greeted by Mina, creeped into his tone. "I had my life shattered into a million pieces and just when I finally start fixing things everything I had, everything I ever did, it just gets erased? Again? Like Earth? I worked my a-" He paused abruptly, and then turned towards the kitchen entrance. A yellow-furred head darted out of the doorway from where blue eyes had been peeking at Sorun. He turned back towards Tails. "I worked really hard," he reiterated. "Fixing everything. Fixing myself . It's all gone now. Again . What about that sounds okay to you?"

Tails' ears fell a bit. "I know, Sorun. It's awful," he admitted to him. "Sonic was kind of going through the same thing, but things have gone stable for him. If things were different I'd come up with some way to fix the timeline, maybe try and emulate Robotnik's time machine and make my own to make things the way they used to be, but it's just too big a risk. When Sonic did it the timeline almost tore itself apart and in the process of fixing itself we were left with an alternate history. We only risk making things even worse by pushing it further, or even worse just destroying time, and by extension, the entire zone." Tails shook his head. "No. I know it's not ideal, but this is what we have." The corners of his mouth turned a bit upwards. He had the gall to look hopeful. "And hey, things aren't so bad now, are they? Sonic's back in the throne, things are going back to normal, and now we can all just pick up where we left off. All things considered we could be in way worse shape."

"That's easy for you to say, Tails. You got to keep your family."

"... Sorun, it's not like anyone outside of our group even remembers that timeline," Tails reminded him. "I'm not gonna lie and say I don't have it the easiest, but regardless there's nothing to be done about it."

"Yeah. I know. I'm gonna go ahead and change everything back anyways."

The first reaction Tails had was confusion. Incredulity, a raise of one of his furred eye ridges as he examined Sorun and the completely straight face he was making. Interestingly the first thing that came out of his mouth was a small, nervous chuckle followed by the odd look Tails gave Sorun.

"Sorun, um... I get you're upset, but really, you need to let it go. You can't go back to that timeline. None of us can," Tails said to him, slowly, like he was explaining this to a child. Sorun began wondering if Tails was thinking he just didn't understand. "I'm not telling you this to be mean, I'm telling you this because it's literally impossible."

For the first time since Sorun entered the house he looked to the left, at his left hand that continued to clench its fingers around Yamato. He rose it up a bit for Tails to see, and then turned his head to him, saying, "Nah. I got this, remember?"

Tails shook his head, and the nervous grin widened. "Sorun, I don't think you're getting this. It's not like the timeline we're on got tacked onto the original timeline or something like that. It was overwritten with this one, supplanted. It's gone. The only past you can travel back to is this timeline's past."

Sorun made a noncommittal hum of acknowledgement.

A few moments of Sorun silently staring at Tails found the fox's grin lowering somewhat. "Hey," he said, reaching a hand forwards, "why don't you just hand me that-"

The blue ribbon on the sword's scabbard reached up to wrap around Sorun's wrist. The movements were quick enough to wrap around the wrist in a blink, but the way they curled around the appendage was slow, almost protective. Sorun watched it without any change in his expression while Tails had yanked his arm back in shock.

"I'm fine," Sorun told Tails, still looking down at the sword. "Don't look so alarmed. It's only semi-sentient, no will of its own. Just enough to do what I want it to. Technically all Devil Arms are alive since they're made with still-living souls, but Yamato is special in that it was only made from a third of a soul. And even if it's just an artificial recreation the rules still apply it seems."

"I-I don't understand," Tails stammered out, eyes still staring straight at the sword. "A Devil... Arm? Sorun, you're not making any sens-"

"You know the weird thing about Chaos Emeralds and how they interact with me is I can make anything from that piece of fiction," Sorun continued, more to himself, like he wasn't even talking to Tails who listened on. "Weapons, powers, maybe even certain demons if I really tried. 'Cept Devil Trigger. Still haven't cracked that one," he added bitterly. "I thought about making the Beastheads, at the least maybe the statue form, since it has the ability to teleport people to alternate timelines and I could just use that, but that thing eats human souls and I'm not sure I could actually control it. Too unreliable, too dangerous. Never gonna be an option.

"But that's unnecessary anyways. I experimented around with Yamato, and I found a way. A way to go back."

"Sorun, you're talking crazy." Tails had straightened up, face turned into a deep frown as his eyes went from the sword to Sorun, who met eyes with the fox. "I don't know what all the talk about monsters is, but there is. No. Way. Back. It's impossible."

It took some seconds for Sorun to respond. He'd leaned forwards on the couch to get closer to Tails, clasping his hands together with the Yamato between his fingers. His eyes didn't leave Tails'. "The Yamato's power is to separate," Sorun intoned. "I don't think you're appreciating what that actually means, Tails. How broad that description is. The depth of it."

"I'm not seeing a lot of depth in a sword that can cut through anything, Sorun."

"I think I see the problem. You're a genius, Tails, no one can deny that. But all that knowledge of yours sits with practical things. Machines, science, math. But the esoteric nonsense around these powers is where I shine because of all the fiction I've consumed in the past. Mobius just doesn't have the same media," Sorun told him. "What you're failing to grasp is that the sword's power to 'cut through anything' is a singular function under its separation power. The limit of separation is limited to my perspective of how that singular word can apply to something. I think the fact it's a Chaos Emerald is to blame for that." He tiled his hands a bit so that the end of the sword's handle pointed at Tails. "For example. If I stabbed you with the Yamato, I could use it to separate you from your ability to speak. I'm not saying that like it'd take your vocal cords or carve your speaking knowledge out of your brain or something like that; the idea, the simple concept of speaking, would be taken from you. Even if you were physically able to speak, and had full knowledge of speaking, you wouldn't be able to ever talk again. Because the Yamato separated out your ability to talk from you.

"Or I could separate other things. Separate out your intelligence, rob you of your genius status. Take certain memories away. Memories of your children, your family, but leave the intelligence. Separate out your inhibitions so you couldn't say no. I could wipe away your entire personality and lobotomize you into being a little genius slave. That's pretty gross, huh?"

There was a ruffling sound as Tails' fingers squeezed down on the couch cushions, the gloves he wore making a slight squeaking noise. Tails' eyes were alert, focused solely on Sorun with his ears straightened up. The rest of his body, even his tails, was still, and there was no hiding the tenseness in his entire body. Sorun himself remained calm, though a small, almost teasing smile did play across his lips.

"Tails, relax. I'm just kidding around. I'd never do that. What do I look like, Robotnik?" he asked him. "I'm just giving examples to help explain away Yamato."

The Mobian relaxed, albeit only slightly. He maintained his glare into Sorun's eyes, and his gloved hands didn't stop squeezing the cushions. "Examples. Right," Tails muttered out. "You had to make them so creepy?"

"Just trying to get the idea of separating ideas across."

"Well I get it . What does this have to do with anything?" Tails quietly snapped out.

"Hmm..." Sorun's eyes dipped down to the Yamato. "You know I tried going back there using the Yamato already? Didn't work because you're right: there's only this one timeline. But you need to realize that, at one point, our old timeline did exist. A timeline that isn't this timeline. Two separate things. Regardless if it isn't here or not, it at one point did, and because of that there's an idea that the two timelines are mutually exclusive from one another." His fingers tapped on the sword's scabbard. "I can use the Yamato to get back there. Just like how I use it to cut through space to make portals, or cut through time to time travel."

He could see gears turning in Tails' head as he processed Sorun's own words. The implication behind them, Sorun's meaning. There were periods where he would shift slightly in his seat as he intensely thoughts, eyes widening and narrowing in brief interims along with slight mumbles escaping his lips. The only thing that remained constant was the fox's breathing steadily increasing.

After a bit, Tails shook his head. "No, that doesn't make sense. You shouldn't be able-"

"I think," Sorun interrupted, "it might have something to do with the fact that the Chaos Emeralds, Chaos energy as a whole, is immune to time. Time just doesn't touch it. The only reason I'm even here and didn't get erased is because I was inside the Master Emerald and it shielded me. If you really think about it all the Emeralds here aren't just identical duplicates. The containers, sure, but the energy within? It's the same from our timeline. Combine that with the Yamato's separation ability, maybe even entertain the idea that, since the Emeralds' energies are originally from our time, there's a tangible link back there through them. With how insane all this Chaos stuff can get is it really that hard for you to believe, Tails?"

Tails shook his head. Roughly and quickly. Almost in denial, which had Sorun sit up straighter. "Even if you could, even if all of what you just said is right, a single Chaos Emerald wouldn't have the power-"

"Yeah, I know, when I tried it couldn't do it. Yamato doesn't have the power," Sorun finished. "So what you're saying is I just need more power and I could do it?"

The question didn't cause much reaction out of Tails at first. He seemed to think it over, and then something dawned on the Mobian. He sat back against the couch, eyes opening as wide as they could as he stared at Sorun. There was hurt in his expression, betrayal.

"Did..." Tails began, voice sounding hoarse, "did... you come all the here to my house just to ask me that? You didn't come just to visit me?"

Sorun gave the fox a confused look. "Why would I want to visit you? We're not friends. You're not Tails. You're just a stranger with his name and face."

Tails recoiled like he'd been struck. There was pain in his eyes, some anger as well, but mainly pain. "Sorun, that's not true, that's... how could you say that-?"

"You think the Master Emerald would work?" Once again Sorun interrupted Tails, carrying on like he hadn't said anything offending with a bored expression. "I could try using it as a means of amplifying my powers, stab Yamato into it, use the sword as a power conduit. I have enough control to do something like that now."

He could see Tails stiffen, some things like his ears and tails twitch. A moment where, even unconsciously, Tails had considered Sorun's theory, and then reacted in some way. Realization? It had to be, from the way Tails' visual nervousness just increased. Like Sorun had just said something concerning.

"So it is the key. Yamato can do it. I just need more power from the Master Emerald."

"Sorun, what are you hoping to accomplish with this?" Tails' voice had gone lower, his expression becoming startlingly calm.

Something like acceptance passed over him before he fixed Sorun with a cold look. "Even if you manage to temporarily boost the sword's power, and even if you manage to cut your way into the past timeline, what do you plan on doing about it?" he asked. "Are you forgetting about the time anomaly that almost tore the zone apart? The reason Sonic ended up inadvertently altering the timeline in the first place? If you try to stop that alteration from happening we'll all die."

In a nonchalant gesture that seemed to frustrate Tails further, Sorun shrugged. "I'll separate the time anomaly from the zone with Yamato," he suggested. "I have no idea where it'll end up if I do that, though. Throw it in the space between worlds, maybe. It's a time anomaly, so for all we know if we remove it from the timeline it was affecting that alone will be enough to neutralize it completely."

"You don't know that , though."

"Does it even matter?" Sorun asked. "Why are you being so aggressive about this? I thought you'd be on board with me. I'm trying to fix the world."

"The world's as fixed as it's going to be!"

"No, it isn't ." For the first time since entering the house sparks of anger began to appear on Sorun's face. He himself was beginning to feel frustration, at Tails, at the stance he was taking. "This isn't okay. None of this is okay. I promised Sonic I would make everything normal again, and I can do that." He shook his head, looking confused when he asked Tails, "Why are you so against this when I can make everything normal? Things can go back to how they were, everything-"

"Because you don't know what you're doing!" Tails exploded, rising out of his seat in a standing position. "You don't know the consequences of opening a portal that bypasses so many laws of time and space you'll be connecting to a timeline that doesn't exist anymore! You don't know if you can dispose of the time anomaly with the sword! You'll have to go back in time to before Sonic changed the timeline, you realize that, don't you, Sorun? You know you'll be changing the timeline, and the consequences could mean destruction of the whole zone!" He collapsed back onto the couch, sighing while shaking his head. "I'm sorry, Sorun. Yes, I'll admit that Chaos energy... well, it can do anything, so if you're right about the sword then theoretically, yes, you could do all this. But it would possibly mean disaster. You can't , Sorun."

It made Sorun wonder what Tails was playing at. Confirming to Sorun that he probably could do what he was proposing and trying to dissuade him. Why? Because Sorun would just try anyway? Was he trying to lead him with the truth and convince him not to commit because it could mean death for the whole universe? Trying to be transparent with Sorun to have the best chance of convincing him? He'd like to think it, but Sorun very much doubted that, even at a subconscious level, Tails was trying to subtly nudge Sorun towards trying it. Not when he looked this afraid. Not with his family to consider.

Whatever Tails' reasoning was wouldn't matter, though. Sorun had already made his mind up on this.

"I'm still going to do it," Sorun said. "I didn't come here to ask permission. I'm doing it regardless of what you say."

"Sorun, I am begging you to listen to me," Tails pleaded. "I know you think you can fix everything, but you can't, you really can't. I know this hasn't been the easiest time for you, I know it's almost never an easy time with you, but just because things are bad now doesn't mean we can't help you-!"

The sharp glare Sorun sent Tails cut him off immediately. He'd heard enough to know Tails stance - how he'd gone from appealing to Sorun to bargaining. He wouldn't budge from his opinion on matters and Sorun was done trying to convince him. All he had to wonder was what Tails would move on to. Would he just accept Sorun had made up his mind and let him be? Threaten him? Sorun only saw it going one of two ways forwards, but he couldn't figure out which direction Tails would lean in.

It didn't matter. He wouldn't let him stop him even if he did try. Best he could do was wish Sorun luck, but the human felt that was him being wishful.

"Tails. My mind's made up," Sorun said, with an air of finality in his voice. "I'll use the Master Emerald in conjunction with the Yamato to open a way back to the true timeline. I'll use the Yamato to get rid of the time anomaly, and things can go back to normal."

"Or you cause the complete destruction of the entire zone with how much you're messing with time." Tails' expression was hard.

"At this point I'm completely fine with that. Either I make everything normal again so I can go back to sleeping in my bed, or I die in the process and get to sleep forever. Whatever the case I absolutely refuse to spend another second longer in this place than I have to."

Tails' teeth grit in anger. "If you think for even a second I'm going to allow you to endanger-"

Whatever he was going to say was interrupted when a figure darted into the room. Small, Sorun had noted. A child. A fox that bore a striking resemblance to Tails. He made the conclusion that he was one of Tails' children when he ran up to Tails and hugged him while he was still sitting on the couch.

The older fox was caught off guard by the sudden contact, anger vanishing off his face while being replaced by a softer, albeit it confused, look. Sorun, meanwhile, simply watched the pair in silence.

"U-uh... hey, Skye," Tails mumbled out, reaching up to rub the top of the kid's head. Slowly, tenderly. "What's going on?"

The child hugged him harder. "Daddy sounded mad," he spoke, quietly.

The answer almost seemed to startle Tails. "I'm not mad at anything," he said, gripping Skye's shoulders to pull him away. "Just, um, having a small argument with my friend."

"Mm." The smaller fox turned around towards Sorun. He looked up at him, less afraid and more curious as he gazed at the human's face.

On a dime, Sorun's expression had changed entirely. From a apathetic mask hiding the smoldering frustration and anger he felt to a kind face holding the smallest of smiles, eyes completely free of malice. "Hey, champ," Sorun greeted in a light tone, reaching with his right hand to pat him on the head. "Just talking with your dad. Nothing serious," he lied.

Skye had responded by giving Sorun the same treatment he'd given his father and hugged him, close enough to bury his face in his torso.

In response, Sorun made a small chuckle. "Well, you're real friendly, aren't you?" He continued to gently ruffle Skye's hair through the hug. At the same time he looked back at Tails' face, and in a seamless transition Sorun's expression morphed back into the fusion of apathy and anger he'd had with Tails. He lifted his left hand up, showing off Yamato in plain view of Tails.

The thumb on his left hand pushed on the sword's guard and broke the seal on the scabbard, showing off a bit of the sword's blade. Tails completely froze at the sight.

"You're honestly the luckiest kid in the world to have a dad as caring as your father." Though Sorun's tone sounded kind, the face that betrayed his animosity towards Tails remained. "Really, he seems like the kind of guy that'd do everything he could to protect his family. He's a good man."

"Mhm." Skye nodded into Sorun's chest.

"Yeah, he and I go way back. Such a dependable guy you could always count on to have your back. You must love him a lot."

The compliments were doing nothing to sooth Tails. He was starting to shake with fury.

Once again, Skye nodded. "Mhm."

Sorun's thumb pushed down on the sword's guard to put the blade back in the scabbard. "Well, sounds to me like you're the luckiest person in the world to have a dad like him." When Skye pulled away from Sorun, his face morphed back into the kind one with the slight smile. He gave the child one more pet on the head. "You seem nice, but this is grown-up talk your old man and I are having, okay? Maybe go play with your sister. What was her name again?"

"Melody."

Sorun's eyes darted up to Tails'. "Melody, huh?"

"Skye. Please leave us alone." There was little to no emotion in Tails' voice when he spoke, and it sounded like he was struggling to say the words. Skye didn't seem to pick up in his shift in demeanor, and happily skipped away back towards the kitchen he came out of. Sorun watched him go, then looked back at Tails.

"Cute kid. Kinda shy-looking," he commented. His eyes lost their kindness, and the smile fell. "What?"

"Get out of my house."

"Tails-"

"Get out," Tails growled out, "and never, ever come back, Sorun. Do you hear me?"

"Fine." Shrugging in agreement, Sorun stood up off the couch. "Not like it'll be that hard since this version of your home isn't likely to make it past the hour anyways. I'm heading right to the castle."

He turned around to leave. Tails had spoke out and stopped Sorun before his right hand even managed to reach out towards his sword. "You know, I thought I knew you. I really did. I had to wonder if I really did after what you did to King Shadow, and I managed to convince myself that you were just under a lot of stress." Something appeared underneath all the anger his voice, almost akin to sadness, and when Sorun didn't respond Tails continued. "But threatening my children , Sorun? Were you just bluffing around with the sword hoping I'd drop the matter or were you actually serious?"

Sorun didn't have an answer to the question. Truthfully he didn't even know what the answer was. "I just want to go home, Tails," he said, looking over his shoulder at the Mobian glaring at him. "That's all I want."

"And you're willing to go this far to do it? Threatening my family?"

"If you're gonna make a problem of it. Maybe it'd give you perspective," Sorun responded. "I'm going to the true timeline, and I'm not going to let anyone stand in my way. And I'm surely not gonna let you ruin my life again."

By now Tails nearly looked like he was snarling. "I saved you!"

Sorun tore the sword out of its sheath. Despite his demeanor, Tails still flinched. "That wasn't the context back then. It was a byproduct. Don't act like you did something noble. You didn't." He slashed a cross into the air, and seconds later it folded inwards into a portal. "Just please do us both a favor and don't try to stop me. Don't call anyone, don't do anything. It'll all go easier if you just let me do this."

Tails shook his head. "You know I can't."

A deep frown settled on Sorun's face. He thought of saying something, but then decided against it and shook his head. "Whatever. It doesn't matter."

He stepped through the portal without another word.

He was acutely aware that he should have gone straight to the Master Emerald the second he stepped out of the portal and closed it. Less risk of outside interference. Sorun wanted to, but a lot of Tails' words stayed with him that he couldn't help but mentally go over as he slowly re-sheathed the katana.

In a way, he was right in that Sorun didn't have a full grasp on what he was doing. A lot of it was guesswork and assumptions, though, granted, he was in the best position out of anyone to make accurate educated guesses when it came to the Yamato and its powers. Ironically he was the best judge of the situation despite not being as knowledgeable of time compared to someone like Tails, who was good enough to jury-rig a time-immunity room to protect himself and his family on short notice.

But Yamato let him circumvent the lack of understanding due to the broad nature of its power and its ability to just bulldoze its way through the rules due to the nature of Chaos energy. He just needed more. But there was that risk Tails droned on about, how Sorun might end up breaking the entire universe in trying to fix it. To be fair there was truth in his words, but Sorun had been honest when he said he was at the point where he didn't really care. In the best of all worlds he'd succeed and go back home to the others, but failing that he'd rather die than stay here.

It was still causing him to hesitate, though. Because of what Tails said. Funnily enough the prospect of dying still held weight over him despite the amount of times he'd brushed so closely to death. He didn't know whether to be grateful over the fact that was one thing that wasn't desensitized about him yet, that there was at least that bit of humanity left in him, or to be annoyed on how it was making him hesitate with this.

So with all that in mind he'd portaled into the castle he'd been loathing such a short while ago, in one of the halls. Somewhere below him was dungeon full of weapons and other things he didn't really want to know about, as well as the Master Emerald. Really he didn't even need to take the stairs down there; he could just make a portal direct. And it still irked him that he should do that but wasn't.

"Not yet. In a bit. Just need to clear my head first."

To that end he began to idly wander the castle halls. Less because he wanted to and more because, quite frankly, he didn't really have anywhere else better to go in this world. It was daytime now, from all the windows he was passing while roaming the halls. Bright and sunny, a stark contrast to when Sorun first appeared here. Almost bright enough to hurt his eyes, to the point he found himself shying away from being too close to the windows.

He noticed there were some changes, at least aesthetically. Not evil paintings hanging on the wall, no reliefs of angel girls. Sorun still didn't know what her deal had been. From everything King Shadow had said he managed to piece enough together to assume she was someone he'd been close to that died, but he decided not to think any further on it than that out of respect for the real Shadow. Without all the distasteful decorations, the castle interior was admittedly... tolerable, in a way. The only thing keeping Sorun from saying it was "nice" were the memories he held of the place.

He wouldn't be shedding any tears once it was gone.

"What the- hey! Hey, Sorun!"

At hearing his name, Sorun had stopped, then he made a small groan when he recognized the voice. More out of annoyance than displeasure. He didn't even get to turn around fully before he heard a rapid set of footsteps, followed by a blue body standing right in front of him when Sorun finished turning.

"..." Sorun's eyes directly went to the top of Sonic's head. He was wearing a crown - there was some relief when he saw it was a different crown from the one King Shadow had worn. Even so Sorun still had to resist the unconscious urge to smack it off of Sonic's head, and instead looked down a bit to meet his eyes. "Hey," he stiffly greeted.

"Uh, yeah, hi." A few moments passed, each more awkward than the last. From the uncomfortable look Sonic had on he had just about as many words to say as Sorun did. So it couldn't have been that many. "What are you doing here?" he asked. "I, er, didn't hear you come in from the guards."

Sorun quirked an eyebrow. "There's guards?"

"Yeah, Sorun, I'm king now, and guards are kind of a king thing."

He blinked, and then looked around. He and Sonic were the only ones in the corridor and Sorun hadn't seen a single guard in all the time he'd been here. "I don't think they're doing a very good job," he said, turning back to Sonic.

"Probably not," he agreed. He made a sigh and pinched the space between his eyes. "You've been gone for a whole five months, man. So I'm guessing you're done with, you know, the whole time thing? That's settled? Tails filled me in after you left."

"Yeah."

"And you really had to be gone for five months to do this?"

Sorun offered a shrug. "Time travel's tricky," he explained.

Sonic's shoulders sagged. "Don't I know it," he murmured out, and instantly Sorun felt a bit bad.

"... I met with Tails," Sorun began. "He said you're holding things down." Remarkably the city wasn't on fire, so Sorun supposed Sonic must have been at least half-decent at this. Surprisingly.

A dry chuckle left the hedgehog. "You don't have to sound so surprised," he said. He sounded like he tried to be playful, but he just came off as sounding plain exhausted. "Yeah, it was a bit of a mess at first, after you, you know..."

"Killed that last king," Sorun finished, making Sonic jump a bit. "Yeah. Regicide. Deicide. Been getting a lot of the cides in lately." When all Sonic offered him was a blank stare, Sorun added, "It's a Latin suffix that means... oh, whatever, you don't really care."

"Hey, don't say that," Sonic chastised, watching as Sorun walked over to and leaned on the wall near one of the corridor windows. "I get a lot happened, and how... we'll say upset ... you were because of this, really showed me a side of you I didn't know you had, but things worked out."

"Mm. So this isn't the part where you crucify me for committing a cardinal sin that I don't really care about?"

"I'm more concerned about the fact you don't care than about you actually doing it." Another silent pause between them. Another sigh from Sonic. "Look, what happened happened. And I know you're not a psychopath that'll go around cutting people even with a good reason, so we can't just, you know, move on? It's been months."

Sorun hummed. It was more maturity out of Sonic than he would have expected, but he was grateful for it nonetheless. And eager to get off the topic. "So things have been good?"

"As good as they can be. All the people I'm in charge of now, they're, um, they've been real supportive, actually. Dunno if that means I'm doing a good job since a lot of it's actually been Sally." He glanced off to the side, his cheeks visually heating under the fur. "We got back together. Probably already guessed it but she's queen."

Sorun's expression grew flat. "You married this timeline's Sally."

"Yeah," Sonic confirmed, "and, well... we, uh... we kind of already have kids on the way, you know? So things are finally coming back together."

Sorun's expression didn't change.

"I know it's not the same , never will be I don't think, but this is fine, right?" Sonic asked him. "World's coming back together, everyone seems happy enough, and things are just... things are going great. We're fixing everything. That's gotta count for something, right?"

"Fixing. Sure." Sorun glanced down, folding his hands over Yamato and holding it over his lap as he continued to lean his back against the wall. "None of what happened bothers you?"

"Well of course it does, but-"

"Never mind, I get it."

"O-okay." Sonic waited for Sorun to continue, but when he said nothing, he awkwardly coughed into his fist to try and gain his attention. Blue eyes flicked up to look at Sonic. "How are you doing?"

He could have stabbed him for asking that question. "Who even knows?" Sorun airily answered with a shrug. "I think I will be okay, maybe. Later. I'm glad to see you're taking it all in stride." He must have said that a bit harsher than he intended, because he saw Sonic flinch back a bit. "Sorry, I-I didn't mean it like-"

"No, I get it," Sonic assured him. "It's just... weird. Seeing this side of you. The side of you I saw back when we were dealing with Shadow."

"Yeah. And you got old and Tails married an idol. It's been weird for me, too," Sorun said.

"I get it." Sonic slowly exhaled and looked away. "We really did try, you know. To get you out of there after what happened with Enerjak. Everyone did. We didn't want to leave you in there."

"In the past. Literally. 'S fine." It wasn't really fine, but at this point, with what Sorun was planning, it didn't matter. Not a word of this conversation mattered, really, but Sorun had yet to work his nerves up to go downstairs to the Emerald.

"Can I at least ask why you did all that?" Sonic's question made Sorun pick his head up completely. "That whole thing with Enerjak?"

A bit of confusion wormed its way onto Sorun's face. "I didn't want my friends' souls to be enslaved and for the rest of the world to be conquered by an insane god. What about any of that do I need to make clear?"

"You sacrificed yourself again," the hedgehog pointed out.

"Yeah, man, I- Jesus, what do you even want from me?" An exasperated sigh left Sorun when he realized just what kind of answer he had to give. "Look, I liked you all, okay? I liked living there, in that city, with all you. Rest of the world, eh..." he tilted his head from side to side, "kinda iffy, but that was true even from where I'm from. It was home."

It was somewhat grating, admitting all this. Doubly so because it was him . Triply so because it wouldn't matter in a bit because this whole conversation would be erased. Sorun wondered if any of this even mattered, if he was really even talking to Sonic or if he was just talking to himself again and just using Sonic as an outlet this time. The blue Mobian was at least keeping quiet and letting Sorun speak his mind, and he still didn't know if he should resent him for doing that or not. He still continued regardless.

"Look, in my old life, my old home, I... I mean I had something . I had a mom, I had some friends, I had one really good friend who I'd go as far as to call a brother. I knew people in the community, neighbors, cashiers at places, that one homeless guy that got into fistfights with birds. But that's all gone now, don't know why , but it is, but with the exclusion of my mother and David I never... I was never really close to people like I was to pretty much everyone in that city. Like, close close. I dunno. It's stupid."

"I don't think it's stupid," Sonic said. Bastard sounded sincere. "Why didn't you ever tell any of us this?"

"I think humans are hardwired never to say any of this, because every sentence I speak on this is making me want to jump off a roof." It wasn't a lie; Sorun was actively fighting himself to say all this and he hated it. "Or maybe it's just me. I'm not social." He paused. "But yeah. I ll... I liked you all. Really. I did. So I didn't have to think very hard about making the choice I did."

It was the smile that did it for Sorun. That really big, wide, happy smile he saw on Sonic's face that made something twist violently in him, that made Sorun grip Yamato tighter. He had to speak before Sonic got the chance to get a word in.

"But I'm going to be completely honest with you, Sonic. Out of everyone, I liked you the least."

The smile shattered away, and he just had to look hurt at the statement. Almost crushed, even. But Sorun pressed on, and for some reason he found it easier to say all this than to admit how much he'd adored everyone back at New Mobotropolis.

"It's not because I think you're a bad person. You're not. You just... everything about you freakin' irritates me. The way you act, things you do. You did one thing to me in particular I never forgave. But... people have flaws and you were a good person, and we were friends. So if it was a question of giving my life up to save yours if it was just you on the line, I'd give the chances of me doing that a solid maybe." A lie, it was a hard yes, but Sorun couldn't find it in himself to admit that. Easier to just fib it. "And even if you do drive me up the wall, you don't deserve what happened with your life and your kids, man."

There was movement on the other side of the window that caught Sorun's attention. They were on a floor above the ground, so he had to glance down to see it. A flying car had touched down on what looked like a cross between a landing pad and parking garage. A figure was walking towards the castle, towards a pair of guards standing at a gated entrance. The red alone told Sorun it was Knuckles, if that hat didn't give it away.

He clicked his teeth together. Probably meant nothing; could just be a routine visit if he was still a chief enforcer to the king, but for all Sorun knew that position was dissolved. Could also be Tails tattled on him and for whatever reason called Knuckles first, and he was coming here to do... what? Warn Sonic, intercept Sorun before he got to the Master Emerald? Maybe all this was wrong and he was here for some other reason entirely.

Whatever the case it still jolted Sorun enough to finally work his nerves up as he watched Knuckles enter the castle. He didn't like how fast the echidna was walking. Was barely even a walk; more of a slight jog, like he was rushed. Didn't bode well. Good thing he was done talking to Sonic, anyways.

"... Anyways yeah everything sucks but hey glad you're doing well," Sorun quickly finished, pushing off the wall to face Sonic again. "Gotta go now."

"H-huh?" Sonic seemed startled by Sorun's sudden energy. "So soon?"

"Yeah."

"Oh, alright." He seemed almost disappointed somehow, though Sorun didn't know why. "Hey, you have a place to stay?" he asked him. "I get, uh, that you probably don't since, you know, new timeline, so if you need somewhere to kick your feet up a bit 'til you acclimate-

"

"Nah don't worry about it. I visited Tails earlier and he's giving me a place to crash back at his home," Sorun assured him.

Sonic had visibly sagged with relief. "Oh, that's fantastic to hear. Knew I could count on him," he said, smile returning. "To be honest with you I was kind of nervous with the idea of you staying here, 'cause I raised the idea with Sally, and all she ever saw of you was after, you know..." He made a choking noise and dragged his thumb over his neck. "That. With Shadow. She has this crazy idea you're some kind of unhinged maniac. I tried to tell her different, but you kind of shot your first impression with her."

"..." Sorun made a sharp inhale. As a parting gesture he should have hugged Sonic. He settled for patting him on the shoulder with a stiff arm. "She's a smart woman, Sonic. Smarter than the both of us put together. Don't lose her, 'cause I don't know anyone else with the patience needed to deal with you."

Sonic gave him a questioning look. "What's that supposed to be mean?"

"Hey, don't worry about it." He pulled Yamato out of the sheath. He entertained the idea of cutting Sonic's legs off right now, just to be safe. He decided not to. "Some stuff I gotta go settle," he continued, cutting a portal into the air. "See you when I see you."

"Uh, yeah. Sure." Sonic didn't manage to lift his arm up all the way before Sorun vanished beyond the portal. "Bye."

Somehow Sorun wasn't surprised to find Knuckles there when he exited the portal. Standing right in front of the pit separating the room's floor from the circular platform held aloft above the pit by chains, where the Master Emerald was suspended above that by even more chains. The lighting was the same as Sorun remembered, bright, the brass/gold metal walls.

As Sorun closed the portal, standing across from Knuckles in the open entranceway to the room, he found himself wondering what was even going on. His presence alone, standing there with his arms crossed, one eye narrowed in his direction and the bionic red eye glaring at him, said enough. That he knew what Sorun was trying to do. He just couldn't figure out why, out of all the ways Knuckles could have gone about this, he chose doing this . Alone . Instead of trying to go to the king or bringing others.

Perplexing as it was confusing. And Sorun found himself wary of the sight of the lone echidna.

"Hey, Knuckles, how's it going?" He tried playing it casual, on the off chance Sorun was wrong and this was something else entirely. Or at the very least to sound confident to maybe try and rattle Knuckles. But his expression may as well have been stone, so it wasn't working.

"I can't believe I ever called you a friend."

Sorun started at that. "Well that's quite a thing to say to a guy. We didn't even get a chance to talk like normal people during the whole arresting me thing from five months ago. Don't want to talk about anything else, catch up? Wife, kid, job-"

"Tails called me. Told me what you did. What you're trying to do," Knuckles interrupted.

The light grin that was on Sorun's face fell off into a neutral expression. "Mhm. And what'd he tell you?"

"That you're messing with time behind everyone's backs. That you tricked him into telling you things." Knuckles shook his head, almost looking like he was in disbelief. "That you... you threatened his kids so he wouldn't tell anyone? You went that far, Sorun?"

He could have pointed out he never made any direct threats, but Sorun didn't see the point. "It didn't seem to take so well since he still called you. Surprised you came all the way down here just to greet me instead of going straight to Sonic." Risky enough to be suspicious.

"Tails called me because he knew you would never have done something so horrible. So do I. I'm here to convince you that you're making a mistake."

That was the reason? Simply because Knuckles believed reason was enough to win this situation? Sorun's shoulders sagged with disbelief. He didn't know whether to laugh or cry at the answer.

"Sorun, I know you're a good person. I understand this whole situation, everything, is scary and you're probably more confused than I could even imagine, but this?" Knuckles gestured back at the Master Emerald. "What you're trying to do? It's wrong."

"Why?" Sorun snapped, frustration building. "Why is it wrong? Why is me trying to fix everything wrong?"

"You mean outside of the risk that you could possibly destroy the world doing this?" Knuckles shot back. "There's no reason."

"There's no reason," Sorun repeated, tone dull and monotonous. "You really, truly, honestly believe that."

"I believe it because I'm right! What you're trying to do is wrong!" Knuckles exclaimed. "Do you even understand the gravity of what you're trying to do? You're trying to rewrite everyone's lives, their memories, reality, everything!"

"Back to what things were originally!" Sorun argued. "And you don't have a place to talk." His expression soured. "You're just like Tails, got yourself a happy little family and everything. No, why would you want the timeline to change when things here are working out so well for you, huh? You can't fucking talk. You and Tails. You're both hypocrites."

If the words hurt Knuckles any, he didn't show it. He just shook his head. "No. You're wrong," he said. "You think you know what you're doing, but you don't. You always do this, even back when you were a Freedom Fighter, thinking swinging your sword around fixes everything because you're just a kid-"

"You're really going there? What, just because you're an adult now you know so much better than me?" Sorun asked. "This doesn't mean a lot coming from the guy who let himself get possessed by an insane spirit twice . And both times I had to be the guy to solve the problem. Or are we just forgetting that little detail out of convenience?"

If Sorun wasn't angry before, he truly was now. Everything about this, people trying to stop him when he was just trying to fix everything. People thinking he didn't know any better. And now this, Knuckles talking to him, his words sounding almost patronizing to Sorun. Like he was acting like a parent scolding a child, and it honestly sickened him. He felt insulted.

"You wanna argue with me over this, I'll argue it with you," Sorun said, "but if you really think I'm gonna back down because you're twice my age and know better, we're going to have a short conversation."

Knuckles' features tightened. He bowed his head a bit, shaking it while muttering under his breath, but he remained where he was, standing across from Sorun. Only a distance of two meters, probably not even that. The echidna rose his head up and met Sorun's eyes.

"Fine, have it your way. If this is what it takes to get you to stand down," he agreed. "But tell me why. Why are you doing this? What's the point of trying to make things like they were when things here are fine?"

"Because I didn't fucking die two times to save the entire world only for it to mean jack shit because of Sonic's fuckups," Sorun heatedly answered. "Because I didn't pull my life together only for it not to mean anything anymore because nobody here asides from you, Sonic, Tails and his wife even remember who I am."

"So you're going to interfere with the lives of every single thing in the universe because of what? Your ego ?" Knuckles asked, disbelief heavy in his tone. "Because nobody here will acknowledge you for everything you did?"

" No . Because back there, in that timeline, I had a life! But here? Here it's all wrong, everything's wrong," Sorun said, shaking his head. "How everything's different, everyone's changed, this world? This isn't the world I gave my life for! Not this place, not these people, none of it!" He stopped himself, and against his will his face began to look pleading. "I just want to go back. Back to the life I had, where everything was better. Why are you trying to stop me?"

"Because this isn't just about you, Sorun. It's about everyone, because if you go through with this it affects everyone in the whole zone," Knuckles answered. His face turned grim. "Have you even given any thought to what's going to happen to some people if you go through with this?"

"Why should I?"

"Do you even realize how many people in this timeline are alive compared to the one we came from?" Knuckles asked him. "Say what you will about King Shadow, even I didn't like a lot of the things he did, but the fact is he unified the world. Ended conflicts way before we ever did, saved more lives than anyone, the Freedom Fighters, the Republic of Acorn, ever did!"

"He took lives, too," Sorun pointed out. "Or did you forget that?"

Knuckles' glare hardened, and he exhaled through his nose. "Yes. He did. And because he did an uncountable number of people, of families , exist in this timeline that never had the chance in the other. You know what happens to them if you set things back to the way they were? Those people that got to live here but died in the other timeline, those families, those lives? They cease to exist because either they died over there or they were never even born."

"Yeah, but what about Sonic's kids, Knuckles, huh?" Sorun challenged, voice high and cracking. He gestured his left arm holding Yamato behind him while nearly shouting. "His children got fucking erased because of all this! His wife doesn't remember who he is! What about people that are dead here that are live there!? I'm just supposed to let them continue to be gone so people that never should have existed to begin with can live!?"

"He got back together with Sally!" Knuckles argued. "They're having kids again! He got his family back!"

"Do you even know how fucked that sounds?" Sorun asked, voice broken. "That's not his Sally, Knuckles, that's just someone else! They're not gonna be his original kids, they're gonna be someone else! Forget how even genetically they won't be completely the same, but the memories he had with them, their personalities? You can't just fucking substitute a lost family and just forget about the originals! And I can just bring them back, so why does it matter!?"

"It matters because of everyone else!" Knuckles shouted. "What about them, Sorun? The people who get erased because you chose to do this? What Sonic had to do the first time, changing the timeline, it was an accident but was necessary at the time. What you're doing? It's a choice. You're choosing to erase people. So what about them, Sorun, huh? What about the people who get erased just to bring Sonic's kids back? What about the kids Sally is pregnant with right now ?"

Sorun shrugged. "Sucks to be them, I guess."

Knuckles' mouth dropped open. He looked appalled and furious at the same time. Enough that he had to take a few seconds to find the words. "You can't be serious."

"Either way you slice it one set of kids get to exist and the other doesn't, and that's just one example. It's a shitty situation all around. The only thing that matters is what I choose to do, and I choose to go back. If that means people I don't know and care about die so that people I don't know or care about can live then fine, whatever. I don't really care. Both decisions are wrong so I'm going with the wrong choice I want."

Knuckles' fists clenched at his sides. They began shaking. "What gives you the right?" he growled out. "The right to make this kind of choice, to decide who gets to exist and who doesn't? Why do you get to decide something like this?"

"Because I can," Sorun answered. Knuckles became so enraged at the answer his teeth clenched. "Because I'm the one with the magic sword. Because I'm owed a home after everything I've done and I want to go back to it. Because this timeline was never even supposed to exist in the first place and I'm just putting things back the way they're supposed to be." He sneered at Knuckles, eyes full of derision as he regarded him with contempt. "You're barely even a person. Everyone and everything here, it's all fake, mocking, wrong . Nobody'll even remember anyways so it doesn't fucking matter ."

"And if you end up destroying the world? Because of this? Or if your presence end up derailing something in the timeline, ends up altering history anyways? If the zone ends because of your actions? Have you even considered that, if by some miracle you make it back, even manage to go back to the time you were put in the Master Emerald, your very presence could end up changing history when you weren't there the first time?"

"Well that's just a risk I'm willing to take, Knuckles."

"On behalf of the whole world!? Without anyone's consent!?"

Sorun only offered another shrug.

Knuckles didn't have the words at first. Something in his face shuddered, and Sorun had to wonder what it was until he saw him raise a gloved fist up to wipe something away from the one good eye he had left. He shook his head, and then looked at Sorun.

His legs spread out, knees bent. He rose his fists up to either side of his head. Readying a combat stance, Sorun realized, and he looked about as serious as could be.

"I was wrong. You really can't be talked out of this." It came out of Knuckles' mouth as a mumble, almost somber-sounding. His stance tightened, expression looking much more resolute. "I'm not letting you go through with this."

"... 'Let'...?" Sorun echoed, almost in amusement. He glanced down at his side, where he held Yamato, and then looked back up at Knuckles. "Really? You're gonna try and fight me while I have this?" He gently shook the sword.

Knuckles shook his head. "I know the powers that sword has. The basics, at least. And I know they're too dangerous to use on a living person without maiming or killing them - what you ended up doing with King Shadow says enough. And you're not nearly good enough with just the ordinary blade to beat me in a fight, Sorun."

Sorun blinked. He grew confused. "What are you trying to say?"

"I'm telling you that you can't beat me using just the sword, and you can't use its powers on me because it's too lethal," Knuckles clarified. "You can either give up or run away in a portal, but either way you're not touching that Master Emerald. Even if you try to portal right to it from there I'm fast enough to stop you from doing anything."

"Oh." That's what he meant. He really didn't know how serious Sorun was over this. He almost did laugh, but he was so shocked by Knuckles' thinking all he could do was stare at him, bewildered. "You know..." he finally drawled out, looking down at Yamato and grabbing its handle, "there's another benefit to changing the timeline back. Everything'll just get overwritten again, and it's because of that none of this matters. Not this conversation, not everything I did, none of it. It'll all be erased and replaced just like it was the first time everything changed. So you know what, I really could have just slaughtered Tails and his family. Because once I turn everything back to normal that would have just been undone and they wouldn't have even remembered. Shadow'll come back, too, so no matter what I'm walking away from this with clean hands. So it doesn't really matter if I kill you right now." Sorun glanced back up at Knuckles. "You know. Since it's all just gonna be overwritten anyways."

Knuckles tensed up, his mouth thinning. "No. I don't believe you," he said. "You're not going to kill me, Sorun. I was your friend ."

Sorun's fingers drummed along the sword's handle. "I dunno. I recently found out it's way easier to kill someone than everyone ever made it out to be." He fully gripped the sword's handle, though it remained sheathed. He affixed Knuckles with the most serious expression Sorun could muster. "I'm going back," he said. "You won't stop me. Believe whatever you want about what I will or won't do."

Not another word was said between them. Knuckles just stood there, still in a fighting stance, his face morphing through so many complex expressions as he thought and tried to come to a decision, and Sorun couldn't tell what was going on in his mind. If he was trying to figure out if Sorun was bluffing or not or what the best method of attack was if he was really committed to fighting him.

As for Sorun himself, he just stood there, hands calmly gripped around his sword. His own stance eerily calm as he stared at Knuckles with a cold, empty expression. Waiting for him to make a move. Silently praying he'd just move aside.

After what could have been seconds or minutes, Knuckles moved. In a dead sprint straight towards Sorun. He settled on Sorun bluffing. He'd only gotten five steps in before his entire body was engulfed in a warped sphere of space. He was in the process of shifting his facial expression into something, whether it be betrayal or fury or surprise, but just didn't have the time to finish before the slashes from the Judgement Cut came.

It wasn't like with King Shadow, who could weather Yamato's abilities and come out with mere scratches. Knuckles' body had been rent apart completely from the slashes inside the warped space, sliced apart in dozens of places in the blink of an eye. He'd been running fast enough that, even after he'd been cut to pieces, the forward momentum carried the body parts further, making them roll and fly past Sorun.

Slowly, Sorun exhaled and stared down at the severed body parts littered around him. Half an arm there, a quarter of a torso there. He saw Knuckles' head at the corner of his vision. Completely dead, his eye glassy and jaw missing, but even still it looked like he was staring at Sorun. And Sorun didn't know what look he was supposed to give back to the head. One of sadness? Anger, regret? All he could do was shake his head in something that could be closely defined as disappointment, but that wasn't quite it. He didn't know what it was.

"Stupid call, Knuckles," Sorun whispered out. He looked ahead, up at the Emerald suspended in the air by the chains. He didn't waste any further time, swiftly walking forwards and hopping over the divide that separated it from the platform held below the giant gem.

"Ever since I got dragged onto Mobius it's done nothing but throw bullshit at me, and all I've ever been able to do is deal with it," Sorun said aloud, almost glaring at the Master Emerald as he pulled Yamato free from its scabbard. "Well, this time I brought some bullshit of my own."

Yamato flashed outwards, severing the chains that held the Master Emerald up. It slammed down onto the center of the platform, causing it to jostle roughly, the chains holding it above the pit rattling. Sorun nearly lost his footing, but fortunately managed to right himself as the platform and chains settled.

He could faintly feel his heartbeat steadily increase. The scabbard hung off his waist, right hand holding the blade while his left was empty. He'd laid a hand on the Emerald, and immediately felt it for what it was. The intrinsic connection made between it and him the moment physical contact was initiated. Boundless energy contained in a physical form, thrumming beneath his fingertips and waiting to be released by a just simple mental command.

Often, Sorun wondered what would happen if he actually absorbed this thing. It was essentially just a more powerful Chaos Emerald, how much more powerful was an answer he wasn't even sure could be quantified in the context of these things, but what would it mean for him power-wise? Would it let him make things he wouldn't be able to make with normal Chaos Emeralds? He couldn't imagine that was the case; the Yamato was pretty much the ceiling of reality-breaking things he could conjure from 'DMC'. Just more powerful versions of those things? Maybe. He was only having to rely on this because Yamato wasn't strong enough to do what he needed. Or, as a grim afterthought, maybe even for him it'd be too much energy and he'd just overload and get flash-disintegrated.

The thought caused Sorun to subtly shudder. Any ideas of turning the Master Emerald into Yamato were abandoned. Too many unknowns, too many risks. This was was safer, even if it had more steps, that added layer of complexity. But he didn't come this far just to get offed on a stupid mistake like that. An accident , after everything he'd gone through. It'd be insulting.

He plunged Yamato into the Master Emerald, halfway to the hilt. So far, nothing, which was good. He focused on the blade, closing his eyes and breathing out. To reach backwards, past the nonexistent breach that divided this timeline from the other. Reaching not past, but through time and space, to reach something that no longer existed but was, nonetheless, separate from this reality.

There was a mental twang in his mind, like pulling a string taught. The location was there , but he couldn't reach it. Too many rules said he couldn't. Space said it didn't exist, and time said it never happened. But yet it had. Time wasn't a factor when it came to Chaos energy, and the Yamato chose to ignore space at Sorun's will. Even if the location didn't exist, it was still there, and Sorun was locked onto the coordinates. Chaos energy provided the way to make anything possible. It was just a question of how much.

"Well, here goes everything." With his left hand resting on the surface of the Master Emerald, Sorun pulled at the energy underneath. Green energy, buzzing and violent, arced up along his arm, causing a harsh tingling sensation. He funneled it through his shoulders and down his right arm, right into the sword.

The change was immediate. He could feel the sword in his hand charge with energy, felt the connection to the location he was focusing on strengthen. The bond between him and the sword blurring together. The pulse of something alive in his hands.

"I don't want to be here anymore..." Sorun's voice could barely even be heard above the crackling green energy racing through his body. "Take us out of here. Out of this place. Bring us back home."

Cracks appeared along the length of the katana's blade. The cracks grew to the point the blade was segmented to tens of asymmetric pieces, each piece still held together into the rough shape of a katana by blackish-blue flesh that cemented the metal pieces together. There were eyes spread throughout the flesh holding the sword together, individually darting their vertical irises and pupils to look around the room before, all at once, they all looked down at the Emerald the sword was stabbing into.

The sword felt Sorun's will, and made it so.

Its power reached out, facilitated by the sword's user and the immeasurable energy flowing into it from the Emerald. The blue irises of the eyes along the sword, as well as Sorun's own eyes, shifted to an intense green. Fundamental, inviolable laws of the universe were bypassed and outright ignored as it reached for the destination Sorun desired. The concepts that separated the two timelines was cut through.

Sorun twisted the sword.

The Master Emerald lost its green luster, dulling to a dark gray, and the gem was split in two. The intense crackling of energy was heard, there was a bright light, and Sorun lost all his senses.

He came to in however long it took Sorun to recover. Feeling came back first, and Sorun felt himself laying on something soft and damp. His ears were next, registering a quiet, pulsing sound. The air smelled and tasted off in a way he couldn't form into words. Stale ozone.

When he finally opened his eyes, irises still glowing green, Sorun realized he was no longer in the room that had contained the Master Emerald. It was a tunnel, some kind of tube. Dark. Blurry, too, until Sorun realized that was just his own vision still adjusting. Blinking multiple times managed to clear it up until he managed to accurately see where he was, and it was a sight that took his breath away.

He was in a tube of meat. Dark walls of pulsating, blue-black flesh, glistening like it was almost hardened but still flexible. The walls were spotted with the eyes everywhere. Pupils slit, irises glowing green, all staring straight at Sorun.

"The fuck is my life anymore...?" Sorun whispered to himself. He looked behind him, towards the end of the tube. There was an end to it that he saw, though the sight once again stole his breath. The end of the tube looked just like the entrance to a portal: it lead back out into the room where the Master Emerald had been. He could faintly see red at the end, the diced pieces of Knuckles' corpse.

And then he looked ahead, at the other end of the tube. Faintly he could see there was a end, but unlike the one behind him there wasn't an image that told Sorun where it lead out. Just white light. Bright enough he had to squint his green eyes to see it.

"Is... is that where I want to go? The way back?" Sorun asked the eyes staring at him from the walls, silently hoping for an answer. "I need to go that way?"

All the answer the eyes gave him were to all move in unison from looking at him to looking towards the end of the flesh tunnel that lead to the white light, away from the room with Knuckles' corpse. It was about as definitive an answer as Sorun could hope for, so he took it for what it was and began walking towards the light.

He saw the eyes were changing the further he walked. Whatever power was fueling them to change the color of their eyes, all the energy from the Master Emerald he presumed for lack of a better explanation, it was beginning to wane. The irises were shifting back and forth between blue and green, with Sorun's own irises flashing the two colors in sync with the eyes on the wall. He found himself speeding up as a result, going from a light jog into a straight run towards the end of the tunnel. The flashing colors was quickening in frequency, and he didn't want to dawdle in this tunnel too long for fear of it collapsing while he was still in it. No telling what would happen to him in that case, if he'd even life to experience it.

Fortunately, the exit to the tunnel hadn't been too far away. Once he was in reach Sorun had dove right through.

He ended up landing on what felt like solid concrete. Cool, crisp air blew over his skin as the sight of an eye-filled tunnel was replaced by the view of a city block in the dead of night, with Sorun laying on the street. He groaned and rolled onto his back, spotting the portal he'd just dived through hovering in the air above him. A swirling mass of blue energy, not too dissimilar to the portals he usually made. The space-defying aperture twisted and condensed in on itself, giving shape and solidifying until the blue shape transformed from a portal into a solid object.

Sorun sputtered out when the blue Chaos Emerald dropped onto his face and rolled next to him. He shook his head, and then groped around blindly for the gem until he managed to grip it. The gem shifted into the Yamato, and he used the sword as a crutch to pick himself up.

"I... I... fuck, did I make it? This is?" Panting out heavily, Sorun glanced around him. He was in some city, somewhere, but he couldn't tell if this was in the right timeline or not. There were people on the streets around him, Mobians, all who'd stopped what they were doing to stare at him. Most questioning. A few frightful.

Ignoring the looks, Sorun made his way to the closest one, an echidna he didn't recognize. "Hey, man hey," he called out, stopping in front of the red Mobian to lay a hand on his shoulder. "King Shadow, name ring a bell to you?"

The echidna gave him a confused, if not frightful look as a response. "Wha- who? I've never heard of- you mean King Soni-?"

"I fuckin' made it." Sorun shoved the Mobian away, turning around as low chuckles made their way to Sorun's throat. The Mobian had scrambled away from Sorun as a result, turning around and running away from Sorun. All the other Mobians that had been around him did the same in an effort to get away from the stranger that was quietly cackling in the street. A quiet, wheezy laugh broken up by coughs that betrayed how exhausted Sorun was.

Exhausted, but elated. Even if he could register all the people that had run away from him he wouldn't care they saw him as a loon. They didn't matter at all. He'd made it. Made it back to the right timeline. Nothing mattered but that.

"He-he-he-ghk-chk..." A few more coughs wracked Sorun's throat, throwing the laughs off completely. He made a small shouting noise, shaking his head and then breathing in deeply to try and clear his head. "Ah... ah, man..." He looked down at Yamato. "The hell even happened with the Master Emerald? Did I... shit, did it break ?"

He'd managed to see it before he got sent to the meat-tube. The way the color left the Emerald, how its shine dimmed. The actual Chaos Emerald used to create Yamato seemed to be completely intact by all means, but the Master Emerald, the way it'd broken apart before that transition... just how much energy was needed to literally breech the impossible and separate the bounds between one timeline and a nonexistent timeline that had, at one point, been reality? Enough he'd burned through a well of what Sorun was lead to believe was infinite energy?

How did that even work?

"Whatever, long as it worked," Sorun mumbled to himself. He pulled the sword out halfway to examine his reflection. His eyes had mainly returned to their blue color, but, interestingly, there was still an occasional flash of green energy that would color his irises. Residual energy from when he shattered the Master Emerald? The flesh and eyes were gone, leaving a clean blade...

Somehow it still felt like the sword was looking at Sorun.

A distant sound of thunder dragged Sorun from his observations. "No, not thunder," he realized seconds later. Something similar, but there was something wrong with it. The pitch of the sound being too low, with a strange warbling after-effect heard behind it. There was a flash of light in the sky and another boom of the off-sounding thunder, and Sorun felt something prickling the surface of his skin.

Looking up revealed the problem. A storm brewing in the darkened sky above. Not any kind of storm Sorun had ever seen. Normal storms didn't make clouds move that quickly, so chaotically. Lightning bolts weren't that luminous and numerous. He felt the ground tremble every time a bolt sparked off in the sky, and Sorun pretty sure that earthquakes weren't meant to coincide with storms. He'd been on Mobius long enough to know.

This was something else. And he knew what.

"So this is the big, bad time anomaly that caused Sonic to mess it all up, huh...?" Sorun mused to himself. He honestly didn't know what to expect from how everyone had described the time anomaly. He almost pictured a Final Fantasy-esque final boss monster that personified the time anomaly. Something he could fight.

But this wasn't that. This was a monster on a whole different scale: a literal force of nature shaking the very foundations of the universe apart. Couldn't fight it in the same way you couldn't fight a tsunami or a hurricane, only this was on an even larger scale. How did you fight time itself breaking apart?

"... Okay, fine, Sonic, maybe you were a bit justified in what you pulled after all. Fate of the world and all that." It rankled Sorun to admit it, but he'd concede Sonic that much if this was really the state of things. It didn't change the fact him and his running through dimensions with his power was the cause of it to begin with, but the guy had suffered enough and Sorun could fix it. So he'd let it slide if it meant he was the winner over Sonic, even if it was just on a tangential level.

Yamato was fully pulled out of its sheath. "Still got a bit of juice left," Sorun noted, commenting on how his eyes were still flickering between blue and green in the reflection. "If I just get rid of the time anomaly now before Sonic uses that time machine, that other timeline will never come to pass. Dunno how long before he sets it off, though, miracle I even made it to this point," he murmured to himself. "Ideally I'd just go to where the time machine is and break it just to make sure, but I forgot to ask anyone where the fucking thing even is." He glanced back up at the sky. "Shouldn't matter. Just need to get rid of this and it should work out. Hopefully."

Realistically speaking he didn't know how good his chances were at using the Yamato to separate out the concept of a time anomaly from the universe it was affecting, but considering all the impossible shit he pulled literally five minutes ago this somehow seemed like small potatoes in comparison. Which was enough to startle Sorun, somewhat. Seeing this as small potatoes. Like the opposite of humbling in some weird way.

Well, not matter how he felt he still had to get rid of this thing, because otherwise he'd just end up right back in that godforsaken timeline.

"Fuck it, I'm game for pulling out a second miracle." A cross was cut into the air in front of him which then folded into a portal. "Man, I hope this works."

He jumped through the portal. It spit him out on the other side, resulting in Sorun tumbling through the air. Wasn't hard to see why when he made the other end of the portal connect high into the sky, right in the center of the clouds where the storm was taking place. The time storm quite literally shaking the world apart.

Frigid air whipped past Sorun as he fell through the dark clouds. He felt moisture fly into his face, forcing him to squint. Lightning was rapidly firing off all around him, powerful enough that he felt his bones shake.

With two hands gripping the handle, he held Yamato out it front of him. He could still feel the vestiges of the Master Emerald's power flowing through it, still plentiful but ebbing away at a rapid pace. He'd moved quick, not wanting to find out if the Yamato on its own would be sufficient in this undertaking or not, not wanting the energy to run out because he'd been too slow.

"Separate this time anomaly that's wrecking everything from this zone." Blue arcs of electricity began flowing down the blade in response to Sorun's thoughts. "You don't even need to put it in another zone. Just put it in the empty space between universes where it can fizzle out and die or just exist without hurting anyone. Just get it out of here."

There was a pull, the sword responding to the request as it locked onto the target. Through the blade Sorun could feel it - the time anomaly itself. A force, not quite defined in shape or design but by mere existence, permeating not just the skies but the world. Spreading at a rate that almost felt exponential. At its size now it only encapsulated the planet Mobius, even then just barely.

But through the sword he felt it. Its growth, how it threatened to swallow this world. Would it go beyond the planet? Consume the solar system, then the galaxy, grow beyond that and consume other galaxies, not stopping until the entire zone itself shattered? Likely. It was the scenario Tails had pitched, the reason Sonic was forced to alter the timeline in the first place.

The sword was interfering, though. Not just the blade and its power, but the waning Chaos energies from the Master Emerald, intertwining with something as abstract as the time anomaly. Working in congruent with the Yamato: filling in voids where the sword was slowly peeling away the time anomaly from the fabric of reality.

It was... fixing it? Why? Because Sorun simply wanted it to?

Bolts of lightning passed by Sorun. He grit his teeth as he fell, arms shaking as he maintained his grip on the blade. More lightning striking out from the clouds, striking the blade itself as if in defiance for what Sorun was doing, for what he was succeeding at. Some of the lightning-

---

The tower loomed in the center of the dead city, its highest point scraping against the clouds.

- struck Sorun, and he was assaulted by flashes and images that failed to take hold in his memory. Momentary glimpses that were completely forgotten. There was no time to think on the short blank in his perceptions he'd suddenly experienced or the fact getting hit by lightning should have hurt worse than that.

Was this even lightning? Some derivative? Time lightning? Was that even a thing?

Pointless questions. Didn't matter.

The storm only intensified the further Sorun went. By now the Yamato was a shining beacon, its glowing blue blade shining like a lighthouse in the midst of a dark fog. Continuous bolts of energy surrounded the blade, and by now Sorun couldn't even tell if those bolts was a result of the Yamato emitting energy or the storm striking the blade. Maybe both. He redoubled his efforts as more bolts-

---

The white hedgehog kept pleading past it all. Being smashed through walls, limbs broken, stabbed and pinned to the floor with an eye gouged out.

- rolled off Sorun's body and caused more of those momentary lapses. Not enough to divert his focus from the task on hand. Nothing as important as this.

He felt it fading. The target of his sword, the time anomaly. Felt as it was extracted from the very fabric of the zone, like a scalpel being used to cut away a tumor. Could feel it as it was discarded in the boundaries between zones, left to whatever fate was in store for it now as the Chaos energies from the Master Emerald mended the leftover rifts.

That'd been the end of the Master Emerald's energies' rope, though. He felt it leave the sword as it set off to do its final requested task after the time anomaly had been discarded, and in the process Sorun's eyes had finally settled for their blue color. Relief, warm and inviting, washed over him as he continued to fall, as he felt the strain leave the sword as its work concluded. Almost enough he'd accidentally let go of it, but he'd managed a firm grip.

The dark clouds were beginning to clear away. From here Sorun was surprised to find it wasn't even night at all - the clouds had just been that dark. As he continued to fall through the sky, finally having passed the clouds, he saw them part from above him to reveal a deep, blue sky with a sun that shone down on him. The warmth was enough he could have cried. He'd let out an exhausted half-chuckle instead.

"Holy hell... I think I actually managed it..." There were no storms, no earthquakes, nothing. A clear sky above him, a shining city far down below towards where Sorun was falling. To him it may as well have been paradise. Anything would be if it marked the end of this screwed up journey he'd been set on. It was enough that Sorun would have kicked back while falling down in the sky, taken the moment to soak it all in, his victory and the sunlight, to enjoy the wind rushing past him as it finally sunk in that he did it .

But then he'd made the mistake of looking forwards.

His heart stilled when he saw it. White. As far as one could look up, stretching to every corner of the horizon. An all-encompassing white while of... well, just white. Washing over everything. Spreading. Getting closer to where he was, threatening to consume everything around.

The thought of what Tails had told Sorun about jumped out at him when he saw that white wall approaching. Time paradoxes, the danger of messing with time. The potential consequences. But Sorun had been so sure he'd done everything right, that he'd been careful enough to avoid something like this.

Had he been wrong? Did he mess up and now the whole zone was going to suffer for it? Was it something else entirely?

He didn't know. Sorun didn't even have time to think on it, not managing more than a startled gasp as the white wall reached him and overpowered him, overriding all his senses and filling it nothing but white and noise and everything was shifting and-

"Project Recursion... It's honestly the worst name for a plan I've ever heard of in my entire life."

I could see them all gathering below me, from the edge of the ship we were on. So far in the clouds it was hard not to see it all. Warships as far as the eye could see, all of various designs and models. Legions of machines gathered among some of the ships, while others were operated by more organic hands. Machines and Mobians and Overlanders marching side-by-side.

All for me.

His voice spoke out from behind me. "Perhaps if you'd been around more during the key moments of the planning phase you could have had a hand in coming up with a name." There was pride in his aged voice, but whenever he spoke to me it sounded like a mix of being playful and mocking. "Besides. It's as fitting a title as possible, and I fail to see how you could come up with something better."

"Well, you'll have to excuse me. I was a bit too busy running around following the plan we agreed on to waste time on a name."

"And I haven't been busy setting everything up? Can you even fathom the complexity of this undertaking? You should be overjoyed your place isn't at the technical end of things. I'd fear it'd be the end of us otherwise."

I rolled my eyes. "Then I guess we should count ourselves lucky you're not the one out there fighting, getting shot at. You'd be dead so many times over I couldn't count that high."

"Well, it couldn't possibly be that large a number if that's the case."

A momentary pause. A small, dry chuckle left my mouth, uncontrollable. A similar sound came from the man behind me, though the quick grunt I heard afterwards implied he tried to stifle it. Too late. I'd already heard.

"Forget the name for a moment," I said, "but can we actually talk about the plan itself and how horrible it is?"

"We're doomed otherwise." I turned around to the person standing behind me. That tall, rotund Overlander looking down at me. The wild mustache looked more frazzled than it ought to have, and the mouth attached to it was set in a deep frown. "This plan is all we have."

"It's still a terrible plan."

"May I remind you that it is your mistakes that brought this upon us to begin with?" I managed a straight face, but inside I couldn't help but feel something ugly twist in me at that scathing tone he was using on me. Because of how right he was. "Your mistakes, your errors, your shortsightedness, incompetence and ignorance is what caused all this. You should be thankful my brilliance is sufficient enough in providing us a way out of this mess you've dragged us into."

A wry grin spread over my mouth as I glanced off to the side. "I'll admit I didn't make the best decisions. Neither did you, but hey, it's all good. 'Cause we're gonna fix it all."

"Hmph." There was something clutched in his hand. A bundle of purple cloth. "Well, we won't be fixing anything if you get yourself killed out there. Here. Your battle coat," he said, tossing the item towards me.

"My battle coat." I felt amused on how silly that was. The name itself and the concept. I'd still caught it out of the air, giving the man a bemused look as I waved the coat around a bit. "You call it a battle coat. That's cute. I mean I'm insulted you think I need armor with all the things I'm capable of, but I'm willing to overlook that because you went out your way to call it a battle coat ."

Oh, he looked irritated at that. I liked doing that, putting him outside of his comfort zone, making him act differently than his norm. Signs of stress, that he only had the faintest bit of control over the situation, only putting up with me because he had to. I was in the same boat, granted, but in this situation he was out of his comfort zone. Me, though, at this point I'd learned to roll with it. He hadn't, and he was flustered. That look, that small bit of irritation, was proof of that. I'd keep irritating him as long as I could.

Plus it was funny.

"That battle coat is no mere coat ," he nearly spat out. "That exquisite piece of armor was weaved with graphene composite polymers and coated with a nanolaminate solution I personally-!"

"Yadda yadda yadda, yeah, super coat, I get it." I grinned wider when he sputtered out at me, though the disinterest I'd displayed was feigned. The coat certainly sounded impressive, at least. The way he hyped it up it was probably the sturdiest piece of clothing around even though it felt and weighed like a normal coat.

When I turned the coat over, though, I found my smile dipping down a bit. Figures. He'd put his logo on the back of the purple coat, grinning out at me.

"I was fine with you giving me a purple coat, but this? You really had to put this eyesore on it?"

"Humph!" He crossed his arms and turned his nose up at me. "It wouldn't do not to sign my work."

"This isn't the time to be pushing an ego, and I really don't think anyone will care."

"If nobody will care then I don't see why you're protesting the matter. If you're that against it then you're free to design your own battle coat with your own bleeding-edge technology." A beat passed, and I nearly sighed knowing what he was setting up. "Oh, but you can't ."

"Ah-huh. And you're so capable of doing at least half the things I can do?"

"..."

"Thought so."

"Just put the coat on."

Shrugging, I'd put the coat on. Immediately I found it was just a tad bit too tight. Not enough to inhibit functionality in any way, but juuust enough to be noticeable.

I didn't know if he fitted it this way on purpose just to annoy me or if he was just a shit tailor on top of being a mad scientist.

A passing gust of wind blew the coat's twin coattails behind me as I turned around and looked back down. My smile broadened seeing the legion of ships approaching closer to us. Just how much effort they were putting into all this. I really couldn't understand why they were fighting so hard for this. Out of spite? Blind hope where there was none? One or the other; couldn't be anything else, not with what was on the line.

"Looks like I'm super public enemy number one," I laughed out, nearly taken aback by the sheer size of the fleet below. "The entire planet is rallied against me, all just to stop me from getting to Silver."

"Are you going to be able to do this?" It was more serious than I'd ever heard him speak. "I mean, actually?"

"... They're stalling," I said, my own voice going serious and smile dropping off. I creased my eyebrows in concentration as I observed the scene down below, thoughts racing through my mind. "If they really wanted to stop me from getting the thing, they'd just shatter it like I shattered all of Blaze's Sol Emeralds."

"Yes, about that. I trust you've sufficiently recovered from that bout of yours?"

"Ah, from nearly getting incinerated? Yeah, just peachy." I wasn't really. It'd probably be a while before I'd manage going to sleep without seeing that deranged Mobian's face. "Pyrokinetics are a pain and a half to deal with, but the actual fire itself is still limited to conventional laws of physics. I learned all sorts of tips and tricks for dealing with that back where I'm from."

"And yet she still lives."

My back straightened a bit at hearing that. I felt my ego prickle at the words, felt my skin itch and fingers unconsciously curl. I turned my head over my shoulder to look at him and gave him an easy, lighthearted grin. "Hey, don't worry about it. One more Mobian in the pile's a non-issue.

"Anyways," I continued, turning back to look down at the coming fleet, "the way they're playing this is telling. If they're coming at me this hard, it's either out of spite or hope. Can't be spite, 'cause I don't know Mobians to be this petty. Everyone else, maybe, but not them. So they must think there's still a way out of this besides what we're planning, and since Silver's the only one that knows how to use it, they're-"

"Playing keep-away with Silver as they try to figure something out," the man finished. "We destroyed every means of getting out of this zone and finished off anyone with the ability, and you destroyed Blaze's means of traveling, so they're throwing everything and the kitchen sink at you while they themselves are probably scrambling to cobble something together to get Silver as far away from you as possible."

"... Yeah, my thoughts exactly." I felt a twinge of annoyance at having my own thoughts finished for me, but the sight below helped distract me. It was honestly impressive how something could unify a whole planet like this. The fact I was the cause was almost comical. I really couldn't help but laugh at it all, because to not would almost be a disservice.

I spun around to address him, playfully kicking a leg back and forth. "But what I want to know," I said, eyes narrowing a bit, the corners of my mouth tightening to reveal the teeth in my smirk, "is if everything is set up on your end? Because this whole thing hinges on a lot of factors and the ones you're in charge of are arguably more important than mine."

He almost looked like I'd slapped him in the face. Like even implying I doubted his ability was a severe slight against him. "Of course I managed everything on my end. Everything is set up and prepped, and all that's left is the final pieces. It's only after you pull your own weight the real work begins."

I rolled my eyes again, not really knowing what else I expected. It was kind of refreshing, I realized. In a small way it was a bit of normalcy in the center of all this chaos.

"So, I feel it prudent I ask a third time," he continued. "Can you do this?"

Before I answered, I spun back around, to look out towards the sky. Up there, far above the fleet, was a massive floating island.

My smile broadened.

"Well, I'll need a new sword."

Sorun opened his eyes.

"... What even..." He made a groan and lifted a hand up to his head. His thoughts felt like a slurry, running slower than it should in the same way eyes were blurry when first awaking. There was a dull throb, too, though thankfully that was calming down over time. Slower than he'd like. "Ugh, sheesh, the hell happened to me?"

He thought back to what happened. Used Yamato on the Master Emerald, made it back to the right timeline, stopped the time anomaly, the white, waking up here-

Sorun bolted straight up. The white. Time paradox? Something happened, but a quick inspection of Sorun's own body revealed he was completely intact, much to his own relief. A bit more dusty than he'd like, but otherwise fine.

And then he blinked in question. Dusty? Why? And come to think of it, why was the air so stuffy?

He looked around, and then did a double-take. He was in... well, he didn't even know where. Some kind of bookstore? Except the shelves all around him were toppled or broken, with so many books scattered along the ground he couldn't even see the floor. There was a thick veneer of dust over everything, enough he saw dust motes floating through the air, and everything was dark, only the orange light of either dusk or dawn flooding through shattered windows and a broken doorway.

Also, the ceiling was caved in. Woods, metal girders, and other types of debris had seemingly smashed in through the center of the roof, punching through to make a pillar of trash in the center of the shop.

"What?" He shook his head and blinked a few times, but the sight remained the same. He noticed a glow in his peripheral, glanced down to see the blue Emerald sitting next to him, and snatched it up to transmute it into the Yamato before standing up. Maneuvering past all the books and debris found him to the destroyed entrance of the shop, in which he had to duck his head to make it through the partially-collapsed doorway just to make it outside.

It wasn't any better outside.

"What!?"

The shop had been a single building nestled between other, larger buildings in a packed city square. All the buildings around Sorun were in the same state as the book store had been in that they were just as wrecked. Every building was either halfway collapsed or completely destroyed. The streets were cracked with some segments missing entirely. Rusted out, hollowed vehicles were spread out there and there. But more alarmingly than that there wasn't so much as a single living thing in sight that Sorun could see.

He'd walked out all alone into what looked like the apocalypse.

"WHAT!"

Chapter 84

Recursion Error

Episode 84- Back to the past, Jack

Maybe there was a lesson to be learned from all this. Some sort of sign. That no matter what Sorun tried in life he was deigned to screw it up in some fashion.

Try to buy some orange juice at the grocery store? Get drafted into a freedom war in another universe entirely.

Try to make it back to Earth? Can't, dying.

Try to at least save Mobius in his final death throes by taking an evil despot with him? Messed that up.

Finally make it back to Earth? Guess what, it's dead. Granted Sorun realized this one wasn't his fault, but the loss still hit deep.

Try not to be a depressed douchebag that always made his friends worry? Yeah, that never took off.

Save the timeline?

Well, considering he was jogging around the wrecked streets of a destroyed city somewhen, he wasn't feeling too confident with this one.

"~Don't be so serious, brr brr brr brr brrr, don't be so serious, brr brr brr brr brrr...~"

In actuality it was less jogging and more Sorun kind of just hopping over pieces of debris in the street after he chose a nondescript direction to wander down. The song felt appropriate given everything. That and he needed some sound other than the eerie silence all around.

"~Don't be so serious, brr brr brr brr brrr...~" This was probably the fifth car he'd had to jump over. The other side of the street was blocked by a fallen, rusted light pole and piles of rubble. On the other end of the debris was, shockingly, more destroyed city.

A short sigh left him. He shook his head, and the singing devolved into noncoherent mumbling as he kept moving forwards.

On the bright side he managed to find out where he was after a while more of wandering.

Downside was he wasn't sure it was a good thing.

It was in a city plaza Sorun had found his way into. Wrecked like everything else, with the exception of one single thing in the middle of it. A statue. And it just so happened that Sorun recognized the face on the statue, because Knuckles' daughter irritated Sorun so much in the time he'd known her that he wasn't sure he could forget her face if he tried.

What he couldn't puzzle out was why there was a statue of Lara-Su. What he did manage to figure out was that he must have been on Angel Island, because he couldn't see where else she'd get a statue for whatever she'd done to get it. Maybe in the future they'd renovated Echidnaopolis and it stopped being the ruined city everyone told him it was, like it was in that alternate timeline, but it seemed now it'd reverted back to being a ruin.

But there was still one problem with this new revelation.

"Why do I have to look up to see the clouds?" Sorun wondered to himself as he looked up. The sky was still orange, the few clouds floating up there being dark, but that was the thing. He'd been on the island before, and he hadn't had to look up this far to see the clouds in the sky. In fact from this vantage point it was the same as looking up from the ground.

Which meant he was on the ground.

"The whole island got grounded? What the hell?" Sorun took another glance around the city. For as big as it was he knew it only made up a small portion of the island as a whole. So if the whole thing ended up falling out of the sky, well... honestly, in that case the city was actually looking pretty good. And now Sorun was left wondering where in the world the island was. More importantly than that what happened with the Master Emerald here that caused it to fall.

Or most important of all what happened in general.

"None of this makes any sense..." Sorun murmured to himself. He turned back to the statue, his frown deepening when he saw Lara-Su. That straight, noble pose she was striking, the strong expression she held.

He pulled Yamato out of its sheath and slashed at the statue once. The head was sliced off and fell down to the stone pedestal holding it up with a loud thud.

Pettiness, maybe. Probably wasn't even the same Lara-Su. But she'd rubbed him the wrong way when he met her.

Eventually wandering became too tiring. Especially when wherever Sorun went it was just more ruined city. He got tired enough that he found refuge on top of a relatively intact bus, where he was now lying with his back flat on top of it with one of his legs dangling off the side. Eyes staring up at the sky and arms spread out at his sides.

"I fucking miss Quiznos," Sorun said to himself. "Subs in that place, they were the best, you know? Yeah, totally. 'Specially the bread, know what I mean? Something about it, I dunno, it just hit differently.

Yeah, I know. Nothing really compared. 'Cept Blimpies, that place was pretty good, too. Oh, duuude , Blimpies, yeah, I almost forgot about that place. Fuck yeah, they rocked, too."

Mobian cuisine didn't quite cut it for Sorun sometimes. It was good in its own right, but it didn't compare to the food back home. Not in terms of quality, sometimes, at least, but more that it didn't taste like home . The homemade stuff, maybe, but the food from sandwich shops, diners, all the local places Sorun had frequented, nothing on this planet really compared.

Hell, he'd give almost anything to eat at a McDonalds again. Though on the other hand Sorun was technically the healthiest he'd ever been with the food he'd been eating since getting dragged here.

He wasn't sure if the health was worth it.

"Man, it sucks all my favorite food places are dead. Like everything else on Earth," Sorun grumbled to himself as he sat up. "Like everything else in this city, seriously where the fuck is everyone?"

Okay, by now he was pretty sure there was something wrong with the sky. There had to be. He'd been wandering around the city for hours now and the sky was still orange. He still saw the sun revolving around in the sky, so at least that was working normally. It was everything else that was wrong.

"Maybe that one song really was right and apocalypses just cause orange-colored skies," Sorun mused to himself. "... I don't even know if it's an apocalypse, though, for all I know it's just the island that got messed up. Still doesn't tell me what happened."

He groaned out and kept looking around. Still nothing but ruined buildings all around him. And this city must have been proper-sized, too, 'cause he'd been wandering for hours without seeing familiar sights. Or at least as varied as it could get seeing as everything had the same veneer of rubble plastered over it.

Still walking forwards, Sorun used his free hand to cup the side of his mouth. "HEY!" He called out, almost as loud as he could. Near-silence, the wind brushing past him.

"I'M SORUN!"

Nothing still. Another five minutes of blind wandering before he tried again.

"IS ANYONE OUT THERE!?"

Nada. Sorun had to wonder to himself if at one point he should give up and leave the island. Different time, but the overall geography of the planet should, hopefully at least, be the same. Maybe he should ditch the grounded island, try for somewhere more familiar? New Mobotropolis? The G.U.N. place, that base in the mountains?

Hell, he'd take the Mobians who spoke in that old-ass English that lived in Mercia over this silence.

"HELLO!?"

Sorun stopped mid-step. That hadn't been him.

He turned towards the sound of the new voice. Male, youngish. But it sounded far off, and when Sorun looked all he saw were more cracked streets lined with destroyed buildings and filled with rusted, burnt-out cars. Whoever this person was either was really far away or invisible and really quiet.

At this point Sorun would believe either-or, but he tried yelling back out all the same.

"HEY!"

"OH, HI! HELLO!"

Sorun squinted and leaned his head back a bit. "Okay, that was weirdly nice," he murmured to himself before he continued shouting.

"OVER HERE!"

"I HEAR YOU!" the other voice shouted back. It didn't sound any closer. "IT'S NICE TO MEET YOU!"

"Uh..." Sorun shook his head. "CAN YOU MOVE!?"

"YEAH!" There was a pause. "SO HOW ARE YOU DOING!?"

"What the f- MAN GET OVER HERE SO WE DON'T HAVE TO SHOUT!"

"OH! YEAH, SURE!"

Sorun's hand ran over his face as he made a small groan. "At least this new guy seems polite, but goddamn..."

He decided to just stand there and wait for whoever it was he'd found. He didn't much know what to expect. To see someone walk or run around a building's corner and make their way to Sorun was the most likely event, but he'd prepared himself for pretty much everything at this point.

So when he saw a white figure floating off the ground fly around a building's corner and then proceed to float towards Sorun, he wasn't surprised. Much. He at least managed to keep his face straight.

The Mobian, clear enough to see he was one even at this distance, finally got close enough that when he settled his feet back on the ground he was standing right in front of Sorun. Another hedgehog, he'd noted with some weariness settling into Sorun. Mobian standard of boots and gloves, had cool, glowing teal lines going through them Sorun tried not to pay attention to. Mostly because this Mobian's fur in particular was such a vivid shade of white that contrasted so sharply with everything else Sorun actually had to blink a few times until his eyes adjusted.

But those were only passing details Sorun noted. The main thing Sorun was focused on was his head. His spines were mainly clumped into two spikes curving from the back of his head to his lower back, but Sorun wasn't even looking at those. Around the top of the hedgehog's head were five long, waving locks of hair, standing up straight in a peculiar pattern. A very peculiar pattern that was very reminiscent of a plant Sorun knew of on Earth.

"Weeeed head..."

"O-oh, wow, I really didn't expect... um. Gee." The awkward greeting from the white Mobian made Sorun stop focusing on his hairstyle so he could focus on what sounded like a teenager around his age standing in front of him. "Hhhi there, uh, you."

Sorun blinked a few times, continuing to stare at the Mobian. He hadn't expect him to look so nervous, to be twisting a foot back and forth so awkwardly. And he was struggling to even meet Sorun's eyes.

It was odd to him.

He started to shy away even further, causing Sorun to realize he'd just been blankly and silently staring at him for a solid minute as he parsed his thoughts together. He mentally berated himself and shook his head a bit, and then decided to go with introducing himself.

"Hey, I'm Sorun," he lamely greeted. "Uh... yeah. That's all I got."

"Oh, alright." Just that small introduction alone seemed to gain the Mobian back a majority of his confidence. He managed to still his body and meet Sorun's eyes again. There was still a bit of shyness in his expression, but beyond that was... excitement? Maybe even a bit of joy? "It's great to meet you! I'm Silver."

Not the worst name Sorun had heard come out of the mouth of a Mobian. Hell, it was actually up there with the more sensible ones he'd heard. He saw movement, and noticed the hedgehog extended his hand out to Sorun, waiting for something. The Earthling extended his own free hand, inches away from the gloved hand. Sorun's fingers rapidly flexed and wiggled around as he contemplated what to do.

He decided to mess with him a bit by softly slapping Silver's palm with the back of his hand, then slap the back of Silver's hand with his palm, and end it with a fist bump that Silver hadn't reciprocated because he'd been too confused to react. Sorun, by contrast, maintained his straight face as he pulled his hand back.

Silver pulled his hand back, looking at it with a quizzical expression as he flexed his fingers. His yellow eyes darted up to Sorun. "What was that?" he asked.

"That's how people say hello from where I'm from." Kind of a half-fib, but it didn't matter all that much.

"Oh. Huh." He looked back at his hand. "My master said people are supposed to greet people with a handshake."

"His master?" Sorun filed that detail away for later. "He an old-fashioned kind of guy?" he guessed.

"I mean, probably? I wouldn't really know," Silver said. "So are handshakes really not a thing?"

"Yeah, nobody does them anymore. At least where I'm from."

"Oh, okay." Silver shrugged, and then lowered his hand and looked back at Sorun. "You're really weird-looking, you know? I've never seen a Mobian without fur." He paused and glanced to the side. "Granted I've only ever met the other two, but still..."

A lot of red flags popped up in Sorun's head. "I'm not a Mobian."

"Huh?" Silver blinked. "Oh, wait, he told me about these. Those, uh, the other people that existed way before, over-something, right?"

"Overlanders," Sorun corrected, his worry steadily increasing. "I'm not one of those, either."

Silver's confusion grew. "Then... what are you?"

"A human."

"... And what's that?"

"They're like Overlanders but better."

"Better how?"

"Just are," Sorun said. "I'm... getting the feeling it's not just Angel Island that's completely wrecked."

"What do you mean?" Silver asked. "Of course the rest of the world looks like this place. The apocalypse, you know?"

And just like that, a pit sunk down in Sorun's stomach. An apocalypse. The world ended. Something happened and the world ended.

"Why?" Sorun's mind whirled, but he couldn't think of an answer. Things were supposed to be fixed, he was supposed to be brought back to where things were before Sonic used the time machine to combat the time anomaly. From everything he heard the world was in a good state at that point in time. It shouldn't be in ruins. Everything was supposed to be fixed .

Why, why, why did things keep going wrong...?

Silver seemed to pick up on Sorun's sudden, visible distress. " Oh , wait, are you... are you not from here?" Silver asked. "Like, from here from here?"

Sorun didn't get his meaning entirely, but nodded all the same. "Yeah, I'm lost. Like... I'm super lost, man," he replied, his shoulders dragging down. "Like, I was here then I was there then I did some stuff and was supposed to go to one place but ended up here, and I don't... I just don't know anymore." He shook his head. "I don't know what's going on."

"... That sounds pretty bad," Silver quietly admitted to Sorun.

"It's pretty bad, yeah," he agreed.

"Yeah." Silver paused. He looked over his shoulder, and then back at Sorun. "Hey, um, you maybe wanna come back with me? You can talk with my master and, you know, he can maybe help you out. Probably."

The suggestion only needed a moment's consideration. Sorun didn't have many other options. "Yeah, sure."

It was weird, somehow, walking around with Silver, to the point that moving around in an apocalyptic city was starting to register less with Sorun the longer he was with him. Any kind of company would have worked, but in the short time he'd known him, all of ten minutes, Sorun found Silver was nice enough to get along with.

Chatty, too. Wasn't at first, but after a while the few words being passed between them were growing with time. Something Sorun barely noticed, but he didn't pay it much mind. It was nice talking with someone he didn't want to strangle.

"So your master, he's, like, a cool guy?" Sorun asked as the two of them maneuvered between a pair of destroyed buildings.

"Master Mogul?" Silver asked as he ducked under a fallen beam. "Yeah, he's great."

"Why does that name sound famili- fuck me it's the elephant guy."

"He's kind of been the only person I've ever known, you know?" Silver continued, oblivious to the fact Sorun was glancing between him and the katana he was carrying. "Well, him and Edmund. He taught me a bunch too, whenever I come and visit here."

Sorun hummed. "Oh, so you don't live here?"

Silver shook his head. "No, I just come and visit Edmund from time to time. Taught me stuff like Master did, and he's got this really big library he lets me look at sometimes. I usually just come here by myself, but a while ago Master was really insistent on both of us coming here for some reason, so we're visiting."

"Mm." Sorun gave Silver his full attention. "No parents?"

It took a moment for Silver to respond. "No, nobody. Just my master. I've been around a lot of places, Sorun, and honestly I'm pretty sure we're the last three people on the whole planet. Well, four now that you're here."

Again, Sorun felt his heart sink at hearing that. A true apocalypse, then. One that'd taken the life of nearly the whole planet. All except this hedgehog, an evil elephant person his friends warned him about long ago, and some third guy. He felt like kicking something.

"But it's not so bad," Silver continued. "Er, living with Master Mogul, I mean, not, you know, the whole world being the way it is. That's terrible. But he's nice."

Sorun's grip on his sword relaxed somewhat. "Oh, really?"

Silver nodded. "Yeah, I mean he was pretty strict at times with all the teaching, but... well, he's the only family I got. And he makes nice-tasting food and helped me out with my powers."

The white Mobian lifted his hand up. A teal glow surrounded the hand, a similar aura surrounding a couple of displaced bricks nearby. The bricks floated off the ground, formed into a circle, and started spinning around while Silver looked back at Sorun with a small grin.

"It's pretty neat, right?" he asked him. It didn't sound like how Sorun would expect it to hear, cocky and arrogant, like something that would fly out of Sonic's mouth and make him want to punch him. It was sincere and a bit excited, like a child trying to show someone something. It ended up putting Sorun a bit more at ease.

"Yeah, it's cool," he agreed. Silver smiled wide at that. "So your thing is telekinesis?"

"That's what my master calls it," Silver said, dropping the bricks. The glow left his hand at the same time. "Between you and me it kinda sounds like a mouthful, but I don't have a better name to call it. Better than just saying I can just move things with my mind, but, eh..." An airy sigh left him. "I never really had anyone else to talk to it about, so, well, yeah."

"I getcha," Sorun said. "You know, I'm technically an orphan, too."

There was something odd about the way Silver looked sad and excited about that at the same time. "Oh, for real?"

"Yep." Sorun nodded. "If you wanna get real technical I'm an extinct species. You'd think that'd get me put on a list somewhere."

"Aren't... aren't we all technically extinct?"

"... It's complicated, man, I'll fill you in later," Sorun promised.

Silver looked a bit disappointed at that, but he'd still remained silent as they continued walking. A few minutes later he glanced up and called out, "Oh, hey, we're here!"

As the hedgehog ran ahead, Sorun had to slow down to examine the place they'd come to further. It was... well, there wasn't much to say about it. It was just another destroyed, half-collapsed building, virtually indistinguishable from all the other ones they'd passed on the way here. It put Sorun off a bit; he'd expected something more , seeing as Silver and his master were supposed to live here. Maybe the apocalypse didn't let them be picky.

It was odd overall, but he still followed Silver into the building. He'd used his powers to float up a bit, towards a higher floor in the building - what was left of it, at least. Fortunately for Sorun the interior stairwell was still intact, as well as the building's front door and entrance lobby. Surprising, given how everything else looked. He'd managed to spot what floor Silver had floated up to and decided to hold off on commenting to Silver about making him climb up to the fifth floor alone when he caught up.

Getting off of the stairwell and ducking into a hallway nearly sheared in half made for a short trip, as Sorun could already hear a pair of voices the closer he got to them, past rooms closed off by debris or wrecked doors. Most of what he heard was Silver's own excited voice. The other one he couldn't make out, too quiet and deep.

The first thing Sorun saw was the room itself. Larger than most of the other rooms he'd crossed on the way here, and mainly intact. That said a lot for the rest of the place seeing as one of the walls was completely gone, giving a nice view of the rest of the destroyed city. Other than that the rooms distinctly looked lived-in: More cleaned and furbished than everywhere else, less debris. Little things like stacks of books or food here and there, some bedrolls, a literal campfire in the center of the room.

Then there were the occupants. They were both at a far corner near the back of the room, around a surprising number of stacks of books. He made Silver out immediately, talking excited and animatedly to someone. He'd saw Sorun walk in and turned towards him, smiling and waving.

The one sitting in the corner of the room talking to Silver was the one Sorun had been worried about. He didn't know much about Mogul outside of what he heard from others. He didn't think he'd be so huge , either, dwarfing Sorun by three, maybe even four times just sitting down, hunched in the corner, wrapped in a brown cloak that almost blended into the brown fur covering the mammoth's body.

It was the face that gave Sorun pause. "This dude looks fucking old ," Sorun thought. It was hard to see visible age past the fur covering his face, but there wasn't hiding that look in his blue eyes as he looked towards Sorun. Half-lidded to the point of almost being closed, the way his shoulder and the rest of him was so slumped, the deep, tired look his eyes and mouth held. The slow breathing. Hell, he even smelled old if that musty scent said anything to Sorun. It felt like he was standing next to a relic.

What really put him off was the look he was directing at Sorun, specifically. He couldn't place it. Like, at all. Just that Mogul was giving Sorun a certain look , and he didn't know what that look was. Appraisal, maybe? He more than likely knew about Sorun since the Earthling was around back when he was a prisoner in New Mobotropolis, before that breakout he'd heard about. But no, there was something more there, beneath that initial, acknowledging glance. For the life of Sorun he didn't know what it was. But oddly enough the one thing Sorun didn't see in his eyes was surprise at seeing him.

Whatever the case, it caused Sorun to grip Yamato just a bit tighter. He did his best to keep as relaxed a composure as possible, but his hands were ready to snap the sword out at a moment's notice. Just in case.

"- And then I found him wandering around so we talked a bunch and you know Sorun's really neat," Silver was telling the mammoth, without seeming to take a breath, "and I was thinking maybe-!"

"Calm yourself, Silver." The baritone voice that came out of Mogul's mouth was so deep Sorun could have sworn the building rumbled under his feet from it. "I would think it prudent our guest introduce himself first, hmm?"

"Oh! Er, right." Silver stepped away, looking sheepish. "Sorun, this is my master," he said to the Earthling, and then gestured to the mammoth. "Master Mogul."

"... I know of him," Sorun said, making Silver blink in surprise. "A little, at least."

"Huh?" Blinking again, Silver looked back and forth between the two. Neither Sorun nor Mogul stopped looking at one another. "You do?"

"Yeah," Sorun said. "Sonic always described Mogul as one of the rogue's gallery villain nutballs that gave him and the others trouble in the way of petty villain nonsense."

He'd hoped to glean some reaction out of Mogul with that. Granted, he did, but not the one he'd expected. The mammoth had just heaved a heavy sigh and seemed to slump even further. Almost in a sad manner. "I've no doubt the me of the past would have demanded swift retribution for such an insult."

All of those words flew over Sorun's head with the exception of a few. "'Me of the past', huh?" he muttered. "The you of the now, then?"

"Would simply correct you in that calling my actions petty would, as you would most likely phrase it, 'undersell' it."

This time Sorun was the one to sigh. "So I'm in the future? That it?"

It was Mogul's turn to blink. "You don't seem surprised."

"Man of the world like me? What's even left?"

Nearby was the remnant of what had one point been an office rolling chair. The back of it was missing but the chair itself and the wheels seemed intact. Sorun sat down in it and turned the chair to face Mogul, who continued sitting where he was at while looking at Sorun.

Silver had backed up some to sit down, keeping quiet while continuing to glance between the two.

Sorun took in a deep breath as he thought. With all the burning questions he had, Mogul was probably the only one around who could answer them, tell him just what the hell was going on. Given what little he knew of him he wasn't completely sure if he could trust every word that came out of his mouth, but he'd suppose he'd just have to judge that for himself.

"Do you know me?" Sorun asked. "Like, me specifically? Who I am, what I did?"

"The wayward youth, plucked from his own world," Mogul answered. "You aided the Freedom Fighters of old."

Sorun released a breath, and made a small nod. In a weird way, it was comforting to hear Mogul say that. He'd existed here at some point; had to if Mogul knew all that. Which meant this was the right timeline. The original one, the one he'd strived to get back to. That answered the question of where he was. Now he had to figure out when the hell he was.

Which brought him to his next question. "How far into the future am I?"

"I assume you wish to know how far from the point you were entombed in the Master Emerald? For reference?" At Sorun raising his eyebrows, Mogul raised his eye ridges. Not a smile, his mouth didn't even move, but for him it was probably the closest he could get to a smirk. "No need to give me that look. I've shared in the experience."

The statement made Sorun relax somewhat. He'd heard as much. "Fine, sure. How long since then?"

"Two hundred years. Approximately."

He probably said more after that. Sorun hadn't heard him.

It just went to show how almost nothing ever seemed to go right for Sorun on this planet. All he'd done, everything he'd gone through, only to end up here. Right timeline, wrong time. Two hundred years too late in the timeline. And then even worse was the sight he saw outside - that apocalyptic vista of a dead world. He'd already had to suffer through one of those, but seeing it again, it was wrenching at something in his chest.

There were so many feelings welling up in Sorun there was no way to articulate them. Frustration on such a massive scale that he'd come so far only to find this and end up here, so far in the wrong point in time everyone he knew would be dead, end of the world or not. Hopelessness over this being the fate of the world he'd worked so hard to set right. All that, everything he'd done, just for this. A dead world. Anger, not even the kind he could aim something at, just blind fury with no identifiable target. Aimless, all-consuming.

More than all that he just felt tired.

Silently, Sorun rose up out of the chair. It was a toss-up whether he wanted to throw the chair as far as he could or just crumple onto the ground right there, and ended up doing neither. Mogul was giving him a critical eye but was otherwise saying nothing. Silver had been silent throughout the entire exchange, listening to every word while looking towards Sorun with increasing surprise. But now he just looked worried.

Sorun turned from both of them. "I'll come back. I need a bit." There were still more questions he had, things he needed to know, but he couldn't right now, not in this state. Needed time for... for even what, just to calm down? Get into a state where he could hold a conversation without being liable to fly into a fit of rage or something else?

He didn't know, except that he just couldn't do anything at this moment.

Silver had opened his mouth to say something. A sharp look from Mogul made him pause in whatever he was gonna say, followed by him shaking his head at the hedgehog. Sorun missed all this, having already half-walked, half-stumbled out of the room to make his way towards the stairs. Nobody followed, thankfully.

"What the fuck was the point?"

It was the single question that kept burning inside Sorun's mind as he was lead back here, once again navigating broken streets in a dead city. Silver and Mogul's home, the location, was kept somewhere in the back of his memory, somewhere for him to return once he was ready, because where the hell else was he supposed to go?

But company wasn't something he was concerned about. It was the everything else.

He'd sagged onto the side of a nearby, fallen lamp post, sighing out loudly while glancing around at the destroyed buildings. Part of Sorun wanted to take Yamato and go to other parts of the world. Not to verify if the rest of the world really was dead; he trusted Silver on his word, and destruction on this scale was something Sorun was familiar with, even if he'd only ever caught a glance. He didn't need to see the rest of the world to know. No, just to see if New Mobotropolis and his old house was still there. He decided he couldn't bear the answer of if it was or not, or what state it'd look like.

Sorun didn't even know how the apocalypse began to begin with and he felt defeated. The mere knowledge, simply looking out and seeing that at some time, within two hundred years of the time he was supposed to be in, the world ended.

Another dead world. Another moment where he got to be the last one standing in what was left. He felt so useless.

He'd dipped his head down towards his feet to let out a loud sigh. When he looked up, he saw that, somehow, he'd circled back to the plaza he'd been in way earlier, where that statue had been. And, surprisingly enough, he saw that there was someone there. Standing in front of the statue. His nose wrinkled a bit when he saw it was an echidna, red like most others, and the fingers holding the sword tightened a bit, but he held off on doing anything and just chose to observe.

Observing wasn't doing much considering the echidna wasn't doing anything.

"That the Edman person Silver mentioned? Gah, fuck it." Sorun pounded a fist against the fallen lamp post, pushed off it, and then walked towards the echidna. Halfway there he saw the "clothes" he was wearing, if it could even be called that, looked more like a poncho than anything else. And he was old if all the wrinkles Sorun saw just from a back view said anything, plus the walking stick in his grasp. The old Mobian still didn't react even when Sorun stopped right next to him.

Sorun found himself blinking a few times when he realized the echidna was looking down at the decapitated head of the statue.

"It's a cryin' shame," rasped out the echidna. His voice sounded brittle and aged. "This statue stood the test of time 'til now. I always figured it'd outlast me, but it seems it wasn't meant to be."

Unconsciously, Sorun hid the Yamato behind his back. "Yeah, man, corrosion's no joke," he agreed. "I actually knew her for a bit. Didn't really like her. She had this... smile that bugged me."

Did more than bug him. It pissed him the hell off. Particularly after she'd disabled King Shadow, she'd stood there with that wide smile on her face. Sorun sure hadn't felt like smiling at the time, even after that ordeal was over with. Not after what he'd gone through, was still going through. Not after what he saw them do to that other Rotor. Nothing about that situation suggested a smile was appropriate. But yet she'd stood there, with that wide smile on her face, like nothing was wrong with the world while Sorun's whole world was falling apart around him.

The old echidna next to Sorun made a hum. "Is that so?"

"Yeah." Sorun glanced to the side at him. A wrinkled, bearded face with a small set of glasses met him. "Why? You know her?"

"Mm. She was my mother."

There was a moment of awkward silence. For a single second Sorun felt bad, but then it was overrode with his previous feelings. He leaned in a bit closer to look - the echidna's eyes were a familiar shade of purple, if not a bit faded. "You certainly have his eyes," Sorun mumbled, leaning back so he stood straight. "Well, I'm not taking back what I said. She was irritating and I didn't like her."

Surprisingly, the old man just laughed. "There's a strength in that, not backing down even after being tripped up. Something I can respect." His eyes glanced up to meet Sorun's. "You could at least say you're sorry."

"To say I'm sorry is to admit I made a mistake and promise I won't do so again. I didn't make a mistake by saying I had a poor opinion of your mother."

"No, I meant for cutting the statue. Corrosion doesn't make that fine a line where the head separated from the neck."

"Sharp for an oldie." Sorun didn't so much as flinch at the accusation. "Fine. I apologize for defacing a historical monument. In my defense there aren't many people left to appreciate it."

"There's truth in that." A withered sigh left the echidna in recognition of Sorun's words. "Well, regardless of your feelings she was an excellent Guardian, just like her own old man. And a good mother, along with my croc of a pops father."

"... Wait, what?"

"My pops. Old man. Dad, daddy, father." Edmund rose his tick up and poked Sorun in the chest with its tip. "What about this ain't you getting?"

"No, I got that part," Sorun said, slapping the cane away, "I meant... croc as in crocodile? Really? Your dad was a crocodile?"

"Mhm, and he saw fit to remind me of it whenever I asked him," Edmund grumbled out.

"... By any chance do you know his dad's name?"

Edmund shook his head. "It's been so long by now I just plain don't know. Best I can do is remember what it sounded like. Had a kind of... vvv sound at the beginning."

That was enough for Sorun to go on. "Vector managed reproduction? How the hell he'd pull that off?" He shook his head. Not the time to think about that. "That's cool and all, but... that doesn't, you know. Seem physically possible?"

"Eh?" Aged eyes ogled at Sorun as if he'd just gone insane. "What you mean by that, youngin'? What, your own ma never tell ya how child-makin' works?"

"Way too vividly," Sorun sighed out with a slight shudder. "But, like... crocodiles are cold-blooded reptiles, and echidna are... I'm assuming not so cold-blooded." After an uncomfortable silence Sorun began idly tapping Yamato's scabbard. "I'm not getting how that's possible."

"What's to say it ain't possible?"

"I don't know, biology?"

"Look, sonny, what'd you say your name was?"

"Sorun."

"Sunder, listen." Once again he jabbed Sorun in the chest with his cane. He had to resist knocking it out of the old man's hand. "Dunno how it works with your kind, but Mobians're special. If cross-species compatibility weren't a thing we wouldn'ta made it as far as we did before the big end." A third jab with his cane. "Heck, maybe if your attitude weren't so sour you could get yerself a lady friend of your own and see with your own eyes. 'Least if there're any left."

"Yeah, I think I'm good there, old-timer." Once more Sorun batted the cane away. "And as relieved as I am that my humanity didn't automatically lock out my ability to have kids on a planet full of not-humans, I've been nuked more than microwave popcorn, so I don't think it matter- actually, Devil's Body would've probably fixed that," he suddenly realized.

"Hmph." Edmund clacked the tip of his cane on the ground. "Whatever that means, Souther."

Sorun's eyes narrowed at the echidna. "You know, believe it or not you're only the second decrepit old man I've met that couldn't pronounce my name right. And you know what, it's not getting any less annoying."

"Feh!" Edmund gave him a displeased look." You know, back in my day people respected their elders."

"Back in your day there actually were elders and people to respect them."

"... You're not a very likable person, Soujourn."

"I wouldn't go that far. I knew your grandpa, Knuckles. He liked me, at least during the times he wasn't possessed and trying to kill me," Sorun said. "At any rate I liked him more than his daughter."

At hearing that, the old echidna gave Sorun a curious look. "Really? You knew him?" he asked. "And who did you say you were again?"

Letting out a mirthless laugh, Sorun shrugged his shoulders and stepped forwards a bit. "Oh, I'm all sorts of things. Sorun the Gamer, Sorun the Freedom Fighter, Sorun the Delivery Boy." He turned around and sat down on the statue's head while looking up at the echidna. "Right now I guess I'm Sorun the Time Traveler, and right now I'm lost by about two hundred years."

The echidna didn't respond at first. He let Sorun's words sink in, and then closed his eyes to give a brief nod before opening them back up to look at Sorun. "Alright. Well, back when she was alive my mother called me Edmund. I suppose you could call me the last echidna. And the last Guardian, or a failure of one at any rate."

"Hey, from one failure to another, could be worse. I think," Sorun said. "What makes you such a failure?"

"I inherited the position of protecting an island halfway sunk into the ocean. So far, not too great," Edmund informed him. "I've long since learned not to worry about things I cannot control."

"I hear that, man." Sorun blew out his mouth, shook his head, and then turned back up to Edmund. "So you think- huh?"

Something had gone wrong with the echidna's face. He suddenly seemed more distant, eyes glazed and staring off in a random direction. His mouth was moving up and down, as if he were whispering something, but nothing but airy sounds were coming out of his mouth.

"... You alright, man?" Sorun hesitantly asked, resisting the urge to reach over and poke him. A few seconds later the old Mobian seemed to snap awake.

"Oh! Er... right." Edmund blinked his eyes a few times and looked over at Sorun. "What were we talking about again?"

"For the love of- another friggin' one?" A sort of sad frown found its way onto Sorun's face, and he shook his head. "No, uh... just thinking," he said. "I don't know what I'm supposed to do now."

Because what was left for him? He couldn't go backwards in time to before all this, back to the others. He could , technically, but using the Yamato to go back presented the risk of time paradoxes and the likely death of everyone in the whole zone as a result. He was effectively stuck here in a dead world with someone he was honestly okay with, someone he didn't really trust or like, and a third guy who looked like he wasn't long for this world anyways.

None of that even covered the world was dead. There was just too much to unpack in that bit of information alone and Sorun was still coming to terms with it, all the implications behind it. It was bad enough he was sitting here airing out all his grievances to an old man halfway to being senile.

"You said you were a time traveler, didn't you?"

Sorun glanced towards the speaker. "A fairly lousy one, but yeah."

"From where, may I ask? Time from my grandpops?"

Sorun nodded. "If the elephant dude is to be believed, I'm two hundred years too far ahead of where I'm supposed to be," he answered. "World was still alive back then. Seeing it now, it's..." Heart-wrenching? Nauseating? Awful, horrifying, grim, hopeless? "... It sucks."

Edmund made a hum of acknowledgement. "I can sympathize with that. Somewhat. Never really got to see the world in its old-world glory, if you get my meaning."

That caused Sorun to raise an eyebrow and fully turn to the echidna in question. "Mf. Really? Just how recent was all this, anyways?"

"Hmf. Couldn't tell ya. Might have to ask that 'elephant dude' of yours if you're so inclined to wonder," Edmund suggested. "Think I know who you're talking about. That old sad sack of bones lookin' after Slither."

Sorun made a withered sound. "Silver?"

"Yeah, Simmer. Good kid, real bright. Let him poke 'round my library some whenever he comes visit. Good heart on that one. Nothin' like that mentor o' his, an' the only reason I tolerate his ilk lookin' after the boy's 'cause of how well he turned out," Edmund said. "But, given how long that codger among codger's been kicking, well... goodness. He'd be your best bet on answers unless you wanna go digging up the past along with Shiver, but the man's an honest downer to hold a conversation with."

"Yeah, immortality'll do that, I guess," Sorun dryly remarked, though his voice was quiet as he pondered the suggestion.

To be completely honest, he didn't want much to do with the guy because of how the others described him. Power-hungry blowhard that used big words to demean people was the basic gist of the accounts he'd been given. Admittedly he hadn't seen much of that meeting the man in person, but then again maybe time and/or the apocalypse changed that. Or he was that good a actor, but with how everything was dead Sorun honestly didn't see the point in him going that far.

And he still did have questions, and there were a scarce amount of people around to answer them. Mogul was in all likelihood the only one. And it wasn't like Sorun had anything better to do.

"Fine. I'll go talk to him." Sorun stood to leave, but then stopped and looked back down at the head. "Er... you know, the world's supply of duct tape and glue's probably all bad by now, but I could probably... uh..."

Sorun trailed off when he saw Edmund had that vacant, unfocused look on his face again. The sad frown returned to Sorun's face, after which he turned the other way and began backtracking the way he came from. He could swear he still heard the old man muttering behind him as he left.

He'd gone back to the building Silver had lead him to previously, but Mogul wasn't in the same room he'd been in prior. Some searching around eventually found Sorun on the roof of the building - what was left of it, at least, though compared to most of the other roofs around this one was mainly intact.

He found Mogul there, resting against one of the large ventilation units one would typically find on top of tall buildings. There were more books scattered around him, and he had another one in his hands. His eyes were still down reading the pages, though he still spoke up as Sorun approached him.

"Finally found a moment to compose yourself?"

"Still had questions that needed answering," Sorun said. "Good book?"

"A difficult question. I'm fairly confident I've read every single book on the entire planet by now," Mogul rumbled out as he turned a page. "Whatever ones survived at any rate. I've found myself rereading a vast majority of them. Even before that, with my age, the plot of many a tome became rather predictable."

"Yeah, I've heard being immortal has a way of sucking the fun out of everything after a while."

Though Sorun had said it with a bit of snark, Mogul didn't stir in the slightest. "Not inaccurate," he simply replied, and then turned a page.

The response threw Sorun off for a moment, going as far as to make him stop for a second, but after he continued walking until he'd made it to the mammoth's side. A few more seconds passed, after which, without making a sound, Sorun decided to sit down next to the mammoth.

Minutes passed with them just sitting there, Mogul silently reading his book while Sorun stared out into the destroyed world beyond, the hollowed buildings and orange sky. From this high up he could see that the city itself was off-kilter slightly, like the whole island was slightly tilted. Questions whirled through his mind, but he didn't even know where to start, what the ask first. What to do , even after this. He could barely even figure out his own feelings on what was happening and could scarcely keep up with it all.

"It's supremely tragic, isn't it?" Mogul asked, breaking the silence without even looking up from his book. "The state of the world?"

"... I remember back when I was with a bunch of people that tried their best to save the planet," Sorun answered after a few seconds. "Started as early as five, most of them. Was even with them for it for a bit of it. Them, foreign governments, everyone trying to make the world a better place. I even went forwards far enough to see them pull it off, even after Sonic-"

"Irrevocably damaged the time-space continuum in his youth and was forced to alter the stream of time in order to rectify it," Mogul finished.

Slowly, Sorun turned his head towards Mogul. "How do you even know about that?" he asked. Nobody but him alone should even be aware something like that happened. Mogul wasn't even there for any of that.

The mammoth simply turned a page. "Some knowledge has a way of burdening those who shoulder it. Some would curse others with knowledge out of simple spite or greater machinations. A few passing words to shatter the psyche. I like to consider myself above such pettiness. As such, Sorun, I'll do you the benefit of not answering that question." He sighed a deep breath. "If it will ease your mind, however, know that I'm unique in this regard. Nobody, back when everyone was alive at any rate, was ever aware of any changes or alteration in the timeline."

"But how do you know ?" Sorun pressed. "It shouldn't be possible."

"Indeed. It shouldn't. But what I encountered long ago was an impossibility unto itself." A page in Mogul's book was flipped. "How I wish I never encountered it. That cursed abomination."

The teen's grip on the sword's scabbard tightened. "Did this 'abomination' of yours tell you something about me? Because you sure didn't seem surprised to see me walk in with Silver."

"I couldn't comment on that. I also couldn't comment on us meeting when I just so happened to have asked Silver to transport me here along with him on one of his voyages to the island. Quite the coincidence, two relics of the past meeting during our little vacation here." His voice lowered a few octaves. "I would strongly recommend you disengage from this line of questioning."

Sorun scoffed at his refusal to answer, but didn't comment further on it. "Fine, be that way," he muttered. He was still interested, didn't care enough to press it at any rate. Not without risking making him upset enough he'd stop talking. "So I really did fix it? Time, all that? Considering we're two hundred years past the fact I imagine the time anomaly isn't a problem since we're alive and talking about it?"

"A hundred and seventy-five years past the fact," Mogul corrected him as he turned a page, his voice returning to its normal, albeit it baritone, pitch. "It didn't make itself evident until twenty-five years after you were locked aw-"

"Whatever. You know what I mean."

Mogul made a hum. Sorun couldn't tell if it was in displeasure or indifference. "The results speak for themselves, do they not?" he asked. "That event never occurred in this time. I'm admittedly not privy to every detail, but my knowledge of time and its workings is complete enough that I know multiple streams of time in a single zone is impossible. I don't know anything pertaining to the alternate timeline you went to, but as we're here now, discussing it, it is more than safe to say that alternate world is no more."

Despite it all, despite everything being displayed to Sorun, it still managed to make him give a sigh of relief. The alternate history with King Shadow was gone and dead. Deleted. And seeing as Mogul had knowledge of Sorun before they'd even met, it meant this was the original one Sorun had strived to return to after all.

So in the end he'd managed it. He'd did it. He came back.

Fat lot of good it did.

It left a bittersweet taste in Sorun's mouth. Everything he'd done to get back here, everything everyone had done to set the world right... "Everything my friends did to try and fix the world, only for this to be it's fate," he mumbled out, looking at the city beyond. He could swear from this high up he could see the outermost edges of the island, and the glistening surface of water beyond its border. "Was there a point to it all? Any of it if this was the end result?" He looked up at Mogul. "What even happened to the world?"

Because he had to know. If this was manmade, Mobianmade, whichever, or if it was some kind of natural disaster. If whatever invalidated the efforts everybody had put in to save this world could have been prevented or not, if it was all in vain or not. If it was even worth trying when the world was just going to end anyways no matter what. If it was all a waste of time.

He wasn't sure he wanted that answered after all when Mogul spoke. "A cataclysmic event two hundred years ago wiped out civilization. Some survived and managed to carry others further, but the conditions of the world proved too harsh to sustain anything long-term. Silver is the last generation of sapient species as a whole on Mobius."

The world got wiped out two hundred years ago.

That couldn't be right.

"But... but that's before the time anomaly almost destroyed the world."

"That is correct."

"And I got rid of the time anomaly. It's gone, never happened. It shouldn't have posed a danger to anyone because I made it so that time anomaly never happened to begin with."

"That is also correct."

Sorun's voice became frustrated. "So then why did the world end up getting destroyed anyways!?"

Calmly, Mogul flipped a page in his book. "Because the cataclysm that destroyed the world and the time anomaly you discarded away with were two wholly unrelated events."

So it was something else after all? "That makes even less sense," Sorun argued, shaking his head in denial. "You're saying this all happened before the time anomaly. That doesn't make sense, because nothing happened! I wasn't there for long, but I talked with people during that time. I talked with Tails and Sonic while he was king, and they never mentioned anything like this! The world never ended, it didn't... everything was peaceful! So why did it get destroyed this time? Because this timeline, it's the original, nothing should have been altered except for the time anomaly disappearing. You said so yourself! So why did something change?"

Why did something cause the world to end when it didn't the first time? What changed when the only thing Sorun did was get rid of the time anomaly so there could be a future past that point a hundred and seventy-five years ago? What happened?

"Who can say?" Mogul wondered as he turned a page.

"..." Sorun's eyes narrowed in Mogul's direction. "You were there," he pointed out. "You must know something."

"I wasn't in the direct vicinity of the event."

"What do you- the whole world got destroyed, so doesn't that mean the entire world is the vicinity!?"

Mogul didn't answer and instead just turned a page.

Irritated, Sorun stood up. Half of him wanted to cut that book in half just so he could gain his attention, and the other half wanted to chop a limb off to get the point across. When he had questions he was desperate for answers for and the only person who could give them to him was ignoring him. He was already reaching for the Yamato's handle when the mammoth finally spoke up.

"Do you honestly think a show of bravado and violence will get you far in life?" Mogul asked him, baritone voice as calm as could be. He didn't even look up from his book. "Believe me and my millennia of experience when I say that intimidation can only get one so far before they encounter those immune to its effects for one reason or another."

"Yeah, you would know that, wouldn't you?" Sorun bitterly remarked. "What with all you were doing back in the-"

"I find it amusing, you choosing to judge me for my actions when you yourself were present for precisely none of them," Mogul interrupted. "You've never met me before now. You were never victim to any of the consequences of my actions. So why the hostility against an old man you've only recently acquainted yourself with?"

Sorun huffed out a breath. All the same, his right hand dropped away from the sword's handle. "You gave my friends a hard time back in the past. That's all," he answered in an honest tone.

"What would you have me say? Profess my deep regrets for my past actions? Prostrate myself before you? Spare me," Mogul rumbled out as he turned a page. "I'm not ashamed to admit my wrongdoings. Yes, I heavily interfered in the lives of your friends in the past all for the sake of what amounted to petty power plays that ultimately proved futile in the end."

"... Why, though?" Sorun asked, now more genuinely curious than anything else. "You... you're... I knew you were old and immortal, but you're seriously thousands of years old?"

"Thereabouts. Quite honestly the number becomes meaningless at a point."

"Yeah, I imagine, but..." Sorun shook his head in confusion. "Seriously, why ?"

"I've come to understand that no amount of age and wisdom is sufficient in resisting foolish temptation in the pursuit of one's ambitions," Mogul told Sorun. "You couldn't fathom living a life as long as mine. I saw Mobian civilizations rise and fall. I'd risen to the pinnacle of power in some ages only to fall back to rock bottom when those ages crumbled. I'd taught wizarding arts to Mobians only to see those techniques fade and die out with age as their practitioners perished with time." Mogul paused, and though it was hard to make out, Sorun could have sworn he heard the mammoth's voice grow quieter. "I believed it to be my right to stand above all others."

"Just because you were the oldest? The most experienced? Because you had powers an abilities nobody else had?" Sorun questioned.

"Yes to all that and more," Mogul answered. "I won't get into specifics, but you understand the barest gist, I see. I very well am one of the, if not the , first fully sapient Mobians to walk the surface of this planet, mainly due to my exposure to a Chaos Emerald in my 'youth'. So believe my words to be true when I say that the Kingdom of Acorn was by far the most successful and largest Mobian civilization that had ever been erected. At the time I thought it logical and prudent to engage with them."

"Sure, but what did you actually do?" Sorun asked. "All I ever got told by the others was that you did some villainous junk that got you thrown in jail."

Mogul turned a page. "Employed the services of mercenaries in the efforts of purloining an artifact of great power that had been held in the Acorn family for generations to usurp their position of authority. Kidnapped that prodigious two-tailed child and replaced him with a perfect double for a time before his speedy friend rescued him. Became a god incarnate utilizing the energies of Chaos and wreaked havoc across the worlds."

That last one threw Sorun for a loop. "Ah... huh. You really did all that, huh?" He gave the mammoth a quizzical look, but he didn't budge in the slightest from it. "Became a god?"

"In the basest sense of the word, yes. A being so omnipotent in power that I'd crushed entire zones in the palm of my hand." Mogul blinked. Sorun wasn't sure if that'd been the first time since he arrived on the roof if the Mobian had blinked or not. "The young fox had thwarted those efforts as well. Undid my actions and stripped my power. Those events among other, less-important recollections are the primary reason those in that kingdom-turned-republic viewed me in an unfavorable light and why you evidently dislike me so."

The mammoth turning into a mad god that honest-to-god crushed whole universes in his meaty, furry palms should have been a more nerve-wracking piece of information. It wasn't, not to Sorun, at least. Not at this point. He was actually more focused on the part where Tails had been the one to stop him. He'd somehow beaten a multiverse-level god and saved everyone he'd destroyed, if Mogul's words were true. And they sounded very true.

"Listen, when you fight a guy radiating so much power the air around him is literally boiling then you can fucking talk. 'Til then you can't say shit about what I did, so shut the fuck up about it already."

Well, apparently Tails had done that after all. That and so much more. Sorun wasn't even sure him beating Enerjak measured up to that. And he didn't even so much as bring it up with Sorun when he'd said that to him in the other timeline after he'd killed King Shadow. Why? To patronize him? No, even worse: he'd been trying to be humble and sympathetic with someone being open hostile with him. Someone who'd later on threatened his family.

And honestly, Sorun hated that. Because he didn't think he would have done that. He didn't like how Tails ended up being the better man after all. How he'd been in the right.

"Fucking Prowers," Sorun thought as he shook his head. "Wow," he ended up mumbling out, halfway between sounding impressed and scathing. "You wanted to be the top guy so bad you went around killing an uncountable amount of people to make a point? I'm not even talking numbers in the quadrillions or quintillions, like literally I'm talking an unquantifiable number because you were destroying whole universes like it was nothing."

"They were restored upon my defeat," Mogul pointed out.

Sorun breathed out in disbelief. "I really don't think that matters."

"Then does you erasing an entire timeline just to preserve this one not matter?"

"..." Once more, Sorun felt his eyes narrow. His breathing intensified slightly. "Don't you dare start this. Did you go on this whole tirade about past regrets just to make a point?"

"An intriguing word, 'regret'," Mogul said, ignoring Sorun's question. "I used to think myself above such a word. I'd considered it such a paltry emotion, something to be discarded in the pursuit of something greater. A useless crutch for the weak. I was mistaken, of course. It was only after the entire world was lost and I was left with nothing but time to reflect did I realize just how far I'd erred. But it's a fault I believe anyone is susceptible to - losing sight of what's truly important in pursuit of personal goals." For the first time since Sorun stepped onto the roof Mogul tore his eyes off his book to look at Sorun. "Or am I wrong? Is you destroying a timeline for personal reasons not the same as my abusing omnipotence out of a foolish and selfish desire to be recognized as the most superior being in the cosmos?"

It was more similar than he'd care to admit. True enough that he felt his arms go slack, all the hostility washing out of Sorun. "Sure. I had to do things. I had to hurt people to get here. Back in that other timeline," he quietly admitted. "Break one woman's jaw, completely cripple a man. Kill a king, kill a friend, threaten another friend's family. Tell myself that none of it matters since all those events got erased, never happened, that all those people got replaced with this time's versions. Lives getting brought back, others being snuffed out and erased, everybody changed but me. It all sticks to me regardless.

"I don't know. I didn't kill anybody in the end, since those actions and consequences were deleted, but..." But it still unsettled him, somewhat. Back then he'd been so laser-focused on his one goal, "get back, get back to the true timeline, get back," that nothing else had mattered. Not events, not people. He hurt and threatened without a second thought. Killed and shrugged it off, like it didn't matter. It technically didn't , not really, but something about how Sorun had still managed to do it with borderline casual ease shook him somewhat.

Nevertheless...

"Where'd that get me? Here?" Sorun quietly scoffed. "I set the world back to the way it's supposed to be, and for what? Just for it to be destroyed anyways?" He made a breathy laugh, and then collapsed back into a sitting position next to Mogul. He lifted his free hand up, and let it fall down and slap against the concrete roof. "Where'd it all end up getting me in the end? Talking about all of this to some sad old guy on a roof somewhere."

"And yet," Mogul drawled, "you look down on me for committing practically the same crimes."

Sorun clenched his teeth. "It's not the same."

"Isn't it?" Mogul challenged. "Lives rewritten. People and their very existence simply vanishing without so much as a memory to fit the events of this timeline."

"Lives saved. Lives brought back. Lives that would have remained gone if I did nothing," Sorun argued back. "You did what you did because of a power high. Your words. I-"

"Supplanted the lives and memories of every single being in this world, irreversibly altering an inordinate number of beings throughout this world. Trying to weigh the lives you changed versus mine on a scale seems quite pointless when the numbers become so large it's arguably arbitrary. What use is there?"

There wasn't any. Sorun would be a hypocrite to argue it. "I just wanted to go back home," he mumbled out. "Nothing else mattered but that. I didn't care if I actually had a right to make that choice. Just that I could make that choice. Just me and my special sword." He shook his head and glanced up at Mogul. "But you're wrong to compare us. Even if there are people in that other timeline that would have never been born in this one, if they never get to live now solely because of me, there were people that got to live here that were never even born there. I did what I did to save people. I stand by my decision. That timeline wasn't even supposed to exist to begin with; I arguably did nothing wrong but make everything how it was supposed to. You -" he said, pointing at Mogul, "didn't save anyone, going around squeezing whole universes like they were stress balls."

At the end of the day, he refused to be put on the same pedestal as an egomaniac like that. Even if what he did was selfish, at least some good came out of it. Not like what Mogul did. Nothing like what he did.

"There's truth to that," Mogul admitted. "In the end it is us who are left to wrestle with the consequences of our actions when no others remember. Or the lack thereof consequences, in our unique circumstances."

Sorun would amend that he had a point there, and made an agreeing grunt in response.

Mogul continued. "With age and experience comes wisdom, or so they used to say. To that I say you could have thousands of years of experience sccrued wisdom. Without perspective, though, what use really is all that knowledge?" he wondered. "I'm... simply ashamed it took the end of the world and the pending isolation for me to realize what I lost sight of. Perhaps my gifts are to blame. More likely it's me searching for excuses."

"Okay, but why are you telling me all this?" Sorun finally demanded. He'd tried going along with the old man's ramblings as best he could, but the teen's patience had finally wore thin. "Are old people just that compulsive towards imparting wisdom on the youth and long-winded speeches about morality because of how screwed a past they had?"

"I'm afraid Silver's already taken my focus in that regard," Mogul informed him. "It's as I said. I'm bereft of distractions." Again, he flipped a page in his book. "And perhaps I wanted to see just what kind of individual you are."

"... Why do you even care? We barely know each other."

Mogul didn't answer him. He just continued reading his book.

After rolling his eyes and muttering under his breath, Sorun tried changing the topic. "Okay, fine, speaking of Silver," he began, "what's his whole deal? I don't even mean the whole telekinesis thing. Powers, sure, it's whatever at this point, but how do you go from..." He almost asked him "how do you go from being a power-mad schemer to someone's caretaker?", but with his previous words Sorun already managed to figure that out on his own. Instead he asked, "Why'd you decide to look after him?"

"In this desolate, lifeless world, it seemed too cruel to abandon a helpless child," Mogul answered plainly. "A combination of me learning from the errors of my past, a desire to atone for my actions, and perhaps a chance at adding a bit of good in a world I'd fostered so much bad. Among other reasons I'm sure I'm not even aware of, and a small few I won't divulge to you. So between leaving a babe to die of exposure and raising him, yes, I took him in, formally educated, and trained him to the best of my abilities."

His mouth moved. It seemed impossible, but Sorun could have sworn that may just have been the smallest of smiles on his mouth. Or a wince. Hard to tell, really.

"..." Sorun wasn't sure of how he was supposed to respond to that at first. "He doesn't seem like you. At all," he pointed out.

Mogul made a "humph" sound. "I'm beginning to suspect that you don't think I sought repentance at all for my past deeds. I didn't indoctrinate the boy, as your accusing tone would insinuate. I taught him. That's the limit of my influence over him. That old Guardian he oft visits certainly colored his view some." Something shined in his eyes. Fondness, maybe? "And... perhaps some of him rubbed off on me. I'm not nearly as verbose as I once was in life."

"This is you at low-level verbosity?"

"Yes."

"... Alright." He would believe that much. About his use of words and actions with Silver. With how Silver's demeanor was a near polar opposite of Mogul, he'd be hard-pressed to think otherwise. "So what's his deal? Just trying to eke out an existence in this wasteland along with you?"

"Hardly," Mogul denied with a shake of his head. "Silver fancies himself... hm. 'Historian' is too strong a word, unbefitting. He oft spends his free time exploring, digging through old ruins. Seeking answers."

"Answers? To what?"

"The world before this. What happened and how it happened." Mogul paused, eyes pausing in his reading as if he was contemplating something. "It isn't immediately obvious, but the state of this world burdens him greatly. It's a burden that grew the more he learned of the old world, through either my words or Edmund's teachings or from whatever documents he managed to dig up. Either in the library here the old Guardian cares for or elsewhere when he explores."

Sorun looked back out into the dead, slanted city. "I mean, I'd be pretty upset, too, if I had to grow up here."

"Quite," Mogul agreed. "In that respect, Silver is like you, albeit in the barest of senses. He has a desire to fix this."

If he'd been building to that the entire time, Sorun would admit, he was hooked. Intrigued in all possible senses of the word. Part of him didn't want to dare to hope that the desire to fix this world actually had a foundation, to not be disappointed, but he couldn't help it. He'd latched right onto that sentence.

"And just how does he plan on 'fixing' all this?" Sorun asked him.

"... This world was once home to many objects whose depths of power were limitless," Mogul began. "The Chaos Emeralds, for instance. In this age they, as well as the Master Emerald, are gone, but you understand my meaning."

"They're gone?" Sorun asked, confused. "Where'd they go?"

"They're not here," was the only response Mogul chose to give Sorun. He chose not to pursue the topic. "But very few knew that other, similar objects existed. Objects labelled the Time Stones once existed, though all but one of them were lost." Mogul paused. "Silver has, in his possession, the sole remaining Time Stone in this universe."

Sorun's heart stilled. With a name like that... but it couldn't be true, could it? "And what," Sorun asked, swallowing despite having a dry mouth, "does the Time Stone do?"

"It allows its user to travel through time. Even backwards, if the user wished."

It was too good to be true. Sorun desperately hoped that wasn't the case. "But... but I thought that wasn't possible," he said, partly confused and partly hopeful. "You can't travel back in time because making changes in the past would break the whole zone, wouldn't it?"

"The Time Stone is unique in that any changes made to the past via traveling with the Time Stone retroactively reshapes the future," Mogul explained. "As such, the timeline is preserved, if not changed by use of the Time Stone."

"Aw, seriously?" With some annoyance, and a face full of disbelief, Sorun held the Yamato out. "I can't use Yamato to go to the past without incurring the wrath of horrible time paradoxes that would tear the zone apart, but this Time Stone thing gets a free pass? That's bull."

"It's by design ," Mogul said. "Would I be correct in assuming that sword's function was not intentionally designed to go through time?"

"No, I..." Sorun hedged, looking sheepish as he lowered his left arm, "well... kinda just used a loophole in its power to brute force my way through time travel."

A sigh left Mogul. He almost sounded annoyed. "As I thought," he rumbled out. "That sword is how you restored the timeline?"

Sorun nodded. "Needed the Master Emerald from the other timeline, but I made my way back here," he said. "Then there was white, and I woke up here. Still trying to figure out how that even happened."

"An impossibility in time caused by your meddling. Paradox, as you put it," Mogul asserted. "Fortunately enough it seems the only damage it incurred was correcting the fabric of space and time by wiping out that alternate timeline to preserve this one, likely through your own actions. It's not surprising such an... unstable method catapulted you here to this time by mistake," he explained. "You're fortunate this method even worked. It's miraculous you even survived the ordeal. But perhaps that was by design as well."

Sorun nodded at that, though with some hesitation at not understanding all his words. Even so, he wasn't feeling very lucky seeing as the world around him was the outcome. "So, Silver?" he pressed. "He wants to fix this? Un-apocalypse the world?"

Mogul's large eye ridges twitched, almost in pain at hearing the word "un-apocalypse" uttered. " Yes , quite," he replied in a clipped tone. "He's fully informed me of the breadth of his plan, and I've aided him in his pursuit by giving him whatever knowledge I can. He's been piecing as much information about the past as much as possible in order to be successful, but, regrettably, not much was recorded in regards to what happened it was so sudden."

"So Silver wants to go to the past and alter events so the world doesn't end." As far as goals went it sounded reasonable enough to Sorun. "And you're telling me this because...?"

"It was my assumption that you wanted to return to your rightful place in time. And, correct me if I'm wrong, but you'd rather not see the world in such a dismal state as this, correct?"

"No, Mogul, I am, in fact, not very pleased that I died a bunch of times and went through all these time shenanigans to save the world only for it to end up like this," Sorun said. "More than that I already lost one planet. Not gonna lose another. And it wouldn't be fair to all the effort everyone put in to saving it. It's an insult."

"Then go," Mogul suggested as he flipped a page. "As he is, Silver... quite frankly has absolutely no experience whatsoever when it comes to a world completely different from the one he grew up in. Words can only do so much to prepare him of an age of thriving civilizations. It's familiar territory to you, and he will have enough to worry about without being lost in it all."

Sorun didn't respond, unsure of what he should say. He wanted to prevent all this from happening, yes, but he also didn't want to fight to save the world anymore. He'd lost count of the amount of times he'd said he wanted to be done with it all only to end up being dragged back into the fray over and over. Didn't help nobody knew what even preventing all this entailed - assuming it was even doable.

But... he also didn't want to see the world end. Again. And since nobody else managed to do anything it seemed it was up to Silver. And Sorun if he chose to help out. And Mogul was really making it sound like Sorun should help out. And with his first impression of Silver, he wasn't sure he should leave the fate of the world in his hands alone.

He made his mind up.

"... I mean Silver seems like a capable enough guy. But since he's my ride back and I'll owe him one, I guess I'll help out. You know, for the world," Sorun said. "Where is he, anyways?"

To answer Sorun, Mogul lifted a hand and pointed in a direction - towards a far-off, leaning building that was largely intact compared to the ones around it. "Before civilization fell that building was a housing complex comprised of rental domiciles."

"You could have just said it's an apartment building, dude."

Very slightly, Mogul scowled. "As of late Silver has taken a pension for exploring such places for documentation to give further details of the past. Newspapers and journals and the like. I imagine he's there in preparation for his journey."

"Alright, great." With that, Sorun finally stood back up to his feet. After taking a moment to stretch his legs out to wake them back up, he looked back up at Mogul. "Well, I'm off then. To go back home and potentially save the world, because for some reason it keeps falling down to me. And, uh, hey, it sounds to me like you did a lot of raw stuff in the past, but you seem to be doing good now, so... yeah. Good on you." He flashed Mogul a thumbs-up.

"..."

"... I'm gonna go now," Sorun said. "Good luck with all this." He gestured to all the books surrounding the mammoth, and then turned to leave.

He made if halfway across the rooftop before Mogul spoke up.

"Wishing me good fortune is irrelevant, Sorun," Mogul called out. "I surrendered to the inevitability of it all long ago. It doesn't matter, in the end. None of it does."

Confused, Sorun turned back around to face the Mobian. "Whazzat s'pposed to mean?"

"Nothing of importance to you," he said. "Just try to remember on what I said. Not to engross yourself in something so deeply you lose sight of what truly matters."

"I'll try not to, I guess?" It came out as more of a question than Sorun intended, due to his sheer confusion over the words. He would have spoke further until he finally saw that look Mogul was giving Sorun. And for the first time since meeting him Sorun was finally able to figure out what that look was.

The look Mogul was giving Sorun held nothing but pity.

"Do have safe travels, Sorun. You and Silver both." And with that, he turned back down to his book. Sorun finally turned and left.

For the life of him Sorun didn't know what he did to warrant that look.

It took some time to get to the apartment building. Didn't look like one on the outside, too tall and not wide enough compared to apartment buildings Sorun was accustomed to back on Earth, but he saw it for what it was once he entered through the entranceway that lost its door. Check-in desk at the lobby, wall of mail boxes, small map that was halfway gone near the stairs.

He didn't know where Silver was, exactly, so Sorun just started going floor-by-floor while poking his head in random rooms. Some were gone completely, fallen away from the building and piled into debris on the ground below. Others largely intact, some even accessible because the doors were unlocked, broken, or just gone completely. He might've even taken some time to explore them if he wasn't in such a rush to get to Silver.

It was just his luck he happened to be on one of the upper floors. Sorun had found him when he'd poked his head into an apartment's living room, seeing the white hedgehog surrounded by papers and notebooks. He didn't even notice Sorun had entered until he'd cleared his throat, causing the Mobian to jump a bit and drop the journal he'd been holding in his hand.

"Yo," Sorun greeted, giving him a small wave. "I calmed down, talked with Mogul. We, um, we gotta talk about some stuff, man."

"Er... yeah, I'd like that." He looked almost relieved that Sorun wanted to talk, and gestured towards a nearby couch that still seemed to be in one piece. They sat down next to each other, Sorun leaning back on the couch to be as relaxed as possible while Silver was hunched forwards, hands clasped together as he thought, a foot tapping nervously.

Finally, Silver looked towards Sorun. "So you're really from the past?" he asked, eagerly.

"Yyyyep," Sorun answered.

"Okay, like- like how far? Master mentioned the Freedom Fighters, did you- he was talking about the Freedom Fighters, right!?"

"As far as I'm aware," Sorun answered again, waving his right hand in a circle. "I hung around them for a while."

"Oh my goodness, this is huge. This is amazing!" Silver'd gone from being nervous to being incredibly excited. Enough that he was slightly bouncing up and down while sitting on the couch. Sorun would believe he was vibrating. "Sorun, this changes everything!"

"Cool?" Sorun leaned up a bit so that he was sitting straight, finding it hard to keep looking towards Silver's white smile without being blinded. "I- it's cool you're happy an' all, but what's so important?"

"YOU!" Silver shouted, startling Sorun some. "I've been going left and right trying to get as much as I could to piece together some kind of picture so I had an idea of what I was getting into, but if you're from there then-!" He paused abruptly, and then gave Sorun a questioning look. "Wait, what are you even doing in the future, anyways?"

"I don't even know where to start with that one," Sorun told him. "Um... like, it's a lot, dude. I'm not even supposed to be in this zone technically."

"You're not?" Silver tilted his head a bit to the side. "Why? What happened with your zone?"

"Dunno about that universe as a whole, but my planet? Dead. Lot like this one," Sorun said. Silver flinched at that, and his smile dropped off completely in place of a sympathetic look. "Yeah, I don't even know why it died. I came to this zone, stayed a while, and when I tried going back found out it was gone so I just stayed. It's... it's not really related to why I'm here specifically, tell you later if you really wanna know, but it's part of why I'm really interested in your whole 'fix the future' plan. 'Cause this-" he waved a hand out towards a nearby window, "- this ain't cool." He leaned closer to Silver. "That's what you're doing, right?"

"Oh, uh, right. Yeah, yeah that's right." The saddened expression Silver held lightened up, and his ears perked up as he began to explain. "It's just... we have the Time Stone, and we could go back and fix this. Make it so the world never ended up, you know, like this." He nodded his head towards the same window Sorun pointed to earlier. "People would be alive, the world wouldn't be dead, my parents... I mean maybe I could finally meet my parents," he mumbled out. "And other stuff, I don't know. What did people back then even do, Sorun?"

It was too broad a question for Sorun to answer adequately, so he just shrugged. "Stuff?"

"Stuff," Silver repeated in a morose tone. "Yeah, I'd like to do stuff. Not the stuff I've been doing all my life, but... you get it."

"Yeah, I get it. I'm not exactly thrilled with how the world turned out either, Silver," Sorun said. "Believe me, I wanna fix it just as much as you do. It's all I've been doing is trying to fix the world."

Silver smiled at that. A small, easy smile that made him sag with relief as he gave Sorun a hopeful look. "Right, so... the thing is, I don't really know much about the past. Well, Master's told me a bunch and I've been reading some, but I haven't... it'd be really new for me," he explained. "So... you know, if you want to save the world as much as I do, well, er, you know your way around so maybe you could...?"

"You're going back two hundred years, right?" Sorun asked.

Silver nodded. "Yeah, two hundred exactly."

"Well you're in luck, Silver, because that just so happens to be when I need to go back," Sorun told him.

Silver smiled wider. "That's great!" The smile dimmed. "There's just, ah, one little thing."

Before he could ask what the hedgehog meant, Silver began digging into one of his gloves. He removed an object from the inner folds: something that fit in his hand and was glowing an intense orange color. He held it out for Sorun to see, who leaned in with interest as he peered down at the item in Silver's palm.

He almost mistook it for a Chaos Emerald, except the color was wrong as well as the shape. Where normal Chaos Emerald were shaped in the class round diamond shape, this gem was square in shape. Much like how a classic normal emerald would look, Sorun had considered with some amusement. Other than the shape and color it looked about the same: an orange gem pulsing with orange power.

But... there was something off about it, as well. It seemed dim, somehow, and its entire surface was marred with cracks, some pieces of its surface even chipped off. Like it'd been run over or dropped a bunch of times. Damaged. It made an unsure feeling pop up in Sorun, who glanced up at Silver with a quirked eyebrow.

"Looks busted," he observed, making Silver sigh and pull his arm back.

"Yeah, we don't know why. We found it like this," Silver said. "Master or Edmund could never figure out why, but somehow it got damaged. It's still good, in a sense that it works." There was an uncomfortable pause. "Once."

Sorun's face grew flat. "It's one and done."

"Yeah, as best as Master and I figure, it's gonna break completely after a single use."

"... Okay but you put a bit of practice into using it, right?"

"Sorun, I just told you it's gonna break after we use it."

"Fair point, fair point." A small, steadying breath left Sorun. "How confident are you about using it?" Because he didn't want something like Silver making a mistake and blasting them back too far or not far enough or something else. Not after he'd come this far. His heart couldn't take it all ending because of a stupid mistake like that.

The look Silver gave him, however, told Sorun that Silver was sure. "I've been training real hard with Master to make sure I get this right. Both with this and my powers," he said. "They help with using it. I'm telling you I can do this." He looked down a bit. "It's just... well, this is the only way back, you know? And if it breaks... sure, I'll save the future, but I'd be stuck in the past." His shoulders fell. "I guess I'd still be happy, but... well, I wouldn't be able to see Master again. Or Edmund. Or my parents, maybe other family I don't know about that'd come back. It's part of why I've been kind of dragging my feet on this, because I don't have a way back."

Sorun nodded. Made enough sense - more than enough sense, even. A large part of why he'd gone with setting the timeline back to normal was because of the people he'd lost. His... new family. He could understand how hollow a victory it'd be to save the future if Silver didn't even get to enjoy it afterwards. Hell, he sort of felt it right now with everything that'd happened.

The weight resting in Sorun's left hand offered him an answer, though.

"This day of yours just keeps getting luckier, Silver." When the hedgehog gave him a questioning look, Sorun held Yamato out.

"'Cause I got this."

Silver blinked. "Okay." He blinked again. "How does that help?"

" This is how I managed to even get here in the first place," Sorun answered him as he shook it. "It's a super cool sword that can do super cool things, bypassing time among them. I can't send things backwards without inviting horrible consequences, it's not the same as the Time Stone, but I'm pretty sure I can still send stuff forwards without anything bad happening." Made sense in a logical way of thinking. Couldn't cause a time paradox by just going forwards, right? At that point it was just time acceleration with a few less steps.

"So," Sorun proposed, "here's what I'm thinking. You use the Time Stone to send us back, and we undo whatever it is that caused the world to end. And once it's done, once we are a hundred percent sure we did it and the future is safe and secure, I'll just use the Yamato to send you forwards in time back home. It'll be one-way, but, well, them's the breaks." He lowered Yamato into his lap. "So what do you think?"

He could see the gears in Silver's head turning. The idea had merit, and indeed if they went through with this it meant Silver had a viable way of going back once the problem was solved. And though he seemed excited by the prospect, there was still a hint of hesitation in his face. "Yeah, but... b-but we don't even know how long this is gonna take. It could be weeks, months, maybe even years! And I don't know anything about living in the past, I don't know where'd I'd go in the meantime and what I'm supposed to-"

"Dude, just come live with me," Sorun deadpanned.

Silver went completely still. His eyes went wide. "Seriously?" he asked in a quiet, disbelieving voice. "For real? You'd do that for me?"

"I mean, I got a guest room at my house. Nobody else is using it. Might as well be you." Sorun gave a shrug. "It's not really a bother, and you're cool enough."

"Oh." Despite still looking somewhat shocked Silver appeared happy at the offer. "W-well, uh, geez, Sorun, that's... that's really great. Thank you, really. I'd be glad to if you'll have me" He turned away from Sorun when his eyes became glossy. "Sorry, I didn't mean... w-well, you're just a really nice friend, you know?"

"I'm throwing him out on the streets if he tries to hug me." He didn't fortunately, though Sorun was still ready to fend him away in case Silver tried. He sort of looked like he wanted to, though, a prospect which deeply frightened Sorun. He quickly tried to shift to a different topic to avoid this. "So," Sorun quickly said, "what are we actually working with towards the whole 'save the future' thing?"

"Hm? Oh!" Bolting up a bit straighter, Silver seemed to remember something and bent down. There was a leatherbound journal resting near his feet that the hedgehog picked up, and then sat back up straight while showing it to Sorun. "The latest info I've gotten is from the contents of this journal I found in Edmund's library. Lot of the pages were missing, though. Or destroyed. Some water damage, too." Silver looked at the journal with squinting eyes. "Penmanship's kina hard to read too, actually."

He opened the journal up to a random page and showed it to Sorun. The human tried reading the contents, but already he could tell that he wouldn't be able to read anything at a single glance.

"Oh, yeah, this got written in a really girly cursive font. Kinda familiar, actually, but I can't place it." He looked up from the journal and at Silver. "And what else?"

"Right, well..." Silver opened up the journal and began skimming the pages. "In terms of what actually happened to end the world, we... don't really have anything. I don't even know when it really happened, just when it started: sometime two hundred years ago."

"So it was a long process, or...?"

Silver shook his head. "No idea. I just know some threat showed up two hundred years ago to cause all this."

"Hm." Sorun gave a short nod. "So we know a bit of the when, but not the how, why, what, or where. Do we got a who?"

"That's actually our biggest clue," Silver informed him. "According to what the Master told me, and it's corroborated by some of the things in this journal, it was a traitor in the Freedom Fighters that caused all this."

Sorun's mind came to a screeching halt.

A traitor. In the Freedom Fighters. The same ones he was acquainted with. All of his friends. One of them caused the end of the world and the desolation he only needed to look out a window to see. One of his friends caused the extinction of planet Mobius.

He didn't believe that.

"You're mistaken," Sorun said, voice firm.

Silver looked a bit taken back by Sorun's tone. "Sorun, I'm pretty sure-"

"You're wrong. The journal's wrong. Mogul's wrong." He shook his head. His grip on Yamato tightened, his anger flaring at the mere idea one of them caused all this. It was a ludicrous idea. Ridiculous. There was absolutely no way, zero way whatsoever, this was all one of their doing. He knew them too well to know it was impossible. None of them would even consider harming the planet for any reason.

"Then how do you explain what the journal says, Sorun?" Silver asked. "It says that a member of the Freedom Fighters, the same Freedom Fighters that helped free the world from whoever this Eggman is, whatever an egg even is, turned traitor. Master Mogul said this same traitor is directly responsible for causing the end of the world. I don't have much more than that because of how damaged the journal is." He flipped through some of the pages, and then stopped at a place. "The only detail it describes," he said, gloved finger running down a page, "is that it was a red-eyed Freedom Fighter that did it."

The anger and disbelief Sorun was feeling shifted into confusion. "Come again?" he asked.

"Yeah, says right here. Red-eyed Freedom Fighter," Silver repeated. He looked up at Sorun. "Can't be many like that, right? Maybe you could point them out to me?"

"Well, there's a serious problem with that, Silver."

"What's that?"

"There were no red-eyed Freedom Fighters."

Now Silver looked confused. "What? No, that... that can't be right." He went back to flipping through the journal's pages again. "None of them, really? Not this Bunnie person it mentions a lot?"

"Nope."

"Rotor, Tails, the guy who became the king, Sonic? The queen Sally?"

"No, uh-huh, nadda, none of them," Sorun said, shaking his head. "... Hey, am I in there?"

"Nah, I don't think... no, nothing," Silver said with a shake of his head after flipping through the journal once more.

An admittedly large part of Sorun was disappointed to hear that, and his head dipped a bit as a result. He'd figure him stabbing a god a bunch of times would only get a footnote in history, but not even that? With him making multiple sacrifices that cost him his life that quite literally saved the whole planet he should have at least got a whole page for that alone. He felt insulted.

"Maybe you're in the missing pages, I don't know," Silver informed him. He still seemed troubled by the earlier detail Sorun mentioned about the red eyes, and looked up at him. "There seriously isn't a single one of them that has red eyes?"

Sorun cupped his chin in thought. "I don't think so, no. Sonic and Amy had green, Tails and Sally had blue... actually, I'm not even sure I know anyone with red eyes. Knuckles had purple, Charmy had yellow, Vector had yellow, Espio had yellow, Honey's are more of a gold than yellow, that one guy Razor I met had yellow... man, I know a lot of people with yellow eyes." Sorun glanced up at Silver, who blinked his yellow eyes at him. "It's spreading."

"Sorun, this is serious!"

"Alright, alright." He went back to thinking. "Nah, I'm not getting anybody." He thought harder. "Well, except Shadow, I guess."

Silver made a loud gasp.

"Nope, no no, it ain't him," Sorun instantly denied, shaking his head roughly. "Nope, no way, I already went through the whole evil Shadow thing. It ain't him."

"But if he has red eyes-!"

"Silver, he's not even a Freedom Fighter," Sorun informed him, making the hedgehog back down. "He's this weird secret agent guy for the Overlander government. He did some joint work with the Freedom Fighters back when I was with them, but that was it. He wasn't actually a member."

"Alright, then it isn't him. Master made it pretty clear it was a Freedom Fighter." Silver flipped through a few more pages, but evidently didn't find more when he made a dismayed sound. "You really don't know anyone else with red eyes?"

"Other than him, no. And Eggman, with his weird black and red eyes, but I don't even need to tell you it ain't him. He's the exact opposite of a Freedom Fighter. He's a... Oppression Offender or something, I dunno."

Disappointment reigned over Silver's features. His shoulders fell, and a long sigh left him as he gazed at the journal's pages. "It doesn't make any sense, though. This is the biggest lead I have, and it's wrong?"

Sorun's mind went to work. "to be fair, 'traitor' doesn't really tell us a lot, because that could mean anything," he argued.

"I don't really see how that makes any sense."

"I don't know, man, it could be a number of things. Maybe somebody got brainwashed and it caused their eyes to turn red, or mind controlled, or it was an evil clone or robot doppelganger, an imposter, something along those lines." As Sorun rattled off possibilities Silver began to look up at him with wide eyes. "Geez, we don't even know who wrote that journal, so for all we know they were mistaken with something or some important detail was lost. You're seriously gonna put all your trust in an incomplete journal you just randomly found?"

"Wow, I... I didn't think about any of that!" The way Silver looked at him, he seemed almost amazed at Sorun. He was practically beaming at the Earthling with those bright eyes of his. "Sorun, you must be some kind of genius or something!"

The compliment did wonders for his ego, and Sorun found himself preening heavily under Silver's praise. "Ah, well, it's nothing too special, just some anime and video game logic," he said, rubbing his knuckles against his chest as a smile grew. "But the fact is," he continued, face turning back serious, "the only thing we have to go on is your master's word and a unreliable source of information that isn't even complete, Silver. I'm not a detective and even I know that's not nearly enough."

Silver's features tightened. He looked like he wanted to argue, but didn't seem to be able to come up with anything. He slumped in defeat instead and dropped the journal. "You might be right," he admitted. "So what do we do?"

"Well, seeing as we have almost nothing to work with and don't actually know what we're doing..." Sorun made a short hum, and then nodded. "Yeah, I say we do nothing."

"..." Silver stared.

"What?"

"The future's depending on us, and nothing will change if we do nothing... so you want us to do nothing even though we want to save everyone," Silver said, flattening his hands so they were parallel with each other and bouncing them up and down with each point he made. "I'm really hearing that from you?"

"Well yeah, sure, we're gonna do something when something pertinent to the situation pops up, kind of have to address it at some point, but we don't know what we're addressing, when it'll show up, in what form, how to prepare for it, practically nothing unless this traitor thing of yours is legit. Which it probably isn't," Sorun said. "But, like, until then there's literally nothing we can do but just kinda wait around for something to happen. So we'll just do that and improvise along the way."

"The future's riding on us and you wanna wing it!?"

"Dude, you wouldn't believe how far winging it has carried me."

By now Silver looked like he wanted to tear some of his fur out. It wasn't out of frustration for Sorun, though. There was a flicker of understanding on his face, and after a few moment he slumped forwards in defeat with a sigh. "Yeah, I guess you're right," he mumbled. "It just seems kind of reckless, though, doesn't it?"

"Well, there's nothing to do about it." It was incredibly reckless, but they were in the weeds, as it were. With all the nothing they had at their disposal the wait-and-see approach was really all they had going for them. Even Sorun hated the idea, except for the part where it didn't sound like it required much work, but he couldn't think of a better alternative. "So does that about sum up our plan? Or the lack of one? Go back to the past, do thing, save future, bunch of question marks thrown in? Profit?"

Silver opened his mouth a small bit and squinted a bit. "What?"

"Uh, we're good? Nothing else to talk about, go over? We're set to leave?"

He gave Sorun a nod. "Er, about as could be, I guess."

Grinning, Sorun slapped his knees and rose up off the couch in a standing position. "Well then pack your bags, Silver my man," he said, turning to the hedgehog, "'cause we gotta go back, back to the past, Samurai Jack."

"Again, what?" Silver repeated.

The grin left Sorun's face, and small, stuttering breath left him. "Just... how long until we can go?"

"Huh? What do you mean? We can go right now."

"Right now?" Sorun repeated in surprise. "Like, 'right now' right now? So soon?"

Silver stood up off the couch. "I don't really think soon is a thing with time travel."

"Probably not but, but I mean don't you wanna go say goodbye to Mogul or something?"

"Oh! Yeah, good call." Silver stood up off the couch, and then closed his eyes. After that he just continued to stand there, eyes closed with a slight look of concentration on his face as Sorun gave him an odd look. Before Sorun could make the motion to wave in front of his face he opened his eyes. "Okay, we're good. Let's go."

Sorun blinked a couple of times. He pointed at Silver. "So do you have a telepathy thing going on, or what?"

"Yeah, we- oh, you mean me. No, that's Master's ability. I can't, er..." Silver made a small grin, and began wiggling his fingers around his head. Then he stopped while looking a bit embarrassed. "Or, well, I do have mind powers, but they're not very good and kinda make me sick and-"

"You can only affect physical things, got it," Sorun finished. Silver gave him a grateful nod at the short explanation. "Mogul say anything important?"

"Erm, just goodbye. Safe travels and all that. We talked a bit about this beforehand," he confessed. He cupped his hands together, the orange gem resting in the center. "So... yeah," he said, quietly. "This is it. We're going right now."

"Uh, cool." A second of silence passed where Sorun rubbed the back of his head. "I was joking about the 'pack your bags' thing, but seriously is there anything you wanna bring with us? Memento, toothbrush? Anything?"

Silver shook his head. "No, I'm good." He looked up at Sorun. "What's a toothbrush?"

"God." Sorun lifted a hand and rubbed at his eyes. "Maybe Mobians have freakishly strong enamel or something. Who am I kidding, I'm gonna have to take this guy to a dentist when we get back. Quack does teeth, right? He sets bones. Teeth are basically just bones on the outside, practically no difference-"

"If you're talking about the tooth thing I do where I go like this-" Silver said, dragging Sorun from his thoughts. He took his hand away from his face and saw Silver hovering his index finger around his teeth. There was a teal glow around it, "- then yeah, I'm good. Master was... weirdly insistent about self-appearance and grooming techniques raising me. Especially teeth." He hovered his hand over the side of his mouth and leaned in closer. "I think it's because of the tusks he has. He's really sensitive over them," he whispered.

It was a unique person that could make Sorun feel so relieved and at the same time want to strangle them for making him worry so much. "... Silver, just... just do the thing with the crystal already."

Silver nodded. He looked down at the gem in his hands at the same time a glow started to emanate from the object. Soft, translucent coronas of orange, blue, and teal colors began to pulse out from the damaged gem, and a soft, orangish-yellow glow began to spread up his arms.

"Well, alright. Here we go. we're really doing this." Silver's voice sounded higher and more nervous than normal, and he'd made a gulp. "Um, you're gonna wanna grab onto my wrist so you come with me, Sorun. Or, you know, my shoulder. Anywhere on me, really, actually just go ahead and do whatever you're comfortable with-"

Without a word Sorun stepped to Silver's side and loudly clapped his shoulder with his right hand, and then squeezed tight. Silver winced a bit at the force used, but said nothing as he continued working on the Time Stone.

The pulses of light shining out of the gem began picking up in frequency. The orange-yellow glow by now had completely covered both Sorun and Silver, bathing them both in its glow as the gem brightened up the entire room, enough that it was too bright for Sorun to even see Silver's hands. He felt a small buzz humming through his body, like a current being run through him. And then, suddenly, there was a bright light that engulfed both Silver and Sorun.

And then they were gone.

A/N- Small changes to cannon here and there. If you're in the know with the comic lore you know, if not don't worry about it.

Chapter 85

A/N- A little hard confirmation from the author here, but in case there were any lingering doubts the alternate timeline really is gone forever. As in it really was obliterated and we're never, ever going back to it. That is all.

Yeah, I know that aside from the mental toll Sorun accrued erasing all the consequences he committed in that zone goes against what I'm going for here in this story, but that section in particular was always more for showing off the changes in Sorun's character and a vehicle to get to this point more than anything else, among other things.

Recursion Error

Episode 85- Not-So-Lonesome Road

The nice thing about time traveling with Silver and his mystic nonsense rock was how easy it turned out to be. No falling flat on his face after going through to the other side. No tumbling through portals. Not the sheer insanity of falling through whatever the hell that space had been when Sorun traveled back through time using the Yamato.

Nope. None of that with the Time Stone, apparently. Just a quick flash of light, a small buzzing sensation, and both Sorun and Silver were left standing in the same position they had been, with Sorun only feeling the sensation of light movement. It was truly refreshing, and he had half a mind to breath in a deep sigh.

The feeling was torn away from him when he looked around at where they were.

"..." Sorun blinked a few times to make sure he wasn't seeing things, but unfortunately the sight remaining the same even when he was done blinking. They were... he didn't even know where this was. An infinite, boundless space of soft blues, lavenders, and whites as far as the eye could see. No ground, no sky, no sun or stars, no anything. Not even any wind. Just an infinite space of these intermingling colors.

This was most certainly not Mobius.

"Hey, Silver." Sorun turned his head at the hedgehog, who was looking down at his palm. "Silver. Silver, hey. Hey. Hey, Silver." He began poking the Mobian with the tip of his sheathed sword. "Silver. Silver. Silver. This isn't Mobius. Silver what's going on. Silver. Hey. Silver."

Silver's other hand reached out and grabbed the covered blade before it could poke him again. "Please stop that," he requested, eyes still focused down on his open palm. The remains of the Time Stone were lying in his hand, orange glow completely faded and dull, the gem itself fragmented to pieces and its luster all but gone. He slowly turned his hand over to drop the fragments, and as they fell away they turned to dust and scattered away before they even reached his feet.

"Well, that's that," Silver said after a small sigh. "Time Stone's done."

"That's great and all, Silver, but there's the small matter of us being in the middle of what looks like nowhere-"

"Yeah, I know, Sorun, give me a minute." He let go of the sword, and Sorun, obliging the request, chose not to jab him again with it. A small, thoughtful frown overtook Silver's features as he examined their surroundings, and after a minute he made another sigh. "Yeah, I see what happened. This might be a bit of a problem."

A tinge of worry grew in Sorun. "How small's a bit?"

"It's... not too huge," Silver assured Sorun, though he still looked a bit worried. "I guess the Time Stone got a bit wonky since it was so damaged. I can tell you for a fact we did go back two hundred years, that's not the problem. It just... kind of screwed up on the location. Master warned me this might happen."

Sorun allowed himself to relax a bit. If it was just a matter of location then it wasn't nearly as bad as he'd hoped. Location they could do. Time was when it got tricky. "Okay, alright, so where are we?" the Earthling asked.

"Hmm..." Humming, Silver took another quick glance around. "Looks like we got sent to the world between worlds."

"The world between worlds," Sorun flatly repeated.

"Mhm. The world between worlds. The empty space in the multiverse where all the other zones reside," he explained. "Which means," he continued, looking down, "this... must be the Cosmic Interstate Highway! The highway that connects every single zone in the multiverse!"

"Wait, what?" Sorun looked down at his feet, and then nearly jumped in shock. The thing they were standing on was... it really was just a normal road one would see on a highway. Black paved asphalt with two yellow lines running through its center. When Sorun looked up the road seemed to go on for forever. Or at least as far as he could see.

Looking closer, he actually saw more of the road in the distance. For as far as his eyes allowed he saw the road winding everywhere, in a myriad of twists and turns and straights, branching off in seemingly infinite directions, so far away that, to Sorun's perception, it seemed impossibly thin.

"What in the... it's an actual, legitimate highway? I thought that name was just a metaphor," Sorun whispered in disbelief. "Who the hell built a highway that spans a whole multiverse? Where would you even get the resources to build...? Sheesh, and I thought a Dyson Sphere would be an impossible thing to build, but shit, nothing's ever gonna top this."

"Well, duh. Of course the Cosmic Interstate Highway is a highway," Silver said, looking at Sorun like he'd just said something incredibly stupid. "What else would it be?"

The shocked, awed look Sorun had held was swapped out with a blank look as he met Silver's eyes. "... You know what, Silver, I really don't know," Sorun said before turning forwards. "So we just got shunted out of our own zone and onto the, uh, the highway?"

"Yeah, looks like it," Silver said with a nod. "... It shouldn't be too difficult to find our way back," he said after a moment's hesitation. "We just gotta follow the road back."

"Yeah, follow the multiverse-spanning road with an infinite number of branching directions, piece of cake," Sorun agreed, flatly. They both turned to look at each other. Silver had a nervous grin on his face while Sorun's own expression remained blank. "Silver, we at least know what zone we're supposed to make our way towards, right?" a hopeful Sorun asked.

The relief he felt when Silver nodded was overflowing. "Yeah, of course. Master Mogul taught me all about this kind of stuff." He looked back out into the infinite expanse. "Our proper zone- er, well, my proper zone, your... anyway, the zone we're shooting for is the Prime Zone."

"Huh. Sounds important," Sorun noted.

"It should. Master Mogul says that our planet is called Mobius Prime, since it's in the Prime Zone, prime meaning it's the zone all other zones are based off of," Silver explained, making Sorun's eyebrows rise. "You could say it's the first universe to ever exist inside the multiverse in that respect. All other zones in the multiverse branch off of that universe. It's the original."

Sorun couldn't even find it in himself to be that surprised. "Yeah, of course that place is the literal center of the multiverse," he grumbled under his breath. Somehow it made all the insane things that happened there seem more sane when put in that light.

Weird to think, though, because that meant even his own zone and Earth was an offshoot possibility of Mobius Prime in the infinite expanse of worlds and possibilities they found themselves in. Probably should have figured; there was a Statue of Liberty there, after all, and the geography was roughly similar. Then again Sorun's zone was so special it didn't even have a connection to the Cosmic Interstate Highway and no connection with the Chaos Force, so... who even really knew what the deal with that was? A cosmic fluke like Finitevus had hypothesized?

Eh. Sorun didn't care enough to dwell on it.

"Alright, well, if the universe we're aiming for is the centermost universe, then all we gotta do is follow the road back to it, right?" Sorun asked. "Theoretically speaking all the roads should lead back to it since it's so important, shouldn't they?"

"I mean, maybe? Can't really say," Silver admitted with a shrug. "I guess we should just get walking and see where the Highway takes us. Maybe we'll find a sign or something along the way."

"A sign. Right," Sorun muttered out with a roll of his eyes. Nonetheless, he fell in and began walking behind Silver. "So how far away do you reckon the Prime Zone is, anyways?"

"I dunno. Could be the next zone we run into, or it could be a few billion lightyears away."

All the breath left Sorun in a loud, wheezy gasp, and he'd stumbled so much he nearly fell flat on his face.

"Welp, guess we better get moving!" Silver proclaimed loudly, sounding awful chipper as he continued walking down the road.

"..." With a defeated groan, Sorun began following Silver again. "Silvs, wait up."

Sorun never expected to grow a liking to Silver so quickly as the both of them traversed an infinite interdimensional highway. He didn't know what to expect, really - the guy seemed decent; Sorun would go as far as to say charming with that "naïve, clueless traveler" vibe he gave off, no doubt due to his lack of contact with modern civilization or people that didn't talk like a living thesaurus. The way he'd flounder here and there and get embarrassed over little things.

More than that he was nice enough to talk to. Pleasant beyond normal standards, really, though Sorun couldn't tell if he was naturally nice or if Mogul raising him to be polite had a hand in it. Nature versus nurture was an argument never really solved, though in the end it mattered little when the end result was Silver was a nice person to talk to. And hey, to Sorun it mattered even less, because the hedgehog really grew on him. Maybe their personalities just meshed that well. Maybe Sorun was glad to finally have a friend he could relate with, what with the whole dead world thing. Glad to talk to someone he could be happy to talk to.

Maybe it was because Silver didn't have that little label that said "this person is directly complicit in abducting me from my world" hanging over his head like most of his other friends.

Whatever the case, Sorun quickly grew to like him. More than he'd expected given the short time they'd known one another. And when the two of them found themselves traversing a road of infinite length to a destination of dubious length, which Sorun was going to colossal lengths trying to ignore, they had little else to do but talk.

"- Wow, so you couldn't talk about it at all?" Silver asked Sorun with widened eyes. "Like, not anything? Words, writing, nothing worked?"

"Yeah, it wasn't a fun time," Sorun said. He'd unconsciously rose a hand to his throat while regaling Silver with his own origin story since he got the gist of Silver's. Only seemed fair. "I tried so many ways of getting around it, man, but Aurora was really thorough with that curse. As such I was very thorough with the suplex I gave her later on. Among other things," he grumbled out.

"Wasn't that kind of mean, though? Beating them up?"

"Silver, I had a lot of stress at the moment."

"Sounds to me like being a Freedom Fighter in general was stressful."

"I retired for a very good reason," Sorun agreed with a nod. "Honestly, it still kind of freaks me out that I can put 'retired Freedom Fighter' on my resumé now."

Silver gave him a quizzical look. "How come?"

"The term 'freedom fighter' had a very different connotation back where I come from," Sorun answered. "Lot less, uh... campy than the experience I had." By a wide margin. Nothing he could ever tell the others, of course, because the details of that fell in the category of horrible shit from Earth Sorun would never speak about on Mobius.

"So your world was under siege by an insane tyrant, too?" Silver gasped out. "Wow, this must be more common than I thought."

Sorun almost laughed out, but then shook his head. "Nah, nothing like that. It's just humanity was all alone over there without any other sapient species, so we had to fight the only other thing there was to fight: ourselves."

"Huh?" Silver didn't seem to understand that. "I don't get it."

"Yeah, I don't really get it, either."

Silver accepted that answer, though he still looked a bit puzzled. "So what was life over there like, anyways?"

"..."

"Hey, Sorun, did you hear?"

Sorun looked up from the textbooks on his desk and at Dave, who was crouching besides his seat. "Hear what?"

"Y'know Marty?"

"That annoying fucking prick always going on and on about sports collectors cards? Had that giant binder full of them?"

"Yeah, him. Somebody robbed his house. He got stabbed and sent to the hospital."

"Oh." Certainly explained why he wasn't at school today. "Well, that sucks." A pause. "We still on for 'Ace Combat 7' multiplayer this weekend?"

Dave nodded. "Mhm, but we gotta invite Jamie to the lobby."

"Jesus fu- why- what the fuck, man, why'd you invite him?"

"What do you mean, why? We needed a third and I thought you liked playing with him?"

"I do 'cause he's a decent pilot in that game, but for fuck's sake, Dave, he's a plane nut. He goes on and on about technical specs for obscure plane shit I'm never gonna retain when all I wanna do is fly the planes I think look cool and have good performance."

"Hence why you fly a Berkut."

"Hence why I fly a Berkut," Sorun agreed. "You fuckin' F-22 main."

With a chuckle, Dave shook his head. "You're just hating because it's a better plane."

"It is not a better plane. I have a K/D ratio with the Berkut that says it is not a better plane."

"Okay, well, if we're basing which is better on that alone-"

"Dave it's too mainstream a plane and it doesn't even look that cool."

"What do you mean not cool? It's the most advanced-looking-"

"Not compared to the ADF-"

"I'm not talking about the fake sci-fi planes in the game, I'm talking about real-world-"

"F-22 doesn't have cool backwards wings, case closed."

"Listen here you little shit-"

A wistful smile had grown on Sorun's face as he contemplated Silver's question. "It was a pretty cool world," he said after a long moment of silence. "I mean, not everywhere, but my town was alright. Most of the time. Usually. If you ignored the bad parts."

"Um... so it wasn't so good?"

"It was home, Silver, and nothing's perfect."

"What you told me sounds significantly worse than a little less than perfect."

"I don't wanna hear this from the guy who until recently was living in the apocalypse."

"..."

"..."

"... Master Mogul told me Mobius' history, so technically speaking we're all living in a-"

" Post- post-apocalypse, big difference," Sorun argued. "Apocalypse would imply the complete collapse of civilization due to some major catastrophe. That's you and the future. Post-apocalypse implies the disaster passed and the survivors are picking up the pieces to restart civilization. Post-post-apocalypse is the complete reconstruction of civilization after the catastrophe that knocked out the world. That's the state Mobius was in before whatever happened destroyed the future, which we're trying to prevent," he explained. "So no, Silver, we are not living in the apocalypse. Assuming we ever find our way off of this road, how far to Mobius Prime, anyways?"

Silver, who had been paying rapt attention to Sorun's explanation, gave him a shrug. "I don't know. Maybe that sign ahead will help."

"Sign? What sign?" Following the direction Silver was pointing, Sorun saw what the hedgehog was referring to. He became bewildered at the sight. "What even...?"

There was, in fact, a sign at the end of an oncoming three way junction, the road stopping and going left and right. And posted at the head of the junction was a normal road sign in the form of two white arrows, each pointing down a different direction the road was going. And each sign had words printed on them in big, blocky letters, what Sorun assumed to be the destinations each road lead to. But the words themselves confused him immensely. They stopped in front of the sign, with Sorun reading the signs aloud.

"Rainbow Moon Paradise Zone..." Sorun read off the left arrow, eyes squinting as he moved on to the right arrow, "and... Mystery Noir Zone. What just came out of my mouth?"

"I think these are the names of nearby zones. Like how our zone is the Prime Zone," Silver supplied as he looked at the signs.

"Okay, but why are they named like this and not, I don't know, really long and complicated serial numbers or something?"

Silver shrugged. "I dunno. I guess you'd have to ask whoever's making these signs and roads."

"And who would that be?"

Again, Silver shrugged, eliciting an annoyed sigh from Sorun.

"Okay, you know what, whatever, doesn't matter." Sorun turned back to the sign. "So we got a road that leads into something that sounds like it came straight out of 'Sailor Moon', and another one that leads to something that come straight out of 'L.A. Noir'. I dunno about you, Silver, but one of these sounds really appealing and the other one doesn't."

Silver turned away from the sign to look at Sorun. "You wanna visit one of these zones?" he asked. "Why?"

"'Cause... you know, maybe they know the way back?"

A fair amount of doubt settled on Silver's face. "Sorun, the way Master talked about it, zones aren't really common knowledge. I really doubt we're gonna meet someone that actually knows the directions we need just by popping into random zones."

"Yeah, but come on, the alternative is we keep walking on this road potentially forever, and I'm gonna be real honest with you here, Silver, I don't know if I have that kind of patience." Not only that but Sorun was starving and they didn't pack any food. And he didn't know when the last time was that Silver ate. And slim as it may have been, there was an off chance somebody actually knew the way back.

Plus, well... the concept of traveling to different universes sounded cool. Just a bit. And they were already here and lost so it wasn't like it could hurt that much.

"I guess..." Silver hesitantly agreed. He bit down on his lower lip and turned back to the signs. "So we're going left?"

Sorun did a double-take on Silver. "What? No. I wanna go to the noir place."

"But... but you said one was appealing and one wasn't."

"Yeah, I was talking about- Silver, one sounds like it has crime and gritty mysteries and the other one is... is rainbows and moons. And we're guys." It should have been an obvious pick. He didn't see what the problem here was.

But evidently there was a problem, because it looked like Silver disagreed with Sorun. Heavily. Enough that, with a disgruntled look on his face, Silver looked down to kick at his feet all defeated-like. "I don't know why you want to go to a place that sounds like it's filled with crime, but fine. Not like I wanted to see the cool rainbow zone anyways."

Seeing the look of slight disappointment on Silver's face had brought on unwanted feelings in Sorun. Mostly feelings that made him feel bad and feel like a jerk. So after mentally cursing at himself and making a quick decision, he asked, "Would it make you feel better if I let you pick the next world? If there is a next one?"

Maybe swallowing his guilt was worth it to see the hedgehog's face brighten up. "Can I!?" he asked excitedly.

"Er, sure. Next time." Sorun turned down the road leading to the right. "Now come on. Daylight's burning." As he continued walking, Sorun looked up at the infinite expanse of swirling colors above them. "Or... whatever constitutes for light and time in this place, given the, uh, the lack of a sun. And sky. Atmosphere," he muttered. "The hell are we breathing?"

His excitement not diminishing in the slightest, Silver fell in besides Sorun, the wide smile never leaving his face. "This is really cool, Sorun! I've never been to a whole new zone before!" he nearly yelled out. "You think there'll be other people there!?"

Not nearly as excited as Silver, more contemplative as he continued looking up, Sorun gave a noncommittal hum. "Uh-huh, maybe."

"And things to see, and buildings that aren't in pieces like all those postcards I used to collect!?"

"Mmhm, mmhm."

"And maybe some food? 'Cause we've been out here a while and, well, I'm kind of hungry."

"We'll see when we get there."

"Okay, great, 'cause I was really starting to get worried about that. Hey, Sorun, you think when we get there..."

Hours later

Within the infinite expanse of this empty space, in addition to the infinitely vast, sprawling road that ran through it, were motes of light that ends of the branches of the road ran into. From a distance these lights seemed more like specks of white than anything else. Depending on one's position on the road most were so far away they were invisible. If one were to walk up close to one they'd be greeted by a great, shapeless barrier, seemingly with no definable end or shape. To those initiated these barriers of light were defined as the borders that separated and contained zones; impassable passageways that lead off to lands and worlds unknown.

Or at least as unknown as could be provided one decided not to read the signs on the Highway.

Upon one of these barriers walked two figures: a pale human in a blue coat and a white-furred Mobian, both laughing at something said between themselves as they came to a stop in front of the barrier. Silver was hunched over forwards, laughing while holding his stomach while Sorun was laughing in a much more subdued manner, shoulders shaking with a moderate smile on his face.

"Ah ha ha... ahh, man, that's a riot," Sorun sighed out as they came to a stop at the end of the road. "Now what's this all about?"

The end of the road was just that: an abrupt end of the street, cut off and hanging in the vast space they were located in. Leading right into a giant, white pulsating barrier that looked like it was made of light itself. Massive in scale, enough that looking up or to the sides Sorun couldn't see where it ended or began.

Said a lot for how big this place was that they hadn't even noticed this thing until they'd gotten close. He didn't know if it was due to some optical illusion, or if space here was a bit jank in some way.

"So what's the deal with the giant fog gate?" Sorun asked once both his and Silver's laughter had calmed down. "Is this the entranceway into this zone?"

"Heh... entranceway?" Silver repeated, confused. "What entranceway?"

"Like... into the zone," Sorun elaborated, turning to Silver. "Doorway, gateway, whatever."

"Oh, zones don't have entranceways or anything like that, Sorun," Silver explained. He seemed a bit surprised Sorun was even asking the question. "People aren't supposed to do what we're doing. You know, traveling outside of zones, breaching other zones. Like, at all. Zones weren't meant to be entered and exited like a normal room."

"Well, I don't see a rulebook anywhere." Sorun walked up close enough to the barrier his nose was nearly touching. He reached his right hand out and poked it. A ripple of energy ran along its surface from where he touched it, like disturbing water, but the barrier didn't so much as distend in the slightest no matter how hard he poked it. "We're gonna be inside a planet if we go in here, right? We're not just gonna end up floating in space?"

"Sorun, I don't know what's gonna happen if we go in there. I've never done this before," Silver said. "I'm not even sure we can do this. That barrier looks pretty solid."

In response, Sorun lifted Yamato up. "I got a pretty good key right here."

"Uh..." An unsure expression crossed Silver's face as Sorun unsheathed the katana. "Are you sure about this?"

"Nope." Sorun stabbed the blade into the barrier. It slipped in with no effort. "But I'm doing it anyways."

In Sorun's defense, if every zone had a barrier like this, then that meant the Prime Zone would have one as well. So they had to figure out right now if entering zones via Yamato cutting them a way in was even feasible. But Sorun didn't want to worry Silver by telling him all his fears about this going horribly wrong. Worry him that Sorun had no idea what he was doing and was mainly going off guesswork. Worry that they might end up walking into a sun or black hole or something, because he honestly had no idea what would happen by doing this.

No, Sorun wasn't sure about this at all. But he'd gone too far by now to be set back by things like being unsure.

The sword was sliced downwards, creating a large slit in the barrier big enough for the pair of them to enter. It'd only remained open for a short time, though. Around ten seconds later the slit made in the barrier closed in on itself and sealed back up. Sorun hummed at the sight, while Silver silently watched.

"Self-repairing, huh?" Sorun mused. "Alright, I guess we just have to jump in after I open it up."

The hedgehog made a quiet sound as he gazed at the fog gate. He was fidgeting slightly in place, glancing between the sword and the barrier with an uneasy look. "Sorun, I'm not sure-"

"Silver, odds are we're gonna have to do this to even get back to Mobius Prime when we finally find it." Once more, Sorun stabbed Yamato into the barrier. "Sometimes you just gotta take a leap of faith, you know? And also I don't have any better ideas. If you do then by all means."

Silver shook his head, making a defeated look as he stepped forwards towards the new entrance Sorun was making. "I guess I don't," he mumbled out. "You're coming in with me?"

"Of course I am," Sorun assured him as he pulled the sword out. He only managed to push it halfway back into the sheath before he noticed Silver holding his hand out to him. "Really, man?" Sorun asked. When the hand wasn't taken away, he made a loud sigh and grasped Silver's hand with his right one. He felt like making a snappy remark, but seeing Silver calmed down from the contact made Sorun hold off on telling him off.

After the two nodded at each other, they both leapt in through the hole in the barrier.

"Man, I'm on a roll with these portals," was Sorun's first thought as both his and Silver's feet touched down on what looked like a sidewalk. Traveling through that barrier hadn't even felt like going through a portal - there had just been a bright light that momentarily blinded him, some rushing wind, and suddenly they were here, standing on a side walk.

Relief was first. Relief they'd ended up standing on a planet, a civilized one at a momentary glance, and not somewhere in space or some barren wasteland. Sorun didn't know who to thank for that: his luck, the wonky rules these zones seemed to abide by, Yamato doing things with that portal to ensure they wouldn't be harmed entering it, something else perhaps. Whatever the case, he was just glad they managed to live long enough to appreciate it.

Immediately familiar sounds hit Sorun's ears. Sounds he hadn't heard in what seemed like forever that caused a bit of nostalgia to well up in him. Distant, unintelligible chatter, the sound of cars, honking horns and distant sirens. All around them were tall buildings. Fully intact buildings, too, not the hollowed husks from Silver's future, and Sorun could actually see people in some of them through the windows. They'd found themselves right in the midst of a city. Even the smell seemed familiar to Sorun. Brisk air mixed in with the unpleasant aroma of the nearby cars.

Smelled like home.

Would have looked like home, too, if it weren't for one crucial detail missing.

"Why is everything in black and white?" Sorun asked, somewhat dumbfounded by what he was seeing. It was like something had sucked the color out of the world: everything from the signs to the traffic lights, to even the sky, the cars, and nearby Mobian citizens and their clothes. Everything in the world was grayscale, with not a speck of color to be seen except for black, white, and varying shades of gray.

It was extremely jarring to Sorun, to say the least, who was having a hard time not being freaked out at the sight. Even his own skin and clothes were grayscale now. Silver, meanwhile, didn't seem as visually concerned as Sorun as he examined himself.

"I don't actually think I'm seeing a difference," Silver said as he examined his own arm. His arm that, for all intents and purposes, was still the exact same shade of white. A flat look from Sorun, followed by him clearing his throat, caused Silver to look up at him. His now-gray eyes widened at the sight of Sorun. "Oh, yeah, there it is, I see what... you... mean..."

He'd trailed off once Silver had gotten a good look around at where they were actually standing. His eyes had widened up to the size of saucers, and his head was whipping left and right so fast Sorun was worried he was going to accidentally twist his own neck. But he seemed to be fine if the slow gasp that was slowly leaving Silver's throat said anything.

"Oh my gosh, Sorun, look at all this!" Silver exclaimed. He wildly waved his arm at the nearest building, looking like he was going scream in joy at one of the most mundane sights Sorun had ever seen. "The buildings aren't in pieces! And look how clean everything is!"

Sorun's eyes trailed down to a particularly grimy part of a nearby corner, near the ground. "Um-"

"And all the cars aren't covered in rust and they're moving around! The streets and sidewalks aren't torn apart, and- and look at that guy!"

With vigor that put even Sorun off, Silver pointed out to a Mobian in a suit on the other side of the street from them. He had a briefcase in one hand and was giving both Silver and Sorun an odd look.

Awkwardly, Sorun waved at him. "Hello there," he awkwardly called out, and then turned to Silver after lightly jabbing him in the ribs. "Silver, cool it, I'm pretty sure we just appeared out of thin air in front of all these people."

"But-but-but everything here is so different , Sorun," Silver reiterated as he turned to him. "It's- there's noise everywhere, and this really weird smell-"

"Smell's normal, don't worry about it," Sorun assured him, "but look, I get it, it's really exciting and new for you but we can't really focus on that, alright?"

The awed look Silver had on was shocked out of him by the reminder given by Sorun. The boundless energy his eyes had held left as abruptly as it'd came; sadness flickered over his features, and then he thankfully returned to having a normal expression while giving Sorun a short nod. "Yeah, I get it. It's just-"

"There'll be plenty of time to sort through this kind of stuff when we're back home, alright?" Sorun assured him. "But really, there's more important things to worry about. Like why everything is in black and white." Sorun looked back down at his arms. "Seriously, do colors just work differently in every single zone, or what?"

"I dunno. But, um..." Silver fidgeted around for a bit again, taking one more quick glance at their surroundings before looking back at Sorun. "Weren't we here for directions?"

"Directions. Right." Sorun gave a quick nod and looked away from his arms and at Silver. "Idea?"

Looking left and upwards, Silver pointed up at something. "Well, maybe this place can help," he suggested as Sorun looked towards where he was pointing. "It says it's a detective's office. From all the old books I dug up in the future detectives are supposed to be these weird people that talk in long-winded sentences in the rain and solve mysteries while breathing on sticks they set on fire, right?"

"I'd say that's a stereotype, but I'm pretty sure we just literally walked into one," Sorun said. His eyes narrowed at the sign they were looking up at. "Oh, you gotta be... Sonic's Detective Agency?"

That's what the sign said, at least. Emblazoned on the front a small, two-story building they were in front of. There was a logo of an eyeball next to the sign, too, but because color apparently didn't exist in this universe Sorun couldn't tell what color it was. Probably green.

He didn't know how to feel at this. He should have probably guess there'd be a Sonic here, but what were the odds they'd appear this close to one? And of all the alternate versions of people he knew in Mobius Prime to become a detective in a detective-themed world if the name said anything why him ?

"Motherfucker, I can't get rid of this guy no matter where I go," Sorun silently seethed as he looked up at the sign. "Guy gets to be a hero one place, king in another, now a cool detective?"

While Sorun stood there, silently glaring at the sign, Silver spoke up. "I mean it's a good idea, right?" he asked. "Asking a detective for directions? If anybody would know it'd be this world's Sonic, right?"

"... Mmm maybe," Sorun breathed out, voice nearly a hiss. With how multiverse worked and how literally anything was possible there was no telling anything about this Sonic compared to the one he knew. If he was in the know about zones or not, if he was even as influential in world events as his- as Sonic Prime. Maybe he was a world-famous detective in this world or he was a no-name shamus. And either-or didn't tell Sorun if he knew about zones or not.

Well, no matter what the best way to find out was ask, and there weren't any better candidates standing around.

"Okay, uh... alright, here's what we'll do," Sorun began. A quick scan around revealed something about a block away that Sorun could see - a nearby petrol station with a convenience store. "Okay, Silver, I want you to go stay at that... it's called Schnell? Really? Is nothing sacred?"

"Sorun?"

"Okay that gas station over there, Silver. Need you to wait for me over there," Sorun instructed. "Just, um, just look around while I'm busy, pick out whatever food you want. Don't actually take anything, though, just look around and wait for me to get back and we'll grab some stuff for the road, alright?"

Right as Sorun finished speaking, Silver's stomach began rumbling. "I am getting kind of hungry," he noted as he placed a hand on his stomach. "Um, Sorun, what's past food like?" he asked. "Like, um... like what am I looking for? And what's... you know, the process for getting it? How does that work?"

"Don't worry about it."

"But don't we have to buy-?"

"Silver, don't worry about it." Sorun placed a hand on the hedgehog's shoulder and gave him an assuring look. "I'll be in and out, five minutes, ten max, come back to you and help out, alright? Just trust me on this."

"O... kay, I trust you." Nervously, Silver turned back towards the gas station. "Ten minutes max?"

"Maybe not even that." By now Sorun had already started climbing the steps up towards the detective agency's front door. He turned around at the doors to give Silver a small wave. "Look, it'll be fine, just take a look around in there. I won't be long."

Nodding, and it was a rather stiff nod mixed with an unsure expression, Silver turned back around and began to walk towards the gas station. He'd jumped when a car had driven past him on the street, and then seemed to give up on something and decided to just use his powers to float up and towards the store, garnering more than a few stares from onlookers. Sorun facepalmed himself as a result.

"Yeah, the flying hedgehog won't cause any questions, no siree. No questions at all, like how the hell I'm supposed to feed us when we're broke." Sorun's hand dropped away from his face. He stood there for a few seconds to think, and then made a heavy sigh. "I'll figure it out, I'll fucking figure it out. Detective first." He looked down at Yamato. "Sword might be a bit too conspicuous."

He transmuted the sword back into a Chaos Emerald. Due to where they were it'd lost its blue color and turned into a glowing, dark gray gem. It also didn't feel any less conspicuous than a katana seeing as it was a giant, glowing gem.

"... Fucking hell, fine, I just gotta be quick about this," Sorun thought to himself as he entered the building.

It wasn't that Sorun was paranoid. Paranoia would mean he was suspicious without good cause. And as Sorun walked his way through the short halls of the small building he was in, he was not filled with unfounded fears. Because the fear he was filled with was completely sensible and justified.

He was beginning to look at things in retrospective now, and already Sorun was questioning his own choices. He didn't know what conditions in this world were like, if powers were the norm and everybody would pass it off like in Mobius Prime or if here it would call down some government response because of Silver being so casual with his flying. Was there a government? They were in industrialized city, so maybe. Fears for if there were people here that could actually point them in the right direction or if this was a waste of time. If he was gonna walk outside and find the place surrounded b agents or something or if he'd go out to find Silver in some situation with someone.

This all took precedent in front of the fact Sorun was genuinely considering robbing somebody just so Silver didn't go hungry.

The fact remained there were too many unknowns. Literally, just too many unknowns because they were in a whole alternate universe they knew nothing about. Not the social customs, rules, history and behaviors to ignore, none of it. And with every second that ticked by Sorun was regretting his decision more and more.

"'Oh it'll be cool man, cool noir-themed world, it'll be neat to see we should really go check it out,' man what the hell is wrong with me?"

he mentally berated himself. There was a door at the end of the hall. It was made of frosted glass and had Sonic's name on it. Office door, had to be. "No, we had to come here," Sorun reminded himself as he approached the door. "Needed directions and food, remember? Should've listened to Silver and went to the 'Sailor Moon' world. Would that have been better or worse than here? Goddammit."

He heard some muffled chatter as he approached the door. The door itself was unlocked, thankfully, though Sorun had only opened it halfway to peek into the room. It was immediately clear it was an office of sorts; he'd go as far as to say it was the most stereotypical detective's office he'd ever seen. Half-draped, open windows in the back, a cluttered desk, a ceiling fan that didn't seem to work, there was even a rack in the back full of trench coats and hats.

Of course there was also him . Even without the color to identify him Sorun could recognize that cocky look anywhere. Maybe it was universal. The trench coat and fedora was new. On him it seemed to magnify his smugness and the irritation Sorun felt just being near him. He was sitting behind that cluttered desk of his, the receiver of a rotary phone up to his head. He'd glanced up towards Sorun when he poked his head in, and then nodded to him before turning his attention back to the phone.

"Mm, yeah, that's real great. Say, listen, a client just walked into the office, and this one's lookin' a bit more off than normal. Just one of those things, you know how it is," the detective said into the phone as he waved Sorun in. "Yeah, I got it. Tell him I said hi."

The receiver went dead, and Sonic hung the phone up. He leaned back in his chair afterwards, steepling his fingers as he watched Sorun fully enter the room. "Sorry about that," he apologized. "Secretary's out at the moment. Family issues."

Well, there went half of Sorun's remarks he'd been planning. "'S alright, listen, I need help."

"Ha. You and half the city," Sonic said as he gestured to the empty chair opposite of him. "Someone walks into this office, though, and it's always more than a particularly peculiar problem they need help with."

"... Uh-huh." Sorun slowly sat down in the chair. "And I seem like one of those people, do I?"

"The look ya got on says it all. That doe-eyed look that's screaming at me you're lost and don't know what's going on, the nervous expression crying out for help, it's as easy to read as a book." Sonic clicked his tongue and, with his hands still clasped, pointed his index fingers at him. "The fact I don't even know what you are says a lot, too."

"Oh, humans not a thing here?" Sorun wondered aloud. "Whatever, doesn't matter, don't worry about that part. In all that nonsense word salad you just fed me you were right about one thing: I am lost."

"Aren't we all?" The chair Sonic was sitting in swiveled around so that he was facing the window. "It's not too uncommon a story I hear."

A sigh was growing in Sorun's throat as he pinched at his nose. "Please don't-"

"This is the kind of city where getting lost is more common than you'd think. Much more common." The detective rose up out of the chair and made his way to the window. Sorun made a sigh. "Whether it's loosing their way, or losing someone or something, everyone here gets lost one way or another. Seen it a million times in this line of work, like a bad show on the radio going on repeat." He dragged a gloved finger down the window's glass. "Just like the radio some stories end well, others not so well. Part of reality they managed to get right, I suppose. Trick I've found, though, isn't finding what you lost. It's about not losing yourself."

"It's fucking amazing how no matter what iteration of Sonic I meet I always wanna smack his teeth out." If he'd known he'd be walking into a cheesy noir detective monologue straight out of a trashy novel Sorun wouldn't have bothered coming in here. Even if he was desperate for those directions. It was getting less and less worth it by the second. "Wait, what the...?"

It was there. On the desk. A glass ashtray for cigarettes. Except instead of cigarettes and ash there was just a fucking chili dog sitting on it. Didn't even fit on the whole fucking ashtray.

"Alright, I might actually kill him," Sorun decided. "Oh, wait, what's this now...?"

Next to the abomination sitting on a glass pedestal it didn't even fit on was an open envelope. An envelope that had a notable stack of bills spilling out of it. Bills of the monetary type.

"Payment for a recent job? Something else? Maybe this wasn't a waste of time."

"- Sometimes I'd like to say there's nothing new under the sun with how long I've been on the job, but this city has a way of surprising you at every corner-"

"Christ, he's still going." A loud clearing of Sorun's throat thankfully halted whatever detective Sonic was going on about so he had a chance to speak. "Okay, dude, that's fascinating. I don't really care. I just need directions."

"Directions, is it?" He turned back to Sorun. "A strange-looking person walks in with the most expensive-looking beaut of a gem I've ever seen and asks the most renown detective in town just for directions? The case just gets curiouser and curiouser." He sat down in his seat and re-steepled his hands as he met Sorun's eyes. "So what's the story, huh? Alien, prince of a long-lost civilization with a mystical artifact, what am I dealing with here?"

"None of that, listen, can you just tell me how to get to a certain zone?"

Sonic leaned back in his chair. "Zone, huh?" he repeated. "Which zone? One of the internment zones, the demilitarized zones, radiation zones? Places like that are a world over, friend. Problems here are a lot more tame than the ones across the ocean. And as weird as you look you don't seem like a scavver digging around irradiated ruins for Yesterage artifacts to sell off," he said, taking a look at Sorun's coat. "Clothes are too fine."

"No, I- wow, there's a lot to unpack there," a stunned Sorun mumbled. "But no, not that kind of zone. I need to get to Mobius Prime."

Sorun's fear grew when Sonic's eyes grew confused. "Mobius Prime?"

"Yeah, Mobius Prime." Sorun waved his wrist around when the detective continued to give him a blank stare. "Uhhh, the central zone? Original zone? Prime Zone? None of this ringing any bells?"

Sonic shook his head. "'Fraid not, friend, 'fraid not."

"... You don't know what zones are," Sorun said with a defeated sigh. It was a long shot to begin with, he supposed. Silver himself warned Sorun zones weren't common knowledge and nobody probably had answers for him. And if this world's Sonic didn't know then nobody probably did.

So dead end, then. A waste of time. He couldn't point them the right way.

"Never quite seen someone so disparaged without even knowing what I said to put them off," Sonic said after noting Sorun's now-slumped figure.

"Yeah, uh... yeah, don't worry about it," the teen muttered out. He gripped the Emerald in his hand tighter. A few gray sparks danced over his hand. "Thanks for taking the time to hear me out, but there's nothing you can do for me."

"Huh? Are you sure?" Sonic asked. A gray phantom in Sorun's image appeared behind him. "Uh, okay, listen, I didn't mean to put you down so hard you'd try and drop the case altogether. Give me some time to ask around and-"

The Doppelganger reached out and pulled down the curtains on the window, disappearing in the same movement. The small ruffled, clattering sound they made caused Sonic to stiffen in his seat, and then turn around towards the window. The moment his back was turned Sorun reached out, grabbed a handful of the money sticking out of the envelope on the desk, and then quickly stuffed it into his pocket.

"Huh, darn curtain. Been meaning to replace that." Sonic turned back to Sorun, who was already halfway out of his seat. "Sorry about that. You sure you don't want to reconsider?"

"Super sure," Sorun assured him as he pushed the chair in. "If anything comes up though, I promise you I will not hesitate for even a moment to come back and see you. But that being said, my problems are a bit out of depth for a detective." He turned around towards the door. "It's out of depth for me, too, and I'm right in the middle of all it."

So the detective angle was a bust. Utterly and completely. Bad news for Sorun and Silver since it still meant they were hopelessly lost, but hey, at least now they wouldn't starve for the foreseeable future. However long that would last.

An admittedly large part of Sorun was intensely worried over the whole thing, but there wasn't much to be done about it. Right now he was just worried about the fact he was about to open the front doors to Sonic's building and the men in black would swarm him.

He'd been ready to fight the moment he'd opened the doors. He had a firm grip on the Emerald, ready to stop time at a moment's notice the instant he saw anything even slightly out of the ordinary once he opened the doors. The fears turned out to be unfounded, though: there weren't any black vans and Mobians in suits on the sidewalk outside or the streets. No cops except for a traffic cop in the distance, nothing.

"Too paranoid? No." He'd breathed a sigh of relief at the sight, but he couldn't shake the wary feeling he felt. He couldn't stop his arm from shaking, either, or even still his rapid heartbeat. The urge to leave this place wouldn't leave him.

He began moving. According to detective Sonic, humans weren't even a thing in this world, at least as far as he knew. He was going to attract unwanted attention the longer he lingered here, that was just a given. And he and Silver didn't have time to deal with nonsense in a world they weren't even staying at.

So he'd went to the convenience store he'd pointed Silver to earlier. To Sorun's relief he managed to see him through one of the windows on approach. He almost laughed at the sight when he entered the store itself: the white Mobian still had that wide-eyed look and was going around the store like a kid in a candy shop with that amazed look on his face. He himself barely got three steps in before Silver was upon him, holding a prepacked sandwich.

"Sorun! Sorun, look!" He excitedly held the sandwich out for Sorun to see. "They got this stuff here called sliced bread! We don't have that in the future."

Sorun made a small smile, and it didn't even feel forced. Seeing Silver excited over bread of all things helped relieve the tension he felt. "That's great, man," he said, patting Silver on the shoulder.

"Yeah, Master always tried making bread but it never really turned out- wait, what happened with Sonic?"

Sorun's face fell, as did Silver's when he saw. "Yeah, he didn't know what I was talking about when I asked about Mobius Prime," he answered.

"Oh..." Visibly deflating at the news, Silver asked, "So what now?"

"We keep going, I guess." Sorun dug into his pocket and drew out the money he stole from Sonic. "The guy was nice enough to give us some money for food for the road, though, so there's that at least."

"That's great!" Silver's wide smile returned. "So, what should we grab?"

"Hm." Sorun looked down to the hand holding the money. It only now dawned on him it was bills stamped with hundreds that he'd stolen out of Sonic's office. If the fact all the cars outside looked like they were from fifties Earth said anything that was probably more than he thought it was. Assuming inflation was the same.

Too bad.

"Whatever you want, Silver."

"... This shit's real?"

He always thought it had just been a gag in a cartoon, but no, here it was. Sitting on a shelf right in front of Sorun, in all its canned glory. If that word was even applicable to this thing.

"Canned bread," Sorun mumbled out as he examined the can. "Does... does it at least expire slower than normal bread?" He grabbed the can and turned it around to examine the labels on the back. "Two years? Holy shit, that's pretty good."

Should he get it? Probably should. Not telling how long Silver and him were gonna be on the road. Better not be years, but normal bread expired in a manner of days whereas this would hopefully last them the whole trip. Plus they could afford it.

Boy could they afford it.

"Hey, Sorun, what about this?" The teen looked up from the can as Silver approached him with another can. "It says this soup-"

Sorun grabbed the can out of Silver's hand and put it on the closest available open space on the nearest shelf.

"Sorun?"

"Soup is a cardinal sin, Silver. We don't partake in it."

"What?"

"I don't like soup."

"... Okay, but can I at least have it?"

"No."

Silver gave him an odd look. "Why not?"

"I don't like it being near me."

"Oh, come on!" The odd look turned into a disbelieving, frustrated one as Silver threw a hand up. "Is this a past thing? Is food so common in your era that everyone's this picky about it?"

It kind of was, even in New Mobotropolis, but he didn't want to admit it. "Look, we don't even need the soup." Sorun held his own can up to Silver's eyes. "See? Canned bread. No insane mixing of solids and liquids and calling it food. Pure solid."

Silver didn't seem very confident about the can. He shied away from it and took a step back. "But it's not the sliced bread I want to try."

"It's totally sliced. Just, you know, cylindrically," Sorun said. "And we can take this and the sandwiches, so what's your problem?"

Silver's eyes lowered down, towards the plastic basket with its handles looped around Sorun's left arm that was carrying the Chaos Emerald. He gave a very questionable look at the contents Sorun filled it with. "My problem is that the stuff you're picking out isn't, well, the healthiest looking?"

Sorun took visible affront to the accusation that his collection of chip bags, candies, other assorted junk foods and soda bottles wasn't conducive to long-term survival. It was the glass kind of soda bottles, too. Much too fancy to pass up.

"It's to balance out all the long-lasting healthy stuff you're picking," Sorun defended. "Besides, I lasted on stuff like this for a large part of my life and I turned out fine. Also it's been like seven or eight months since I've had stuff like this and the withdrawals started coming back when I saw them." The Chao Cola had helped stave that off and ween Sorun off of those cravings, but by god did he miss Mountain Dew. Fucking nukes.

Silver gave Sorun a concerned look. "That doesn't sound healthy."

"It isn't," he agreed. "I don't care. And a single road trip's worth of junk food isn't gonna kill me." He tossed the canned bread in the basket and started walking past Silver. "It'll be fine, don't worry about it."

"Uh... if you say so." Silver turned around and started following Sorun. "But I was counting that money this zone's Sonic gave us and compared it to the prices to all the stuff we're buying and we're gonna have a lot left over, so maybe after we buy this we can go to a real store? Maybe even get some bags or something to help carry all this?" They both stopped, with Sorun turning to face Silver. "I just don't want to be rude since I'm not very sure this currency'll be good in other zones," Silver continued, "and he gave us a lot and I don't want to send the wrong message by not making the most of it, you know what I mean?"

Sorun did, even if Silver was completely wrong. But he also did have a point. Even if Sorun didn't want to linger around any longer than he had to because he didn't know how long they had before Sonic called the cops. Or found them, which he very likely could since he was a detective. On second thought he wasn't very thrilled with this idea.

"Can't you just use your telekinesis to carry everything?" Sorun asked in a hopeful voice.

"No!" Silver shook his head. "You know how exhausting it'd be for me to lug all this stuff around for however long we're gonna be traipsing around the multiverse!?"

"I don't know, dude, I'm not a psychokinetic like you."

"Well, it's exhausting," Silver informed him. "I'm also kind of sure we can't keep these baskets since they're the store's, so we kind of have to do something about it."

Once again, Silver had a point. Sorun couldn't even find it in himself to be begrudging over it.

The backpack hung heavily on Sorun's shoulders. Mostly because Silver had loaded it down with water bottles they'd bought to stave off dehydration. Largely because since all the snacks Sorun bought were so light he got saddled with the water while Silver's backpack had all the actual food in it, and the emotional turmoil gained from the unfairness of it all still wore heavy on Sorun.

Thankfully the proper grocery store Silver had wanted to visit hadn't been too far away from the convenience store, so Sorun hadn't found himself protesting all that much during the trip. Exiting the large store where they'd procured the backpacks, as well as the food and water, Sorun couldn't help but keep glancing down all the nearby roads.

Plenty of busy people. No cops. No hedgehog in a trench coat. World was still black and white and it was really starting to get on Sorun's nerves.

"Well, Sorun, I think we're as prepared as we're gonna be," Silver said to him as he readjusted the straps on his shoulder. "That being said, we still have a few coins leftover from Sonic. You think we should head back to his office to give them back? I at least want to thank him for all the help he gave us."

"I think he's busy with detective stuff. We shouldn't bother him." Sorun turned his head at Silver. "Keep the coins as a souvenir or something."

"Sure, I guess that works." Shrugging, Silver put the coins inside the cuffs of his gloves. Sorun still wasn't sure how he kept putting stuff in there, if there were pockets inside his gloves or some kind of trick he was using. "So now it looks like our only problem left is getting back to the Cosmic Interstate Highway."

"I gotcha." The gem held in his left hand transformed into his familiar katana. "Just one sec here."

"And you're sure this is gonna work?" Silver asked as Sorun pulled the sword out.

"Gone to more impossible places." Quite literally, in Sorun's case. With all the trouble he had to go through to get back to the original timeline, slipping into the world between worlds was practically nothing.

All that was needed was that Sorun had physically been standing on the Highway, after all, and because of that he could remember how to make a portal to go back. Or maybe more accurately was that Yamato remembered how to go back if Sorun had been there; he honestly wasn't sure.

He had almost laughed out loud at the question, though. Could he get back to the Highway that was cut off from them due to universal boundaries? Things like that were nothing to the him and the Yamato.

"There we are." The portal was cut open and hovering in front of them. "Now can we please go back to the world of saturated colors?"

Silver nodded, and even grinned a bit at Sorun's words. He was a bit hesitant in entering it, though, but after poking a foot through the portal he'd taken the dive and stepped through it entirely. Sorun had taken one last glance over his shoulder at the black and white city, and then decided he couldn't get out of here fast enough and followed Silver through the portal.

There was no holding the sigh of relief Sorun felt when the familiar sight of the Cosmic Interstate Highway and the boundless space it inhabited and, most importantly, color flooded his vision. One for easing his worries for whether they could go to and from zones and the highway, and another for finally getting out of that zone. The zone that, as long as Sorun could help it, he would never, ever return to ever again.

Silver seemed to be in a similar state of amazement as Sorun, going as far as to look around with a wide smile, laughing a bit. He turned towards Sorun as he began hastily closing the portal, exclaiming, "Wow, you actually managed to do it!"

"What? You doubted me?" Sorun asked, mock hurt in his voice as the portal was closed off. "I told you I could do it."

"Heh, yeah. That sword of yours really is amazing. I wouldn't be surprised if it could..." Silver trailed off as his eyes turned down towards the sword. A thoughtful look crossed his face. "Hey, Sorun? Why can't you just use the sword to make us a portal back to Mobius Prime?"

"Oh, because I..." Sorun stopped mid-sentence. He blinked. "Huh." He held Yamato up. "Oh fuck, did I just rob somebody for no reason?"

Dammit, he hadn't seriously made such an oversight, had he? He hadn't really forgotten... yes, he realized with a sigh, he had. He had forgotten he could probably just make a portal back home with Yamato.

It was with a barely-suppressed grumble Sorun held the sword back up. On the bright side their hopeless situation just got a lot more hopeful, but with it came the growing guilt Sorun began to feel over the money he'd stolen from detective Sonic. He wouldn't have done it if they could just go straight back home; hell, he wouldn't have bothered with them invading that zone to begin with. Maybe he could go back and dump everything they'd bought off at his office, it was mostly food anyway, so provided he ate it all it wouldn't technically be a waste-

Sorun frowned when he stabbed the sword forwards. Nothing had happened. No metal blade disappearing in the space in front of him as he breached dimensional barriers, no blue light or energy sparks. It wasn't working.

"Er, Sorun?" Silver asked as Sorun tried stabbing forwards again. "What's the matter?"

Eyes furrowed in concentration, Sorun tried stabbing forwards a third time. No luck. "I can't find it," he grunted in effort as he tried a fourth time.

"Er... try harder?"

With a frustrated growl, Sorun tried a fifth time. Still nothing. He didn't know what he was doing wrong - he was doing the exact same thing he always did whenever he used Yamato to teleport somewhere. Funnel energy through the sword, project his will onto it and think of where he wanted to go, let the sword do the rest as it cut through space and time...

He could feel the destination, too. It was there. He knew it was there; he'd physically stood in that zone. It was like trying to grasp at some intangible shape in pitch darkness, but he knew the destination was there. But he couldn't lock on to it.

With a defeated sigh, Sorun sheathed the sword. "It ain't working," he informed Silver. "I don't know what's going on. It's just not working."

Silver grew visibly disheartened at hearing that. The hope that had grown on his face had immediately fallen away. "Aw, man... is the sword broken or something?"

With a shake of his head, Sorun said, "No, I think... maybe there's something different about traveling to zones compared to traveling to different locations inside a single zone. Cutting through multiple planes of space instead of a single one, I don't..." Still frustrated, Sorun glanced down at Yamato. "I can feel the zone, it's there. It's definitely there. I can't feel any other ones except that one and..." He paused and let power run through the sword again. "... Two others, I feel two others. One really close by, I think that's the zone we just left, the other one, it's..."

Sorun's face screwed in concentration as he felt out the third location. He caught a glimpse of how far it was.

He nearly dropped to his knees.

There wasn't a scale to describe just how distant this third location was. It was a distance so vast it was nearly incomprehensible, and he felt his head throb from just trying to conceptualize the distance. It was a place so far that Silver's earlier estimate for how Mobius Prime could be billions of lightyears away seemed like a joke; like it didn't matter. Because the location he was focusing on was such a sizeable distance away that the difference between lightyears and millimeters seemed negligible.

And more than that it felt disconnected. The pitch-black void he felt his mind feel around in, trying to connect to the Prime Zone and the Mystery Noir Zone, what Sorun assumed to be his power's and mind's best attempt at conceptualizing the multiversal space they all inhabited, it felt like this third place wasn't even inside that. That it was so far removed not even the multiverse itself housed it. A zone sitting in dead space, in endless void beyond the edge of nothingness.

"Is that where Earth is?"

He cut off the power flowing through Yamato. A few dull throbs still assaulted Sorun's head, though thankfully, it was quickly subsiding. He made a small groan while running his right hand through his hair, taking a shuddering breath all the while. He felt something grab onto his shoulder, and turned his eyes upwards to see Silver grabbing him while giving Sorun a worried expression.

"Sorun?" Silver quietly asked him. "Are you okay?"

"Yeah. Yeah, fine," Sorun muttered out. It took a few seconds to Silver continuing to look to make sure before he released Sorun, after which the Earthling sighed out and shook his head. "I found out where my zone is. The one I was born in." He turned from Silver, covering his mouth while muttering, "Christ, Tails said it was far away, but man..."

"Your old zone?" Sorun ceased his muttering and turned to Silver. "What about it?" the hedgehog asked.

Sorun shook his head. "Silver, buddy, I don't think it's actually possible to go that far without using portals of some kind. Words...

aren't sufficient in describing the gulf between here and there. Hurts to think about.

"But enough about that. The good news out of all this-" he turned back around and pointed in the distance, "- is that I know the way to the Prime Zone. Even the distance. Which..." His shoulders fell with a sigh, "which is kind of an issue."

An unsettled sound came from Silver. "How far?" was his simple question.

Sorun bit his lip. He didn't want to say, more because he didn't want to hear the truth with his ears more than anything else. But he'd felt it with Yamato - the distance from here to Mobius Prime if they took the road. He was almost certain he knew the answer. And the answer scared him almost as much as Silver sounded wary of the answer. But it was too important to ignore.

He told him the truth.

"Well, if you use your powers to fly us straight there the whole time, we might make it back in about a year or two."

A/N- Listen, in my defense I'm not even making up the noir world and the implied Sailor Moon world. Those are all completely canon to the comics. If you really think about it I could technically do anything and say it's canon because multiverse, but you actually see evidence of those two zones in the comics.

Anyways, I know it's a bit weird I ended up going this route instead of straight back to Mobius Prime, and it might even feel like filler, but it's not. I try to avoid filler, and you wouldn't believe how much filler I've cut out of this story only for it to still be this long. Originally when Sorun came back to life the Chaos Emeralds were supposed to scatter for real and I was gonna take seven chapters just to go after them with different characters in each chapter for this big extended goodbye arc, but I scrapped all that since it wouldn't have been a real goodbye to begin with since Sorun was staying anyways and it seemed like a bad idea to stretch it out that long for something that wasn't even gonna happen.

In this case I'm mainly doing it because it introduces details and bits of information that becomes relevant later and I need to introduce it to Sorun somehow. It's not too big a detour though - this chapter and two more after and we're back on Mobius Prime, promise.

I dunno, might not be so bad, but the next two chapters are pretty much centered around them visiting a single zone, and... yeah, I got no idea how people are gonna react to that one.

Chapter 86

A/N- Yeah, a windstorm knocking out the power to your block for a week ain't fun.

Recursion Error

Episode 86- Just beat up the elderly

Something to be said about potato chips from alternate dimensions. They were actually fairly decent by Sorun's standards. Either that or his tastebuds got resensitized to them after all this time, but he didn't really care about the details. Right now they were pretty good.

Though, maybe it wasn't the safest idea to be eating them here. Sitting at the edge of the cosmic road he and Silver had been walking on for a week, with his feet dangling over the side and above the infinite precipice of whatever the hell was at the bottom of this place. Forever, probably. Just forever down there. Forever of what Sorun didn't know. Made him wonder why the dumbasses that built this rode didn't install safety rails.

Didn't matter, though. He had his chips. He was happy.

"Agh, it's no use!"

Silver wasn't so happy.

He was stomping around behind Sorun, pacing back and forth on the road while running his hands through his quills. Sorun just continued kicking his feet while munching on chips from the bag he held, though he did note that Silver had been becoming more and more irritable as of late.

"You know, you keep saying that phrase," Sorun said, not even turning around to look at Silver. "You've been using it a lot lately."

"Because it's no use, Sorun!"

Another chip popped into Sorun's mouth. "Yeah?"

"We've been out here for a week, going from zone to zone hoping we can find a way back to Mobius Prime, but not a single person knows the way!" Silver fumed as he continued to angrily stomp around behind Sorun.

"I keep telling you the problem isn't the way back, the problem-"

"Is that it's too far away, yeah, I know, Sorun, but nobody can help us with that, either! It's no use!"

"What is that, the third time you've said that in the last minute?"

"Don't- don't you..." Silver whirled towards Sorun and pointed at his back, "don't you start with me. Why aren't you more worried about this!?"

"Silver, I try not to worry about things outside of my control."

"And that really helps calm you down?"

"No, never, I'm as worried about this as you are. I'm just so used to this it isn't showing," Sorun said as he ate another chip. "Won't stop me from trying, though. Even if our world is potentially doomed because we had to take a really long road trip."

That was the crux of the matter, really: unless Sorun and Silver, mainly Silver because Sorun didn't really want to get that involved with the whole "save the world" thing again, did something to intervene with whatever it was that caused the apocalypse that Silver's future fell to, it was fated to happen again. Due to using the Time Stone he and Silver were the only ones that could do that, but if they were stuck outside the Prime Zone they wouldn't be able to do anything about it.

Silver's main worry was that they wouldn't make it back to Mobius Prime fast enough to save it. They didn't even know who was behind the catastrophe, after all, nor did they even know when exactly it all went down, which meant there was a large chance that if they really did spend years hoofing it back to the Prime Zone they'd miss their window to save the world. Which wouldn't be so bad if it weren't for the fact they only had one shot at this.

Admittedly Sorun was worried about it, too, but he wasn't as outward about it as Silver was, who'd practically been pacing himself into a rut for the past week after they left that black and white detective zone. They'd been going in the general direction Sorun felt the Prime Zone was in, occasionally dipping into any passing zones they encountered in hopes of finding somebody that could help them. Or at the very least find somebody that could lend them a car or something.

But no. Nobody ever knew what they were talking about when they asked about zones. The most they could do was find a hotel or something to sleep at whenever they got tired. Sometimes while Silver was sleeping Sorun would have to go out to procure more funds for supplies. That'd been their life for the past week. Walk the road, dip into a zone, find a place to sleep, get food. It was admittedly fun for a while but after five days Sorun was starting to get sick of it.

"I just don't know what we're gonna do, Sorun," Silver mumbled out in a despair-filled voice. "You know what happens if we take too long to get back?"

"It's impossible for me not to know. You see fit to remind me every single hour on this trip, Silver." Sorun's fingers were scraping the bottom of the bag. Chips were almost out. Damn. "I know this is real bad, but hey, we at least keep seeing some pretty cool sights out here, huh?"

"Yeah, I guess," Silver agreed. "For as terrible as all this is we've seen some pretty neat things. That world full of the giant lizard things, the dino-whatevers you called them, the future-looking place with the people half made of metal, all the other sights. If we weren't so pressed for time I'd love to explore all these places. I don't think I can ever stop getting surprised by all the things we're seeing."

"I saw Shadow in a Hooters shirt in that last zone, Silver. Nothing can surprise me anymore."

"Yeah, I've been meaning to ask. What was that place, by the way? You took five steps in there then turned around and dragged me out of that zone."

A place Sorun really wanted to forget about. "I'll tell you when you're older."

"But... we're the same age...?" a confused Silver voiced.

"When you're older. Until then please stop talking about it," Sorun requested as he finished off the last chip. "Still trying to get the image of Antoinette out of my head. Guy's one of my best friends on Mobius Prime, I didn't need to see that."

With the bag thoroughly finished off, Sorun tossed the plastic bag into the vast unknown that stretched out before him. He watched it lazily float down until it fell too far for it to remain in his sight, after which he grabbed the nearby blue Emerald, transmuted it into the Yamato, and began to stand up.

"Um, hey, Sorun?" When the human turned to look at him he saw Silver had an uncomfortable look on his face. "I don't think we're supposed to throw our trash around like that," he said.

Sorun scoffed. "Or what? The interdimensional cops from Alpha Centauri are gonna come arrest me for littering?"

"I don't know. Maybe there are interdimensional police people. Somebody built this giant road and made all the signs."

"Yeah, but we've been out here for a week, man," Sorun reminded him, spreading his arms out to gesture to the road all around them. "You don't think if there were someone else on this road besides us we woulda found them by now?"

"... I mean, to be fair this road spans the whole multiverse," Silver reasoned. "That's a lot of ground to cover."

"Maybe, man, but I don't care enough to find out." With Sorun leading the way the pair began once again walking down the road. "And hey, listen, hypothetically speaking. The Time Stones in the future are gone, but the ones in this time period are theoretically still intact, right? If we do screw up and fail to save the world can't we just use one of the Time Stones from this time's set?"

"We could, but I don't know where they are," Silver informed him. "Master's the one that gave the one to me, and he'd only found it a few years ago. They could be anywhere on that planet."

Sorun frowned. That nixed that plan. "Well, we'll just have to do it in one, then."

"Assuming we actually make it back in time to save everyone," Silver sighed out. "Man, I feel like such a failure."

"Don't worry, Silver, I always feel like a failure. You get numb to it after a while."

Silver only seemed to wither further at that comment. "Maybe we should try some positive thinking here, Sorun."

"Maybe." There was another highway sign jutting out of the side of the road that the pair of teens had just walked past. Sorun craned his neck to read it as they passed, and then shifted his attention to Silver. "Hey, maybe this upcoming zone will have something for us. Wanna take a look?"

"Unless we find someone willing to give us a jet or something for free, Sorun, I don't think we'll find much help," a glum Silver replied.

"I keep telling you we should just steal one. From past experience I can tell you flying a real plane is nothing like flying planes in games, but I'm good enough to fly in a semi-straight line."

"No." The word was punctuated by Silver stopping his movement on the road. Sorun had stopped, too, sighing while turning to see Silver giving him a stern glare. "I already told you we can't do something like that. It's not right."

"Yeah, no, fate of the whole world for someone's jet. Totally seems equitable," Sorun dryly replied.

"We'll find another way." There was a firmness in Silver's voice that had Sorun a bit surprised. Enough that he wasn't able to immediately respond as Silver walked past him. "Single jet wouldn't even carry us the whole way anyways before it ran out of fuel."

"... Could have just stolen another one on the way, but sure." Pocketing his right hand while the left still held Yamato, Sorun turned and began following Silver. "You know, there's gotta be a point where we gotta put our own needs over relying on the kindness of strangers from other worlds, Silver."

"We've gotten this far, haven't we? Every zone we've been to nice people keep giving you money so we can buy food and hotel rooms."

"... Mhm, yeah."

"Exactly. So we'll just have to keep doing what we're doing and hope something good comes out of it."

It was frustrating moments like this that made Sorun want to hit something. Part of him almost wished Mogul hadn't chilled out over the centuries and raised Silver to be a opportunistic douche just so they wouldn't have this kind of problem. He was admittedly glad Silver turned out this way, better overall, but Silver possessing good morals like most Mobians Sorun had met was proving to have its own problems. Like this. If it was just Sorun on his own he probably would have made it back to Mobius Prime by now. Would've left a trail of chaos in his wake, but hell, it wasn't like he would have killed anybody, and this was too important.

If only he could get the Yamato to transport them to the Prime Zone. He still couldn't figure out what was wrong, despite trying for a week now to fiddle around with the thing. As far as he could tell it was still functioning fully as always, so the only conclusion he could come to was that his previous assessment was right: there were more layers to traveling between zones than simply teleporting through universe-local locations. The Cosmic Interstate Highway seemed to be an exception to that, but maybe that was due to where it was. Not a "universe", per se, but the space between them.

He was missing something. What, he didn't know, but there was something missing in the formula that would allow the Yamato to transport them between zones. Simply having been there in person wasn't enough; it was a component, but not the whole picture. And until Sorun figured out what that was they were stuck with going it the long way.

Which wasn't ideal seeing as it would take them years to get back to Mobius Prime the long way.

"You know what, fine, why not? Let's visit that zone you mentioned," Silver tiredly flopped his arm behind him, in the general direction of the road sign they passed earlier. "Maybe this'll be the one that'll get us back."

"Maybe." Sorun doubted it, but kept his mouth shut as he grabbed Yamato's handle. The doubt hadn't faded even as he pulled the sword free, but neither of them knew what else to do at this point.

As he used his katana to cut through the bundle of leaves in their way, Sorun came to the conclusion that he hated this new zone.

It was a jungle that the entranceway cut into this zone had spit Sorun and Silver out into. A jungle Sorun came to quickly despise as the pair of teens trudged through it. Not that there was anything explicitly wrong with it; the air was clean, the sky was clear and full of sun, and altogether everything was peaceful. There was even a large, naturally-paved path running through the brush that the two were following.

The heat, though, was a different matter. Sorun just wasn't built to handle a tropical climate, and he was cutting his way through a jungle with an afternoon sun beating down on him, not to mention he had a long coat on. He couldn't understand how Silver wasn't bursting into flames considering he was covered in fur, but for all intents and purposes he seemed to be doing fine.

Could have been worse, granted. At least there weren't any mosquitoes eating them alive. And the humidity was somehow bearable. But between the heat, the knowledge that they were potentially years away from getting back to Mobius Prime, and the fact Sorun's patience had been wearing down over the course of this week-long trip, the human was in a particularly foul mood.

Silver, by comparison, was ecstatic.

"Wow, just look at all this! I've never seen so much color in one place!" Silver marveled, his eyes sweeping over everything in front of them. He'd become momentarily distracted when a beetle with a shining blue-green shell buzzed past him. "This place is great!"

Sorun didn't comment.

"And hey, look at that up ahead! Maybe one of those people can help us out!"

That heavy sense of doubt that had been weighing itself inside of Sorun stirred when he saw what Silver was talking about. "I heavily doubt that assertion of yours, Silver."

The term "rustic" was the only word that came to Sorun's mind to describe the village they'd come across while traversing the jungle. It seemed reasonably sized enough, even though it seemed to be entirely comprised of wooden huts that used palm leaves for roofs. Even the people were dressed in little more than grass sandals, loincloths, and skirts.

More than a few eyes tracked the pair as they entered the village. They were clearly Mobians from what Sorun could see, but he couldn't tell exactly what they were. Bizarrely they all had varying shades of an off-white, light grayish shade of fur, and he would have called them rabbits if it weren't for the fact they were lacking the large, floppy ears he normally accustomed rabbits to. And they were all unusually skinny.

And they all looked... he wouldn't say vapid, but there was something off with their expressions. Maybe it was because two strangers of very different species just walked into their village unannounced, but between that and the fact it barely looked like these people were past the stone age, Sorun was quickly coming to the realization that he didn't want to be here.

"Silver, these guys don't even look like they know what a toaster is, let alone zones," Sorun said. "Let's just bail already."

"Without even talking to any of them? We just got here, Sorun."

"You seriously wanna waste time talking to a bunch of-"

"Hello there!"

Silver had jumped up in fright at the sudden new voice greeting them. Sorun had remained rooted to the ground, though his arms had twitched out of the urge to pull the sword from his side and swing at the source of the noise. He managed to hold off on acting on the reflex, breathing out slowly as both he and Silver turned towards their greeter.

He was one of the native gray Mobians in this village. Visually indistinguishable from the rest save for the weird headdress made of leaves and wood he had on. Probably an important person if that and his voice said anything, but Sorun honestly couldn't tell if he was old enough to have that voice or if he just sounded like that. White beard may have been a hint.

Somethin' was off about his expression, though, and Sorun couldn't tell what. Different and yet similar to all the others here. Not that it seemed too malicious or happy. It was blank, but not even on a disturbing level. Like somebody figured out how to turn resting bitch face friendly. An unholy fusion.

It was with dawning horror Sorun realized that was the same expression he wore all the time.

"Oh, hi!" Silver offered the stranger a smile and a friendly wave while Sorun regarded him with suspicion. "My name is Silver, and this is Sorun. Sorun, say hi."

"..."

"I think he gets shy around new people," Silver said, causing Sorun to give him an indignant glare. "We're new here and kind of lost. Think you could help us?"

"That shouldn't be too much of a problem, now. You just happened to walk into the friendlies village on the whole island." The old man shifted the green cane he was holding to the other hand while giving the two of them a kind smile. "Welcome to Gogoba village."

Sorun chose to speak up. "Gogoba village," he deadpanned.

"Yep. Gogoba village. Friendliest village on the whole island," the old Mobian repeated. "Usually I'm in charge of the going-ons here, being the chief and all. Say, you two seem like you've been traveling through the woods for a while now. You must be incredibly thirsty."

"Actually now that you mention it we ran out of water a while ago and-" Silver was interrupted when a pair of villagers walked up right next to them. They each had a wooden cup of water that was handed to the both of them. Silver had accepted it gratefully while Sorun had slowly and cautiously taken the cup. "Oh, wow, thanks a bunch!" Silver said as he began to drink from the cup.

Sorun, on the other hand, did nothing but stare down into the cup. It looked clean enough. He still didn't want to drink it.

"Yeah, that's the last thing I need. Fucking otherworldly salmonella from whatever hole these backwoods hicks drew this out from." Silver seemed to have the polar opposite of Sorun's thoughts, since he was still drinking greedily from his cup. It was enough that Sorun wanted to smack him in the back of the head, but he thought against it. If his own stomach killed him later that would be his problem.

The village chief seemed to notice Sorun wasn't drinking and spoke up. "Something the matter?"

"You know, believe it or not I'm not all that thirsty despite cutting my way through the jungle back there," Sorun told him. "I mean thanks anyways, but yeah, I'm good."

"Oh no, no, that's quite alright," the chief assured him with a small nod. "It's not as if it's an act of back-breaking labor to get whatever water we can back to this village from the source. Who could possibly be cruel enough to judge someone for not partaking in a gift we so generously took from our limited supply of life-giving drinking water we would all die without?"

"Sounds like a you problem. I didn't ask for the water."

Apparently that hadn't been the response the chief was expecting, which caused Sorun's eyes to narrow. He didn't like that tone he'd used. That overly-friendly tone that was just on the edge of being patronizing. He didn't like the way he ordered those words around, either. It just sounded inherently scummy to Sorun's ears.

"Come to think about it, how had those other two guys been so ready with the water so quickly when we've only been here for barely three minutes?"

"Er, Sorun?" Silver's voice sounded apprehensive. When Sorun turned to look at him, he was caught giving Sorun an uncomfortable look. "Do you really have to be that way? They went out of their way to get us this. The least you could do is say thank you."

A spike of irritation and anger rose in Sorun. He took a deep breath to calm himself, and against his better judgement he drank the water. If need be he could just swap out Yamato for Devil's Body later if it really did make him sick. What happened afterwards would depend on his mood and how close Silver was in direct proximity to the village.

At least he didn't feel like dying of thirst anymore.

"Yeah, alright, thanks," Sorun quickly said after finishing off the water. "Anyways, Mobius Prime. Ever heard of it?"

The dithering, confused look the village chief gave him was not comforting. "Nope, afraid I've never heard the term. Mobius?"

"Yeah. Mobius. Home of Mobians." Sorun gestured to the chief with the hand holding the empty cut. "You know... Mobians?"

The chief shook his head. "Never heard of that, either."

"Christ, they don't even call themselves Mobians here," Sorun mentally sighed out. Well, at the very least it confirmed Sorun was, in fact, right all along and this was a giant waste of time. With how he felt, though, he wasn't even in the mood to gloat about it. He just wanted to leave. "Alright, Silver, you heard him. Let's bounce."

His shoulders hanging in disappointment, Silver nodded. "Yeah, coming." He handed the wooden cup back to the chief. Sorun had thrown his own over his shoulder as he departed, though it'd been surrounded by a teal glow and hovered in place before hitting the ground. Silver shot an irritated look at Sorun's back, and then used his powers to slot the cup into the one the chief was already holding. "I'm sorry about him. He's usually not like this," Silver apologized as he began backing up. The chief was looking down at the cups with a contemplative expression while Silver began backing up towards Sorun. "Thanks for the drinks! Love to stay, but we really gotta go!"

"I realize Silver has a point in that walking all the way back to the Prime Zone is gonna take too long," Sorun thought to himself as he walked away, "but for fuck's sake, we're not gonna find any help in places like this. Maybe I should just steal a hover car or something like that the next time he run into some futuristic zone. Silver'll give me hell for it if he finds out I stole it, but damn, at this point-"

"Well, actually, before you go there is one thing."

Sorun's mind had come to a screeching halt at the same moment his body froze. Silver had merely slowed down to a stop, a stark contrast to Sorun just abruptly freezing mid-stride, but while the hedgehog looked curious Sorun's frustration just grew.

It was the old, frail voice of that village chief they'd just tried to walk away from. Still talking. Why was he still talking when all Sorun wanted to do was walk away from him? He would have figured him throwing the cup would have been a good enough message that he wanted to get the hell out of here.

"Yeah?" Sorun asked, miraculously keeping his voice level as he turned around. The old timer was standing right behind him. "What do you want?"

"Well, it's just... I noticed your friend there could move things. You know, with his mind," the chief pointed out.

Sorun's eyes snapped to Silver. Surprisingly Silver was giving Sorun an admonishing look. "You threw the cup. I didn't want it to get dirty from the ground. It's his cup."

"You serious right now, man?"

"Sorun, I get you're really crabby right now, but that's not an excuse to be acting like this!"

"I am not ...!" He couldn't even finish the sentence. Even just uttering the word "crabby" felt like silent admittance that he was, and his pride wouldn't allow it. Instead Sorun just sighed out loudly, and ran a hand over his face as he turned to the chief. "Question still stands. What do you want?"

The chief put his cane in front of him while resting his two hands above it. "Well, the reason water is kind of hard to come by right now is because the old well recently dried up," he explained. "We're working on digging a new one, but for the time being we have to settle with carrying it all the way back from a local source."

"Make an irrigation system. Or use a wagon." The way Sorun said it, it didn't even sound like a suggestion. The words came out too harshly and clipped. With how frayed Sorun's nerves were it wasn't hard to see why. "The wheel was invented for a reason."

"Well, we've been making do with what we have, but, well, a lot of the people here in Gogoba Village are just too exhausted to do it now."

"Mhm."

"So," the village chief continued, "the water is somewhat lacking right now. I'm sure it's alright, though. It's not as if the hot summer sun beating down on all the children and elderly living here is drying them out even faster. Dehydration is treatable anyways."

A few seconds passed of the village chief and Sorun silently staring at each other. "Sounds like you have it handled," Sorun finally said.

The village chief was a bit too quick on the draw for his response to Sorun's liking. "Oh, yeah, true enough, true enough. I mean, why would the back-breaking work of lugging all that water from there to here dehydrate all the villagers even faster? I'm sure nothing disastrous like the village consuming more water than it can bring in and causing a subsequent collapse of public health could ever happen."

"Yikes. That does sound bad," Sorun agreed.

Now the village chief's eyes were narrowing in the same way Sorun's eyes were narrowed at him. "Yes. Yes, of course it does," he said. "It would truly be a tragedy that of course could be completely avoidable."

"Oh, this motherfucker." Now it was becoming clear what this Gogoba-thing was trying to get out of them. Sorun had been around the block enough to know this particular hustle, at least back on Earth. It was common enough, though he hadn't thought the old man in front of him would be so brazen as to try one of the oldest tricks in the book from where Sorun was from. "Well, I'm from Detroit. You can't get me with this shit."

Two could play at this game. You couldn't out-lazy a lazy person.

"It sounds to me like with smart planning on your part a tragedy like that could never happen," Sorun said, plastering a faux smile on his face. The nice accent he'd adopted couldn't sound more fake, but he didn't care enough to try and fix it. "Good thing a responsible chief like you is all over that. People here should be grateful."

The hands gripping the chief's cane tightened. Conversely, he fixed Sorun with a warm smile. Unlike the human's his seemed genuine. "Oh, of course. I could never be so careless as to endanger my community here. We're all practically family, after all. We Gogobas are just that nice," he informed Sorun. "So nice, in fact, we'll even give precious resources we can't afford to squander to complete strangers just to show our hospitality, and I'm a firm believer in good karma being rewarded. I'm sure nothing terrible like my own child succumbing to dehydration due to our unwavering kindness towards you could never happen with such a belief."

"And you know what, chief? I believe you. Every single word, a hundred percent. Readily and completely," Sorun said to him.

"Well, thank you very much," the chief said with an appreciative nod. "I guess if worse comes to worse all the children can starting sucking on the morning dew leaves for moisture if things really do become that dire."

"See, look at you. With forward thinking like that this village'll last for generations." Before the village chief could get another word out, Sorun turned around, patting Silver on the shoulder as he passed him. "Alright, Silver, let's go. You heard the guy. All's well here."

"Sorun..."

"Sweet baby boy Silver no." He knew that tone of voice well. The sadness intermingled with an eagerness to help. That sympathetic voice was the last thing Sorun wanted to hear coming out of Silver's mouth, and his fears were confirmed when he turned and saw Silver's expression. He looked torn. "No, no you can't be this naïve, fuck he would be, why am I even asking?"

"Sorun, we have have to help these people," Silver decided. Sorun didn't like how assertive he sounded. "I know we're on a kind of time-sensitive mission here-"

"Never before has the time been so sensitive, in fact," Sorun agreed, "which is exactly why we need get going and forget these guys even exist."

"But-!"

"Silver, are we gonna stop and help every single person with a problem along the way? 'Cause we're gonna be on this trip a while if you say yes." He wanted Silver to see sense, since obviously he wasn't seeing what was going on, but maybe logic would win him over. That was Sorun's hope, at least, but the hard look Silver was giving Sorun wasn't looking positive.

"We can spare an hour or two to help out. It's not that big a deal." Before Sorun could argue any further Silver turned to the village chief. "If you guys really need help digging that new well I can just use my powers to lift all the dirt out of the way. If you give me all the tools and materials, too, I could probably build the thing way faster than you guys can. I'm really great at the fine-manipulation stuff my teacher kept drilling into me."

"That's just great!" Sorun wanted to scream out in frustration when two more, younger Gogobas just appeared next to Silver, having been standing nearby. Like they'd been waiting. Just like with the water. Sorun immediately saw it for what it was this time, but Silver was happy enough to just go with them as they lead the oblivious Mobian away. Presumably towards where that new well was they well they were making.

The village chief didn't go with them. With sheer audacity that even floored Sorun he turned towards the human with the plainest smug look he had ever seen in his entire life. "Well," he began, sounding much too pleased with himself, "what about you?"

It took a phenomenal amount of willpower on Sorun's part to not reach for the sword he was still holding. "Me?" Sorun repeated in complete disbelief.

"It's just that this drought we're going through has put a strain on me, and between being a loving family man and the chief of this village it's hard for me to manage my side business of running the village pawnshop."

"Wow, you run a pawnshop. Why am I not surprised?" Sorun asked in a dry voice. "That sure sounds like a lot of responsibility for one person."

"Oh, I do my best. It's the least this village of kind, caring folk just trying to peacefully live their lives deserves, you know." That tone of voice he had, that friendly, patronizing tone, was making Sorun grit his teeth behind his closed mouth. "And I was just thinking that while your friend is helping with the well you could come with me to the shop to help me unload a bunch of boxes of stuff we got from the bigger village down the way."

"..." His anger flatlining on a dime, Sorun tilted his head at the village chief. "There's nobody else at the pawnshop to help you?" he asked.

"Nope. Not a one." A sigh that even sounded genuine left the chief's lips as he averted his yellow eyes from Sorun's calculating blue. "Not that you have to, of course. I'm sure these old bones of mine won't give out while I'm moving something heavy, causing my family to have to take time out of their day to help take care of me. I've been at this for years just fine, and even if something were to happen surely the village wouldn't suffer for it."

"And I'm sure, without a doubt, all these terrible, hypothetical situations that are surely unlikely to happen could be completely avoided if I just went with you, and you alone, right now to the pawnshop to help out," Sorun summed up. "Sure. Why not? I'll help out. Let's go, right now. No strings attached."

For such man claiming to be a bit more brittle than he ought to, he sure could turn towards Sorun rather quickly. "I didn't want to ask since you and your friend seem so busy with something, but if you really insist. Are you sure?"

The smile that spread over Sorun's face was genuine. "Sure thing, buddy. Pal."

He'd seen the hustle before. Back in Detroit. Hell, Earth in general.

At the precipice of it was psychology. Genuine psychology, the kind somebody needed a doctorate to understand, the kind people dedicated a lifetime to study. The kind of thing that, if a person was experienced enough, they could use their knowledge to understand the person in front of them in just a few words and glances and have them do anything within reason with the right application of words. Having a fair amount of charisma certainly helped.

Before psychology was verbal sparring, the peak mode of debate practiced solely by philosophers and politicians. Understanding the enemy and navigating through a battlefield of words while dodging japes and barbs. Splitting your attention down the middle to defend your own viewpoint while dissecting your opponent's viewpoints and perspective while coming up with counters of your own. The kind of thing that bored most people to tears unless it was over something somebody actually cared about.

Before debate was gaslighting. Everything from little brothers lying and saying it was their bigger brother that broke the expensive vase while they were playing around in the house to assailants twisting words and making it out like it was the victim's fault in whatever crime. Juvenile if not effective, at least in some cases. Depended on the people using this method and who they were using it on, really, but more often than not anybody who'd mastered debate and/or psychology could deflect it well enough.

Before all that was the time-honored tradition of guilt tripping. The foundation for mental manipulation, practiced more often than not by children. Or really desperate adults if they were pathetic enough. Sorun would admit to being guilty to guilt tripping, mostly against his mother. Mothers were surprisingly pliable when it came to their kids, Sorun's especially when he put on a mopey face when he wanted a new video game. He figured out why she was so susceptible to the guilt tripping when he got older. Regretted it immensely and started doing it less and less, but the habit had been hard to shake no matter how hard he tried. Even into his teens he'd caught himself doing it to her, particularly around birthdays and Christmases.

And now she was dead and he couldn't say he was sorry, so now it was one of his more greater regrets.

But he'd seen it used in other ways. Girlfriends at school acting all sad at their boyfriends so they'd buy them something. Friends who'd obviously been tweaking begging money from their friends because they felt like they were gonna die without their fix. The more crafty teens holding so-called "friendship" up above the head of clueless but rich acquaintances.

Oh, yes. Sorun knew the hustle well. It was primarily the reason why this was shaping up to be the worst day ever in the life of the Gogoba village chief who thought he was leading Sorun by the nose.

The worst part was Sorun couldn't figure out if he was a gifted manipulator or if he'd simply been coasting on his guilt tripping strategy due to easy marks. Mostly because he was new to this zone, and due to a lack of meeting the other locals he had no way of knowing how in the know people were to this kind of thing here. They didn't even use the term "Mobian" in this world, after all, but he wasn't sure how much the name actually mattered seeing as they were still animal people. And Mobians were naturally good-natured to a fault, so Sorun honestly wouldn't be surprised to learn such a transparent attempt at guilt tripping would actually be effective towards the common Mobian. Probably the same with the other residents of this island regardless of what they called themselves.

And Silver, who seemed to be the recent victim of this chief's fuckery, was possible the best possible person he could have guilt tripped. Mostly because, in addition to having a good heart, he had close to zero experience dealing with people and would have never developed the kind of mental defenses necessary to protect against this kind of thing; he genuinely took the chief's words to heart. Sorun was the opposite. He'd seen through the bullshit immediately, but he couldn't well and go call him out on it, especially since it seemed Silver was actually worried about the people here. The problem with the chief's method of guilt tripping was he was putting truth and genuine reasons to be concerned in his words. That was the draw.

Well, he looked old enough, so Sorun would wager he had some experience in this. Lies were more believable the more truth was used, and this was an extreme variation of that. He could almost respect it if he weren't being affected by this. But he was. So it had to be rectified.

Fortunately it seemed that Sorun's theory that the chief had built his manipulating experience on easy marks was likely true, because otherwise he would never have dared to have lead Sorun to a secluded location with no witnesses. Would have had enough sense to at least notice something was wrong otherwise.

"So this is your pawnshop, huh?" Sorun mumbled out. He wasn't surprised to see it was one of the more furbished-looking structures in the village. Solid wood walls and all. Still smallish, about the size of one of the huts. Open window in the front with some shelves and just enough room for someone to stand in, though based on its size it seemed there was enough room for a second room in the back. Storage, maybe.

He equally wasn't surprised to see it was near the village entrance. Draw in visitors, no doubt. And it was a fair distance away from the homes and other businesses. How about that.

"Yup, indeed." The chief lead Sorun to the back of the shop. There were a number of boxes piled up behind it, near a backroom door that lead into the shop itself. "Let me just get the door open here."

Wordlessly, Sorun nodded as he ran a hand over the boxes. There were quite a few of them, piled up to near Sorun's height. Cardboard, too, and taped shut. Implied there was modern civility out there somewhere and the low-tech look of this village wasn't the norm. Not too different from Mobius Prime now that Sorun thought about it. Either that or the logic in this zone was a bit jank. Sorun and Silver had been to weirder zones.

"You know, if you two are willing there's actually a whole lot of stuff here in the village you could help out with," came the village chief's voice to Sorun's ears as he examined the box. "Not that I'm implying you two should spend a week or two here helping out."

"Yeah?" Sorun brought his sword out halfway and pressed its edge against the nearest box. Blue energy briefly coalesced over the edge's blade, and then the tape sealing the box shut popped off in a messy coil. He touched the sticky side with his fingers, and nodded in satisfaction. Felt like all the adhesive was there. "Are you absolutely sure about that?"

"Of, of course. Not that you have to." The chief appeared next to Sorun and grabbed one of the smaller boxes with the hand not carrying his cane. "But it's just I noticed you had the sword."

Sorun turned around to stare at the chief's back. He was approaching the opened door to the back room of the pawnshop. A quick look around revealed there was nobody in sight. "What about the sword?" he asked.

"Well, it's just that sometimes we get trouble from one source or another, like that crazy guy with the robots. And I don't mean to sound presumptuous, but between your friend with the powers and you looking very comfortable with the sword you seem like you know how to handle yourselves."

"Your point? We're not staying around a couple of weeks to protect you from some nebulous threat." A threat that Sorun wasn't even sure existed. The robot comment had him worried, but it was pushed to the back of his mind with what was in front of him right now.

"That's your choice, I guess. But it'll probably be fine. Nobody in this village can really defend themselves and we'll be left completely helpless should the worst happen, but barely anything ever happens anyways so I'm sure I'm worrying over nothing." The chief stopped to glance at Sorun over his shoulder. "But that Silver guy seemed like a nice enough person, so maybe he'll think different."

At that moment Sorun made up his mind. "Nah, I get you. Pests. Can't help but hate 'em. Always getting in your way, and you can't help but just eradicate all of them so they stop bothering you." He began approaching the Gogoba's back as he returned to walking towards the open doorway. "You know, it's situations like these that I'm reminded of the lessons I was taught on the streets of Detroit."

Not wasting a breath, Sorun pulled the scabbard off of his sword. He flipped the blunt covering around, and then swung it as hard as he could to bludgeon the back of the Gogoba chief's head.

A short, pained yelp left the old man's mouth, and he crumpled flat to the ground. The box and cane fell out of his hands, the latter being kicked away by Sorun, who was now sheathing the sword while shaking his head.

"You'd think I'd feel bad for attacking an elderly person, but fuck, man, you're just a special kind of person, aren't you?" He turned around to the pile of boxes. "Wait right there, huh?"

He heard a soft groan leave the chief when he went to grab the bundle of tape he'd separated from the boxes. When Sorun turned back around he saw the chief trying to rise up to his knees while fumbling around for the cane that was nowhere near him. When Sorun returned he kicked him in the stomach, dropping him once again while making him elicit an airy gasp of pain.

"It's your own fault, you know. You know full well what you were doing. You know full well I saw it immediately. But you kept going and goading, knowing Silver didn't, to what? Fucking taunt me? Or were you just that oblivious? I bet you really are a fucking amateur and got off on coasting on easy marks like Silver your whole life if you didn't see this coming."

The old chief tried struggling when Sorun began taping his mouth shut. A growl of frustration left the teen, causing him to momentarily drop the Yamato just to begin punching him in the face.

"Settle down, settle the fuck down! Fuck!" He stopped hitting at the same time he felt something crack, around the same time a stream of red began dribbling out of the stunned Gogoba's nose. After his mouth was successfully taped Sorun began working on binding his arms. "Thought about shattering your kneecaps, make you upgrade from a cane to a wheelchair, but I'm not gonna go and cripple somebody for life for trying to run a shitty con. But I still need to do something about you."

The arms were done. Sorun moved on to taping the legs. "It's Silver, he's- well, you saw him. He's a sweet guy. I honestly really like him. Bit- no, more than a bit, he is dangerously naïve. Nothing wrong with that. Everybody back home's kind of naïve like that. I had it my way they'd always be like that, but then pricks like you pop up out of the woodwork and I gotta deal with it."

By now the chief was successfully bound in tape. He was starting to struggle again, muffled sounds coming out of his taped mouth, but Sorun ignored the struggling as he picked up the taped body.

"Man, you're light," Sorun idly noted as he began carrying the taped chief into the pawnshop. He was even shorter than Sorun, about Tails' height, actually, but even so he hadn't expected the body to weigh so little that he had no difficulty whatsoever carrying him. Quirk of this zone, maybe. "You should honestly be ashamed of yourself. Old timer like you pulling juvenile hustles like this. You're old, you're responsible for all the people in this village, on your own words you're a father. You're supposed to be a fucking example people aspire to, not some guilt tripping moron."

Sorun tossed the bound Gogoba onto the pawnshop's floor. He landed with a muffled grunt and continued squirming as Sorun left to go retrieve the Emerald he'd dropped. A second later he returned, katana in hand, closing the door as he looked around. His previous assertion that this was some sort of storage room seemed to be true, because he couldn't see the open window counter in here he'd seen at the front. There was barely any light in here except for was little light was bleeding through gaps in the wall and through the partially-closed doorway.

He only needed to take a cursory glance around to see that there was a small closet nearby. Testing the handle found it was unlocked, and when Sorun opened it, he was pleased to find that it was empty save for a few hung clothing items. Good enough for his purposes.

"That's the heart of the matter, really. Your hustle," Sorun said, turning around and looking down at the bound chief. He'd stopped struggling and was staring up at Sorun with wide, fearful eyes. "Nobody likes being hustled, least of all me. Never did forgive the last guy that hustled me. But pulling that shit on Silver of all people?" Sorun shook his head. "He doesn't deserve to be taken advantage of like that. But that's not even the full issue, mister chief."

Crouching down next to the Gogoba's head, and staring down to meet his eyes, Sorun said, "The problem here is that this journey Silver and I are on? Hella important. Literally a matter of life and death, and we're pressed for time. So you can imagine why I take severe umbrage at you trying to guilt trip us, mainly Silver 'cause he's the only one buying your spiel, to stay here to help out with menial shit. There're lives depending on us. If those lives are lost 'cause you stalled us...?"

There was a soft, scraping sound. The chief's eyes shrunk to fearful pinpricks at the sight of a katana's tip hovering mere centimeters over his face, held there by Sorun who continued to regard the chief with an apathetic glare.

"That's on you," Sorun quietly continued. "As such you decided to make this a game of us versus you. I win games. And I could kill you really easily right now."

The chief's breathing began to pick up and become heavier. At least as heavy as he could make it due to breathing out of a broken nose, and he began struggling again as muffled, unintelligible pleas came out of his taped mouth. He stopped when Sorun pulled the sword away and sheathed it.

"... Problem with that is you're an unarmed old man that can't even defend himself right now. More than that you have family, and I'm daring to assume that just maybe you're actually a decent leader here. Even if I could get away with it, and I could get away with it pretty easily, I don't wanna ruin people's lives. That, uh... it wouldn't sit right with me." Not said was the paranoid voice in the back of Sorun's mind telling him what would happen if people he actually cared about ever found out he murdered a defenseless old man. He had no idea how they'd find out, but he didn't want to think about consequences like that. Easier and simpler for everyone if he just shoved the guy in a closet for somebody else to find once he and Silver were far away from this zone.

He wanted to stab him, though. He could do it right now with no effort. Nearly had before his conscience took hold and started whispering to Sorun on why he shouldn't go and kill an old man for something that barely even registered as a petty crime. So it was into the closet he went.

"Really, you're lucky that out of all the humans on Earth that got pulled into this situation it was me," Sorun grunted out as he positioned the chief's body in the closet. "There were some real psychos out there. All good in there?"

Muffled screams was the only answer given to Sorun after the bound chief was set in the closet. He was still struggling against the tape, sitting there in that admittedly cramped space, still looking towards the human as he grabbed hold of the closet doors.

"Just make a bunch of screaming and thrashing sounds and I'm sure somebody'll come around and get you out of here. Eventually. You know, by the time Silver and I are long gone from here." He began to close the doors, but then stopped halfway. "Oh, one more thing. Don't send people after me for this," Sorun warned him, making the chief freeze. "Revenge is a fool's game, but more than that you really won't like what happens if I have to come back to this dive."

Having said the final word, Sorun slammed the closet doors closed. It hadn't done all that much to muffle the sounds of struggle on the inside, but that was probably for the best. He stood up, making his way out of the backroom but deciding to leave the door behind him cracked open. Hopefully if the noise didn't clue anyone in then that would when somebody inevitably came around to investigate the missing chief.

"Why do people always feel the need to make my life harder? Sheesh." Taking one last look at the back of the pawnshop, Sorun shook his head and started walking away from it. "Alright, now where the hell is Silver?"

There was a sneaking suspicion Sorun had that some of, if not possibly all, and if that was seriously the case then Sorun worried for this place, the Gogoba villagers were in on the whole guilt trip thing the chief tried pulling on him before he shoved him in a closet. It was more than just how those two randos just happened to have been so close to he and Silver with that water so quickly when it'd been offered. Ones he passed had a similar look to that chief. Not the exact same, but close enough. Apathetic friendliness.

It was borderline shifty, and now that Sorun knew what to look for he really could see it on their faces. The chief hadn't nearly been as easy to read; maybe that was just age and experience, though Sorun didn't really know. It was almost enough to creep him out. He found his footsteps becoming quicker the longer it took to find Silver.

Fortunately enough he'd eventually found him. He was, thankfully, clear on the other end of the village from the pawnshop where he'd assaulted an old man. When he found him Sorun was shocked to find that the well, the entire well, seemed to already be built. The brick lining around the hole was even already done, with a rope, a bucket, and other miscellaneous parts to make a pulley sitting on the ground next to it.

Silver was nearby, too, looking no worse for wear, much to Sorun's surprise. He seemed to notice the human's baffled staring, causing him to wave and approach him.

"Sorun! Hey." He stopped right next to Sorun, smiling widely as he turned to look at the well. "It's pretty cool, huh?"

"... Silver, how deep is that well?" Sorun asked after a few moments of silent staring.

"Around forty meters. Why?"

With shocked eyes Sorun turned to Silver. "Dude I was gone for like twenty minutes. How'd you manage to build a well that deep that quickly?"

Shrugging, Silver said, "With my powers? It's not that hard when all I have to do is pick everything up and set everything in place with my mind. I had to dig a bunch of wells for Master and I back in the future whenever we ran out of water."

"... Wow, that's pretty good, man." Credit where credit was due, it was pretty impressive. Especially to Sorun, who doubted he could do such a feet even if he had all of his powers to work with. Said a lot about Silver, too. Sorun didn't know how much forty meters of dirt weighed, but it was probably a lot. "Anyways, seeing as the well's all built and everything, can we leave now?"

"Huh?" Silver glanced back at the well, and then looked back at Sorun. He had an unsure look on his face. "Are you sure?" he asked.

"I mean, I'm pretty sure the people here can handle the rest now that the well's there, but are you sure there isn't something else that chief guy wanted us to-?"

"Nope, just got done talking with him," Sorun quickly interrupted. He slinked right besides Silver, draping his arm over his shoulders while giving him a wide grin. "Silver, you should have seen it. That guy was so blown away by your generosity to help that I was worried he'd have a heart attack on the spot, bless his old heart. I think he even felt kind of bad he asked us to do this much. In fact I'd bet my boots he'd absolutely refuse to allow us to do a single other chore around this village he was so overcome with gratitude."

"W-whoa, really?" Stars were practically dancing in Silver's eyes. He looked awestruck. "Well, golly, Sorun, I didn't know he'd appreciate it so much-"

"The appreciation was out of this world. So much so I can guarantee you he will never ask us to do a single thing ever again." The arm around Silver's shoulder shook the white hedgehog a bit, after which Sorun disengaged and walked away a few steps. "But hey, now that this is all settled we should really get going. Got our own problems to worry about and all that. These guys should be fine now that the well's here."

For a second Sorun was worried Silver would disagree, and that for some inane reason or another Silver would want to stay for a bit. He'd already began brainstorming as many excuses as Sorun could think of in order to draw Silver out of this village so they could just get going already. He visibly sagged in relief when Silver nodded and began walking.

"Yeah, I guess you're right. This should be more than enough to help the people here out," Silver agreed as he walked alongside Sorun. "Maybe we should find that chief guy, though? Say goodbye or-"

"Nah, he said he'd taken enough of our time and not to worry about it," Sorun said with a wave of his hand. "Dude was really understanding of our situation and felt bad enough as it was. I think we should just go."

"Alright."

The silent cheers Sorun's mind made were nearly audible as they left the village.

"Chalk up another place I can never again visit in my entire life."

This kind of thing seemed to keep happening the further and further along this trip went for Sorun. On the upside the sight of that accursed village slowly disappearing behind them as they left was a welcome sight; of all the locations he'd had to blacklist this was one of the ones he was more than happy to ignore forever. If not for the monumental waste of time than because of the people that lived there.

Could have been worse, Sorun supposed. At least Silver looked really happy with himself as they walked along the jungle trail. The well did some good for his morale, so at the very least there was that.

Sorun couldn't say he was in quite as high of spirits as him. Not because of the experience he'd had there - though in no small part did it contribute to Sorun's dour mood -, but because of something that chief said before Sorun wrapped him in tape. The "crazy guy with the robots" he had mentioned that Sorun had been thinking about in the back of his head.

He didn't want to think there was an Eggman in this world, but the problem with that was that Silver and him had run into alternate versions of Mobians Sorun knew in practically every zone they'd visited. At the very least almost all of them had a Sonic, and that was hard enough for Sorun to cope with. He didn't know why he of all people was so important to be virtually ubiquitous throughout the whole multiverse, but he was. This weird, annoying blue constant Sorun had to deal with no matter where he went.

It was probably sheer luck the traveling pair had encountered so many Sonics or other alternate versions of Sorun's friends without encountering an Eggman yet, but that luck was bound to run out at some point. Sorun was tempted to just make them a portal right now so they could leave the zone and just move on. He nearly did, but an idea had been brewing in Sorun's mind.

"The fact is we're making no progress at this rate. Just walking back to the Prime Zone isn't feasible. It's doable, but it's gonna take too long," Sorun thought to himself as he walked alongside Silver. "We need some way of speeding this along. A really fast ship or car or plane. A machine that can just make us a portal to the Prime Zone. Something . 'Cause at this rate... nah, it's just not working. And we'd need nothing short of a genius who can make technologically miraculous machinery in a shockingly small amount of time to get us something like that. Eggman fits, but, well... if he's anything like the one I know I can't just flat out ask the guy for help."

Sorun's eyes trailed down. He was holding the Yamato with both hands, his fingers running along the dark scabbard holding his blade. A contemplative frown held his features.

"I wonder... do I really have to ask?"

"For example. If I stabbed you with the Yamato, I could use it to separate you from your ability to speak. I'm not saying that like it'd take your vocal cords or carve your speaking knowledge out of your brain or something like that; the idea, the simple concept of speaking, would be taken from you. Even if you were physically able to speak, and had full knowledge of speaking, you wouldn't be able to ever talk again. Because the Yamato separated out your ability to talk from you.

"Or I could separate other things. Separate out your intelligence, rob you of your genius status. Take certain memories away. Memories of your children, your family, but leave the intelligence. Separate out your inhibitions so you couldn't say no. I could wipe away your entire personality and lobotomize you into being a little genius slave. That's pretty gross, huh?"

Back then he really had been messing around with Tails when he'd said all that. Not that he couldn't do it, because his Yamato really was capable of that kind of thing, but because he'd been truthful when he said he wasn't someone like Eggman and would never use its powers for something like that.

It was more than principle; more than not wanting to stoop down to the same level as someone Sorun hated more than anyone else in the whole multiverse, which was saying a lot. It was because the idea disgusted him to no end. He couldn't help picturing himself in that position, some foreign power stripping him of aspects of his personality until he was nothing but a hollow slave. He felt even worse when he pictured it happening to people he cared about. It made him sick to think something similar along those lines happened to Mobians who'd been roboticized by Robotnik back on Mobius Prime; from what he'd heard people retained their memories of the experience and were fully aware during that time without being able to control themselves. Stuff of nightmares, really. Sorun himself couldn't imagine.

He didn't even know if doing something similar with the Yamato was worse or not since at least they probably wouldn't be aware of what he was doing if he did it right. Something as awful as this probably couldn't even be measured on a scale.

Simply rewriting someone like that, it was the ultimate violation of a person's dignity and individuality. The kind of thing that left permanent mental scars, assuming those alterations were ever undone. If it was permanent it was a fate worse than death; Sorun would go as far as to say, pragmatically speaking, it was death.

Death of the original person to be replaced by whatever was left, especially if it couldn't be undone. A concept that was more and more applicable the more severe the changes.

Brainwashing, mental suggestions, possession, whatever the roboticization process could even be classified as, all of it. Sorun hated all of it. Hated the idea of it being done to him, and it was almost instinctual how he hated the idea of it happening to anyone else because of how revolting he found it. It's why he never wanted to do it, even if he technically could with Yamato. He'd rather just kill someone than subject them to that if there really was no better alternative. No sapient being deserved something like that happening to them. Not even someone as horrible as Eggman, as weird as the sentiment felt to Sorun. To say nothing less of what people he cared about would think if they knew he ever did something like that.

But the problem was he was desperate for a solution. And the prospect was becoming awfully tempting to Sorun.

"Am I seriously considering this?" He found it disturbing how inviting the idea sounded. It would be easy. Stab this zone's Eggman and separate a few mental aspects out here and there and he'd have a miracle worker of a slave. "I could just put him back to normal after, right? The separated aspects of his psyche'd have to go somewhere as physical manifestations, so I could probably put him back together- but that wouldn't change the fact I still fucking did it, would it? I'd still leave a man mentally scarred forever- fuck, what if this is the gateway to doing it again sometime down the line?"

Maybe this was why the Batman never killed anybody. It opened up a dangerous line of thinking. "If it was okay that one time then how come it isn't okay this time?" Sorun could see it, except instead of just killing people it was using his magic katana he stole from a video game to mind-rape people out of convenience. How it could easily slip into becoming an excuse to do it again on someone else later, and he didn't trust himself not to abuse it. It honestly scared him how easily he could see that slippery slope and how it could go so wrong so quickly.

He didn't want to consider it an option. He didn't even want to entertain the idea.

But Mobius Prime was potentially doomed if he and Silver didn't get back fast enough. To not have this zone's Eggman do something to get them there quicker was gambling on them finding a solution in some further zone. Gambling on lives. His friends' lives. All for the sake of a person who was probably as bad as his Prime variant.

"I mean, it's Eggman, would anybody really even care if I... that's not the problem, the problem is this is fucking wrong. If I just kill him after, maybe even just separate out the memories- no, that just justifies something than can't be justified. Does it matter if it means getting a way back? Does it matter if nobody ever finds out? But I'll know, and really that's what matters the most. Fucking fuck... maybe I can just threaten the guy at swordpoint?"

"Sorun? You okay there?"

Sorun's head shot up. He took a shuddering breath, and then looked to the side, where Silver was. The Mobian was giving him a concerned look.

"You looked really worried about something, Sorun," Silver continued. "Is everything alright?"

"... Yeah. Yeah, everything's good, Silver. Thanks," Sorun mumbled out. "Just thinking about something the chief said."

"Oh?" Silver's head perked up in interest. "What is it?"

"Hhhh... there might - I stress might - be someone here that can help us out with getting to Mobius Prime faster." Sorun's fingers ran along the sword's scabbard. "I'm thinking we should have a word with him."

A/N- Alright, fine, I'll admit it. I watched the cartoon. I Thought it was kind of good. We're spending a bit of time here before going back to Mobius Prime.

Chapter 87

A/N- This one went on way longer than I thought it would. I wanted to cut it into two chapters, but I made that stupid promise that I'd wrap it up in this chapter and we'd make it back to Mobius Prime by the next one, so here, you get this.

Recursion Error

Episode 87- The big weird

"..."

"Sorun?"

"I'm going to scream if they named the village after him."

Apparently there was a main, central village that most of the people on this island lived at. They'd asked around when they ran into some people while walking around the island. More animal people, because apparently the term "Mobian" wasn't used here despite the fact they seemed visually indistinguishable from Mobians Sorun had seen. Probably a quirk of this zone. Or maybe even a quirk of Mobius Prime in that the animal people there were called Mobians.

Sorun didn't know, nor did he care. He'd still call them Mobians, if only because it sounded more dignified than calling everyone an animal person.

Anyways, they'd been pointed to this village. It seemed rather large, at least compared to that last village they'd been to. The buildings from the outside looked to be of modern make and the handful of Mobians Sorun saw wandering around the inside had modern clothing on. He even saw a cop wander past in police dress blues. It almost seemed out of place with all the trees around them.

It was a genuine breath of fresh air until Sorun looked up at the sign in front of the village and saw what the place was called.

Hedgehog Village

He'd shoot himself if he could.

"What's wrong with the name?" Silver asked. He seemed worried over the fact that Sorun was visually seething at the sight of the sign, and took a tentative step towards Sorun. "Seriously, what's wrong?"

"If there's an Eggman here, then it's pretty much a sure thing that there's a Sonic here, and the idea people here like him so much they named the village after him just- ugh, I can't even put it into words." Sorun spun away from the sign in anger, pacing back a few times while putting his free hand on his face to try and calm down the throbbing in his head. "It'd be just like him to let them, too, him and his ego."

"... Sorun, what's your problem with Sonic?" The question caused Sorun to turn back towards Silver, who was giving him a questioning look. "Every time we run into an iteration of him in one of the other zones you get this look on your face like you'd rather be anywhere but near him."

"That's mostly due to the fact I'd rather be back on Mobius Prime right now."

"Yeah, sure, but you always act differently around him no matter what version it is." The deflection hadn't worked, so Sorun had turned his back to Silver so he didn't have to address him anymore. But the white hedgehog kept questioning him. "Sorun, come on, I'm trying to help. What do you have against Sonic?"

What didn't he have against him? Sorun didn't really want to answer that question, or pursue the matter any further with Silver, but he could tell from his tone that he didn't want to let it go. A large part of him hoped that he could say the bare minimum and get Silver to drop it so they could keep going, but it hadn't worked. So with a deep sigh Sorun hung his shoulders and turned back around towards him.

"Our personalities just don't really mesh," Sorun answered. "Sonic Prime, guy I know, is a genuinely good person but the more I got to know him the more..." He trailed off, frowning slightly at his own words. "No, that's not a good way to put it. Back when we first met he..." No, he didn't want to get into that, either. "... It's complicated. I don't want to talk about it."

"Does... does he know you have some kind of problem with him?"

"No, I never told him. He thinks we're completely cool with each other." Sorun sighed and looked back up at the sign. "I mean for all intents and purposes we are , so I never really brought it up since I didn't want to cause problems, but it, uh... look, just leave it alone, Silver. It's nothing."

"Okay, I guess." Silver didn't look like he especially understood what Sorun was saying, but he'd shrugged it off when Sorun kept looking up at the village sign. "So are we going in?"

"Yeah, sure."

Walking into the village proper Sorun felt mildly underwhelmed with the place. Silver seemed to like it based on the way he kept looking around at everything, but he always did that no matter where they visited. Still overwhelmed by all the new sights despite them doing this for a week now, but the guy had been living in an empty apocalypse before now, so Sorun couldn't blame him all that much.

As for himself, he couldn't say much. Looked nice enough, but New Mobotropolis spoiled him on nice-looking communities. The tropical texture was at least a nice change of pace. The people seemed...

well, like people, not much Sorun could observe there. Seemed like overall a nice place.

"Fuck am I doing?" Sorun mentally sighed at himself. "Trying to distract myself with the sights so I don't have to think about the fact I have to scramble somebody's brains? Still don't even know if I should. If it comes down to it I might gotta, but..."

Sorun's eyes wandered over to Silver. He wouldn't approve. At all. Hell, he took aversion to just robbing people, so Sorun could imagine what his stance on a forced magical lobotomy would be considering how horrifying the concept was. In fact Sorun didn't think there was a single person he was acquainted with back on Mobius Prime that would agree with what Sorun was planning. Not even Shadow, and he was the only single person on board with the whole "hey why don't we just kill Eggman?" plan.

That probably said a lot for how bad an idea this was.

And this wasn't a crime he could just do behind Silver's back and then forget about when they left the zone like he'd been doing this whole time. If by some chance Sorun really did pull this off Silver would probably ask how Sorun magicked them up a way home, and he somewhat doubted telling him this zone's Eggman was feeling generous with their plight would quite cut it. He'd object, heavily, and even if they still got to the Prime Zone regardless he'd likely tell the others and Sorun would have to deal with that for the rest of his life. Best case was that Silver would shun him forever, worst case... well. The whole roboticization disaster made every Mobian over there skittish about things like this, so he could see how this could go so wrong so quickly.

And that was all assuming this Eggman even could get them a way home. For all Sorun knew he couldn't after all and he was stressing about all this over nothing.

Even still, if he had half the brain of his prime counterpart, that'd still more than likely make him the smartest person on this planet. A chance at getting back was still a chance, which was a lot more than the whole lot of nothing they had otherwise. Push came to shove Sorun was getting this Eggman to get them a way back if it was in his ability, one way or another. He just didn't know how to mitigate the consequences yet.

"So what's the plan for finding this zone's Eggman?" Silver suddenly asked, causing the pair to come to a stop. He fully turned to Sorun, asking, "Are we just going to ask around or what?"

Sorun shrugged. "Probably will have to, yeah," he admitted. "I don't have a better idea, but if he's as infamous as the prime one then it shouldn't be that hard. Besides, I don't think we're gonna run into him just bumbling around town-"

"This is outrageous!"

If he was in a better mindset Sorun would have been startled over how the world was so quickly tuned out from his senses. How the edges of his vision darkened, how sounds became muted and his breathing became oddly even. He couldn't even take note of any of this because his entire being was instantly locked onto that voice he heard. It was almost an exact match for Eggman Prime's voice. Tiny bit different, maybe, but it was all too recognizable.

With a stiffened body, Sorun turned towards the source of the noise. Silver had turned as well, but at this moment his very presence wasn't even registering with Sorun. The only thing in the whole world that existed right now was that voice, the person it was attached to, and the sword resting in his itching hands.

He was there. A couple houses over, right there in the middle of the street. Standing out in front of a shop and in front of a Mobian. All the rest of the details flew past him when he saw the man himself. Tall, large, wearing red, bald head, the damn goggles on his forehead and mustache. An image that was superimposed on all the memories Sorun knew of the man, flashing in front of him and blurring them all together into some twisted collage Sorun felt a burning hatred just witnessing.

At that moment, all the reservations he felt over using the Yamato so invasively on him faded in an instant. Sorun's right hand grabbed the Yamato's handle, with his eyes glaring scornfully at the man. Green began to flash in his blue irises as he made the motion to pull the sword out-

"I mean, come on! A thirty dollar late fee!? You're more evil than I am!"

It was almost like all of Sorun's anger was welled up inside a balloon, and hearing that sentence leave Eggman was like somebody popping that balloon with a needle. It all faded in an instant. The pounding rage in his ears, the muffling of sounds and tunnel vision he had been experiencing, and all the tenseness left his muscles so violently he was practically limp. His arms simply hung lifelessly at his sides as he stared with solid blue eyes at the sight in front of him.

"What did... what... fucking what ?" He'd misheard. Had to have. The idea that this Eggman was even abiding by enough laws to be in a position to complain about late fees, implying he'd rented something through legal means, was mind-boggling enough. And then he focused on the actual issue. "THIRTY DOLLARS !? That's highway robbery!"

"It's highway robbery!" Eggman bellowed out. Sorun silently screamed as he stared on, completely baffled. "You're acting like I've been hogging the movie when I was only a day late on the return! You're really telling me 'Tale of a Troubled Tumbleweed' is so popular everyone here is chomping at the bit to see it!? It's a five-year-old movie, for crying out loud!"

"Dude, I just work here," the Mobian standing in front of him said in an uncaring, apathetic tone.

Sorun's jaw hung open. It was only through experience dealing with worlds' worth of nonsense that let him keep up, and even then he couldn't believe what he was seeing. "... Where the hell am I right now?"

"Hey, Sorun?" A small tug on his sleave caused a dumbfounded Sorun to turn his head. Silver was staring at the spectacle with what seemed as much confusion as Sorun held, though even while looking away he continued to tug on Sorun's sleeve. "Is that the evil egg person you keep talking about? He doesn't look like those egg things I ate for breakfast in that one zone."

"W-w... well he's not exactly Humpty Dumpty, but- wait, you're more right than you think." Upon further examination Sorun realized this Eggman didn't even look like the one he knew. That Eggman, Eggman Prime, had proportions that were borderline grotesque. Spindly arms and legs that were too thin attached to a spherical torso topped with an equally round head. Something that would have defied rational design if Sorun didn't know that the body he used had originally been mechanical in nature before being turned organic, though from what he heard the original organic body hadn't looked much better in comparison. Nobody ever took a picture for Sorun to compare. Probably for the best, really.

This Eggman wasn't at all like that. He wasn't even fat, not by Sorun's definition at least. Still weirdly disproportionate, maybe, but this one's limbs had actual meat on them. And his torso was less fat and more just large and extremely barrel-chested. There was still something distinctly inhuman about it, but it was less monstrously disproportionate like Eggman Prime and more being simply top-heavy.

"... Dude looks like a 'One Piece' character," Sorun muttered out after a few long moments of observation.

This time Silver did look towards Sorun when he spoke to him. "What's a 'One Piece'?"

A deep, heavy sigh left Sorun. "I'll never know now, will I, Silver?" he bit out angrily. Years of keeping up with that series and pirating manga chapters all for naught once life on Earth ended...

"Listen, man, I'm gonna level with you. Contrary to what the scale of some of my greater machinations would imply I'm not exactly rolling around in dough. You know how much it costs to ship materials all the way out here?" It was so odd to Sorun's ears to hear Eggman, even if it was alternate version of him, speak so casually. No condescending tone, no clever snark, no veneer of insanity. It almost sounded wrong to hear. "You can't let it slide just this once?"

The Mobian shrugged. "Store policy, man. Can't help ya."

Eggman crossed his arms. "Well maybe I just won't pay the late fee. What do you think of that, huh?"

"Then, uh... I guess I'm just have to call the cops."

"I should call the cops on you for price gouging! There's probably laws against this kind of thing!"

The two continued to argue back and forth, to a point that it just became incomprehensible jargon to the pair watching. Sorun himself was still stuck on the strange juxtaposition between the Eggman he was seeing now and the one stuck in his memories, and was barely even paying attention to what they were arguing about. Silver, on the other hand, was making a vested effort in keeping up, his head going back and forth to look at each speaker, but eventually he made a frustrated groan to signify him giving up, and then turned back to Sorun.

"Okay, I'm completely lost here," Silver said, throwing up his hands in the air while shaking his head. "What are they even arguing about?"

"Huh?" Sorun blinked his eyes a few times to give his brain time to catch up with the question. "Oh, Eggman's trying to weasel his way out of paying a late fee. Guess he returned a rental movie too late or something."

The confusion on Silver's face didn't falter. It only increased. "And what's a late fee?" he asked in a lost voice.

With a completely straight face, Sorun answered, "It's an evil practice perpetrated by people with no compassion for the common man, Silver."

"Oh. Okay." Nodding in understanding, Silver turned back to the arguing pair. "So is the store clerk in the wrong here?"

Sorun followed Silver's gaze. "Nah, I think he just works there."

"Um... but wait, hold on." Silver eye ridges furrowed. "Why is a late fee a bad thing? Don't they need to give people some kind of incentive to return stuff they borrow?"

"Yeah, but it's thirty dollars, Silver," Sorun argued, gesturing out towards the rental store. "You know how much thirty dollars here is?"

"Well, no. Not really. We just got here. We actually don't know what the value of money here is," Silver reminded Sorun. "It changes every zone we go to."

"... Since when?"

"What do you mean, since when!? You should be paying more attention to it than me! You're the one that keeps buying us food every time we run out!"

Sorun made a sharp inhale, and then he quickly coughed. "Oh yeah, right, that, now I remember. Totally."

"Enough of this!" The indignant yell from Eggman nearby caused Sorun and Silver to look back over at him. Both did double-takes, with Sorun in particular stuttering a bit in confusion. He was more than sure there hadn't been twenty robots standing around Eggman ten seconds ago when he'd been looking at him. Now there were, as if they'd been pulled in from the middle of nowhere.

If that weren't enough these weren't even the same robots that Sorun got used to in Mobius Prime. They still looked cartoonish compared to the ones he knew by heart, but somehow these seemed moreso. All painted red with big, blue eyes for visual sensors. And they weren't modeled after him. They seemed to be modeled after creatures. Bees and crabs. And ladybugs that had a wheel for a body for some weird reason.

It felt strange to Sorun to go from killer robots with guns and lances to these things. They didn't even seem half as threatening. Like downgrading from a Terminator to a little RC drone.

"People like you that are enabling these cutthroat business practices are part of the problem!" Eggman roared out. With a stomp of his foot the robots threateningly... or at least as threatening as they could look... advanced on the Mobian clerk. Apparently to him they were threatening because he'd gulped and taken a step back. "I won't let you maintain a stranglehold on my wallet any longer! You're going to void my late fee or else! Or at least give me a steep discount, I'm not unreasonable, because come on, man, really? Thirty dollars?"

Silver gasped out at the sight of the robots converging towards the store. "Sorun, he's going attack that guy with those robots! We gotta help him!"

"I dunno." Scratching the back of his head, Sorun gave the group of robots an unsure look. The next words that came out of his mouth pained him to say it, but he couldn't lie in this case. "I kinda agree with Eggman on this. Thirty bucks is pretty bogus."

Silver whirled to Sorun. He looked aghast at what he just heard. "That doesn't give him the right to attack someone over it!" he yelled out. "Why aren't you more worried about this!?"

"Silver, I grew up in a city where people shot each other for less. This isn't all that new to me."

The hedgehog flinched at that, but continued unabated. "W-well, we can't just stand here and do nothing!"

He had a point there, even if Sorun didn't want to admit it. He couldn't let this slide in good conscience even if he didn't want to get involved at all. It was a realization that made Sorun slump his shoulders and sigh out loudly as he lethargically turned back to the source of the impending attack where the robots were advancing on the store clerk. Still. They were still approaching him at an agonizingly slow pace.

"Okay they're going really slow for some reason, but whatever, let's go." It was probably the unenthused tone of voice Sorun adopted that made Silver shoot him a unimpressed glare before running off towards the robots. Sorun followed behind at a significantly slower pace, enough that his feet were dragging on the ground and leaving small trenches, with his sword bobbing up and down he had such a loose grip on it.

Silver had already planted himself between the group of robots and the store clerk by the time Sorun got close enough to matter. He stood just to the side of the altercation. Despite his involvement, he couldn't bring himself to appear that eager to be in the middle of this. He could practically feel the tired, I-don't-want-to-be-here-right-now expression dragging on his face. And he certainly felt it.

Then again, maybe in some weird way this was a good thing. It was technically an in with the Eggman of this zone, so now all that was left was getting around to coercing him for help. How that was gonna work with Silver so close was something Sorun had no clue on how to pull off. The wait and see approach it was, then, if only to see how this played out. Maybe he might learn something to help with their problem. That's what the shriveling optimist inside of Sorun hoped for, at least.

"Hey!" His arms and legs spread wide to act as a shield to the store clerk behind him, Silver had glared up angrily past the small legion of machines and up at Eggman. Unlike Sorun, he seemed fully awake right now, and more than that genuinely angry at what he was seeing. "I don't care what your problem is! You can't just attack somebody for charging late fee prices that might or might not be expensive!" He looked behind his shoulder and at the clerk. "Hey, is thirty dollars a lot here?"

"Yeah, it's a lot," the clerk confirmed with a nod.

"Oh." Expression cracking a bit, Silver whipped his head back towards Eggman. "Uh, s-still!"

Sorun scratched at his cheek. He wondered what the food here was like. "Kinda hungry. Really hope they have fries here. Haven't had a good fry in- ooh, wait, this is a tropical island, maybe they have coconuts! I've never had one of- oh, wait, yeah I have. Back with Razor. They're shit." His hand fell away from his face as he looked up in thought. "Maybe mangoes? I've heard good things about them."

While Sorun was preoccupied with lunch, Eggman had barked out a single, maniacal laugh while pointing at Silver. "Well, if it isn't my old nemes- hold on, something isn't right here." The wide grin on Eggman's face turned into a confused expression. He pulled his hand back and wiped at the blue lenses of his spectacles, as if attempting to clear something, though his expression only maintained being puzzled. "Sonic, did... did you bleach your fur and quills or something? And why does your voice sound really whiny now?"

"Huh...?" Silver reacted like he'd been slapped across the face. "H... hey, that's not a very nice thing to say..."

"Okay, I feel like I'm missing something. Are you not Sonic, or...?" Eggman's unseen gaze seemed to wander towards Sorun. His head snapped to him once he was noticed, and just like before Eggman pointed towards the coat-wearing teen. "Aha! Well, if it isn't my old nemes- oh come on, you're not him, either. The blue threw me off." A beat passed. Eggman leaned forwards a bit to look at Sorun, and then reared back in shock. "Egads! Well, I'll be! Another human! And here I thought I was the last one in the whole world."

Sorun's face fell at hearing that. He couldn't even tell if he was feeling disappointment or resignation right now. "Seriously? Here, too? Why does humanity keep dying out wherever I go?"

"... I have multiple questions about that statement," Eggman said. "But enough about that. Have either of you two seen Sonic and his friends around? They're usually here about now."

Sorun tilted his head in confusion. "You're... expecting them? Why?"

"I don't know, this is just our thing, you know? I do something villainous, they fight to stop me, I mean we have a whole weekly schedule around it and everything," Eggman casually answered, causing Sorun to reel in surprise. "I had to drag out the ol' 'threatening advancement of my forces' thing really hard since they're taking so long." He gestured to his feet at one of his robots. "Poor crab-bot unit two-seven-three here's an old model. He can't menacingly snap his claws like he used to and these long engagements are murder on his servos."

In response, the crab robot nearest to Eggman hefted its pincers up in the air and snapped. Instead of making a metallic tink! sound, the claws made a loud, grating sound as they snapped closed, as if something on the inside was rusted. There weren't even any sparks when the metal pincers touched.

Sorun didn't have the words to encapsulate the inane display he was witnessing. All he could do was stare.

"Well, anyways, uh... hm." Eggman examined a digital, watch-looking device on his wrist. "Okay, listen, my shows are going to come on pretty soon, so since Sonic's taking forever to get here you think you guys could sub in for him? You two are hero-types, right?"

Silver, discarding his previous hurt look, gave an enthusiastic nod. "Of course!"

Sorun couldn't have mustered a single shred of enthusiasm if he tried. "Eh... on a good day, I guess."

"Alright, good enough. You both are tagged in." After clearing his throat, Eggman began to suck in a deep breath. "Annnnd...!"

Sorun rose his right hand up. "Wait, hold on, seriously what's going on-?"

"ATTACK!"

Apparently that was the tolling bell for whatever insanity they'd been dragged into. The robots surged forwards, suddenly moving much, much faster than they had previously during their threatening approach on the store clerk. A majority of the robots were barreling towards Silver. In fact, all of them were going towards Silver. The only exception was a single robot that singled out Sorun for some reason, so it chose to go for him.

It was one of the ladybug-like robots that had a single wheel for a body. In terms of weapons all it seemed to have was two stubby, pointed arms. Sorun stood rooted in place as it converged on him, wheel screeching as it approached. Blue glowing eyes locked threateningly on him. Pointed arms were coiled back and ready to strike once it was in range.

He kicked it in the face.

The kick wasn't even that hard a one in retrospect. Sorun couldn't even call it halfhearted; he was so bewildered by what was going on that he couldn't summon up the effort. It was more a light punt than anything else. Even so, the wheel robot had fallen down on its side.

"Aww. It fell down." It didn't seem to have taken any visual damage, but it didn't seem to be able to actually get up, either. It just kept spinning its wheel, turning around in a circle as it tried and failed to right itself. It was actually kind of sad to see. "Alright, well, they can't be that tough if a scrub like me can manage." That actually caused a bit of Sorun's confidence to well back up. He'd actually began gripping his sword eagerly as he turned towards the rest of the robots that had swarmed Silver.

That confidence promptly deflated out of Sorun when he saw that every single robot that had gone for Silver was floating up in the air around him, each surrounded by a teal glow.

"Oh, you already- okay, that's fine. Cool." He'd been so excited at the prospect of fighting something marginally weaker than him that Sorun had already pulled his sword halfway out of its sheath. His mood had plummeted upon seeing Silver having dispatched them already, causing him to slam the sword back in the scabbard with a huff. "Fuck me for wanting to do something I guess, Silver's got it."

The white hedgehog didn't even seem the least bit winded by the exertion of lifting up over twenty robots with his mind. More than anything he just seemed confused, maybe even a bit irritated at Eggman, who was just standing there staring at Silver with his mouth agape. Sorun was pretty sure he couldn't add anything to this, so he decided to just look back down and watch the wheel robot spin around.

"So, um, hey, Mr. Eggman guy?" Silver tentatively asked. "Can you please not attack people with your robots? It's not a nice thing to do."

"... But that's what I do. I attack people with robots," Eggman argued in a weak voice. His entire posture screamed being defeated.

"Um... please don't?"

"This isn't even fair. How am I supposed to fight a guy that can move things with his mind?" He glanced off to the side and snapped his fingers. "Knew anti-psychic tech wasn't a scam like business stocks. Should've invested after all." With a sigh, he turned back towards Silver. He seemed to visibly wither at the sight of his robots floating helplessly around Silver. "Fine. You win. Here."

Grumbling incomprehensibly under his breath, Eggman began stomping forwards while rummaging around in his back pocket. He walked past Silver, who followed the larger male with wary eyes as he stopped in front of the store clerk. A fistful of bills was taken out of Eggman's pocket, who subsequently threw the money at the clerk's face. He failed to catch the bills, which all slowly floated down towards the ground.

"There," Eggman growled out, rounding back at Silver while the clerk knelt down to collect the dropped money. "You successfully ensured unethical consumerism lives to see another day. I hope you can live with yourself, Not-Sonic."

"I... think I'll live?" The statement felt like it was asked by Silver, who was blinking very heavily at Eggman. "I really don't understand half of what you're saying, but thank you for paying the nice man. Here you go."

The robots floating around Silver were slowly lowered down to the ground. Once their feet found purchase on the ground the teal glow faded from around their bodies, and they began to move around freely. Even the fallen, spinning robot Sorun was staring at was briefly engulfed by that teal glow, only lasting for a couple of seconds to allow Silver to telekinetically right its position so it was back on its wheel.

"Huh?" For some reason Eggman seemed taken back by the gesture. His head was bobbing back and forth between the robots, who themselves seemed confused by the way they were swiveling back and forth at each other, and Silver, before he finally asked Silver, "That's it? You're not going destroy my robots?"

"No?" Silver answered/questioned.

"Give me some grandstanding speech or heroic one-liner?"

"I wasn't planning on it?"

"Humiliate me by using me as a volleyball?"

"No!" Silver seemed equally shocked and appalled by the mere suggestion. "Goodness, that sounds horrible! Why would anybody do that!?"

"Er, yeah, right, that does sound like something really humiliating to be on the end of. Not that I would know. Ahem." Eggman turned his head to the side and coughed, and then turned back to Silver. "Okay, seriously, what's the deal? My whole experience in this kind of thing is my robots get destroyed and I have to go off and sulk about it for five minutes before I get hungry and forget about it."

If any of that actually meant anything to Silver, he didn't show it as he shrugged up at the man. "Well, you're not attacking anybody right now. And you seem like you really care about these robot things you built." He pointed his hand at one of the crab robots scuttling around him while snapping its pincers up at him. "Like this crab thingamajig, so, well, I didn't want to break them and make you feel sad."

"... Huh." The combination of the mustache and the blue-tinted glasses covering his eyes made Eggman's current expression inscrutable. He was thinking about something, but what that something was Sorun couldn't parse standing so far away while silently observing. "You're a weird guy," Eggman concluded. He lifted his wrist up and pressed a few buttons on the device strapped to his wrist. "I'm gonna go home. See you around, White Sonic with the weird haircut." He turned to Sorun and gave him a single wave. "Other guy."

Sorun could only do as much as give him a stiff wave as he stared numbly at Eggman. Out from behind a few houses some floating vehicle - a white, floating chair inside a hemisphere that was disturbingly familiar to Sorun - floated over to the scientist. He'd gotten in without another word, and the chair carried him off far enough that he was quickly out of their line of sight.

Noticeably he'd left the robots behind.

"That was whacked." Really the only way Sorun could describe the experience he just witnessed. He doubted even given sufficient time he'd be able to ever fully process what just happened. Maybe it was his personal experience that directly conflicted with what he just saw: a non-homicidal, non-genocidal, may-or-may-not be insane, Sorun wasn't sure on that one, Eggman. He wouldn't have thought such a thing possible; in fact, despite seeing it with his own eyes, he still didn't believe it. But the sight still gave him pause.

Something to think about for later. Maybe there really was something to this multiverse thing, but Sorun wasn't counting on it.

When Sorun approached Silver, he seemed to be at as much at a loss for words as Sorun. Not at Eggman, it seemed, but at the robots. How they were all still scuttling around, seemingly lost without their maker around. He was holding one of the crab robots in his arms. "I thought you said this guy was supposed to be a maniac?" Silver asked him upon approach.

The only thing Sorun could offer was a shrug. "Multiverse, man, I dunno." He looked down at the robots. "So, like... he just left them here?"

"Yeah, I think they're gonna have to walk their own way back. I guess he wasn't expecting them to make it this long." There was a deep frown settled on Silver's face. He was obviously displeased with the thought, and his feet were rocking in restlessness. "I think I should probably carry these all back to where he lives."

"You don't even know where that is," Sorun pointed out. "And also, seriously? Why?"

"Because it's the nice thing to do, and plus we need to ask him about helping us anyways."

Right, they'd forgotten to do that. The thought hadn't even come to Sorun's mind, he'd been so busy trying to understand what his eyes were seeing, and Silver had been as bewildered as him. He still had reservations over the idea, though. Regardless of what they just saw, it was Eggman . Sorun didn't trust him as far as he could throw him regardless of what iteration he was, and with his strength that was an effective distance of zero. Even factoring in what they just saw, because for all Sorun knew it was just a psycho that happened to be acting on a friendly whim at the moment.

Agreeable people didn't carry around attack bots with them. He was pretty sure, at least.

"You don't think we should be a bit more tactical with approaching him?" Sorun asked.

"Tactical? Wha- what does that even mean? Tactical? How much tactics can you stuff into knocking on a front door?" Silver questioned.

A flat look was sent to Silver by Sorun. "You wanna knock on his front door," he deadpanned. "Eggman's front door."

"It's polite! I don't wanna just sneak in through a window or someth-"

Silver's words died on his lips when something zoomed past their vision. Sorun hadn't been able to perceive precisely what it was that passed them, but he'd been able to perceive the color . That blue shape that'd zipped right past Sorun and Silver was recognizable enough to Sorun he couldn't not know who it was. That dark shade of blue alone was telling.

There was a small explosion besides them. When Sorun looked to the side at the blue leg stomping down on the remains of one of the robots, he had an uncaring expression. Silver looked shocked and horrified at the person who'd just destroyed one of the many robots surrounding them that, for all intents and purposes, was yet another alternate universe dead-ringer for the Sonic he personally knew. Except for the brown scarf he wore, Sorun didn't know what was up with that.

"What is wrong with you!? Why!?"

That shriek had come from Silver, who looked torn between morning the nameless jobber robot that just died and furious over the fact this Sonic just killed it. Sorun himself didn't have enough skin in the matter to care, but while he was keeping up a bored, neutral expression, he was laughing on the inside at seeing Silver yell at Sonic.

"Uh, saving you guys?" Sonic turned to Silver and actually managed to look offended at the outburst. "You guys new here? Never seen you around before, but here you're supposed to stay away from the evil robots. You're welcome, by the way."

It was a level of condescension that was reserved for parents scolding children. It cut the amusement right out of Sorun, and now he was silently smoldering while keeping his bored expression. Silver wasn't nearly as successful at hiding his anger; he looked downright livid, and Sorun didn't even know if it was over the words or if he was still hung up on the robot.

"We aren't being attacked!" Silver yelled out. "Everything was fine until you showed up!"

Blinking, Sonic took a quick glance around at the robots surrounding them. They weren't even doing anything but standing around to witness all the shouting, though the one that had been in Silver's arms had scuttled off in a panic after its brother got stomped to death. Sorun didn't know why. If they were just that limited in programming that they didn't know what to do without Eggman around or if they were just intelligent enough to have some sense of morbid curiosity and they were just sticking around to see what happened.

"You sure about that? Really?" Sonic asked, taking another quick glance around at the robots. "And where is Eggman, anyways? He's usually not off-schedule for this."

For the first time since he showed up Sorun spoke out to Sonic. "He does this regularly enough you planned a schedule around it?"

"Yeah, Saturdays, alternating Tuesdays and Thursdays, other days depending on the mood. He tries to be flexible with it. Unfortunately."

"..." What was he even supposed to say to that?

Another robot exploded nearby. When Sorun looked, he saw a robot completely flattened under the head of a large hammer. He didn't have to look past that and the patch of pink in his peripheral to know it was this world's Amy. "Hey, Sonic? What's going on with these guys?"

"They're being difficult is what's going on," he grumbled out as he turned back to Silver. "Listen, buddy, I'm trying to help you and your friend here, so if you would just step aside so that we , that is the heroes, could get rid of the robots-"

"You don't need to get rid of them!" Silver argued, voice so loud it was cracking slightly. "They're not even trying to hurt anyone! Just leave them alone!"

"Are- did you hit your head or something?" Sonic asked. "Dude, they're evil robots. Nobody'll care."

"Eggman will care! He put a lot of work into making these things, I don't want him to be upset!"

"What are you, some kind villain apologist?" Rolling his eyes and shaking his head, Sonic spun towards the nearest robot. "Whatever, listen just watch. As soon as we clear out all these robots-"

Sonic's words ceased right there. All movement ceased the moment his entire body was enveloped by a film of teal energy. The same energy that was roiling around Silver's hands as he stared angrily at Sonic.

"No. No, let's try not doing that," Silver suggested, his teeth grit in bitterness. His voice had inversed him high and shrill to low and harsh, and all of his anger was being directed right at Sonic.

Now Sorun did actually laugh. It was a small, breathy thing, only done once and barely audible, but it was enough to get the barest of grins out of him at seeing Sonic frozen in place like that. Amy was less amused and more panicked by the sight.

"Sonic!" she cried out. Anger overtook her features as she swiveled towards Silver, who double-turned at her in surprise as she lifted the hammer up. "Why you-!"

She'd swung the hammer. It'd come within inches of Silver's face before freezing mid-swing, along with the rest of Amy's body as his power surrounded her. The swing itself had still managed to carry enough force to blow his fur and quills back despite the fact it didn't hit, something that seemed to rattle Silver. The anger was gone. Now he just looked awkward and unsure, standing between a frozen Sonic and Amy.

"U-uh, hey, guys," Silver timidly stuttered out, "listen I didn't mean to do this but seriously if you would just listen-"

"Sonic! Amy! No!" A third voice cried out from above them. Both of the teens looked up, but unlike Silver Sorun didn't look surprised at seeing a two-tailed fox dropping down on Silver with a wrench in his hands. And like the other two he got frozen mid-air before he even touched the white hedgehog.

"Okay this is getting out of hand, guys PLEASE-!"

"Don't worry, guys! There's no way he can do that four times in a row!"

Confusion settled on both Sorun and Silver's faces when they, and in unison the surviving robots around them, turned towards the sound of the voice. Sorun almost didn't recognize it because something sounded incredibly off with it, but the shade of red covering the fourth figure sprinting towards Silver gave away that it was Knuckles. At first Sorun balked at the idea that he would do something as moronic as charge somebody who just froze three comrades in close range. Then he got a good look at him and reared back in shock.

"Dear fucking god, why are his legs so much smaller than his arms?"

He was making somewhat of a joke before, but now Sorun was wondering if there really was some kind of 'One Piece'-esque irregular proportion thing going on with this zone. It was a good explanation for why Eggman had looked the way he had. It was the only explanation Sorun could think of for why this world's Knuckles had a chest and arms that looked five times larger than the rest of him, especially when all the other Mobians looked comparatively normal.

And apparently Silver could do it four times, because this Knuckles' war cry got cut off halfway when Silver entrapped him in a telekinetic hold like the others. He didn't even get the chance to try and punch him.

"Why do you people keep attacking me when I just want to talk!?" Silver yelled out. He made a frustrated sound, looking at all four of the Mobians locked in stasis, and then looked to Sorun for help. "Is this some kind of weird inversed zone where all the bad guys are good and all the good guys are bad? Is that what this is?"

Sorun shook his head. "Nah, that's Moebius. Or so I've been told, at least. I'm pretty sure everyone here's just a weirdo." Was that what this was? The weird zone? Was strangeness of this caliber out of the ordinary for the multiverse or did this kind of weirdness set a standard for how ridiculous things could get? Did it even matter in a multiverse of infinite possibilities? Hopeless questions like this along with the experience was the main reason Sorun was able to weather all of this with relative ease. Enough to ask the hard question at least, like why the hell this version of Knuckles looked so top-heavy. Or what that wooden thing whizzing towards Sorun's face was.

"Huh?"

That was all Sorun managed to get out before his reflexes kicked in, and he reflexively managed to tilt his head far enough to dodge the spinning object. Unfortunately for Sorun, after passing him it'd curved and began sailing towards the back of his head. And Sorun, with his back turned to it, had no way of seeing its approach.

Everything went black after the thing struck him in the back of the head.

When Sorun woke up, the first thing he felt was an overwhelming urge to commit violence.

Of course the splitting headache he felt quelled those desires immediately, causing him to groan out and hold a hand to the back of his head where it was throbbing. Opening his eyes revealed blurry vision, but it was good enough that he could make out the living room he was in. And from how uncomfortable he felt he didn't even need to look to know he was laying on someone's couch.

More importantly than all of that was the bright, blue glow of the object resting on the foot table next to the couch Sorun was laying on. Without a thought he reached a hand out and brushed his fingers against the glossy, smooth surface of the Emerald. His hair shifted into a white color, and he breathed out a relieved when the pain instantly flashed away and his vision adjusted perfectly to his surroundings.

The urge for violence had come back as well.

Another quick glance around revealed that this was someone's living room. Decently furnished, obnoxiously bright from all the open windows letting in the clear, afternoon sun. Something else he just now noticed with his enhanced nose... something... briny?

Sorun vaguely remembered that smell, from when he'd crashed a plane on an island. That was an ocean he was smelling.

He sat up. There was a window nearby that he leaned towards, and looking outside revealed he was correct on what that smell was. There was a beach outside the house he was in, with an ocean just beyond that softly crashing into the shore. Although the sights were pleasant enough, for Sorun they were all spoiled by the sight of a nearby gathering of palm trees, the hammock tied between them, and the blue hedgehog sleeping in this hammock.

"Alright, might hurt him, might not, let's see how it goes." Exhaling sharply through his nose, Sorun pushed away from the window. He only had to turn around to see the front door to the home, and conveniently enough it was already open to him. His hair turned black and the gem shifted into Yamato as he walked out of it.

There wasn't hiding the pang of envy Sorun felt when he walked out of the home and turned around briefly to examine it. By all rights it was a fairly modest hut more than anything else, but a beachside house was still a beachside house, and he never so much as went to a beach growing up. His own house in New Mobotropolis was better than anything else he could have fairly asked for, but if this was Sonic's hut something in Sorun twisted uncomfortably knowing that, somewhere in the multiverse, there was a Sonic somewhere living with a beach view when he didn't have one. Not even that there was someone with a beach view when he didn't, but that it was a Sonic with the beach view.

Holding back his grumblings, Sorun stomped his way over to the sleeping Sonic. Either the sand muffled his footsteps sufficiently or he was just that heavy a sleeper, because he didn't so much as rouse from the hammock when Sorun stopped right in front of him. He just continued sleeping contently in that hammock.

"How much of a dick could I be right now?" Pursing his lips in quiet contemplation, Sorun looked up. He only a moment to find inspiration once his eyes landed on the ocean. "Hey, I wonder if this one's as hydrophobic as mine?"

As quietly as he could, Sorun unsheathed the katana from his side. So far so good; Sonic hadn't woken up. He pointed the sword upwards and, very carefully, cut a cross into the air above Sonic which folded inwards into a portal a second later.

At the same time a similar portal appeared just below the surface of the water nearby.

A torrent of water poured out from the portal and directly onto Sonic. That had woken him up, sending him into a thrashing, screaming fit from the makeshift waterfall assaulting him. It was only after he was washed out of the hammock and fell onto the ground that Sorun closed off the portal and water, but by then the hedgehog was already sufficiently drenched.

Immediately he turned his green eyes up to Sorun's unflinching blue. He had an angry expression. "What the heck was that for!?" he screamed out at him.

"For somebody knocking me out with a boomerang. You guys are lucky I just happen to carry around the cure for brain damage," Sorun tersely answered.

"I try to make up for that by letting you sleep it off in my house and you thank me by dumping the ocean on me!?"

"... Well, yeah."

A drenched Sonic stood up to his feet. There was a slight tremor in his body, and he tried shaking some of the loose moisture off himself to no avail. He was still wet. "You're a real jerk. You know that?"

"Only to you, Sonic," Sorun answered honestly.

Sonic's eyes narrowed. "I'm having a hard time believing that Silver guy when he says you're the nicest person he's ever met in his entire life."

"To be fair I've met the other two. It isn't that high a bar to get over," Sorun said. "What ended up happening after I got assaulted?"

"Whoa-ho-ho, hold up now, buddy. 'Assault' is a really strong word," Sonic said, holding his hands up in front of Sorun. "I think what you're looking for is 'lawful citizen's arrest'."

"I wasn't even doing anything. I was just standing there."

"... Yeah, well... you got better, so does it matter?"

He wanted to hurt him so badly. Somehow Sorun managed to hold off, inhaling a deep breath, keeping it in for five seconds, and then slowly exhaling. It was a good thing he did, too, since he got an idea that replaced his growing urge to do something irrational. "Alright, cool, so you wouldn't mind me getting a cop's second opinion?"

Sonic froze at that. "Huh?"

"Yeah, sure. I saw one or two walking around on the way into this village. Had badges 'n' everything. I'm admittedly new here, but I wonder what they'd have to say if I told them... who threw the boomerang?"

The hedgehog didn't look like he wanted to answer. He'd grown a resigned look in his eyes, and he visibly deflated and hunched over while muttering, "Sticks."

"Whoever that is. I don't imagine they'd have good things to say."

"They wouldn't- okay, listen."

When Sonic lifted his head up to Sorun, he was expecting a lot of things. A resentful look, maybe even a violent look. Something that suggested that Sonic was going to take action against Sorun for threatening a friend with the police. He already started preparing for it, ready to transmute the Emerald and have it stop time so he could break Sonic's legs while in the stopped time.

But instead of all that he had a pleading look in his eyes, and Sorun had to remind himself that, even if he looked a bit different and wasn't his Sonic, it was still a Sonic. And it seemed to be a near-universal constant that all Sonics were insufferable good guys of some sort, because it was the case for all the other Sonics he and Silver had encountered on the way here.

"Look, I know we just met and I know we didn't really hit it off alright, but Sticks has a... not the best reputation, okay, whole town knows she's kinda kooky, so the cops'll actually believe you and I'm pretty sure that video store guy saw the whole thing so-"

Sorun held a hand up to stop him. He made a small sigh, fuming at the fact he was starting to feel guilty over the guy. He just had to have the moral integrity to be truthful and honest with Sorun thus far and resort to pleading with him instead of doing anything else, and now his conscience was yelling at him again. He already felt bad over the whole thing.

"Alright, fine, just... forget the cops, just tell me what happened and I'll leave it alone," Sorun bit out, lowering his hand.

The amount of relief Sonic displayed right after was almost alarming. He'd snapped right up to a straight posture with a large smile on his face. "Whew! That's a real load off." At noticing Sorun's quiet gaze he cleared his throat. "Okay, right, so... Silver got really mad after you got hit and had us all frozen. He explained everything, and we all felt bad about the misunderstanding so I took you and your weird crystal thing that turns into a sword for some reason back here to sleep it off." He backed up a step when Sorun kept staring. "Seriously man, I'm sorry. We all are. No hard feelings?"

There was no visible reaction on Sorun's part when Sonic held out a clenched fist in front of him. It was obvious he was expecting a reciprocating fist bump, but Sorun was debating if he should. He didn't want to, but at the same time he didn't want to send mixed messages by not doing it. But then again he didn't really want to.

He settled for raising his hand up and tapping on one of Sonic's knuckles with a single index finger once, and then brought the hand back to his side. Sonic made an uneasy chuckle and lowered his own hand.

"Ookay, I'll take it. Eh-heh. Weirdo ." Sonic looked off to the side. Movement out of the corner of his eyes caused Sorun to look in the same direction, where he recognized the two figures walking towards them. Well, he recognized the Tails in this world, he looked about the same as his. He was still poorly coming to grips with how the Knuckles here looked.

"Sonic! Oh, hey, the guy Sticks knocked out woke up!" They stopped in front of them, with Tails being the one to displaying gleefulness for Sorun's sake. But then he'd looked over at Sonic and began to look puzzled. "Did you just get out of the shower? Why're you all wet?"

"Yeah, I wonder why," he bit out, turning his gaze to Sorun. "How'd you even do what you did, anyways?"

"Hm?" Sorun feigned confusion. "Do what?"

"Don't even play like that, you know what I mean! The whole water thing!"

"I have no recollection of the event in question." He, of course, did, but seeing the incensed look on Sonic's face was more than worth it.

"Aw, don't worry, new guy." This came from the disproportionately-sized Knuckles. "I forget stuff all the time, too. You get used to it. At least I think you do. I might have forgotten that."

Sorun blinked. Slowly. Then, with even more painful slowness, he turned towards Knuckles, who was giving him a dopey smile with an otherwise vapid expression. He tried not to let the pain he felt hearing him speak show on his face. "Is... is that so?"

"Yeah. Oh, and, uh, guess we should say sorry for the mix-up earlier." Knuckles made a light laugh and rubbed the back of his head. "So yeah, sorry for thinking you were the bad guy. I kinda thought all humans that wore coats were evil."

Sorun glanced down at his coat, face impassive. He looked back up at Knuckles' face. An eye twitched. "We are not."

"Okay, cool." The echidna's purple eyes lit up in realization. For all Sorun knew that was some kind of miracle. "Oh, wait! Did you get your big glowing blue thing back? That other guy who wasn't Sonic or the other mean striped guy that isn't Sonic said it was important."

"Uhh... yeah." Sorun lifted his katana up and lightly shook it. "Got it right here."

Knuckles squinted down at the sword. He pointed at its scabbard for some reason. "You put it in there?" he asked. "How the heck did you manage to fit something so big in something so tiny?"

For the first few moments Sorun struggled to understand what he was even asking before realizing Knuckles was under the impression he somehow fit a Chaos Emerald inside of a katana's scabbard. He didn't know how to respond to that. Literally. He'd never in his life ever had to think up a response to something so absurd and he was left silently staring at the echidna. Besides him, Tails just looked tired at hearing that question.

It was Sonic who broke the silence by groaning out quietly while pinching the space between his eyes at the same time. "No, Knuckles, the blue crystal thing turns into a sword, remember? It happened when he dropped it after he got hit?"

Knuckles didn't even so much as respond to Sonic. Like Sorun he'd resorted to blankly staring at the blue hedgehog, only unlike Sorun he seemed completely unresponsive and his face was blank. It was something that genuinely disturbed Sorun, enough that he'd risen a hand up and waved it in front of his face. He only became more alarmed when there was zero reaction.

"Does... does he have brain damage or something?" Sorun hesitantly asked as his waving became more frantic. "'Cause if he does I'm sorry, but that cure for brain damage I mentioned only works on me."

"No, he just needs a minute or two to process things sometimes," Sonic answered. "Your Knuckles isn't like this? Silver told us about the whole 'from another universe' thing."

"He's, um, no. He's normal. Most of the rest of his kind ain't but the less said about that the better."

"Oh, there's more echidna where you're from?" Tails asked. "Knuckles is the only one we've ever found."

"Yeah, you're probably better off for that." Sorun turned away from Knuckles and to Sonic. "So Silver told you? It doesn't freak you out? Us being universal aliens?"

Sonic shook his head. "Nah, believe it or not this isn't the first time something like that's happened around here."

"Ah, I see." Sorun nodded, taking the information in stride. "Sounds... exciting?"

"It's exhausting, that's what it is," he grumbled out, bending forwards a bit. "I just wanna take a nap but I can't go a week without something crazy happening around here. It's a serious pain."

That actually drew some amusement out of Sorun. "You're a snarky one, huh? More than my Sonic, at least."

Sonic straightened up. "Oh, yeah? What's that guy like?"

The question made a small jolt go through Sorun. A hundred thoughts and opinions raced through his mind. None of them were positive. He shook his head as he tried to think of something appropriate. "Uh... his arms weren't blue?"

Green eyes glanced down at their owner's arms. They rose back up to give Sorun an unimpressed look. "Seriously? That's all you got?"

"What do you want from me? You're not exactly the same but in broad strokes, yeah, I'm not seeing much of a difference. Only difference is that guy thrives on the whole hero thing and sucks at video games," Sorun said, the last sentence coming off sounding bitter.

"Ha! Figures me from another world isn't even better than me," the hedgehog boasted. "None of my friends are ever able to beat my scores, even in the new games that keep coming out. Kinda wish they'd stop pumping out so many zombie games, though. Feel like it's sorta being overdone."

Sorun made an agreeing nod. "Yeah, they were kind of oversaturating the market back where I'm from, too. Few bangers here and there, but most of them were a solid meh. Last one I played, 'Dying Light', was pretty great, though. Do not think that sequel will be coming out due to recent events." Sorun pointed at Sonic. "Actually you kinda sound like the main character guy in that game."

"Oh, really?"

"Yeah, not like the Sonic I know. Urkel-soundin' motherfucker ..."

Wasn't exactly the same, and Sorun attributed the fact his Sonic's voice was at least tolerable was due to him being sixteen and puberty having done something to smoothen his voice out. But by god, did Sorun not want to know what he sounded like when he was younger.

"Snorkel-muffin what?" Sonic repeated in a confused voice.

Quickly clearing his throat, Sorun said in a slightly louder tone, "Hey, you know what, it's been great meeting you guys but I gotta get back with Silver and we really gotta go, you know? Real, er, 'portant stuff to do. Getting back home. So... yeah." A beat passed. "Where's Silver?"

"Oh, Amy took him back to her house," Sonic answered. His face screwed in concentration as he tried to remember. "Something about... wanting to talk about his hairstyle? Called him a walking fern? Eh, I don't know. I wasn't paying attention." He shrugged. "He's probably still over there. You need directions?"

He probably did, but he didn't want to be around these people longer than he wanted to. "No, thank you. I'll find my own way." He gave Sonic and Tails a polite nod, spent a second looking at Knuckles who still seemed to be thinking, and then turned around and began walking off. "Been an experience. Bye."

Sorun barely made it ten meters before he heard Knuckles' voice loudly proclaim behind him, "Oh, I get it! The thing covering his sword turns into a rock! But... wait, then where does the sword come from?"

His footsteps quickened.

After ending up needing to ask around, he finally found the house this world's Amy lived in. Somehow it was even nicer than Sonic's house; it was in a section of beach closer to the village, enough that there were other houses in sight and the village proper was not even a minute's walk away. It was over water, connected to a large, spanning wood platform that held the house up and acted as a walkway.

In a word, it was nice. Pretty, even. And Sorun tried not to act jealous over it as he stopped in front of the door and knocked on it. "Why'd I have to get dragged into the war-torn world and not the tropical paradise world?" Sorun wondered as he took a quick glance around at some of the other houses. "Shit ain't fair."

He knocked on the door again, louder this time, and then leaned on the door frame while waiting. He heard soft footsteps on the other side, and after a few more moments he saw the door open up. The pink hedgehog he'd come all the way here for was on the other side, and had frozen in the middle of opening the door the moment her eyes fell on Sorun. Then recognition flashed through her features and she opened the door completely while giving him a wide smile.

"Ohhh! Hey, it's you!" she greeted him in a happy voice. Sorun flinched a bit; the Amy here was just as bubbly as the one back home and he hadn't been ready for it. "Silver was really worried about you after, um... you know. That."

"Where you people knocked me out for doing precisely nothing, yes, I remember," Sorun curtly replied. The smile Amy had withered significantly. "I fixed my broken head."

"That's good!" Amy quickly replied. He wasn't even sure she understood what he meant by that. "Please, come in! Sorry if the place is a bit of a mess I haven't cleaned it in two days and this season really isn't conducive for-"

Most of the words rattling out of Amy's mouth went ignored by Sorun as he quietly stepped into her home. It was certainly bright , what with all the colorful pieces of furniture and other odds and ends scattered around that were mainly pink with a few purple things here and there to break the color up. And the source of the strange floral scent was immediately identified when he saw a lit scented candle resting on a nearby nightstand.

Sorun scoffed. He'd fallen into that trap before.

"- and really I've tried the advice from that interior decorating magazine but really I find it disrupts the flow of the room whenever I try to rearrange- goodness me, I didn't mean to ramble so much. Did you want something to drink, Sorun?" Amy asked.

He turned back to her. She was looking at him expectantly, hands clasped behind her back and with a polite smile on her face. She dressed more conservatively than the Amy he knew, too, now that he looked. At least she went out of her way to wear leggings along with the pinkish short jacket she had on, unlike his who only wore that dress. Always made him uncomfortable, that.

"No, thanks. I'm good," he replied in an even tone. "Where's Silver?"

For some reason, Amy jolted at that. Like she had a sudden, uncomfortable thought that invaded her mind. "Right, that." She made a nervous laugh, glanced off to the side, and rubbed at her shoulder. "Really polite guy, but that haircut... sheesh. I offered to fix it for him and I think the poor guy was too nervous to say no, but, uh... yeah, I think that thing is just a part of him, 'cause I couldn't fix it," she confessed. "He left after. I don't know where."

"I guess I can see where you're coming from. Guy looks like a walking marijuana leaf with that haircut."

"Is that some kind of plant from where you're from?"

With a sad sigh, Sorun slumped his shoulders. "Yeah..."

"Ah." There was a pause of silence between them. Amy transition from rubbing her shoulder to the back of her head. "So, uh, other universes, huh? Cool, cool..." After a few more seconds of silence she asked, "So am I there?"

"Yeah, I know other you," Sorun answered. She brightened up at hearing that. "You're not exactly the same as her, though. You're... I don't wanna say more mature at a first glance, but she did this weird age thing and-"

"Uh-huh, great, sounds great, hey quick question," Amy interrupted. "Not, er, not to pry into not-me's private life or anything, but since you know her, just, erm," she trailed off, bringing her hands together to poke the index fingers together. "You wouldn't happen to know if alternate universe me and alternate universe Sonic ever, you know, hooked up? Like, in any capacity?"

"..."

"So I take it by your silence that's a yes?"

"Never mind, your personalities are pretty one-to-one," Sorun sighed out, turning his head away from the pink hedgehog, who made an unsatisfied huff at him. "Goddammit, why can't things just be normal for one seco-?"

A nearby rattle in what Sorun assumed to be the kitchen startled him and drew his attention. He couldn't see due to a wall separating the two rooms, but the rustling was a constant noise now. It was a sound like somebody was shuffling a bunch of glass bottles. When he looked back at Amy she seemed nonplussed at the noise.

"Oh, that's just Sticks," Amy explained. "She's visiting and wanted something to drink from the kitchen."

The name was unfamiliar to Sorun at first until he remembered Sonic with a brown scarf mentioned her. "You mean the one that-?"

"Amy! What is this!?" Sorun actually winced when he heard that voice hit his ears. Like somebody gargling shards of glass. He couldn't understand how somebody's voice could sound so scratchy. There was movement off to the side and when Sorun moved to look, he saw a Mobian poking her body out of the kitchen holding a carton of milk. "I told you to get the organic kind of milk that comes in the glass bottles, not this store-bought cardboard crud! You know what they put in-!?"

She cut herself off when her eyes locked onto Sorun. For his part he reamined completely still, mainly due to trying to figure out what he was looking at. Some blend of orange and brown... thing that looked like she was wearing scraps of clothes. Torn cloth covering her waist and a cloth stripcovering her chest. He couldn't even discern her hairstyle, much less her species. It was just tied off into to giant masses that jutted out to either side of her head.

Blue eyes narrowed at Sorun suspiciously. "It's you ."

"That's quite a tone to take with someone you knocked out. I'm practically a victim of assault here, lady."

"Oh yeah, sure, that's what it looks like," she said. "But how do I know you didn't intentionally take that hit, huh?"

The audacity alone made Sorun's eyes widen a bit. "Because unlike most of the people around here, present company included, I have common sense, you..." He looked to Amy for help. "Ferret?"

"Badger."

"Every time!" he grunted under his breath before turning back to Sticks. She seemed to have visibly bristled at that last remark he made. "Look, I don't know what your problem is, but I want an apology."

The carton of milk was set aside near the scented candle. The badger fully stepped out of the kitchen and crossed her arms. "Oh, yeah?" she challenged. "Well I want an apology for sayin' I ain't got common sense."

"You'll get one the moment I see evidence of such a miracle."

Her face visible wrinkled in anger. "You tryin' to go for round two, pal? That what you're going for?"

"Hm. Why not?" Sorun's thumb pushed his sword out of the scabbard. "Fair's fair. I'll just win an apology out of you if you're really going to be like that." It wasn't his fault she was being so confrontational. It was bad enough he'd gotten knocked out in front of a friend; he already couldn't stand the hit his dignity took for that. He thought the least he was owed in the face of that was an apology, but not only was he not getting a sorry, but this badger had the utter gall to act this way when it was her fault?

No, forget Silver and getting back to Mobius Prime for the moment. He could spare a minute for this.

From somewhere , Sorun wasn't sure where and was becoming increasingly annoyed at how this was becoming a common thing in this world, Sticks pulled out a large stick that he assumed was whittled down to be a sort of makeshift staff. The sight of the weapon only spurred Sorun forwards, with Sticks matching his footsteps as they approached one another.

He really would have struck out at her with his sword if Amy hadn't wedged herself between the pair of them.

"Whoa whoa whoa, time out!" she yelled out, holding out a hand to each of them to stop them. "First of all, this is my house and you two aren't gonna start something and end up breaking something, and second of all you two should be ashamed of yourselves!" Her head whipped towards Sorun, who visibly flinched at the glare she was sending him. "What are you thinking, being so hostile like that!?"

"She was being mean," Sorun weakly argued, though he did shy away from her glare and push the sword back fully in the scabbard.

"And Sticks," Amy growled, turning to the other occupant, "you don't knock people out and then be rude to them about it afterwards! We talked about this!"

"He's wearin' a coat, Amy!" Sticks loudly argued, pointing her staff at the now stilled human. "Ya know people with coats can't be trusted!

Especially the long ones..."

If he didn't have more self control, he would have dropped his sword over hearing the reason the badger lady was acting this way towards him. He almost looked back to Amy again for more help, but he was shocked to find she didn't even seem surprised at her reasoning. Tired and upset at it, yes, but there wasn't so much as a hint of surprise in her eyes.

What she said next only cemented it for Sorun. "Now Sticks, exactly how many times have I told you we do not judge people by WHAT THEY WEAR!?"

"Of all the inane- you don't like me because of the coat!?" Sorun yelled out. He didn't even know what he was feeling anymore, if it was anger at her or frustration over this whole situation or anger at feeling so ignorant right now. He didn't know anything except he wanted to pull the sword back out. "You really are an idiot!"

Sticks' grip on her staff redoubled. "Why I oughta-!"

Before any of them could make a move Amy's hands snapped outwards. Her left hand gripped one of Sorun's ears, who hissed out loudly in pain, while the right hand gripped one of Sticks' ears, who made a more feral sort of sound. Amy, by contrast, simply had on an irritated, fuming expression as her eyes darted back and forth between the two.

"Now then, I want both of you to simmer DOWN ," she all but commanded, pulling on their ears tighter and causing them to stumble. "This is a safe place, we're all friends and friends do not hurt each other at all. Do they?" She was apparently expecting an answer, so when none came she screamed out, "WELL!?"

"Y-yeah, 'course," Sticks stuttered out. Amy made a "hmph" noise and released her ear.

When Amy looked to Sorun, he said, "I'll stop egging her on." The face she made afterwards didn't leave the impression she was satisfied with the answer, but she still released his ear all the same. It left Sorun rubbing at his sore ear and a burning sense of more of his dignity flaking away, but seeing the heated glare the pink hedgehog was sharing between him and Sticks made him ignore this for the moment.

Without another word, she slapped a hand on both of their backs and spun them towards the nearby couch. She pushed them towards it, and Sorun found himself lacking the will to actually try and resist her. "Couch. Plant 'em," she ordered. They both sat down on the couch, albeit at both ends and as far away as possible while trying their best not to look at one another.

Satisfied, if barely from the sigh Amy made, she then reached over and grabbed a nearby stool. She all but slammed it down on the floor in front of the couch, making Sorun and Sticks jump, and then sat down on it so she was facing the two of them. She closed her eyes, took in a long, deep breath, held it for ten whole seconds, and then slowly exhaled. At the end of her breath she opened her eyes again.

"Okay, then!" Sorun was nearly floored at the sudden shift Amy's personality had taken. With that single breath she'd gone from the demented tyrant that'd screeched his ears off seconds ago to a smiling, happy-looking hedgehog. She even sounded cheery now. "I think we got off on the wrong foot, guys, and I'm sensing some communication issues here. I think we need to have a talk."

Sorun groaned and sunk further into the couch. And now she was talking like a therapist. Or even worse somebody who'd read through half a psychology book and suddenly thought they were a qualified therapist. He wanted to leave right then and there but at this point he wasn't even sure Amy would let him until she was done tormenting him with talks about feelings. And he didn't like his odds fighting her. Not with the damn hammer. So, with a resigned sigh, he accepted that Silver was going to have to wait for a bit.

At least the couch was comfortable.

"Now, first thing's first," Amy began, crossing one leg over the other while clasping her hands together in front of her. "Sorun, Sticks is a dear friend of mine and I won't tolerate you insulting her. Say you're sorry."

Lazily, Sorun shifted his gaze to the right, where Sticks was sitting. She met his gaze with her own eyes, somewhat reluctantly. He considered saying something witty and spiteful, but he didn't want to risk incurring the hammer-wielder's wrath. "I maybe-"

"Maybe?" Amy repeated in a warning tone.

"I said things I shouldn't have and said untrue things about you," Sorun quickly amended. "And for that... I am..." he had to swallow something in order to actually get this out, "sssssorry. Sticks. For all that."

Sticks glared at him, but otherwise said nothing. Seeing this, Amy loudly cleared her throat.

"Okay. Sticks, Silver told us that he and his friend Sorun here are just trying to get back to their home. They'd completely de-escalated the problem with Eggman and that whole fight was a misunderstanding. You were there for all that. So, yes , you do owe him an apology for hitting him in the head with your boomerang."

The badger tore her gaze away from Sorun to look at Amy. "But he's got a coat , Amy."

"Why does me having a coat even matter?" Sorun asked as he flipped his free hand up. "I get it's not exactly the right thing to wear in this climate, but gimme a break, not every world I've been to has been all sunshine and palm trees."

"Sticks has a lot of... beliefs, we'll say, about a lot of things," Amy replied, though saying the word "belief" seemed to cause her some pain to say. "And her opinion about these beliefs are very strong, so sometimes-"

"Oh no no no no no , it's more than just belief we're talkin' about here, Amy," Sticks denied. "Coats are the clothing of the enemy!"

"The enemy?" Sorun repeated in a bland, bored tone. "Y'mean Eggman?" From what he saw that thing this world's Eggman wore could barely even be called a coat. Was more of a red cardigan than anything else.

"No, not him! The enemy !" Sticks emphasized her point by leaning forwards on the couch. "The spooks . Coats are the main article of apparel of any agent from some shadow government sect sent in to infiltrate the population!"

Sorun loudly scoffed at hearing that. "Agents? What, like the Men in Black?" He lifted his right hand up and mimicked decompressing a button. "Do they go around hitting people who've seen too much with a neuralyzer to wipe their memories out?"

Maybe mocking her for this was going against what Amy was trying to do, but Sorun couldn't resist the joke. Though that joke suddenly stopped being funny when Sticks gave Sorun a shocked look.

"You've seen them too!" she gasped out, causing Sorun's hand to fall limply on the couch as he gave her a dead stare. "That's just one thing they like hidin' in their coats! They gots all sorts'a gizmos and gadgets like that an' they need the coats to hide 'em all!"

"God, it's like I'm talking to Crazy Ricky all over again. She's almost as bad." He should have just turned around and walked out of the house the moment Amy said Silver wasn't here. That's what Sorun should have really done, so he wouldn't have to sit here and listen to a conspiracy nut. He'd already had to deal with one during his life in Detroit, and that one was enough for a whole lifetime.

"And look! Just look!" Sticks pointed to the bottom of Sorun's coat. "His coat's got three tails! Three! You know what that means?"

Amy let out a very tired sigh. "He's not a Chupacabra, Sticks."

"Well, we'll know at a new moon, now, won't we?"

They weren't going to get anywhere at this rate. Sorun knew that. Knew just from dealing with her type before. And if there's one thing Sorun knew about Crazy Ricky it was that you just didn't win with these people no matter how hard you tried; it just wasn't feasible to keep up with all the nonsensical jargon they spat out.

"I don't know what I'm supposed to say to you to convince you I'm an interdimensional traveler and not a shady something or other, Sticks," Sorun tiredly deadpanned.

"I never said I didn't think ya weren't from another universe," Sticks said back to him. Sorun didn't know how to counter that, so he just sighed and sunk further into the couch.

"Okay, guys, I think we're starting to get to the heart of the matter." Sorun didn't find himself appreciating how helpful Amy was trying to sound now. "You know what, Sorun, do you think you could maybe take the coat off just for a bit? For Sticks' sake?"

Immediately Sorun sat up ramrod straight on the couch, causing the two Mobians near him to start a bit at his speed. "Absolutely not. The coat stays on," he firmly stated. "I'm not taking it off just because you asked."

Sticks fidgeted nervously in her seat. "He ain't taking it off, Amy..."

"I know, Sticks," Amy said. She looked over from the badger to Sorun. "Do you mind telling me why you don't want to take it off, Sorun?"

Sorun's lips pressed together. He didn't want to say because it was so personal. He really just wanted to get up and leave since he had better things to do than assuage the paranoid fears of some badger he'd never ever see again once he and Silver left this zone.

But then there was that goddamn hammer.

"The coat was a gift from a friend," Sorun bit out at last, refusing to meet Amy's eyes, and expressly looking away from Sticks. "It's one of the few things I have left that I can actually call mine and it was from a very dear friend, okay? So I'm not gonna take it off when somebody I've known for all of ten minutes asks."

He could only see it from the corner of his eye, but he'd seen Sticks recoil a bit from the explanation. "Your, uh, your friend, huh?"

"Yeah, my friend Nic- oh my god Nicole. Oh my god what have I done?" The color drained out of Sorun's face when he remembered what he'd done the last time he'd seen her. "Ohhh noooooo ..."

He'd forgotten what he'd done. With everything that had been going on from the time travel to dimension travel to the mad kings and gods it'd been pushed to the back of Sorun's memories to make room for more pertinent priorities. He couldn't actually believe he'd forgotten about what he did until she was brought up in a conversation but now he remembered and fuck what has he done ?

The... the kiss. He'd done that. Before he went to fight Enerjak because he thought he was going to die after. Except Sorun didn't die. Sorun was very much still alive. Which... which meant that happened. Which meant Nicole... very much absolutely remembered, and...

Oh, what has he done?

"Fuck. Fuck, I forgot, I... damn, that kiss, I didn't mean, I mean... holy shit, what have I- what am I supposed to say- just- what- fuck. Oh fuck. Shit. Damn. Fuckshitdamn." He bolted right up to his feet, a horrified expression on his face. Fuck the sorry excuse for a therapy session, his head was spinning and his heart was beating a thousand times a second and he needed some air right now because he was breathing hard and fast enough that it was starting to hurt.

"I- I gotta- I gotta go, get out of here," Sorun gasped out. He wasn't even able to register the worried looks present on both Amy's and Sticks' face. Didn't even feel it when Sorun brushed past Amy's arm when she reached out to offer him a steadying hand. It felt like his feet were on autopilot when he stumbled to the front door and nearly crashed out of it to the outside.

The air wasn't helping. The air was worse, making him feel like he was suffocating, making everything spin as Sorun came to terms with the fact he quite possibly had made the worst mistake in his entire life and was only now remembering it. He stumbled off in a random direction, towards anything, with no clear goal in Sorun's mind as it kept spinning around the same event he couldn't help but play in his mind as he was reminded of just what he'd done.

What had he done?

"- SO! STUPID! I'M SO! FUCKING! STUPID!"

Every single word was punctuated by Sorun bashing his head against a tree. He didn't even know where he was, some random part of the village, maybe, it didn't matter. He'd found a tree at some point. Or run into it, he didn't really remember. And what else was he to do but beat his dumbass head against the tree?

"Agh! Man..." But eventually the pain in his forehead had to beat out the turmoil he felt, so Sorun was left turning around and sliding his back down against the tree until he ended up sitting against it. And after that, all that was left to do was think.

Think about that stupid, stupid decision he decided to make.

"Fuck my life, I thought I was gonna die. I wouldn't have done that if I'd known- yeah, you know what, I don't think Nicole's gonna see it that way." His head fell into his open hand. "She's gonna kill me."

He didn't even know why he'd done that kiss. It was in the heat of the moment. One of those "never gonna have a chance to do this again" things that he decided to capitalize on at that moment. And... also to maybe stun her for a second so he could get through that portal because she was genuinely getting ready to physically restrain him, but that hadn't even been that big a factor compared to the fact he wanted to do it. He'd had the foresight to at least just make it a forehead kiss, something that maybe implied something platonic, that he hadn't thought of her in that way and just considered her a really good friend, but... well, now that he really thought on it he wasn't sure Nicole would take it like that. Would she? He didn't know. He didn't know what he left her feeling. Probably horrible, since for all intents and purposes she thought he was dead right now.

Somehow the knowledge everybody else was brought back after he did what he did wasn't comforting Sorun.

In a strange way he was relieved just remembering Nicole. There really had been so much going on he couldn't focus on her at all. All because of that alternate future, probably. Or almost dying a bunch. It'd all been such a jarring experience Sorun wasn't surprised she'd been the last thing on his mind, with how focused he'd been on fixing the world and surviving. And now that he thought about it older Sonic had never even mentioned her, so for all Sorun knew she probably hadn't even existed in that future. If that was true it just helped to reaffirm he'd made the right choice in doing what he'd done - he would have destroyed that whole timeline just for that one fact alone. But she hadn't been there, nor had there been any alternate zone versions of her while he and Silver traveled to remind him of how much of a fool he was. So the memory remained locked away.

But then by mere chance that stupid conversation with Amy and that stupid badger just happened to bring her up and now that her memory was back on the surface of his mind Sorun didn't know how to deal with it.

How was she even going to react once Sorun returned? He didn't know. Literally, he had no idea what Nicole would do once she saw him. Probably kill him; he wouldn't blame her. He'd... performed the most dickish move in the world, and for what? Just to make himself feel better before walking off to his death? He hadn't even considered what state he'd be leaving her in, even if he'd made that kiss as chaste as possible, but damn, what did that even matter? After what he'd done? Sorun didn't even want to think about what he'd left her feeling.

It was bad enough that Sorun was feeling levels of shame he hadn't thought humanly possible before now. Just how strong the message of "I fucked up" was being beat into his head; something words alone couldn't describe. It wasn't even half the issue compared to how bad Sorun felt for Nicole, for how she undoubtably felt over the whole thing. When he'd promised her he'd stop doing risky things that would worry her.

And then he'd gone and died. Practically walked off and committed suicide from her point of view.

"In fairness to me it was to save the world. Aaaand there's no chance that'll actually matter." Sighing, Sorun lifted his head up off his hand to look at the sky above. "This isn't something I can ever take back, is it? Man, I've screwed things up with her forever. I'm never even going to be able to look her in the eyes again."

He couldn't. Not after what he'd done to her. After that . Which would be real hard considering his house was in a city she was omnipresent in.

"Well, I guess there's only one thing I can do."

"Uh... Sorun? What are you doing?"

He would admit it probably looked strange. Him, in a blue coat no way suited to this tropical climate, chilling out on a cheap, plastic lounge chair on the beach, facing the calm ocean. Umbrella stuck into the sand and providing him shade from the sun, thick, colorful sunglasses over his eyes, fruity drink in hand with a little umbrella. From a certain perspective this was a kind of fantasy Sorun always wanted to secretly live out, and while the circumstances leading up to it weren't ideal, fuck, he'd take anything at this point.

So Sorun could imagine when Silver found Sorun in this state, just lounging on the beach, he'd be confused. For Sorun it was the exact opposite. This was the most obvious move in the world, so much so he was almost impressed with how smart it was. Because really, what else was there to do?

"Huh? Oh, hey, Silver." He turned his head over to the white hedgehog and lowered the sunglasses with his left hand to meet his eyes. The blue Chaos Emerald sat next to him, half-buried in the sand. "Yeah, I live here now."

Silence for a solid five seconds before Silver spoke.

"You... live here now." The puzzlement on Silver's face worsened. He gestured to the umbrella and chair. "Where'd you get all this stuff?"

"Oh, people apparently just leave this stuff lying around," Sorun answered. He wasn't even lying. He'd just stumbled across all this stuff while wandering aimlessly on the beach trying to figure out what to do with his life now and decided to just go for it. And after a half hour of just sitting here in contemplation he decided... yeah. This fit. This felt right. Maybe he could just chill out here forever instead of going back to that mess he'd left behind.

Well, he'd found all this stuff except for the drink. He'd stolen that from somebody while they weren't looking, but honestly for how bland it tasted he was probably doing that guy a favor.

"... Okay, Sorun, what is this?" Silver asked. "I leave you alone to sleep off getting hit and when I find you you're... doing this." Once again he gestured to the chair and umbrella. "What's going on with you?"

Sorun took a sip of the drink. He decided banana wasn't that good a flavor for a drink. That fat monkey Mobian in the purple suit should be thankful to him for stealing this from him. "Yeah, I'm just done," Sorun answered.

"Done," Silver flatly repeated.

"Yeah, done," Sorun confirmed. "Gonna look around, maybe find an odd job or something. Even if I gotta get a labor job the Chaos Emerald pretty much just trivializes that. Figure I do that for a while then find somewhere to live here I can buy and go from there. They got video games here so I'm set."

Silver didn't say anything immediately. He just stood there staring at Sorun, face in a mixture of disbelief and confusion. Noises came out of his mouth, his hands flattened, raised with palms facing each other, fingers pointed at Sorun as he attempted to parse together what the human was saying. Evidently he failed, because then he asked, "What do you mean you're done?"

"Means just that. I'm done." The drink really was horrible, so Sorun shoved the glass halfway into the sand beside him, next to the Emerald. "Silver," Sorun began, "from minute one of getting dragged onto Mobius Prime it has been nothing but nightmare after nightmare. First I gotta be a resistance fighter and fight robots, then I gotta get cool powers that kill me so I can fight a literal super villain, then I gotta fight god, TWICE, mess with time, do all this zone nonsense with you, and Silver these are just the broad strokes, I'm not even getting into the fine minutia of insanity I've been having to deal with on a day-by-day basis.

"I never asked for any of this, okay? Not to be a fighter, not to save the world, not to save to future with you, none of it. I never wanted the responsibility, or to risk my life, or to do any of this other stuff. I was supposed to be done a long time ago but my home world died so I had to make do and then do more of all this because that's my life apparently even though I don't wanna do any of this. I don't want to be a hero . I want to chill. I want to sit down, and chill. That's all I want."

With a final, deep inhale to replenish the breath Sorun had spent laying all that out, he used a single finger to push his sunglasses back up. "So yeah. I'm done. I'm callin' it quits and staying here, because guess what, Silver, I'd rather stay on a tropical island with a nice village community and a beach. I'd rather stay here and deal with an Eggman that's a goofball who, at worst, mildly inconveniences people on a weekly basis with zany cartoon schemes instead of the one on Mobius Prime that's a genocidal maniac who wants to conquer the world. That guy almost killed me! A lot! This one, I don't even know what his deal is, but at least he isn't committing robo-slavery and killing people, so you tell me, why wouldn't I want to stay here?"

Silver fists tightened at his sides. "Sorun. You promised you'd help me save the future. My future. My home . Did you forget all that?"

Leaning back into his lounge chair, Sorun waved a hand and said, "You got cool mind powers, you'll be fine 'thout me."

"Okay, and what about the fact I'm stuck in the past without you!?" Silver yelled out. "You said once we were done saving the future you'd use Yamato to send me back to my proper time!"

"I'll still do that, just come back and see me when you're done doing whatever."

"Come all the way back here from another zone!?"

Sorun shrugged and interlaced his hands behind his head. A frustrated noise left Silver, and his clenched fists began to shake. For a single moment his hands glowed teal, and the umbrella giving Sorun shade twitched slightly. The pale teen had seen this coming and figured he was about five seconds from getting tossed by Silver out of anger.

But, that never came. To his surprise Silver had made a deep breath, and the glow disappeared from his hands. And then even more strangely, he asked in a calm voice, "Sorun, what's really going on?"

Now confused, Sorun turned his head to Silver. He wasn't upset like Sorun thought he would be. He figured he'd feel betrayed that Sorun was just giving up, leaving Silver to do everything on his own and make his own way back to Mobius Prime, and really he wouldn't have blamed him. Instead of that he saw the white hedgehog giving him a patient, but expectant expression. There was even a hint of worry behind his eyes, and Sorun already felt that look chipping away at his defenses.

"I just told you what's going on," Sorun attempted, but he already didn't sound sure of himself, and the short sigh Silver made told him he wasn't buying it.

"Sorun, this is the first time you've ever acted like this, and before this all you wanted to do was go back to Mobius Prime. I don't see what could have changed leaving you alone for a couple of hours," Silver said. "And you're way too nice a person to actually do something like just give up like this. So come on. Tell me what's going on."

It was a somewhat naïve observation, if not accurate. There were so many ways Sorun could have refuted it, but he just couldn't. Not with that soft glare Silver was giving him. Because dammit, he just liked him too much to lie so overtly. And after all they'd been through he at least deserved the truth of the matter.

Groaning out loudly, Sorun sat up and moved so that he was sitting on the edge of the lounge chair, facing Silver. He took the sunglasses off, stared at the colorful lenses for a second, and then with a grunt threw them away into the sand somewhere before looking back at Silver.

"Okay, the truth." Sorun clasped his hands together and took a deep breath to steel himself before speaking. "I screwed up."

"As in...?"

Sorun grimaced and turned his head. "With a girl."

"Huh?" Silver looked to be at a loss for that explanation. "A... a girl? You're having a fit over a girl?"

"It's not just any girl," Sorun snapped out. Silver had jumped at the sudden tone change, forcing Sorun to take another deep breath before speaking. "Okay, so... imagine a girl, but she's perfect, right? Perfect everything, perfectly intelligent, perfectly compassionate, perfect... laugh and smile and..." He forced himself to stop and hung his head before the emotions could overwhelm him. "She was there, during the whole thing with Enerjak I told you about, before I went to the bad future. And at the time, I... figured what I was doing was a one-way street, that I'd be going to die, so... Silver, I did something colossally stupid, you don't even know."

"Oh, come on." How Sorun envied that casual tone Silver held. "It couldn't have been that bad."

"I kissed her before going off to die," Sorun bluntly stated, making Silver freeze. "We weren't... we were just really good friends but I thought I was gonna die and I wasn't thinking so I just... went for it. Then shoved her away and left in a portal before I could even figure out how she felt about it. Then, um, uh, here we are."

"O-oh." The gravity of the situation obviously wasn't hitting Silver, because if it had he would have had more of a reaction than that. "Like... like was it a on-the-lips kiss like in the books?"

"No, Silver."

"Did... did you want it to be on the lips?"

" Yes , Silver."

Awkwardly, Silver scratched the back of his head. "That sounds pretty rough, yeah."

"Oh, you don't say!?" Sorun yelled, lifting his head up to Silver. "I can't ever show my face around her again after what I did. I didn't have any right to do it, I-I did it just so I'd feel better before I died! We weren't in any kind of relationship or anything and I just...!" He groaned out and buried his face in his hands. It was an entirely unsalvageable mess. Completely unforgivable. There wasn't anything he could do to fix it.

"I mean... can't, can't you just talk to her about it?" Silver asked. "At the very least don't you think it'd be better for her to know you're at least alive? Everyone over there thinks you're dead right now, don't they?"

"That's the logical conclusion, yes, but fortunately, Silver, I have you to just go ahead and tell everyone I'm fine."

Silver looked uncomfortable at the thought. "Sorun, I really... you know, I really think it'd be better if you just showed up yourself." When Sorun didn't reply Silver made a small sigh. "Sorun, I'll be the first to admit I don't know anything about the person you're talking about, but you always talked about your friends like you really liked them. And for all you know you're overreacting."

Sorun shook his head. "Not with this one, Silver."

"... Okay, well, look, I asked around and it turns out that Eggman guy lives on a small island a bit offshore, so I'm gonna go ahead and visit him to ask for help," Silver said. "I don't really know what to say about this kind of thing, Sorun, and I don't know what you want me to say. But maybe think about what you're doing? Just try and figure this out while I'm gone, and I guess I'll just come get you when I have news."

He couldn't see Silver when he departed. Only the soft sound of footsteps on sand let him know he'd left, as by now Sorun was so hunched in on himself he was staring at ground. As soon as he was gone that sound was replaced by Sorun's stomach rumbling. And he didn't know what happened with his backpack full of food after the boomerang knocked him out; he'd woken up without it.

He needed somewhere quiet to think. Somewhere with food.

The closest place in this village he could find that served food was some fast food joint in the middle. Quaint enough little place: large shack with a grill behind the window, some patio tables scattered around the front, nice open view of the whole village.

Sorun hadn't chosen to sit at one of the tables. He'd chosen to just sit at the... he hesitated to call a place so small a diner, the joint's serving window that folded out into a small bar. It didn't even have more than one employee, and that one employee was a teenager with a voice so badly cracked it made Sorun wince every single time he had to hear it.

Somehow it wasn't even the worst dive he'd ever been to.

"You really sure you just want fries and nothing else? We're running a two-for-one special on burgers for four times the price." Once again Sorun flinched at the sound of the voice of the person on the other side of the grill Sorun was facing. Some teal-furred, thin-as-a-rail Mobian mouse-ferret thing, he didn't know, he gave up on trying to classify Mobians on sight. The frankly oversized braces he had on combined with the cracked voice made Sorun feel a tinge of sympathy for the other teen. Then he'd seen the nametag he had pinned on his shirt.

Dave.

"... Yeah, it's fine," Sorun hollowly answered, folding his arms on the bar while leaning forwards on it. The guy on the other side shrugged and walked off to the side where a pair of deep fryers were. "So your name's Dave, huh?"

"Cha, that's me. Dave." He started raising baskets full of fries in and out of the oil-filled fryers.

"Mm. I knew a Dave once," Sorun said. "Realest friend a guy could ask for. Kind of guy that would have solved every problem I've had in a quarter of the time it took me if he ended up in my shoes. Man, I miss that guy."

Foolish of him to get sad from seeing a name alone, but he didn't care. He missed everything from his old life, and being here in some random fast food dive with someone named Dave wasn't helping his ill-timed nostalgia trip. He was one of the things he missed most of all.

"I don't know, I mean- you're friends with the coolest guy around forever, and then one day he and everyone and everything else is just... poof, gone, like that," Sorun mumbled out. "I'm not saying I'd wish what happened to me happen to anyone else, but at least then it'd be him alive when everyone else died, you know? And unlike me Dave could actually do things, whereas me I'm just- I'm just this idiot stumbling along barely managing to hold things together, and then-"

"Food's done." A plate of fries and a side of ketchup was placed down in front of Sorun. When he looked up from the fries he saw the teenage fry cook giving him an otherwise neutral look. "Sorry, but I wasn't listening. What were you saying?"

A heavy frown settled over Sorun's features. "Nothing. Forget it," he said. Worse Dave shrugged and went back to doing whatever he was doing while Sorun looked down at his food.

French Fries had been a staple of Sorun's diet back on Earth due to the fact they were goddamn perfect. Right size for maximum grip stability, quick to eat, amazing taste, solid vector for ketchup transportation, and potatoes were a vegetable so Sorun was pretty sure they were healthy. More than that it was the food, the food he and Dave and any of their other friends would always eat at a diner while joking around about whatever.

Or he did, at least, because Dave always had to get those damn burgers.

It was a comfort food. A reminder of simpler times when Sorun's life and mental wellness wasn't hanging by a mortal threat. And that sorry excuse for a food vendor Chuck back on Mobius Prime didn't sell the damn things, jackass seemed to be under the impression hotdogs were the end-all be-all, so he was always pressed on finding some. Apparently this place had them, though, so in this time of great duress Sorun needed his fries.

So, without further hesitation, Sorun grabbed one of the fries on his plate. His expectations were already low from how limp the poor thing was, but he simply shrugged, dipped it in the ketchup, and ate it.

"... Somehow this is fry is soggy, burnt, and cold at the same time," Sorun said as he finished the fry. The ketchup was admittedly stellar, but by god that fry. He didn't even mention how it tasted like Worse Dave tried drowning the fries in salt.

Worse Dave didn't even seemed surprised at how unremarkable Sorun made the fries sound. "Yeah, we get that complaint a lot," he reported. "You don't like it?"

"Just the opposite. Tastes like home," Sorun said as he ate another fry. No matter where he went in Detroit for fries it was never consistent. Sometimes they were the best, or the worst, or were treading on some middle ground. Made the journey for fries somewhat exciting, Sorun supposed, since he never was able to guess what he was getting. Somehow this fry seemed to hit the same note as the worst he'd ever partaken in back home.

"Oh, that's great," the fry cook said. "My employer says I should try and not to feel self-conscious about the fact we use month-expired potatoes to save on costs, but so far all the complaints we've gotten have been all the normal complaints. You wouldn't mind filling out a performance review sheet for me, would you?"

"... No. Go away," Sorun requested.

Dave simply sighed. "Yeah, alright."

The Mobian went off to do whatever inside the kitchen. Sorun returned to his own fries, trying to get deep in thought but failing every time. Too focused on the fries and not wanting to focus on his problems. It was a dangerous loop, but the fries helped to take the edge off that.

He felt a presence sit down next to him. He knew who it was from all the orange and brown from the side of his vision, but she hadn't said anything, yet. She'd just sat down next to him.

"So, uh... hi." There it was. She'd started speaking after his fifth fry after sitting down. "Eatin' at Meh Burger, huh?"

"Is that really the name of this place? 'Cause I can believe it eating these fries," Sorun said as he downed another fry. "What do you want, Sticks?"

"Amy wanted me to apologize for being too, quote, 'me' to you," she explained, making Sorun snort in amusement. "Aaaand after I thought about it a bit I realized, yeah, I was wrong."

"Yeah? How's that?"

"Well, ya wear a blue coat. Everyone knows the reptilians can't see blue 'cause of their eyes, so there's no way you're with 'em. Even if you wear a coat," Sticks said. "And that Silver guy seemed pretty legit, so if he vouches for you, you're cool."

"... Ah, yes, it's so obvious. Of course." Fuck it, he'd take it if it got her off his back. "You come all this way here to tell me that or is there an actual reason you're here?"

"Just... y'know, just checkin'. Ya kind stumbled outta Amy's place in a panicked daze and she was kinda worried." She leaned in closer so her face was in his vision, eyes narrowed as she scrutinized his face. "You're looking fine now, though."

"Right, that." Sorun sighed. Both at the memory and the fact he was almost through the fries. "I suddenly remembered why I'm the biggest idiot in the multiverse and have been dealing with that. Nothing that groundshaking."

"And what's that supposed to mean?"

He didn't really want to tell her, but Silver went off somewhere and there wasn't really any other sympathetic ears in sight. Not that Sorun thought he'd find one in Sticks, but upon further review, he realized he didn't have anything better to do right now than to air his dirty laundry out. So, rolling his eyes, he decided to go for it.

"As far as stories go it's about as sad and pathetic as you could get," Sorun started. "A fool of a fool decided to go on a suicide mission 'cause the whole world was doomed because of a guy in a stupid gold mask. But there was also this girl he had this super huge crush on, so, figuring he was gonna die within the next hour, he decided to go for it, kissed her on the forehead and then left without further explanation. Then the fool did his thing, stupid gold mask man was stopped, planet was saved."

"Okay?" Sorun was honestly surprised Sticks managed to follow along to the entire story. "So what's the problem here?"

"I survived."

Well now he was just impressed at how she was maintaining a straight face. "Were you not supposed to live or something?" she asked.

"Sticks, at the time the method I was using to beat the guy had a hundred percent chance of killing me. I was dead-certain I was gonna die. Still went with it, though, 'cause one guy's life versus the whole planet, no-brainer, so I made a choice. Then a bunch of nonsense happened and I lived, so now here I am trying to get back with Silver," Sorun said. "It'd be great if it weren't for the fact I did the absolute worst thing possible by doing that kiss and then dip out right after."

"Why?"

"'Cause I never really told her how I feel, we were just really good friends, so what I did was really bad."

"Why?"

"Because you... because you don't just go and kiss someone without consulting their feelings. It's beyond rude, invasive even." Sorun rested his head against his palm and leaned his elbow against the counter. "I mean maybe she won't look too hard into it 'cause it was just a forehead kiss, I got that going for me, but god, man, I really don't think that'll matter."

"Why?"

"You say why one more time, Sticks," Sorun warned, shifting his torso so he was facing her. He probably would have lashed out if she was grinning at him, but her face was just that of a curious person. But instead of being angry with her he thought more on that question, on why, and he found himself coming up blank. "I don't know, Sticks," he admitted, "I guess I just don't wanna face the fact I did wrong by someone I respect more than I respect myself. In itself not that high a bar, but in her case she far exceeded that bar. I mean she does all these things for me, even gave me a house for crying out loud, literally a house, and how do I repay her? Doin' that? She got devastated the first time I died, so I don't even know how she's reacting with this one."

Sticks leaned her head back in surprise. "Does... you dying over there happen a lot?"

"That's the thing, it's actually pretty common over there," Sorun glumly replied. "But in the end I don't know, except that I managed to hurt her one way or another. And I'm such a terrible person I didn't even remember doing it 'til that talk at Amy's house. 'Cause her name just accidentally came up. Maybe I subconsciously blocked the memory knowing how bad I screwed up, maybe I just had too much going on, I don't know. But it happened. And now I'm here."

"And your plan for dealing with that is eating the worst fries on the island?"

"It's gotten me this far," Sorun said as he ate his last fry. "I kind of just don't really want to deal with it. Think maybe I'll stay here."

At hearing that, Sticks snorted. "That just sounds stupid."

Tapping his empty plate, Sorun muttered, "Yeah, Silver thought it was pretty stupid, too."

"Ah-huh, I bet." Sticks shifted around in her stool a little bit, and then said, "Listen, Sorun, I ain't really good at the whole feelings thing, so everyone else usually just handles that for me. But even I can see running from your problems isn't gonna help you out that much."

"... Probably not, no..."

"Even then if you really like this girl so much don'tcha think ya owe it to her to at least let her know you're still around? Even if she smacks ya around for what ya did? You're bein' a moron, you should just go back."

She wasn't even wrong. He did owe that much to Nicole. And if not that Nicole at least deserved to know he wasn't dead. Good old Nicole, who always went out of her way to help Sorun when he didn't really deserve to be helped. Good old Nicole, who visited him every day when he was in such a sad state he couldn't even speak after seeing what happened to Earth. Good old Nicole, who was honestly the best video game partner and friend he could have asked for in that world.

He'd done a phenomenally shit job repaying all that kindness by doing what he did. The worst part was the more he thought on it, the more Sorun severely doubted, would stake his life on it, she'd go so far as to hit him over it when she didn't have a violent bone in her digital body. Sorun felt that made what she could do instead that much worse.

But... there was some truth in those blunt words of Sticks'. He couldn't leave it how he left it. And if he was being honest with himself, if he really did stay here Sorun knew he couldn't escape that damn question of 'what if he just went back?' for however long he stayed here. Could see it growing worse with every passing day until he eventually caved and just went back anyways, and made the situation all the worse for it.

"Fuck it, guess I'm going back after all. For Nicole." Surely a disaster waiting to happen, but he could accept it was a disaster of his making. Whatever happened was on him and him alone, and he could live with that. People that actually cared about him deserved to see him alive and kicking, anyways. "Guess I'll finish here and do what I need to go back," Sorun said, fully turning in his stool to face Sticks. "Thank you for... helping me with this, Sticks. You're not that bad."

She waved a hand at him, smiling slightly. "Eh, you're not so bad yourself. And hey, I really am sorry for the whole boomerang thing. Even if it kinda sounds like ya need some sense beaten into ya's."

"That I do," Sorun agreed in an amused tone, watching as Sticks pushed herself off the stool. "So what's next for you?"

She shrugged. "I dunno. Go home to my burrow, maybe. Got a pet that needs walkies. Should probably be heading home yourself." She walked off after speaking, turning around to call out, "See ya!" before turning back around to leave. Sorun quickly lost sight of her, and made a weak wave of his own at her back.

"Bye. Man, what a weirdo." With that done Sorun spun back around towards the bar to attend to his empty plate. And then he jumped in his seat when he saw the fry cook from earlier standing there. Just... staring, and not doing anything else. Sorun looked to the left and right, not seeing anybody else. He turned back to the cook and asked, "Did... were you just listening to that whole thing?"

"Pretty much, yeah. It's a slow day and I don't have anything else to do," he admitted.

"I really don't like you."

He didn't looked fazed in the slightest. "Yeah... I get that a lot, too. So anyways, it's five seventy-nine for the fries."

"Five seventy-nine!?"

"Yeah, you got the medium size which we charge for the same as a large but with twice the smiles."

"You... haven't smiled once during this whole thing," Sorun pointed out. When the braces-wearing Mobian just shrugged he sighed out and reached into his pocket.

It was only then Sorun realized that he didn't have any money from this world.

"Uh-oh." Shortsighted by grief yet again, it seemed. He slowly removed his hand from his pocket, asking Dave, "So any chance you have a tab system up and running, or...?"

Sorun winced when he shook his head. "Uh, noooo, dude, you really need to pay or I'll call the cops."

"I see." Sorun swallowed thickly as Dave took his plate and walked it over to a nearby sink in the kitchen. He looked down at his feet, where the Chaos Emerald was resting against the stool he was sitting on. sorun then looked up and took a quick glance around the perimeter. There was nobody else around. "You know, it's situations like this that remind me of the lessons imparted onto me by the streets of Detroit."

"Um, whatever that is," Dave said as he ran the plate under the faucet. "I'm also gonna have to ask you to pay in exact change, the register hasn't been working for a month and I can't really-" When he turned around from the sink after dropping the plate in he saw the stool Sorun was sitting on was empty. "Huh?"

That was as far as he got before Sorun rushed in from behind him, sword in hand. He held the sheathed katana in front of Dave, grasped both its end and the handle, and pulled it towards himself and against Dave's throat.

The Mobian's eyes bulged out, and instantly he began making gagging noises as his airflow was cut off. The gagging noises soon turned into choking sounds, and his arms rose up in an attempt to try and pry the blunt implement off of his throat. This only caused Sorun to pull the sheathed sword harder against his throat, making him quietly wheeze as he attempted to reach behind him, though this was in vain as his arms couldn't reach Sorun.

Sinking down to his knees, Dave's wheezes and movements began to grow quieter and slower the longer the sword was pressed against his neck. His body began to list off to the side, eyelids blinking slower and slower as he began to still. It was after Sorun felt no struggling at all that he removed the sword from his neck, and then pulled his body to the side so that his unconscious form was leaning up against the bottom of the grill on the other side of the bar.

"Man, that was... surprisingly easy, wow, you really must be the wimpiest Mobian around," Sorun whispered out as he finished propping up Dave's body. He'd only gone for the choke in the first place because he didn't want to cause too much damage with the Bringer Claws, but even then he'd expected more resistance than almost none at all from a Mobian. Maybe in this zone they just weren't all that up to snuff compared to Prime Zone Mobians. Or Dave was just that unfortunate, and after eating those fries, Sorun could believe it.

He got up, ready to make his egress from the stand to get away from his crime as quickly as possible. He bolted towards the back door leading out of the shack, but then froze halfway when he saw something sitting on a nearby counter. There, next to a bunch of other condiments. A nearly full bottle of ketchup. The same ketchup he'd had with those fries.

After a moment's deliberation Sorun backtracked, grabbed the bottle of ketchup, and then stuffed it into one of his pockets. And then he'd exited the shack and ran away from it as fast as possible.

"Alright, boat, boat, gotta find a boat, need a boat, where's a boat?"

